Yesterday brought the second of the Tuesday afternoon series of Symphony Concerts. The first, of a few weeks ago, offered only the classics, Bach, Mozart and Beethoven. Yesterday's list was, on the other hand, as emphatically romantic, comprising as it did Schumann's Overture to "Manfred" and Second Symphony and Wagner's Preludes to "Lohengrin," to the first and third acts of "Die Meistersinger," and "The Ride of the Valkyries."

Save for the "Lohengrin" Prelude, the Wagner excerpts were all heard at the recent Pension Fund Concert, while the Schumann Symphony had place not long ago at a Friday and Saturday pair. The "Manfred" Overture, however, had never before appeared on one of Dr. Koussevitzky's Boston programmes, though his plans for his initial season here once included a performance of the whole of Schumann's music to Byron's play, enlisting the services of solo singers, a chorus and a reader. The Overture itself has more than once been called the finest of Schumann's orchestral compositions. In it is a sweep and a freedom, a passion and a dramatic quality certainly not to be found in any of the symphonies. It received from Dr. Koussevitzky and the orchestra yesterday a performance of expected eloquence, and it is to be hoped that the conductor will see fit to play the piece ere long at the regular concerts.

Even more successfully than before did Dr. Koussevitzky yesterday reveal the beauties and conceal the defects of Schumann's long and uneven Symphony. The performances of the Wagnerian fragments, tintured here and there with the conductor's individual approach to the music, were effective and much relished by the large audience which, in fact, took exceptional pleasure in the entire concert.

TUESDAY SYMPHONY

The first concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's Tuesday series took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. The program included Bach's Brandenburg Concerto No. 3, G major for strings; Mozart's Symphony, E flat major (K. 543); Beethoven's Symphony, C minor, No. 5. Dr. Koussevitzky conducted.

These compositions were all played by the orchestra this season, and the perfection of the performances has already been praised. The playing of a symphony by Mozart tests the proficiency of an orchestra severely, more so than any excerpt from Wagner's music dramas or any wild work of an ultra-modern. It also tests the taste and musical sensitiveness of a conductor. How successfully leader and players meet this test was again made known; as was the brilliancy of the string section in Bach's concerto. The audience that filled all parts of the hall was enthusiastic over the program and the performance.

The object of these Tuesday afternoon concerts is to show symphonic development from the time of Bach to the present day. May one venture to remark that it might be interesting to present with a reduced orchestra works by the lesser known contemporaries of Bach and Mozart? Haydn, of course, is represented in the series of 24 concerts, but only a few, two or three, of his many symphonies are performed in the course of years and they are repeated again and again. One of the earlier symphonies by Mozart would be a refreshing novelty: there are works by him, not dignified by the name of symphonic, that, wholly unknown to these audiences, would be refreshingly novel. And is it not possible that frequent performances of Beethoven's symphonies are injurious to the symphonies themselves, making them too familiar so that their great value is taken as a matter of course?

The next concert of the Tuesday series will be on Jan. 7. H. L. M.

BOSTON SYMPHONY

Herald By PHILIP HALE Jan 12, 1930
The third concert of the Tuesday afternoon series given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Koussevitzky conductor, took place yesterday in Symphony hall. The program was as follows: Schubert, Overture to "Rosamunde" and the first Ballet, also the "Unfinished" Symphony; Strauss, "Death and Transfiguration" and "The Eulenspiegel."

The music from Schubert's music for the half-crazed Wilhelmine von Chezy's drama reminds one of his little success when he attempted to write operas and of his lack of taste in choosing librettos and poems for many of his songs. His musical nature was pre-eminently lyrical. In some of his songs he showed uncommon dramatic force, but not in his operas, and though there have been attempts in recent years to revive one or two of them—even with a new libretto—they have obtained only a respectful hearing. He was as indifferent in transferring the overture for one opera to another as the great Rossini. Take this overture to "Rosamunde": it first prefaced a melodrama; later "Rosamunde," also his operetta, "Der Vierjahrige Posten," while the overture that really belonged to "Rosamunde"

and revolving wheels," and so on, and so on.

The overture to "Rosamunde" was written hurriedly and in the prevailing Italian form of that day. The music is melodious, but it is in the charming ballet music that the true Schubert is revealed. This and the symphony were finely performed.

It was good to hear the two tone-poems of Strauss in close intraposition and so brilliantly played. When "Death and Transfiguration" was first heard in New York, a prominent critic in New York spoke of it as a charnel-house piece. When "Till Eulenspiegel" was produced in Boston, a scholarly critic wrote that it was the work of a madman, while a musician of high standing and fame said Strauss's tone-poems, they are not music; they belong to another and new art. Brethren, we should watch our steps in 1930, lest we stumble and fall, to the amusement of men in 1960.

Of the two-tone poems played yesterday, "Till" is indisputably the greater work. It is more personally Strauss himself. "Death and Transfiguration," however masterly the performance, has not the amazing vitality of "Till Eulenspiegel," in which the genius of the composer shines triumphantly. The fever of the dying man in the other tone poem no longer excites the anxiety of those in the sick room; his sentimental recollections when he is not

Symphony Concert

By PHILIP HALE

The fourth concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra's Tuesday afternoon series, Dr. Koussevitzky, conductor, took place yesterday in Symphony hall. The program was as follows: Handel, Concerto Grosso for strings, op. 6, No. 10. Haydn, Symphony with the Horn Call. Tchaikovsky, "Pathetic" symphony.

The audience—it completely filled the hall—was enthusiastic and justly so. It was even tempted to break rules and applaud after each movement of Haydn's fresh, gay and delightful symphony with its florid solo measures for various instruments. It was impressed by Handel's majesty and tenderness; by Tchaikovsky's symphony, that Iliad of woe. No wonder that Dr. Koussevitzky will take Haydn's symphony to New York next week. Has it ever been heard there? Had it been performed in this country before the Symphony concerts of last week?

The eloquent reading of Tchaikovsky's symphony and the music itself

again excited surprise at the attitude of the French toward this composer and his orchestral works. Whenever a Parisian conductor ventures to put one of the symphonies on a program, the vials of contempt and wrath are uncorked. Rimsky-Korsakov on the contrary is applauded. Tchaikovsky's "Pathetic" symphony is especially the abomination of desolation to the Parisian critics. They find nothing in it; but they find all the terms of critical abuse. Perhaps their attitude comes from a dislike of the aggressively personal note; the wailing, the pessimism. Rimsky's music, his delicacy, his super-refined instrumentation are much more to their taste. Nor was Tchaikovsky highly regarded by the big "Five." He was an outsider; not a true Russian composer; he had been Germanized and so on. Cesar Cui was especially bitter; one might say small-minded, incapable of appreciating the strength in what they called Tchaikovsky's weakness. Yet within a year one finds Stravinsky, for a time ultra-Russian, now deliberately attempting to write in Tchaikovsky's vein or even borrowing from him and acknowledging gratefully the debt.

The next of the Tuesday concerts will be on March 11.

SYMPHONY IN 2ND MATINEE

Romantic List Played for

Tuesday Series

Jan 8, 1930, Pub
Yesterday brought the second of the Tuesday afternoon series of Symphony Concerts. The first, of a few weeks ago, offered only the classics, Bach, Mozart and Beethoven. Yesterday's list was, on the other hand, as emphatically romantic, comprising as it did Schumann's Overture to "Manfred" and Second Symphony and Wagner's Preludes to "Lohengrin," to the first and third acts of "Die Meistersinger," and "The Ride of the Valkyries."

Save for the "Lohengrin" Prelude, the Wagner excerpts were all heard at the recent Pension Fund Concert, while the Schumann Symphony had place not long ago at a Friday and Saturday pair. The "Manfred" Overture, however, had never before appeared on one of Dr. Koussevitzky's Boston programmes, though his plans for his initial season here once included a performance of the whole of Schumann's music to Byron's play, enlisting the services of solo singers, a chorus and a reader. The Overture itself has more than once been called the finest of Schumann's orchestral compositions. In it is a sweep and a freedom, a passion and a dramatic quality certainly not to be found in any of the symphonies. It received from Dr. Koussevitzky and the orchestra yesterday a performance of expected eloquence, and it is to be hoped that the conductor will see fit to play the piece ere long at the regular concerts.

Even more successfully than before did Dr. Koussevitzky yesterday reveal the beauties and conceal the defects of Schumann's long and uneven Symphony. The performances of the Wagnerian fragments, tintured here and there with the conductor's individual approach to the music, were effective and much relished by the large audience which, in fact, took exceptional pleasure in the entire concert.

TUESDAY SYMPHONY

The first concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's Tuesday series took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. The program included Bach's Brandenburg Concerto No. 3, G major for strings; Mozart's Symphony, E flat major (K. 543); Beethoven's Symphony, C minor, No. 5. Dr. Koussevitzky conducted.

These compositions were all played by the orchestra this season, and the perfection of the performances has already been praised. The playing of a symphony by Mozart tests the proficiency of an orchestra severely, more so than any excerpt from Wagner's music dramas or any wild work of an ultra-modern. It also tests the taste and musical sensitiveness of a conductor. How successfully leader and players meet this test was again made known; as was the brilliancy of the string section in Bach's concerto. The audience that filled all parts of the hall was enthusiastic over the program and the performance.

The object of these Tuesday afternoon concerts is to show symphonic development from the time of Bach to the present day. May one venture to remark that it might be interesting to present with a reduced orchestra works by the lesser known contemporaries of Bach and Mozart? Haydn, of course, is represented in the series of 24 concerts, but only a few, two or three, of his many symphonies are performed in the course of years and they are repeated again and again. One of the earlier symphonies by Mozart would be a refreshing novelty: there are works by him, not dignified by the name of symphonic, that, wholly unknown to these audiences, would be refreshingly novel. And is it not possible that frequent performances of Beethoven's symphonies are injurious to the symphonies themselves, making them too familiar so that their great value is taken as a matter of course?

The next concert of the Tuesday series will be on Jan. 7. H. L. M.

BOSTON SYMPHONY

Herald By PHILIP HALE Feb. 12, 1930
The third concert of the Tuesday afternoon series given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Koussevitzky conductor, took place yesterday in Symphony hall. The program was as follows: Schubert, Overture to "Rosamunde" and the first Ballet, also the "Unfinished" Symphony; Strauss, "Death and Transfiguration" and "The Eulenspiegel."

The music from Schubert's music for the half-crazed Wilhelmine von Chezy's drama reminds one of his little success when he attempted to write operas and of his lack of taste in choosing librettos and poems for many of his songs. His musical nature was pre-eminently lyrical. In some of his songs he showed uncommon dramatic force, but not in his operas, and though there have been attempts in recent years to revive one or two of them—even with a new libretto—they have obtained only a respectful hearing. He was as indifferent in transferring the overture for one opera to another as the great Rossini. Take this overture to "Rosamunde": it first prefaced a melodrama; later "Rosamunde," also his operetta, "Der Vierjaehrige Posten," while the overture that really belonged to "Rosamunde" afterward served "Alfonso and Estrella."

When Liszt revived this opera at Weimar the overture then performed was one by Rubinstein—Liszt wrote in a hifalutin manner of Schubert's failures on the operatic stage. "His sublime Muse with gaze fixed ever in the clouds, preferred to cast her azure mantle over asphodel fields, woods and mountains, and was unversed in the artificial raiment in which the dramatic muse moves cautiously between curtain and footlights. His winged strophes took alarm at the rattle of machinery and revolving wheels," and so on, and so on.

The overture to "Rosamunde" was written hurriedly and in the prevailing Italian form of that day. The music is melodious, but it is in the charming ballet music that the true Schubert is revealed. This and the symphony were finely performed.

It was good to hear the two tone-poems of Strauss in close intraposition and so brilliantly played. When "Death and Transfiguration" was first heard in New York, a prominent critic in New York spoke of it as a charnel-house piece. When "Till Eulenspiegel" was produced in Boston, a scholarly critic wrote that it was the work of a madman, while a musician of high standing and fame said Strauss's tone-poems, they are not music; they belong to another and new art. Brethren, we should watch our steps in 1930, lest we stumble and fall, to the amusement of men in 1960.

Of the two-tone poems played yesterday, "Till" is indisputably the greater work. It is more personally Strauss himself. "Death and Transfiguration," however masterly the performance, has not the amazing vitality of "Till Eulenspiegel," in which the genius of the composer shines triumphantly. The fever of the dying man in the other tone poem no longer excites the anxiety of those in the sick room; his sentimental recollections when he is not delirious, no longer affect those standing by his bed; only in the transfiguration section does the structural proficiency of the composer, his building with material that in itself is not remarkable, compel admiration. The performance of the Rondo—for such in effect "Till" is, was amazingly brilliant, showing as it did the incomparable elasticity and euphony that this orchestra has attained under Dr. Koussevitzky.

The next concert of the series will be on Feb. 25.

Wednesday and Thursday
May Step-4
Silk
Ray

20c

16x32, all s, with ray or usc. each

$2.95

voice of sev-spreads with each

sky's symphony and the music itself

Tchaikovsky's from him and acknowledging gratefully the debt.

The next of the Tuesday concerts will be on March 11.

As the Tuesday Symphonies End

Man's. — Apr. 23, 1932
YESTERDAY afternoon the Tuesday Symphony series, the last to begin in the season, was the first to come to a close. They ended with a concert that included Beethoven, even as they had begun with a concert that included Beethoven. In the first concert Beethoven was coupled with Bach and Mozart. Yesterday Beethoven was joined with Brahms. It has been a series, as the Tuesday series usually is, in which almost all of the great ones have contributed of their choicest works: Bach and Handel; Haydn, Mozart and Beethoven; Schubert, Schumann and Wagner (of the Romanticists, Mendelssohn and Berlioz were omitted this year); Franck, Brahms and Chaikovsky; Strauss, Debussy and Ravel. Of the more recent moderns there were none. A single novelty—Ravel's "Bolero"—stood upon the season's program.

Yesterday afternoon the orchestra played two symphonies and an overture. The symphonies were Beethoven's sixth, called the "Pastoral"; Brahms's fourth. The overture was Beethoven's so-called "Leonore No. 3." The program, about five minutes short of two hours, would have been long enough without the overture. But the number of late-comers amply justified the presence of an overture at the beginning. Even with the overture for first piece, there were those who did not see fit to arrive until after the first movement of the symphony. And the continuity of the "Pastoral" prefers to remain unbroken.

Dr. Koussevitzky was entirely in the vein with this music. The gentle, placid "Pastoral" went its way through smiling fields; by the side of the purling brook; through the droll peasant dances; through the storm with the sunshine just around the corner, the storm which makes its point just as surely as though it had been set loose by Straussian or Stravinskian machinery, the storm, however, which would not drive many a hardy soul indoors; and finally, through the pious thanksgivings and rejoicing of the good peasant folk. Such qualities the conductor emphasizes in this score. The deeply emotional he does not seek there; the flashingly brilliant he does not superimpose upon this music; the aggressively stirring he does not distill out of it. The

is in July. Things are not in. c. Wisely, Dr. Kousead them into it. The aret Deving he attempts—and John Hishes—of allowing this
n, to Dr its restrained course.
et, R. I. color, placid in emoluncheon To give it interest in itry Clublances is not much less interpretation. Beetho-

Howesnor, contemplating Na-
arymoun music, that is the con-er fiancé it.

lege and even in whom are min-
ng and drowsy summer,
ahms of mellow, darken-ualties. The programprehensive researches dis-hms once had doubts

of this, his last sym-ubts the world has long
To us the towering out-

yet rich glowing moods
a second movement the odies blend in "unbeliev-

oods of restrained exalta-of high and noble res-ard shows energies and those of the convenn some points of view

en Beethovenian scherzos.

the passacaglia, com-difficulties of construcined musical and emo-

Thus to character the e symphony is no more he beauties of the music

rd day afternoon—as Dr.
nceives it, brings it to ne was when Brahms's

s considered drab and o one has reasonably orchestration was highly

fty thought of Brahms.
Dr. Koussevitzky, no
ernoon, would have im-

adjectives could ever to the Brahmsian man-
orchestra.

ethoven's overture was h curtain-raiser in yes-f things, it was thrilling

ience. That it is high concentrated form, has place of commentators

The successive moods
elling force; the trum-
k-stage are unexpected

ll for the uninitiated
all but the most hope-
of the blasé there are

ay afternoon concerts.
A. H. M.

SYMPHONY HALL

Wednesday, May 7

OPENING NIGHT

45th Season

POPS

Orchestra of 80 Symphony
Players

ARTHUR FIEDLER, Conductor

PROGRAMME

- | | |
|---------------------------------------------------------------|------------|
| 1. POMP and CIRCUMSTANCE | Elgar |
| 2. OVERTURE to "Mignon" | Thomas |
| 3. ROSENKAVALIER WALTZES | R. Strauss |
| 4. FANTASIA "Aida" | Verdi |
| | |
| 5. SIEGFRIED'S RHINE JOURNEY from "Götterdämmerung" | Wagner |
| 6. TAMBOURIN CHINOIS | Kreisler |
| 7. BOLERO | Ravel |
| | |
| 8. SELECTION, "New Moon" | Romberg |
| 9. WHISPERING FLOWERS | Blon |
| 10. AMERICAN FANTASY | Herbert |

As the Tuesday Symphonies End

Inman. Apr. 23, 1930
YESTERDAY afternoon the Tuesday Symphony series, the last to begin in the season, was the first to come to a close. They ended with a concert that included Beethoven, even as they had begun with a concert that included Beethoven. In the first concert Beethoven was coupled with Bach and Mozart. Yesterday Beethoven was joined with Brahms. It has been a series, as the Tuesday series usually is, in which almost all of the great ones have contributed of their choicest works: Bach and Handel; Haydn, Mozart and Beethoven; Schubert, Schumann and Wagner (of the Romanticists, Mendelssohn and Berlioz were omitted this year); Franck, Brahms and Chaikovsky; Strauss, Debussy and Ravel. Of the more recent moderns there were none. A single novelty—Ravel's "Bolero"—stood upon the season's program.

Yesterday afternoon the orchestra played two symphonies and an overture. The symphonies were Beethoven's sixth, called the "Pastoral"; Brahms's fourth. The overture was Beethoven's so-called "Leonore No. 3." The program, about five minutes short of two hours, would have been long enough without the overture. But the number of late-comers amply justified the presence of an overture at the beginning. Even with the overture for first piece, there were those who did not see fit to arrive until after the first movement of the symphony. And the continuity of the "Pastoral" prefers to remain unbroken.

Dr. Koussevitzky was entirely in the vein with this music. The gentle, placid "Pastoral" went its way through smiling fields; by the side of the purling brook; through the droll peasant dances; through the storm with the sunshine just around the corner, the storm which makes its point just as surely as though it had been set loose by Straussian or Stravinskian machinery, the storm, however, which would not drive many a hardy soul indoors; and finally, through the pious thanksgivings and rejoicing of the good peasant folk. Such qualities the conductor emphasizes in this score. The deeply emotional he does not seek there; the flashingly brilliant he does not superimpose upon this music; the aggressively stirring he does not distill out of it. The

is in July. eh things are not in-
c. Wisely, Dr. Kousead them into it. The aret Deving he attempts—and y John Hishes—of allowing this
n, to Dr its restrained course.
et, R. I. color, placid in emo-
luncheonTo give it interest in try Clublanes is not much less interpretation. Beetho-
Howesnor, contemplating Na-
arymoun music, that is the con-
er fiancé it.

lege an even in whom are min-
ng and drowsy summer,
ahms of mellow, darken-ualities. The program-rehensive researches dis-ahms once had doubts
of this, his last sym-
ubts the world has long
To us the towering out-
yet rich glowing moods
n a second movement the odies blend in unbelievmoods of restrained exalta-
of high and noble res-rd shows energies and d those of the conven-
n some points of view
en Beethovenian scherzos.
the passacaglia, com-
s difficulties of construcined musical and emo-
Thus to character the ie symphony is no more he beauties of the music
rd day afternoon—as Dr.
nceives it, brings it to ne was when Brahms's
s considered drab and no one has reasonably orchestration was highly ty thought of Brahms.
Dr. Koussevitzky, no
ernoon, would have im-
adjectives could ever
to the Brahmsian man-
orchestra.

En-Who lding de's parlefly the

, Once Pearls

ss Doris ek, well-l in the Mary's to Victor oyal St. argaret's igned by long and s. Many e congre-daughter idegroom hich was ny show's pearls d painted s ago for was dis-

Beethoven's overture was a curtain-raiser in yes-things, it was thrilling ience. That it is high concentrated form, has
place of commentators
The successive moods
elling force; the trum-
k-stage are unexpected ill for the uninitiated
all but the most hope-
of the blasé there are
ay afternoon concerts.
A. H. M.

SYMPHONY HALL

Wednesday, May 7

OPENING NIGHT

45th Season

POPS

Orchestra of 80 Symphony
Players

ARTHUR FIEDLER, Conductor

PROGRAMME

- | | |
|---------------------------------------------------------------|------------|
| 1. POMP and CIRCUMSTANCE | Elgar |
| 2. OVERTURE to "Mignon" | Thomas |
| 3. ROSENKAVALIER WALTZES | R. Strauss |
| 4. FANTASIA "Aida" | Verdi |
| | |
| 5. SIEGFRIED'S RHINE JOURNEY from "Götterdämmerung" | Wagner |
| 6. TAMBOURIN CHINOIS | Kreisler |
| 7. BOLERO | Ravel |
| | |
| 8. SELECTION, "New Moon" | Romberg |
| 9. WHISPERING FLOWERS | Blon |
| 10. AMERICAN FANTASY | Herbert |

As the Tuesday Symphonies I

Trans. — Apr. 23

YESTERDAY afternoon the Symphony series, the last in the season, was the first to come to a close. They ended with a concert that included Beethoven, even though they had begun with a concert that included Beethoven. In the first Beethoven was coupled with Bach, Mozart. Yesterday Beethoven was with Brahms. It has been a series the Tuesday series usually is, in almost all of the great ones have tributed of their choicest works: and Handel; Haydn, Mozart and hoven; Schubert, Schumann and V (of the Romanticists, Mendelssohn, Berlioz were omitted this year); Brahms and Chaikovsky; Strauss and Ravel. Of the more moderns there were none. A sing elty—Ravel's "Bolero"—stood up season's program.

Yesterday afternoon the or played two symphonies and an ov The symphonies were Beethoven's called the "Pastoral"; Brahms's The overture was Beethoven's s "Leonore No. 3." The program five minutes short of two hours, have been long enough without th ture. But the number of late amply justified the presence of a ture at the beginning. Even w overture for first piece, there w who did not see fit to arrive un the first movement of the syn And the continuity of the "Pastor fers to remain unbroken.

Dr. Koussevitzky was entirely vein with this music. The gentle "Pastoral" went its way throug ing fields; by the side of the brook; through the droll peasant through the storm with the sunsh around the corner, the storm makes its point just as surely as it had been set loose by Straus Stravinskian machinery, the stor ever, which would not drive r hardy soul indoors; and finally, the pious thanksgivings and rejo the good peasant folk. Such qual conductor emphasizes in this sco deeply emotional he does not see the flashingly brilliant he does n impose upon this music; the agg stirring he does not distill out of answer is that such things are not in-herent in the music. Wisely, Dr. Kous-sevitzky does not read them into it. The more difficult thing he attempts—and eminently accomplishes—of allowing this symphony to run its restrained course. To give it interest in these uninflated planes is not much less than marvel of interpretation. Beetho-ven in good humor, contemplating Na-ture, that is the music, that is the con-ductor's way with it.

To the Beethoven in whom are min-gled verdant spring and drowsy summer, succeeded the Brahms of mellow, darken-ing, autumnal qualities. The program-mist in his comprehensive researches dis-covered that Brahms once had doubts about the value of this, his last sym-phony. Such doubts the world has long since resolved. To us the towering out-lines, the somber yet rich glowing moods are irresistible. In a second movement the long, supple melodies blend in unbeliev-able perfection moods of restrained exalta-tion with moods of high and noble res-ignation. A third shows energies and activities beyond those of the conven-tional, yes, from some points of view beyond those even Beethovenian scherzos. While the last, the passacaglia, com-bines tremendous difficulties of construc-tion with sustained musical and emo-tional progress. Thus to character the movements of the symphony is no more than to hint at the beauties of the music as heard yesterday afternoon—as Dr. Koussevitzky conceives it, brings it to his hearers. Time was when Brahms's orchestration was considered drab and colorless. Yet no one has reasonably denied that that orchestration was highly suitable to the lofty thought of Brahms. And surely from Dr. Koussevitzky, no one yesterday afternoon, would have im-agined that such adjectives could ever have been applied to the Brahmsian man-ner of handling an orchestra.

Even though Beethoven's overture was hardly more than curtain-raiser in yes-terday's scheme of things, it was thrilling and exciting experience. That it is high drama in its most concentrated form, has been a commonplace of commentators these many years. The successive moods come with compelling force; the trum-pet calls from back-stage are unexpected and unusual thrill for the uninitiated not much less for all but the most hope-lessly blasé. And of the blasé there are few at the Tuesday afternoon concerts.

A. H. M.

SYMPHONY HALL

Wednesday, May 7

OPENING NIGHT

45th Season

POPS

Orchestra of 80 Symphony
Players

ARTHUR FIEDLER, Conductor

PROGRAMME

- | | |
|---------------------------------------------------------------|------------|
| 1. POMP and CIRCUMSTANCE | Elgar |
| 2. OVERTURE to "Mignon" | Thomas |
| 3. ROSENKAVALIER WALTZES | R. Strauss |
| 4. FANTASIA "Aida" | Verdi |
| | |
| 5. SIEGFRIED'S RHINE JOURNEY from "Götterdämmerung" | Wagner |
| 6. TAMBOURIN CHINOIS | Kreisler |
| 7. BOLERO | Ravel |
| | |
| 8. SELECTION, "New Moon" | Romberg |
| 9. WHISPERING FLOWERS | Blon |
| 10. AMERICAN FANTASY | Herbert |

320

NOTICE TO SUBSCRIBERS

FIFTIETH SEASON
1930-1931

BOSTON SYMPHONY
ORCHESTRA

Dr. SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY, Conductor

24 Friday Afternoon Concerts

24 Saturday Evening Concerts

BEGINNING OCTOBER 10-11, 1930

RENEWAL CARDS HAVE BEEN MAILED TO
ALL FRIDAY AND SATURDAY SUBSCRIBERS.
IF ANY SUBSCRIBER HAS NOT RECEIVED HIS NOTICE, HE IS REQUESTED TO ADVISE THE SUBSCRIPTION OFFICE TODAY.

W. H. BRENNAN, Manager,
Symphony Hall, Boston.

321

Bound Volumes

OF THE

Boston Symphony Orchestra
Programme

Containing

Mr. Philip Hale's analytical and descriptive notes
on all works performed during the season:

The Friday and Saturday Symphony Programmes

The Monday and Tuesday Programmes

The Young People's Concerts Programmes

"A Musical Education in One Volume"

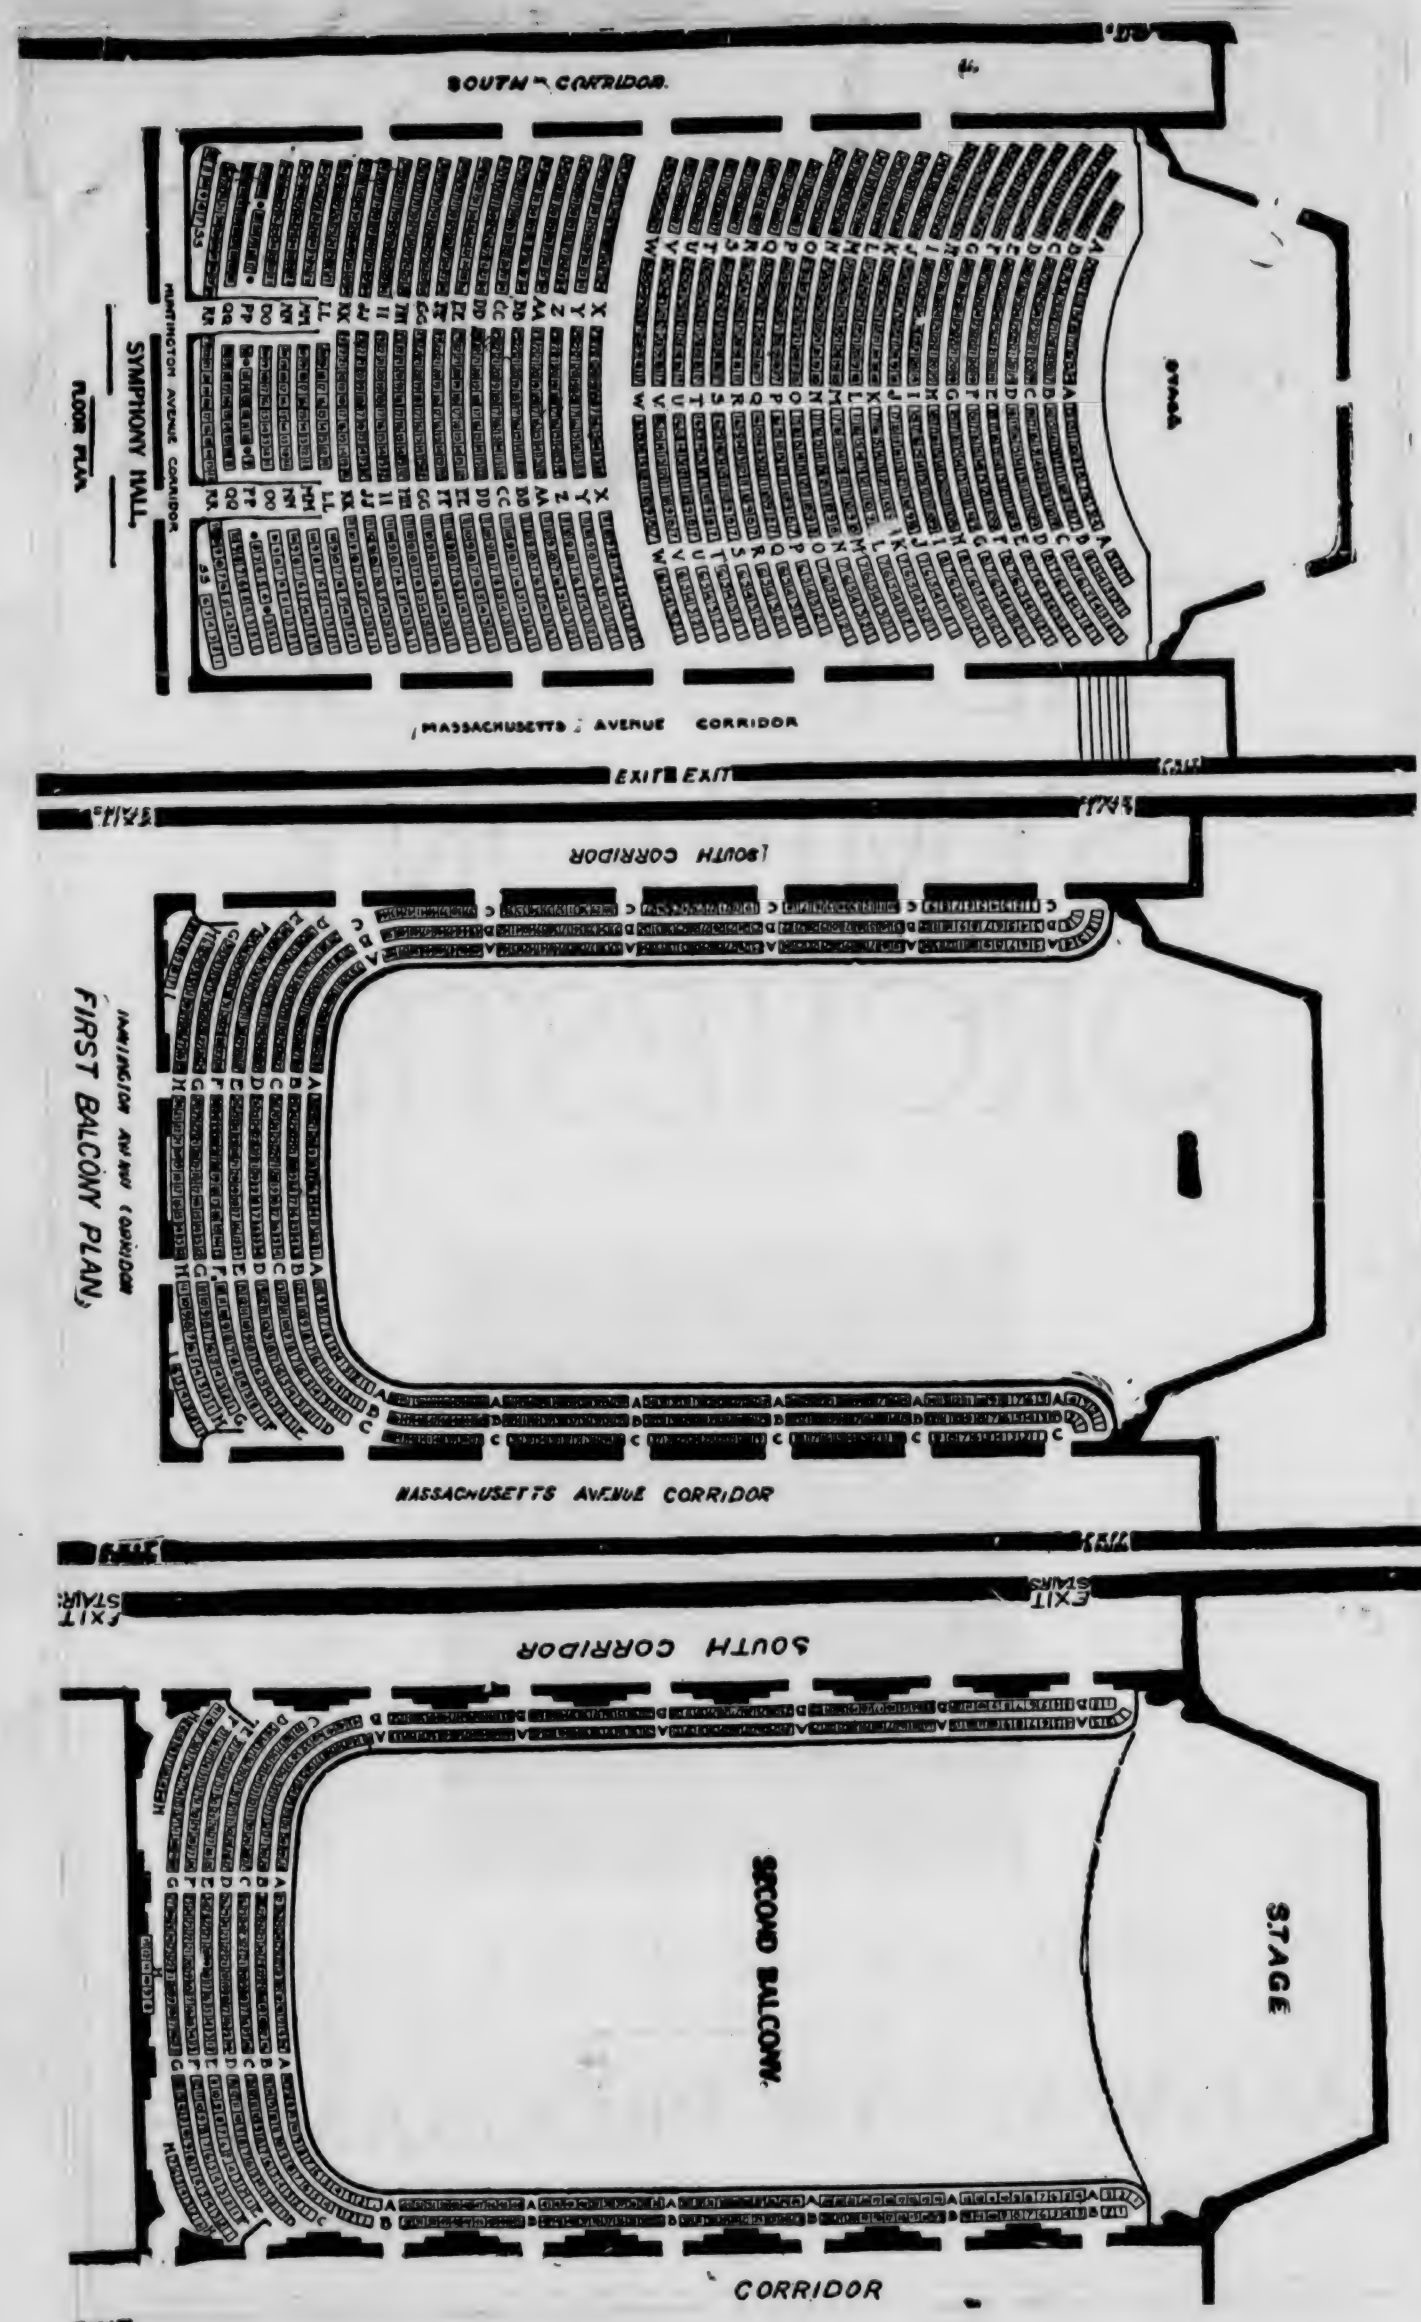

"Boston's Remarkable Book of Knowledge"

LAWRENCE GILMAN in the
N. Y. Herald and Tribune

Price $6.00 per volume

Address

SYMPHONY HALL
BOSTON, MASS.

ARTHUR FIEDLER

announced as the next conductor of

THE POPS

FORTY-FIFTH SEASON TO OPEN MAY 7, 1930

AT SYMPHONY HALL, BOSTON

Lightening Boston's Pops

Reviving The Pops

Timely Task for Which Arthur Fiedler Seems the Fittest Man

NO easy task faces Arthur Fiedler, announced this morning as conductor of the Pop Concerts through next spring and summer. The balance of the programs has admittedly gone awry. A new conductor must restore the happy proportion between light and serious numbers, between classic, modern and popular items, to which relation "The Pops" have long owed their vogue. There are many publics to please; some indeed to be won back after a year or two of abstinence; one or another, perhaps, to be restrained, since it would have the concerts too routinized and muted.

Fortunately, Mr. Fiedler knows them all. Like them, he is native to this town—the first conductor of The Pops to be such. Fortunately also, he is a musician of flexible mind and wide-ranging taste, asking only of a given piece that it be of interest and merit in the kind, whether Beethoven or George Gershwin is the signature. He has also the knack of pleasing an audience without yielding too often or too much to its chance whims. He spurs his men and they work for him. It is an open secret that of late he has revitalized the chorus of The Cecilia. By the same token it is his turn to revitalize The Pops, of late gone dull. Three months more and most of us may be applauding not only "Bolero" but also "Strike Up the Band."

Boston Transcript, Feb. 4, 1930.

Appointment of Arthur Fiedler as conductor of Boston's Symphony Hall Pop concerts next spring promises well for the continued success of that characteristic institution. Every spring, for forty-five years, at the close of the regular Boston Symphony Orchestra season, it has been the custom to clear away the seats from the floor, to install tables and to embark upon a two-months season of popular concerts, with refreshments available. These concerts have always been popular. With prohibition they became more popular and more successful. They are a pleasant and a typical feature of Boston life.

Like most human institutions, the Pops require occasional overhauling and modification to adapt them to the changing times. Unfortunately, during the last few years, progress has been made a bit too rapidly. Pops' programs had come to be hardly "lighter" than those of the regular symphony season. Result, a falling off in attendance.

Clearly, a more moderate policy was in order. Good standards of music must be maintained, of course; but it was not desirable to frighten off musical explorers by offering them programs of too forbidding mien. It was possible to soften these rigors now and then with more caressing zephyrs.

Who could best accomplish this result, restore the Pops to popularity and build up new supporters? Since last summer it has been apparent to well-informed observers that Mr. Fiedler was the man. For five weeks in July and August he conducted popular symphony concerts on the Charles River Basin Esplanade. During that time he built programs that struck a happy medium between the severely classic and the popular, thereby attracting constantly increasing audiences. Here, obviously, was the man to restore the Symphony Hall Pops.

EDITORIAL

Christian Science Monitor, Feb. 6, 1930.

POPS BACK TO NORMAL THIS YEAR

Light, Semi-Serious Music Blended at Opening

May 8, 1930 Pmt
BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

The Pops, beginning their 45th season at Symphony Hall last evening, looked both forward and backward. The hall, itself, newly and gaily dressed and decorated by no less distinguished a hand than that of Robert Edmond Jones, had been reincarnated as a fitting home for lighter musical pleasures. But the programme that Arthur Fiedler had prepared for his first concert as regular conductor of the Pops was reminiscent of those of a much earlier and more innocent day.

NEW DECORATIONS

It was Mr. Jacchia who conceived the idea of turning the Pops into a supplementary season of symphonic concerts, though it remained for his successor, Mr. Casella, to bring that scheme to something approaching complete fulfillment. Mr. Casella is one of the eminent musicians of our day and he lent the Pops a glamour that they had not hitherto known. But many complained, and rightly, that under his leadership these concerts were losing their distinctive character. Now comes Mr. Fiedler with a programme savoring of the Pops of old and with more of the same sort to follow, and the grumblings will cease. The Pops are back to normal.

To return to the new decorations, the wall under the first balcony has been changed from red to green in hue; green is the color of the tables, and the chairs both in the hall and on the stage are gold. A gold trellis against a green background encircles the stage and the doors along the sides of the auditorium are bordered with the same. On each side of the stage and at the rear is set a sconce with three electric candles, and finally, the stage is framed by side portieres and a valance of tan and gold. The entire effect is singularly happy, and altogether appropriate.

Fiedler Warmly Received

And to return to Mr. Fiedler's programme, not only did it follow an earlier order that among other things placed a march as opening number, an operatic selection at the end of the first division, and a musical comedy selection in the third, but it held throughout to a judicious blending of the light and the semi-serious and avoided altogether the sort of music that requires concentrated attention on the part of the listener.

The march was Elgar's "Pomp and Circumstance"; the inevitable overture, that to Thomas' "Mignon"; the equally inevitable waltz; the chain of waltzes from Strauss' "Der Rosenkavalier"; the contrasted operatic selections were from "Aida" and "New Moon"; Blon's "Whispering of the Flowers" and Herbert's "American Fantasy," returned to their familiar places in the final division; the usual tribute to Wagner was paid by the "Rhine Journey," from "Die Goetterdaemmerung"; Kreisler's "Tambourin Chinois," appeared as the artful tid-bit; and Ravel's "Bolero," as the sensation of the recent symphony season, had its due place on the first Pops programme. It may be added that the extra pieces were not announced on a placard upheld by a member of the orchestra, as in the past. Rather was their identity left to conjecture.

Had Mr. Fiedler taken over the Pops three years ago there might have been some doubt as to his success with orchestra and audience. But during Mr. Casella's regime Mr. Fiedler, on his occasional appearances, proved his mettle as leader and established himself in popular favor, while his Esplanade concerts of last summer spread his reputation far and wide. Last evening Mr. Fiedler was received with genuine and unmistakable enthusiasm by an audience that filled every seat. The orchestra played far better for him than in the past, when it was wont to play for a conductor come from its ranks. By every sign the Pops have entered upon a new era of prosperity. Once again they are to deserve their picturesque title.

Gala Throng at Pops Opening Enjoys Program and Approves Decorations

May 8 - 1930 Herald

The Golden Era of the Pops has arrived. Those ardent seekers of good music who assembled last evening in Symphony hall to greet Mr. Arthur Fiedler, the new conductor of the 80-piece orchestra, were the first to realize this epochal event. One glance around was amazingly revelatory. Gone the hot red wall colorings, the drooping fronds which once segregated band from audience. In their place welts of grass green, cool, refreshing. Tables done in a lighter shade of green, with gold embroideries on the edges; chairs gilded as if awaiting royalty. On the stage, gray and gold lattice work for a background, reaching up to the organ pipes, and broken by colonades in pearl gray; the musicians' platforms edged with the same gray-gold effect. At each side of the proscenium dignified drapes in old gold, with a narrow border spanning the arch above. Over all a golden chandelier, resplendent and proud, with more modest wall light fixtures at the back. Even the 12 doors opening on to the flood carried the same latticed trimming. All this was the achievement of none other than Robert Edmond Jones, an artist of high reputation. It is to his everlasting credit that he chose to be consistent in his designing in that he followed in every line the original decorative scheme of the hall. Treatment and color were the innovations only.

This phase of last evening's entertainment is passed on first because it preceded the concert itself. Mr. Fiedler, the first American-born conductor of these summer concerts, came to his position and task with a splendid record of musical achievement, as violinist, pianist, leader of choral bodies, originator and conductor of last season's esplanade concerts. He was greeted vociferously, immediately turned to his program. He does not await silence from his audience. He obtains it by going ahead. He has no superfluous gestures, no marring mannerisms. Without effort he has his way with his band. His gratification at deserved applause is all-embracing. When he responds to deafening salvos his men must stand with him. That happened several times last evening.

It is as program-maker as well that Mr. Fiedler will enhance his musicianly record. Unlike his predecessors of recent years he tries to give his hearers what they as a whole want. He will not lower his own standards but he will respect a legitimate desire for music which has melody, which is comprehensible. His first-night selections indicated this attitude, his subsequent programs confirm it. Opening with Elgar's "Pomp and Circumstance," he ran through a cycle of representative composers, Thomas, Richard Strauss, Verdi, Wagner, Kreisler, Romberg, Blon, Herbert, McDowell, Gershwin, Schubert and Ravel. In fact, it was in Ravel's "Bolero," already made fairly familiar by Mr. Koussevitsky and the full symphony orchestra, that Mr. Fiedler reached the heights. A distant side drum fixes the rhythm, a piping flute the melody. Various solo instruments enter, then the strings as a unit, the brass, and all the time the drums roll louder but in that same fascinating rhythm, to a stirring climax. From that to George Gershwin's "Strike Up the Band," was anti-climax, yet not unwelcome. Said one excited miss, "I bet they like to play that kind of music themselves, for a change!"

W. E. G.

Incidents and Prospects

The first Sunday Concert under the new régime at The Pops falls on May 18. For it Mr. Fiedler has put together a Russian program. Instead of a whole Symphony, he prefers favorite symphonic fragments—the songful slow movement of Chalkovsky's Fifth Symphony, the up-swelling march movement of the "Pathetic" Symphony.

Boston Globe 1930

FIEDLER TO CONDUCT THE POP CONCERTS

Arthur Fiedler is to be the conductor of the Pop concerts next Spring, according to an announcement from Symphony Hall.

Arthur Fiedler, well known as the conductor of chamber concerts, of the Esplanade concerts last Summer, of the Cecilia Society Chorus, as pianist and viola player of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will be the first Bostonian conductor of the Pops. The coming Pops season will be the 45th. It will open on Wednesday, May 7, and will last for nine weeks. Special nights are now being engaged by schools, colleges, clubs and other organizations.

The son of Emmanuel Fiedler, for 25 years a violinist in the Boston Symphony Orchestra and one of the original members of the Kneisel Quartet, Arthur Fiedler comes of a long musical line, his grandparents (both Austrians) having been musicians. Born in Boston in 1894, Arthur Fiedler went to the Royal Academy of Music in Berlin to study, after graduating from the Boston Latin School. He studied conducting, piano and violin, but the coming of the war prevented him from graduating. Fiedler joined the Boston Symphony Orchestra in 1915.

As conductor of the "Sinfonietta" he has been a pioneer of modern music in smaller forms. He has on numerous occasions conducted special nights at the Pops. It was he who organized and instituted as well as conducted the Esplanade concerts on the Charles River Embankment last August.

327

Boston Globe 1930

FIEDLER TO CONDUCT THE POP CONCERTS

Arthur Fiedler is to be the conductor of the Pop concerts next Spring, according to an announcement from Symphony Hall.

Arthur Fiedler, well known as the conductor of chamber concerts, of the Esplanade concerts last Summer, of the Cecilia Society Chorus, as pianist and viola player of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, will be the first Bostonian conductor of the Pops. The coming Pops season will be the 45th. It will open on Wednesday, May 7, and will last for nine weeks. Special nights are now being engaged by schools, colleges, clubs and other organizations.

The son of Emmanuel Fiedler, for 25 years a violinist in the Boston Symphony Orchestra and one of the original members of the Kneisel Quartet, Arthur Fiedler comes of a long musical line, his grandparents (both Austrians) having been musicians. Born in Boston in 1894, Arthur Fiedler went to the Royal Academy of Music in Berlin to study, after graduating from the Boston Latin School. He studied conducting, piano and violin, but the coming of the war prevented him from graduating. Fiedler joined the Boston Symphony Orchestra in 1915.

As conductor of the "Sinfonietta" he has been a pioneer of modern music in smaller forms. He has on numerous occasions conducted special nights at the Pops. It was he who organized and instituted as well as conducted the Esplanade concerts on the Charles River Embankment last August.

ARTHUR FIEDLER WILL CONDUCT POP CONCERT
Feb 4, 1930, Herald.
Will Be First Bostonian to Appear In That Role

Arthur Fiedler, pianist and viola player of the Boston symphony orchestra, who organized, instituted and conducted the Esplanade concerts on the Charles river embankment last August, will be conductor of the Pop concerts next spring, according to announcement from Symphony hall.

Mr. Fiedler was born in Boston in 1894 and will be the first Bostonian to conduct the Pop concerts. He was graduated from the Boston Latin school, after which he studied in the Royal Academy of Music, Berlin. He joined the Boston symphony orchestra in 1915.

et JORDAN'S Help Summer Haven of Yo ur Summer home can be an inviting place in the country, at the seashore, or in the city. Buy Summer furnishings at Jordan's to have a charming result. The result is charming.

Bird's Eye View

The Balcony at The Re-Opening Pops

(The Sketch by V. Lee B.) May 7, 1930 -

330

331

ing From the Enthusiastic Reception Accorded Does Not Mean That the Classical Is Ignored Under the
 at Evening to Arthur Fiedler at the "Pops" Pre-New Baton but That It Is Pleasantly Relieved by Tunes ere at Symphony Hall, in Which Both the Audi-of the Lighter Sort—in Fact, Even Jazz, Good Jazz, Har ce and Members of the Orchestra Heartily Joined, a Place in the Varied Repertory Mr. Fiedler Offers Would Seem That the Gifted Conductor Has Hit Decorations by Robert Edmond Jones Make a Pleasing
 e Taste of Boston's Spring Concert-Goers. This Frame for a Pleasing Entertainment.

Concert-Chronicle

May 9, 1930 11 am
Jonny at the Pops

AGAIN the Pops are in full swing. In their new green and gold heaven Mr. Fiedler and his men played the second concert of the season last evening, were vigorously applauded by a company which all but filled Symphony Hall, responded with such eminently proper encores as Mendelssohn's "Spring Song" or Rimsky-Korsakov's "Flight of the Bumble Bee." One was not slow in discovering the good old Pops repertory; the "Rakoczy" march, the "William Tell" overture, Sibelius's "Valse Triste," Chalkovsky's "Marche Slave," a waltz, "Girls of Baden." To which was added, by way of slightly heavier fare, the prelude to Wagner's "Mastersingers." Modernism crept in with the berceuse from Stravinsky's "Firebird" and Respighi's "Pines of Rome." Modernism, novelty, operatic potpourri were all three served by selections from Krenek's "Jonny spielt auf" — of which the program book informed that it included "Shimmy, Jazz, Negro Spiritual, Blues."

It is well known that Europeans have taken to writing jazz almost more than Americans; that Herr Ernst Krenek has ventured an entire jazz opera, the much heralded and widely discussed "Jonny spielt auf." Until last evening Boston (except in Suburbia) had heard none of it. Mr. Fiedler, with the American feeling for jazz in his blood, was ideal conductor for it. Too often other conductors, holding back a little here, playing somewhat too literally there, make passages which look like perfect jazz on paper, sound tame and "proper." Not so with Mr. Fiedler. And as performance came vastly nearer the "real thing" than is often the case from symphony orchestras, the music itself sounded more "jazzy" than any which the writer has happened to hear from the platform of Symphony Hall. There were the exciting, piquing rhythms of "Shimmy" and "Jazz," the doleful slow movement of the blues, the lushly harmonized Negro spiritual. And yet the illusion was not quite complete. This type of music is so associated with the now conventionalized "jazz" orchestrations, that one said to oneself over and over again, "That passage would sound perfect with saxophones," and similar sayings almost without end. One experienced somewhat the same feeling that the habitue of a ballet might feel if suddenly and for the first time he heard ballet-music without seeing the ballet. Jazz without a jazz orchestra more than ever last evening seemed more than ever an anomaly. Good jazz and of the first water Krenek's music seems to be. But where, oh where, were the saxophones?

Through the rest of the program Mr. Fiedler proved himself adept and sensitive conductor. Imaginatively he molds the melodic line, shapes formal masses, flings out exciting rhythms. Thus last evening he gave stirring performances of the "Rakoczy" march, of "España," of Chalkovsky's Slavic march; sang persuasively the songs of the "Firebird," of various passages in "William Tell"; did an especially fine piece of work with the waltz rhythms of "Girls of Baden"; brought forth a wide range of expressive effect in Sibelius's waltz; proved his mettle in a larger way with Wagner's prelude.

"Pines of Rome" is not yet exactly routine of the "Pops." The romping and the play near the Villa Borghese, vividly portrayed, the descent to the Catacombs with poetic and mystic song, the "nature" music of the "Pines of the Janiculum," the final pounding march of the "Pines of the Appian Way" — to those who do not attend the winter concerts must have given much of the thrill of a few seasons ago when the piece was new. To those who have heard it before the novelty of the phonographic nightingale has turned into wonderment as to how well the "record" may be holding out, or how badly it may have worn. From the men of the orchestra one could learn in the intermission that at the rehearsal the "record" but not the phonograph was present. So that when the moment for Mistress Nightingale came, some accommodating soul among the men whistled her trills and warblings. And the report goes that the whistler gave excellent account of himself. Perhaps Signor Respighi and his publishers would do better to prescribe one of the various "human birds" of the vaudeville stage than the phonographic recording of an actual bird. One missed at this performance only the accumulative pounding rhythms of the march. Mr. Fiedler produced his climax, but it was more than a degree removed from the almost unbelievable Koussevitzkian ascent with this same music. A. H. M.

Pop Concert, in Bright New Dress, Delights Big First Night Audience

May 8, 1930 11 am

By L. A. SLOPER

Symphony Hall, in smart new spring garb, inaugurated last night its forty-fifth season of Pop concerts, amid scenes of enthusiasm such as have not graced a similar occasion for years.

When Arthur Fiedler, first native Bostonian conductor of these concerts, came to the podium, he received an ovation from the audience, which filled the hall. It was several minutes before he was permitted to launch into the stirring first number, Elgar's "Pomp and Circumstance."

The warmth of the applause, in which the orchestra joined, was eloquent testimony to the regard in which the new director is held by the public. Already known as a member of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, in which he plays the viola and the celesta, and as conductor of the Boston Sinfonietta and of the Cecilia Society, Mr. Fiedler last summer won the acquaintance of a larger public by organizing and conducting a series of free concerts on the Esplanade. This new public, as well as the regular attendants at the Pop concerts, evidently has followed him to Symphony Hall.

Decorations by Jones

The decorations which had been provided to mark the rejuvenation of the Pops also won much admiration. They had been designed by Robert Edmond Jones, distinguished young American draftsman of many important stage settings, including those of the Russian Ballet, John Barrymore's "Hamlet," Marc Connelly's "The Green Pastures" and Schöenberg's "Die Glückliche Hand."

Mr. Jones's treatment is masterly in its simplicity and taste. With admirable restraint, he has provided ornamentation in harmony with the architectural design of the hall and in sympathy with its dignity and charm. His color scheme is green, gray and gold. The side walls have been painted a deep, cool green. The walls of the stage has been covered with a lattice work of gold, illumined by golden candlesticks, and a gilded chandelier is suspended over the orchestra. The gold motif is carried out in narrow stage draperies, in the borders of the conductor's stand and or the players' raised platform, and in the frames of the entrance doors. The tables on the floor have been painted a light green, with gilt decoration, and the chairs are gilded. The color scheme is carried even to the electric light bulbs in the chandeliers of the ceiling, which diffuse a soft light through the hall.

Back to Melody

This setting, which serves at once to pay tribute to Boston's Tercentenary and to mark the beginning of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's fiftieth year, gave a fillip to the inauguration of Mr. Fiedler, whose dictatorship, it seems certain, is to restore the Pop concerts to their old popularity. The Pops have always been attractive to Bostonians and to visitors. They achieved their greatest success in the years immediately following prohibition, which brought a marked increase in attendance. In the last few years they have experienced a slight slump, caused apparently by a conductorial tendency to turn them into symphonic rites at which audiences were expected to listen in awesome silence to the "serious" music characteristic of regular symphony programs.

It is Mr. Fiedler's task to restore to the Pops their original nature, that of an agreeable entertainment at which one may hear light and tuneful music, expertly played, and yet speak to one's neighbor, sip a cold drink and even perhaps drop a spoon without fear of being expelled from the hall.

If last night's experience is any criterion, there can be no doubt that the good old-new ways have been successfully restored, to the satisfaction of everybody. The applause which greeted Mr. Fiedler was renewed after every number, indicating that his ideas of program-making were those of his hearers. A thorough musician and an able conductor, he is closely enough in touch with the taste of the great public to understand their requirements. Without sacrifice of musical standards, he is able to contrive programs which contain plenty of tunes and plenty of lilting rhythms. This is what Pops audiences want, and it is what they are entitled to have.

Last night's program contained the Overture to Thomas's "Mignon," Waltzes from "Rosenkavalier," the "Aida" Fantasia, Siegfried's Rhine Journey, Kreisler's "Tambourin Chinois," Ravel's "Bolero," selections from "The New Moon," Blon's "Whispering of the Flowers" and Herbert's "American Fantasy." An admirably contrasted list, with gestures toward classical music and with good measure of popular numbers. The "Bolero" instantly captured the Pop audience, as it had the symphony audiences of last winter.

Programs to come hold equal interest. Tonight, for example, you may hear not only old favorites like Chabrier's "España" and Tchaikovsky's "Marche Slave," but the Berceuse from Stravinsky's "Fire-Bird" and Respighi's "Pines of Rome," with its famous nightingale. Nor is jazz to be barred. Tonight's program contains also selections from Křenek's jazz opera, "Jonny Spielt Auf," which in the last two years has been performed in every opera house and has made its composer a fortune.

Decidedly, the Pops have come back.

Pops New Born, Signs, Wonders, And Surprises

May 8, 1930
Symphony Hall Transformed, New Conductor, Old Ways, Returned Public

THE WORLD may be feminized; but it is still possible to keep a secret where men are most concerned. Consider, for example, last evening for the beginning of a fifth summer of Pops. A year and a half ago it went into rehearsal, as it, at the Opéra in Paris. The orchestra had not "run it" half "through" before everyone within earshot perceived that it would make no small sensation. Yet somehow the secret was kept—and with a woman leader in the deed—until the first public performance. Thereafter a stirred audience "told the world" and enough of us in America, when Mr. Toscanini and Dr. Koussevitzky produced the piece, knew what to expect.

Or consider the surroundings in which, last evening, Mr. Arthur Fiedler and the orchestra played "Bolero." In our time (as the editorial writers like to say) Symphony Hall has not undergone such change of aspect. Since the end of the Symphony Concerts last Saturday, the making of it was a day-and-night job, finished barely two hours before the first audience began to assemble. Yet not a word oozed out of Symphony Hall nor did "the sleuth-hounds of journalism" pick up the scent until word came to them—with next to no particulars—to despatch photographers, one of whose work appears in neighboring columns on this page.

When Mr. Fiedler was chosen for conductor, a general refitting of The Pops was evidently in prospect. The authorities resolved to extend it to the concert-room. It is their good custom to seek able and sympathetic ability for whatever may be in hand. Accordingly, they asked Mr. Robert Edmond Jones—first, in both senses of the word, of American designers for the theater—to undertake the summer redecoration of Symphony Hall. His work once more praises him. (He was present last evening and must have caught many an echo of the general surprise and approval.) A theater seen in Venice suggested the general scheme to Mr. Jones. To some that scanned the outcome, it also recalled the Redoutensaal in the Hapsburg Palace at Vienna, say with a touch of Schönbrunn, as summer-villa, added. Anyhow in it was hint of the eighteenth century before rococo came, as there must be to suit with the lines, the spacing, the decoration, of the original design by the illustrious McKim.

As it is, to right, left and behind the orchestra runs a deep wainscot of green and gold lattice-work. Above it, by a distribution of soft-colored globes among the usual electric lamps, the familiar grayish panelling takes on a lighter hue. The platforms upon which the players sit, the conductor's stand, the chairs and the music-racks are painted to harmonize with this gray, relieved here and there, where the eye quickly meets it, by arabesques in pale gold. Above the center of the stage hangs a many branched and globed chandelier, around it are sparse and slender brackets, both of distinctly eighteenth-century design.

Finally, to right and left of the proscenium arch are curtains drawn back and looped; while a lambrequin of the same fabric hangs horizontally above them. Precisely of what color this nameless fabric bids fair to become a subject of pleasing controversy among frequenters of The Pops. Certainly it is crossed and relieved by pale gold arabesques. The authorities at Symphony Hall affirmed that the basic color was gray. Yet under the lights it seemed to the casual eye tawny brown. Which divergence of fact and impression left most in the confusion besetting Hamlet and Polonius in the play, as they speak of camels, ales and such like.

For the auditorium, around each entrance-door to the floor and the tables is a frame of the green and gold lattice-work, while the warm winter red of the walls is now painted a cool summer grey, a grey, with spaciousness and "coolth" its train—there was need of both in the reeking heat of last evening—cones to the top of the auditorium. From chandeliers descends the gently diffused light already noted. The chairs and the tables repeat the golden tint. (How much will not a little gilding do!) The tables themselves are painted in pale green with pale gold arabesques. . . . So in Symphony Hall is divested of winter aspect; wears now green and gold and grey befitting oncoming spring and burgeoning summer; suggests a chaste and elegant haunt of light pleasure, (as my Lord Chesterfield, or even Dr. Johnson, might have written); for a warm-weather concert-room, is unique in America, and, may be, overseas.

From top to bottom, the first audience filled floor and balconies, everywhere suggesting new-born interest in the reborn Pops. To see, it was rather more modish than it has run of recent years. Dinner coats and evening gowns were as plentiful as the jackets and skirts of the daily round; while the student of feminine apparel—spring 1930—might observe that the fine-meshed, full-brimmed straw hat has come back—definitely and becomingly. It was to be noted also that Boston—to no small credit—remains an obstinate community against the return of the toe-touching skirt, even for evening wear. The evidence of one's eyes was proof at Symphony Hall, as it was last winter at the Opera House. A connoisseur, who makes his living in such things, confirmed the ocular impression. And out of the Middle West, where it is almost rule and habit, we are borrowing white flannel trousers under a dark jacket as semi-formal summer dress for youth and youngish men.

Less the mode than the new conductor engrossed the audience. It greeted Mr. Fiedler long and loud. It applauded him heartily—and discriminatingly—after every piece and performance. Plainly, it liked his alert, business-like procedures; his swift readiness with extra numbers the moment the clapping warranted them. It took pleasure as well in his youth, agreeable aspect, pleasing manners, flowing and exuberant energy. And before a company in which young women are many, it is no detriment—in this gossiping town—to be an eligible bachelor, not without that quality which is movie-custom to denote by initials or else by the neuter pronoun. For the first time, moreover, a son of the Symphony Orchestra had risen, by sheer ability, to be conductor of its Pops.

As such, Mr. Fiedler's unflagging energy and quick versatility were most in evidence. He likes sonorities and did not spare them in the pageant and ensemble music from "Aida." Yet his hand was light and flexible upon the changeful overture to "Mignon." His sense of color and contrast ran clear in Kreisler's "Tambourin Chinois." He beat out the implacable tune, the relentless rhythm, the unrelaxing crescendo, the final burst of modulation in Ravel's "Bolero." (Tempo of Koussevitzky, not Toscanini.) He felt and conveyed the sensuous rhythm, the sensuous Straussian strings, of the waltzes from "Der Rosenkavalier." He "put over" a potpourri from Mr. Romberg's "New Moon" as though the musical plays were his conducting trade. In fact, with two exceptions, and for no small merit, he "put over" every piece, "extras" included. One exception was the "Rhine Journey" of Siegfried—by no means Wagner incandescent in the concert-hall; the less for lack of propulsive force in Mr. Fiedler's version. The other, and minor, was the familiar "Moment Musical" of Schubert, which he might have taken with lighter touch and finer-spun melody. . . . And from beginning to end the orchestra—Mr. Theodorowicz again in the concert-master's chair—worked for and with him.

Throughout, again, there was no mistaking the satisfaction of the audience in the return to the long-standing type of Pop program, with lighter and easier-going numbers to the fore. Those who would have The Pops symphony concerts in miniature and at modest prices, enjoyed an inning three seasons long with the departed Casella. They may or may not be a majority of the habitués; certainly they are an insufficiently sustaining public. By the signs of last evening, the casual, idling, trifling audience has returned in numbers, prepared to stay if within reason, and by no means selfishly, it is humored.

After all, it is a good rule of life to play about as much as possible—particularly in the concert-hall—from May to October. Seven or eight months of "due diligence" are quite enough, in human infirmity, for most of us. Slip in the two Richards, Wagner and Strauss; Chalkovsky and Rimsky; Ravel and Debussy, Weber, Mendelssohn, Beethoven even, as Mr. Fiedler intends to do. But let us also hear the sighing or the jiggling tunes, not yet quite threadbare, of "Mignon"; Kern and Kálmán and Herbert of the musical plays; Krének fondly fancying he is writing American jazz and Gershwin actually glorifying it. Not too often gladiators may march or flowers whisper. . . . The more, the merrier.

H. T. P.

Concert-Chronicle

May 14, 1930 Tram
"Skyscrapers" and Mr. Fiedler

A CONDUCTOR could hardly be in more fortunate position than Arthur Fiedler at The Pops. His orchestra likes and respects him; will also work for him. Though the "regular season" is ended at Symphony Hall, it does not demur to three hours of rehearsal when an exacting piece is to be added to the repertory. Once in the concert-room, it adds good will to due diligence; gives back warm and flowing tone, spirited rhythm, a pervading precision and alertness that more than one of Mr. Fiedler's predecessors was unable to command. The audience is as friendly and good-tempered. It likes the range of the programs; is expectant of the "extras"; welcomes the freedom from every musical snobbishness. If a novel piece is in hand, it listens curious and well-disposed.

For the first time, yesterday, Mr. Carpenter's ballet, "Skyscrapers," was played "in concert form" at The Pops. An unfac-customed audience found it a little lengthy, say in the Coney-Island section, but applauded it as heartily as could be expected at first acquaintance. It may hardly have believed its ears when it heard three-quarters of the Symphony Orchestra playing "sweet jazz" and playing it uncommonly well. "A ballet of American life" said the program—evidently a "high-brow" ballet, yet pounding or snapping out discords when Americans were at work, falling into popular idioms when they were at play, quite as though the composer were to the manner born. Indeed he is—this Mr. Carpenter of Chicago, writing for the Metropolitan Opera House and symphony concerts. After Carpenter, Bartók—in six brief Roumanian Dances, so short that the end surprised many, yet not lacking the harsh rhythms, the pungent melodies, the strident or languorous voice he is wont to find in mid-European folk-music. Two modernists on one program. Evidently Mr. Fiedler believes that we listeners like to live in our own time.

Freshly heard and idiomatically played, "Skyscrapers" renewed every impression that sets the ballet high in American music and high among Mr. Carpenter's "works." The beginning, rough-coated with dissonance, piercing and hammering at the ear, is the sound of daily work translated into tones. Nervously and with a din up go our towers of steel and stone. After the day's work, the night's play. To it in crowds; to it with excitement. Thousands of feet shall beat out the syncopated rhythms. Thousands of voices sing the jazzy tunes, half-gay, half-smeary. The sentimental mood deepens and the Spiritual, or something next of kin, sounds. The sportive mood returns; jazz it up. . . . Somewhere in the distance the skyscrapers are looming through the shining night. Soon it will be morning and work again. Mr. Carpenter readily finds his final "apotheosis," as the journeymen of the old ballet called it; finds and also poetizes. American rhythms,

American tunes, American notions, the American temperament, yet all in the terms of symphonic music by an expert hand imaginatively made. As yet neither Mr. Gershwin—for lack of science—nor Mr. Gruenberg—for lack of personal feeling—challenges Mr. Carpenter. Safely, for the present, "Skyscrapers" remains our paragon of "symphonic jazz."

Cecilia at the Pops

May 15, 1930

THE "Pops," like their winter brethren, the Symphony Concerts, have their novelties. But let these have the qualities which quickly catch the popular imagination, and they soon cease to be novelties and are added to the regular Pops repertory. Thus not so many years ago the presence of music by Ravel on a Pops program would have been matter for special comment. The presence of his "La Valse" there now leads only to the comment that it has come to take its place side by side with "L'Arlesienne," the "Flight of the Bumble Bee," the meditation from "Thais" admirably played last evening by Mr. Theodorowicz, and Sousa's march, "Stars and Stripes Forever." Further is it worth noting that its performance was greeted with such volume of applause as to cause Mr. Fiedler bid his men rise to their feet in acknowledgment.

Last evening too had its novelties; novelties which could easily win place in the repertory did they not call for too great an amount of assistance from outside the orchestra. This assistance requires nothing less than a full chorus—provided last evening by the Cecilia Society of which Mr. Fiedler is also the conductor. The reference is to the presence on this program of the "Coronation Scene" from Musorgsky's opera "Boris Godunov," of Henschel's "Morning Hymn," of the Polovtsian Dances out of Borodin's opera "Prince Igor." That these gave pleasure there can be no doubt. For the "Cecilia" was in fine form and Mr. Fiedler conducted with an excellent blending of skill and imagination. Musorgsky's gorgeous music wanted only its pictorial setting to complete its gorgeousness; the chorus provided its portion, the orchestra exceeded that sometimes provided by opera orchestras, Mr. Harry Newcombe sang persuasively the solo passages. And Mr. Fiedler read the score in manner to provide no little thrill. Henschel's "Morning Hymn" sounded as fresh, in its sustained mood, as the day it was first heard. But a final "punch" in an excellent program came from the barbaric dances from "Prince Igor." If memory slips not, it was Dr. Koussevitzky who first brought them to the Symphony Concerts in their choral form. Mr. Monteux has played them as purely orchestral pieces. Thus new are they to the repertory of the orchestra. And now they come to the "Pops." Could the "Cecilia" be a sort of auxiliary chorus to the "Pops" they would keep their place in its repertory. Mr. Fiedler gave to these dances that virility, more, that barbaric energy which is the making of them. From tempo to increased tempo the activity grew wilder. Frenzy followed frenzy in this music. It is putting it mildly to say that the young conductor was masterly in the reading of this score, that chorus and orchestra gave him all he required of them. A. H. M.

FIRST POP CONCERT OF SUNDAY SERIES

Program of Russian Music

Is Performed

May 19, 1930 glor

The first Pop concert of the series to be given on alternate Sunday evenings was played last night. The audience, which nearly filled the auditorium, applauded the music most enthusiastically.

Compositions by Tchaikovsky occupied the latter half of the program, which was entirely Russian in authorship. The more substantial pieces were the third movement from his "Pathetic" Symphony, the second movement from his Fifth Symphony, Rimsky-Korsakov's "Capriccio Espagnol," and the "Wedding March" from the same composer's "Le Coq d'Or." Other pieces were by Rubinstein and Glazunov.

Under Mr Fiedler's leadership, there were high-spirited rhythms, orchestral color, and melodies warmly sung. His reading of the Spanish Caprice was highly imaginative and zestful. The march section of the "Pathetic" Symphony excerpt was forceful and curt, without expanding into noise.

In certain sections of the andante from Tchaikovsky's Fifth Symphony one wished that the principal melodies might have been done in higher relief, for at times the accompanying harmonies almost overpowered the chief theme. Mr Fiedler showed himself to be a conductor of ability, imagination, and zeal. He received many recalls to the platform during the concert.

George Mager was accorded much applause for the excellent playing of the solo part for trumpet in Jacchia's arrangement of the "Elli, Elli."

The Pops this year seem to have a somewhat more intense and youthfully vital atmosphere. A portion of this new spirit may be attributed, no doubt, to the excellent decorative scheme.

The next Sunday night concert open to the general public will be given on June 15.

Cecilia at the Pops May 15, 1930

THE "Pops," like their winter brethren, the Symphony Concerts, have their novelties. But let these have the qualities which quickly catch the popular imagination, and they soon cease to be novelties and are added to the regular Pops repertory. Thus not so many years ago the presence of music by Ravel on a Pops program would have been matter for special comment. The presence of his "La Valse" there now leads only to the comment that it has come to take its place side by side with "L'Arlesienne," the "Flight of the Bumble Bee," the meditation from "Thais" admirably played last evening by Mr. Theodorowicz, and Sousa's march, "Stars and Stripes Forever." Further is it worth noting that its performance was greeted with such volume of applause as to cause Mr. Fiedler bid his men rise to their feet in acknowledgment.

Last evening too had its novelties; novelties which could easily win place in the repertory did they not call for too great an amount of assistance from outside the orchestra. This assistance requires nothing less than a full chorus—provided last evening by the Cecilia Society of which Mr. Fiedler is also the conductor. The reference is to the presence on this program of the "Coronation Scene" from Musorgsky's opera "Boris Godunov," of Henschel's "Morning Hymn," of the Polovtsian Dances out of Borodin's opera "Prince Igor." That these gave pleasure there can be no doubt. For the "Cecilia" was in fine form and Mr. Fiedler conducted with an excellent blending of skill and imagination. Musorgsky's gorgeous music wanted only its pictorial setting to complete its gorgeousness; the chorus provided its portion, the orchestra exceeded that sometimes provided by opera orchestras, Mr. Harry Newcombe sang persuasively the solo passages. And Mr. Fiedler read the score in manner to provide no little thrill. Henschel's "Morning Hymn" sounded as fresh, in its sustained mood, as the day it was first heard. But a final "punch" in an excellent program came from the barbaric dances from "Prince Igor." If memory slips not, it was Dr. Koussevitzky who first brought them to the Symphony Concerts in their choral form. Mr. Monteux has played them as purely orchestral pieces. Thus new are they to the repertory of the orchestra. And now they come to the "Pops." Could the "Cecilia" be a sort of auxiliary chorus to the "Pops" they would keep their place in its repertory. Mr. Fiedler gave to these dances that virility, more, that barbaric energy which is the making of them. From tempo to increased tempo the activity grew wilder. Frenzy followed frenzy in this music. It is putting it mildly to say that the young conductor was masterly in the reading of this score, that chorus and orchestra gave him all he required of them.

A. H. M.

FIRST POP CONCERT OF SUNDAY SERIES

Program of Russian Music

Is Performed

May 17, 1930 Glor

The first Pop concert of the series to be given on alternate Sunday evenings was played last night. The audience, which nearly filled the auditorium, applauded the music most enthusiastically.

Compositions by Tchaikovsky occupied the latter half of the program, which was entirely Russian in authorship. The more substantial pieces were the third movement from his "Pathetic" Symphony, the second movement from his Fifth Symphony, Rimsky-Korsakov's "Capriccio Espagnol," and the "Wedding March" from the same composer's "Le Coq d'Or." Other pieces were by Rubinstein and Glazunov.

Under Mr Fiedler's leadership, there were high-spirited rhythms, orchestral color, and melodies warmly sung. His reading of the Spanish Caprice was highly imaginative and zestful. The march section of the "Pathetic" Symphony excerpt was forceful and curt, without expanding into noise.

In certain sections of the andante from Tchaikovsky's Fifth Symphony one wished that the principal melodies might have been done in higher relief, for at times the accompanying harmonies almost overpowered the chief theme. Mr Fiedler showed himself to be a conductor of ability, imagination, and zeal. He received many recalls to the platform during the concert.

George Mager was accorded much applause for the excellent playing of the solo part for trumpet in Jacchia's arrangement of the "Elli, Elli."

The Pops this year seem to have a somewhat more intense and youthfully vital atmosphere. A portion of this new spirit may be attributed, no doubt, to the excellent decorative scheme.

The next Sunday night concert open to the general public will be given on June 15.

SEP 30 1932

VOLUME 50

1930-1931

THIS VOLUME CONTAINS MANUSCRIPT MATERIAL.

MANUSCRIPTS MAY NOT BE REPRODUCED

WITHOUT PERMISSION.

No. 125.5.50

1930-31

GIVEN BY

Miss Mary Brown

me

No. 125.5.50

1930-31

GIVEN BY

Miss Mary Brown

†† In 125.5.50

July 25, 1932

From Mary Brown

7. 125. 5. 50

SYMPHONY HALL, BOSTON

HUNTINGTON AND MASSACHUSETTS AVENUES

Branch Exchange Telephones, Ticket and Administration Offices, Commonwealth 1492

Boston Symphony Orchestra

INC.

Dr. SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY, Conductor

FIFTIETH SEASON, 1930-1931

Programme

WITH HISTORICAL AND DESCRIPTIVE

NOTES BY PHILIP HALE

COPYRIGHT, 1930, BY BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA, INC.

THE OFFICERS AND TRUSTEES OF THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA, Inc.

FREDERICK P. CABOT	President
BENTLEY W. WARREN	Vice-President
ERNEST B. DANE	Treasurer

FREDERICK P. CABOT
ERNEST B. DANE
N. PENROSE HALLOWELL
M. A. DE WOLFE HOWE
JOHN ELLERTON LODGE

FREDERICK E. LOWELL
ARTHUR LYMAN
EDWARD M. PICKMAN
HENRY B. SAWYER
BENTLEY W. WARREN

W. H. BRENNAN, Manager

G. E. JUDD, Assistant Manager

8. 56

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

(110 Musicians)

SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY, Conductor

*Miss Mary Brown
July 25, 1932*

Boston Symphony Orchestra

Fiftieth Season, 1930-1931

Dr. SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY, Conductor

PERSONNEL

VIOLINS.

Burgin, R. Concert-master Theodorowicz, J.	Elcus, G. Kreinin, B.	Gundersen, R. Kassman, N.	Sauvlet, H. Hamilton, V.	Cherkassky, P. Eisler, D.
Hansen, E. Pinfield, C.	Lauga, N. Mariotti, V.	Fedorovsky, P. Leveen, P.	Leibovici, J. Tapley, R.
Thillois, F. Mayer, P.	Zung, M. Diamond, S.	Knudson, C. Zide, L.	Gorodetzky, L. Fiedler, B.
Bryant, M. Murray, J.	Beale, M. Del Sordo, R.	Stonestreet, L. Erkelens, H.	Messina, S. Seiniger, S.

VIOLAS.

Lefranc, J. Artières, L.	Fourrel, G. Cauhapé, J. Avierino, N. Gerhardt, S.	Bernard, A. Van Wynbergen, C.	Grover, H. Werner, H. Deane, C. Jacob, R.	Fiedler, A.
-----------------------------	------------------------------------------------------------	----------------------------------	----------------------------------------------------	-------------

VIOLONCELLOS.

Bedetti, J. Zighera, A.	Langendoen, J. Barth, C.	Chardon, Y. Droeghmans, H.	Stockbridge, C. Warnke, J.	Fabrizio, E. Marjollet, L.
----------------------------	-----------------------------	-------------------------------	-------------------------------	-------------------------------

BASSES.

Kunze, M. Vondrak, A.	Lemaire, J. Oliver, F.	Ludwig, O. Frankel, I.	Girard, H. Dufresne, G.	Kelley, A.
--------------------------	---------------------------	---------------------------	----------------------------	------------

FLUTES.

Laurent, G.
Bladet, G.
Amerena, P.

OBOES.

Gillet, F.
Devergie, J.
Stanislaus, H.

CLARINETS.

Polatschek, V.
Arcieri, E.
Allegra, E.
(E-flat Clarinet)

BASSOONS.

Laus, A.
Allard, R.
Panenka, E.
Bettoney, F.

PICCOLO.

Battles, A.

ENGLISH HORN.

Speyer, L.

BASS CLARINET.

Mimart, P.

CONTRA-BASSOON.

Piller, B.

HORNS.

Boettcher, G.
Pogrebniak, S.
Van Den Berg, C.
Lorbeer, H.

HORNS.

Valkenier, W.
Schindler, G.
Lannoye, M.
Blot, G.

TRUMPETS.

Mager, G.
Lafosse, M.
Grundey, T.
Perret, G.
Voisin, R.
Mann, J.

TROMBONES.

Raichman, J.
Hansotte, L.
Kenfield, L.
Adam, E.

TUBAS.

Sidow, P.
Adam, E.

HARPS.

Zighera, B.
Caughey, E.

TIMPANI.

Ritter, A.
Polster, M.

PERCUSSION.

Ludwig, C.
Sternburg, S.
White, L.

ORGAN.
Snow, A.

CELESTA.

Fiedler, A.

LIBRARIAN.

Rogers, L. J.

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

(110 Musicians)

SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY, Conductor

Boston Symphony Orchestra

Fiftieth Season, 1930-1931

Dr. SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY, Conductor

PERSONNEL

VIOLINS.
Burgin, R. Concert-master Theodorowicz, J.	Elcus, G. Kreinin, B.	Gundersen, R. Kassman, N.	Sauvlet, H. Hamilton, V.	Cherkassky, P. Eisler, D.
Hansen, E. Pinfield, C.	Lauga, N. Mariotti, V.	Fedorovsky, P. Leveen, P.	Leibovici, J. Tapley, R.
Thillois, F. Mayer, P.	Zung, M. Diamond, S.	Knudson, C. Zide, L.	Gorodetzky, L. Fiedler, B.
Bryant, M. Murray, J.	Beale, M. Del Sordo, R.	Stonestreet, L. Erkelens, H.	Messina, S. Seiniger, S.
VIOLAS.
Lefranc, J. Artières, L.	Fouré, G. Cauhapé, J. Avierino, N. Gerhardt, S.	Bernard, A. Van Wynbergen, C.	Grover, H. Werner, H. Deane, C. Jacob, R.	Fiedler, A.
VIOLONCELLOS.
Bedetti, J. Zighera, A.	Langendoen, J. Barth, C.	Chardon, Y. Droeghmans, H.	Stockbridge, C. Warnke, J.	Fabrizio, E. Marjollet, L.
BASSES.
Kunze, M. Vondrak, A.	Lemaire, J. Oliver, F.	Ludwig, O. Frankel, I.	Girard, H. Dufresne, G.	Kelley, A.
FLUTES.
Laurent, G. Bladet, G. Amerena, P.	OBOES.
	Gillet, F. Devergie, J. Stanislaus, H.	CLARINET'S.
		Polatschek, V. Arcieri, E. Allegra, E. (E-flat Clarinet)	BASSOONS.
			Laus, A. Allard, R. Panenka, E. Bettoney, F.
PICCOLO.
Battles, A.	ENGLISH HORN.
	Speyer, L.	BASS CLARINET.
		Mimart, P.	CONTRA-BASSOON.
			Piller, B.
HORNS.
Boettcher, G. Pogrebniak, S. Van Den Berg, C. Lorbeer, H.	HORNS.
	Valkenier, W. Schindler, G. Lannoye, M. Blot, G.	TRUMPETS.
		Mager, G. Lafosse, M. Grundey, T. Perret, G. Voisin, R. Mann, J.	TROMBONES.
			Raichman, J. Hansotte, L. Kenfield, L. Adam, E.
TUBAS.
Sidow, P. Adam, E.	HARPS.
	Zighera, B. Caughey, E.	TIMPANI.
		Ritter, A. Polster, M.	PERCUSSION.
			Ludwig, C. Sternburg, S. White, L.
ORGAN.
Snow, A.	CELESTA.
		Fiedler, A.	LIBRARIAN.
			Rogers, L. J.

Henry Lee Higginson

(Recalled by the Symphony Concert in his honor)

Mourn ye, lament,
The great, the glorious-hearted.
He the wise in counsel,
He the strong of soul,
Dauntless 'mid peril,
Stranger to fear
Alike through storm of battle—
Alike through stress of life—
He the constant leader,
Patriot deeply dear.

Gone is he now, as gone the leaves of autumn,
Gone is he now, his years as garnered sheaves.
Safe is he now where dwell the great Departed:
Where he who saw but half sees now the rounded whole.

Wrap him close, ye colors,
Starry flag above him,
Hark! Up-thrilling life,
Bugle, roll of drum,
Speak of goal achieved,
Tell of sunset come Far, song-winged they sound it,
Clear-voiced taps resound it, Martial music's paeon,
"Warrior, welcome home."

ANNA LYMAN GRAY
(MRS. JOHN CHIPMAN GRAY)

Nov. 17, 1919.

Present Symphony Hall to Rush
the Unreserved Seats in the Second Balcony. From the Painting (1924)
by Duane Haley

By PHILIP HALE

The 50th season of the Boston Symphony orchestra will open next Friday afternoon, when the concert will have a sentimental interest. Sir George Henschel, the first conductor of the orchestra, will then present the program, with one exception, that he prepared for the first concert on Oct. 22, 1881: Beethoven, "Consecration of the House"; Gluck, "Che faro senza Eurydice" from "Orfeo ed Eurydice"; Haydn, Symphony, B flat (B. & H. No. 12); Schubert, ballet music from "Rosamunde"; Bruch, Penelope's Lament; but instead of Weber's festival overture, Sir George, for some unknown reason, will conduct the prelude to "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg"; Annie Louise Cary was the singer at the first concert; Mme. Matzenauer will sing next Friday.

In the late seventies Mr. H. L. Higginson was planning the establishment of a permanent orchestra. The time of the players for "careful training" and for the 20 concerts each season was to be engaged in advance. But who was to be the conductor?

Isidor Georg Henschel, born at Breslau on Feb. 18, 1850, came with his betrothed, Lillian Bailey, to Boston in 1880 for a concert tour in the United States. He was then known and applauded in Europe as a singer. He had sung in England with Miss Bailey, having been one of her teachers. Their first appearance in Boston was at a concert in the Old Bay State Course on Nov. 1, 1880.

On March 3, 1881, an Overture (ms.) by Mr. Henschel was performed for the first time at a concert of the Harvard Musical Association. Mr. Henschel was invited to conduct his overture. Mr. Higginson was in the audience, which was pleased by the vigor of the performance. The newspapers of Boston in April, 1881, published his plan for the new concerts. He then named Mr. Henschel as the conductor. Now Mr. Henschel had had no experience in Europe in training an orchestra or in the interpretation of orchestral works.

Any one can learn by consulting the newspapers published during the three years of Mr. Henschel's conductorship that the concerts were often bitterly criticised; that criticism of the conductor was often savage. Mr. Henschel had no easy time of it. Even his friend Mr. Apthorp, writing to the Evening Transcript in 1911, about the early years, said that the choice of the conductor was made "without due circumspection"; that Mr. Higginson was "in plain English paying Mr. Henschel a high salary for those days, for learning his trade in public." It should not be forgotten that there were "unfortunate elements" in the orchestra. Bernhard Listemann, the concert master, a remarkable violinist in certain ways, and a sound musician, was a nervous, high-strung man, constitutionally unfit for the position. He was wont to hurry the tempo; he insisted on playing the music in his own way; without the intention of usurping the conductor's throne, he could not follow any conductor. Then there were intrigues against Mr. Henschel in the orchestra and out of it.

Mr. Henschel's programs were generally well arranged and interesting—in those years. How many of the "novelties" in 1882-84 are heard today? Who is now familiar with Cowen's "Scandinavian" symphony, Volkmann's symphony No. 2, Raff's "Winter" symphony, Dvorak's symphony No. 1? The conductor did not refuse a hearing to light overtures, as Auber's "Lac des Fees," Herold's "Zampa," Nicolai's "Merry Wives of Windsor." There should be room today during a season for a light and joyous overture, a waltz by Strauss, ballet music by Goldmark, Rubinstein, Gounod, Massenet, Delibes. Too much of the ballet music written today and performed at the Symphony concerts, is sour and laboriously contrived.

The experience thus gained by Mr. Henschel—he was knighted in 1914—no doubt profited him when he returned to England. Even while he was busy as a singer and teacher of singing he established in 1886 the London Symphony Concerts, a feature of that city's musical life for 11 years. He revived forgotten works, and brought out many that were unknown. In 1893-95 he conducted the Scottish Orchestra in Glasgow. Though he gave his farewell song recital at London in April 1914, he has appeared occasionally in recent years as orchestral conductor and as singer.

In December, 1902, at a concert of the Cecilia Society he conducted his "Requiem," composed in memory of his wife. His daughter Helen then sang the music for the soprano. His first wife had died at London in 1901.

Dr. Koussevitzky will first appear at the concerts on Oct. 17 and 18, to conduct an ode for orchestra and chorus, written for the orchestra's anniversary by Edward Burlingame Hill. The text is by Robert Hillyer. This will be the first of a list of new scores which have been especially composed for the orchestra's jubilee year by foremost composers. They include a "Symphonie de Psaumes" by Stravinsky; also symphonies by Roussel, Honnegger, Prokofieff and Hill. There will be a symphonic ode by Copland, and shorter pieces by Ravel, Dukas, Hindemith and Sibelius; also a piano concerto by Bax. The Russian composers Lourie, Nabokoff and Trebinsky and the French composer Ferroud will also be represented. This music will be performed in the course of the regular concerts.

Other features of the season will be a Beethoven festival, to be given in Washington, D. C., through the first week of December, and a Bach festival to be given in Boston next spring in memory of Henry L. Higginson.

In honor of the 50th anniversary of the foundation of the Boston Symphony orchestra, Arthur Foote, one of America's most distinguished composers, will speak in the lecture hall of the Boston Public Library next Thursday, at 5:15 P. M., on the subject, "Fifty Years of the Boston Symphony Orchestra." He has been personally acquainted with all the conductors and with many of the players and soloists who have appeared at the concerts of the orchestra. He has known many of the composers whose works have received their first performance in Boston. As an attendant at most of the concerts for 50 seasons his opinions and reminiscences should be of importance and interest. This talk is the first of a series of lectures on the programs of the orchestra and is open free to the public. Mr. Foote's friends, the subscribers, and all former members of the University Extension classes are invited to be present. No seats are reserved. The doors open at 4 P. M. and entrance is from Boylston street.

Of special musical interest in connection with the convention of the American Legion will be the first public performance of a new composition by a Boston composer. The work is entitled, "In Flanders Fields," a chorus for men's voices, and the composer is Richard Gilmore Appel. Its performance at the legion dinner to the press of America at the Bradford Hotel on Monday evening will be the tribute of a young American to the valor of American youth. In parts of the composition, Mr. Appel introduces French and American folk airs; the work is said to be an inspired setting of the text by Col. McCrae, the famous Canadian poet. On this occasion it will be performed by the University male quartet: Clifton Johnson, first tenor; Norman Arnold, second tenor; Ralph Tailby, baritone; Robert Isensee, bass; Earl Weidner, accompanist.

SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY

Several years ago, London and Paris became aware of a quite extraordinary Russian conductor. Under the transforming hand of Serge Koussevitzky, a classic symphony would glow with fresh life, a romantic score would sing with a new and unprecedented eloquence, a composition of our own day would reveal an unsuspected creative vitality.

When it was announced five years ago

that such a leader would have such an instrument as the Boston Symphony Orchestra to do his bidding, new marvels in symphonic performance were anticipated.

Koussevitzky's first season with the Boston Symphony Orchestra astonished even those who had expected the most from this ideal union. And in succeeding seasons, conductor and orchestra have touched new heights of executive perfection, tonal splendor, and interpretative vision.

In a word, Koussevitzky has once more proven himself the genius to whom an achievement, however great, can only be the starting point towards a still subtler beauty and a still deeper significance.

Thus, a transcendent chapter is being added to the history of what has been, these many years, the finest symphony orchestra in the world. To the forward-looking leader of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, its fiftieth season (1930-1931) is the next horizon.

Boston Orchestra Praised

Henry Prunieres, well-known French critic of music, has written for the New York Times his impressions of four American orchestras, which he heard on a recent visit to this country. He says that all four are better than the Berlin Philharmonic, which he thinks is now the best in Europe. And of the four he inclines to prefer the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

This testimony from an impartial foreign critic of high standing would justify any claim local pride in our orchestra may make. According to M. Prunieres, the Boston Symphony is today the best orchestra in the world. What would he have said of the old Boston Symphony under Dr. Muck, which by common consent of all who remember it surpassed the present orchestra.

M. Prunieres is editor of the leading serious magazine in France devoted to music, the Revue Musicale. His point of view is not that of the popular journalist, nor does it appear that he aims to flatter Americans. As he says, the presence in the Boston Symphony of 38 Frenchmen suffices to prove that Paris could have just as good an orchestra as Boston has today if anyone in Paris were prepared to spend the necessary large sum of money. The $100,000 annual deficit of the Boston Symphony would look almost astronomical if counted in French francs.

Excerpts from M. Prunieres' article, published by the New York Times Dec 7 follow:

"I am quite sure that if the Berlin Philharmonic Orchestra, which is the best in Europe, in my opinion, were to visit America, it would be adjudged as being in the fifth or sixth rank, certainly below that of the Chicago Symphony Orchestra, which seems to me to be inferior to those in Boston, Philadelphia and New York.

Boston Orchestra Preferred

"Which American orchestra is to be ranked the first? I find it difficult to choose among such orchestras as those in New York, Boston and Philadelphia. When Toscanini stands before the New York orchestra the result seems to be an absolute perfection. When he is replaced, even by such a great conductor as Erich Kleiber, whose worth, as I see it, was not sufficiently recognized in New York, the qualities of certain of the solo instruments may be criticized.

"At Boston and Philadelphia, despite every effort, I have been unable to discern a weak point in the composition of the orchestras. If my preferences should incline toward Boston, it is because the quartet there appeared to me to possess a sonority more glowing than even that in Philadelphia. There are simply nuances to differentiate these three orchestras, which deserve to be classed and proclaimed equally the best in the whole world.

Dec 14, 1930 glrk

"Serge Koussevitzky is very popular in Paris, where we are grateful to him for some magnificent concerts which he has given here, and for all the great new works which he has introduced.

No other conductor has done so much for modern music in France as Mr. Koussevitzky. I am happy to see that he continues along these lines in the United States, for it is due to his initiative that the Boston Symphony Orchestra has commissioned some new works for its 50th anniversary by the best contemporaneous composers, and has brought into existence symphonies by Stravinsky, Prokofiev, Albert Roussel, etc.

"Koussevitzky is a great conductor, and I was enthusiastic when I heard him conduct Albert Roussel's Third symphony, Debussy's 'La Mer' and excerpts by Rameau. To judge him, one must hear him at the head of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. May we have this pleasure soon in France!"

Parisian Report Jan 12, 1931

RETURNED to Paris, Monsieur Prunieres, the eminent writer about music and the performance thereof, is discoursing again—this time in Le Temps—about his autumn experiences in American concert-halls. The whole article, traversing the field from Boston to Chicago, will be reproduced in these columns on Saturday next. For the moment, here in free translation are three paragraphs about the Boston Orchestra and Dr. Koussevitzky: "There is a fertile rivalry between the Boston and the Philadelphia orchestras, between Serge Koussevitzky and Leopold Stokowski. They come in turn to New York with their orchestras, sometimes (sic) exchanging them courteously. Both are prodigious virtuosi of the baton. Koussevitzky is popular in France; but his concerts in Paris gave no true idea of the marvels that he accomplishes in Boston. To me his orchestra seems superior to the best in America. No words can express the splendor of the strings—power with no loss of velvet-like texture; brilliance without hardness; precise and edged attack yet never dry; exhaustless softness and sweetness in pianissimo. The brass and the woodwinds are not less admirable.

"The Bostonians play the classics in free-handed versions, in which much is left to the will and mood (fantaisie) of the conductor who inspires them. With music of our own time, he is notably respectful of the composers' wishes. It was my good fortune to be present at the rehearsals of the new symphony written by Albert Roussel for the jubilee of the orchestra. I have rarely encountered a conductor so concerned with the exact conveyance of the intentions of the composer. The performance was beyond praise. This Third Symphony of Roussel (which is surely his masterpiece) ascended skywards."

SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY

Several years ago, London and Paris became aware of a quite extraordinary Russian conductor. Under the transforming hand of Serge Koussevitzky, a classic symphony would glow with fresh life, a romantic score would sing with a new and unprecedented eloquence, a composition of our own day would reveal an unsuspected creative vitality.

When it was announced five years ago

that such a leader would have such an instrument as the Boston Symphony Orchestra to do his bidding, new marvels in symphonic performance were anticipated.

Koussevitzky's first season with the Boston Symphony Orchestra astonished even those who had expected the most from this ideal union. And in succeeding seasons, conductor and orchestra have touched new heights of executive perfection, tonal splendor, and interpretative vision.

In a word, Koussevitzky has once more proven himself the genius to whom an achievement, however great, can only be the starting point towards a still subtler beauty and a still deeper significance.

Thus, a transcendent chapter is being added to the history of what has been, these many years, the finest symphony orchestra in the world. To the forward-looking leader of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, its fiftieth season (1930-1931) is the next horizon.

Boston Orchestra Praised

Henry Prunieres, well-known French critic of music, has written for the New York Times his impressions of four American orchestras, which he heard on a recent visit to this country. He says that all four are better than the Berlin Philharmonic, which he thinks is now the best in Europe. And of the four he inclines to prefer the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

This testimony from an impartial foreign critic of high standing would justify any claim local pride in our orchestra may make. According to M. Prunieres, the Boston Symphony is today the best orchestra in the world. What would he have said of the old Boston Symphony under Dr. Muck, which by common consent of all who remember it surpassed the present orchestra.

M. Prunieres is editor of the leading serious magazine in France devoted to music, the Revue Musicale. His point of view is not that of the popular journalist, nor does it appear that he aims to flatter Americans. As he says, the presence in the Boston Symphony of 38 Frenchmen suffices to prove that Paris could have just as good an orchestra as Boston has today if anyone in Paris were prepared to spend the necessary large sum of money. The $100,000 annual deficit of the Boston Symphony would look almost astronomical if counted in French francs.

Excerpts from M. Prunieres' article, published by the New York Times Dec 7 follow:

"I am quite sure that if the Berlin Philharmonic Orchestra, which is the best in Europe, in my opinion, were to visit America, it would be adjudged as being in the fifth or sixth rank, certainly below that of the Chicago Symphony Orchestra, which seems to me to be inferior to those in Boston, Philadelphia and New York.

Boston Orchestra Preferred

"Which American orchestra is to be ranked the first? I find it difficult to choose among such orchestras as those in New York, Boston and Philadelphia. When Toscanini stands before the New York orchestra the result seems to be an absolute perfection. When he is replaced, even by such a great conductor as Erich Kleiber, whose worth, as I see it, was not sufficiently recognized in New York, the qualities of certain of the solo instruments may be criticized.

"At Boston and Philadelphia, despite every effort, I have been unable to discern a weak point in the composition of the orchestras. If my preferences should incline toward Boston, it is because the quartet there appeared to me to possess a sonority more glowing than even that in Philadelphia. There are simply nuances to differentiate these three orchestras, which deserve to be classed and proclaimed equally the best in the whole world.

"Serge Koussevitzky is very popular in Paris, where we are grateful to him for some magnificent concerts which he has given here, and for all the great new works which he has introduced. No other conductor has done so much for modern music in France as Mr. Koussevitzky. I am happy to see that he continues along these lines in the United States, for it is due to his initiative that the Boston Symphony Orchestra has commissioned some new works for its 50th anniversary by the best contemporaneous composers, and has brought into existence symphonies by Stravinsky, Prokofieff, Albert Roussel, etc.

"Koussevitzky is a great conductor, and I was enthusiastic when I heard him conduct Albert Roussel's Third symphony, Debussy's 'La Mer' and excerpts by Rameau. To judge him, one must hear him at the head of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. May we have this pleasure soon in France!"

Parisian Report Jan 12, 1931

RETURNED to Paris, Monsieur Prunieres, the eminent writer about music and the performance thereof, is discoursing again—this time in Le Temps—about his autumn experiences in American concert-halls. The whole article, traversing the field from Boston to Chicago, will be reproduced in these columns on Saturday next. For the moment, here in free translation are three paragraphs about the Boston Orchestra and Dr. Koussevitzky: "There is a fertile rivalry between the Boston and the Philadelphia orchestras, between Serge Koussevitzky and Leopold Stokowski. They come in turn to New York with their orchestras, sometimes (sic) exchanging them courteously. Both are prodigious virtuosi of the baton. Koussevitzky is popular in France; but his concerts in Paris gave no true idea of the marvels that he accomplishes in Boston. To me his orchestra seems superior to the best in America. No words can express the splendor of the strings—power with no loss of velvet-like texture; brilliance without hardness; precise and edged attack yet never dry; exhaustless softness and sweetness in pianissimi. The brass and the woodwinds are not less admirable.

"The Bostonians play the classics in free-handed versions, in which much is left to the will and mood (fantaisie) of the conductor who inspires them. With music of our own time, he is notably respectful of the composers' wishes. It was my good fortune to be present at the rehearsals of the new symphony written by Albert Roussel for the jubilee of the orchestra. I have rarely encountered a conductor so concerned with the exact conveyance of the intentions of the composer. The performance was beyond praise. This Third Symphony of Roussel (which is surely his masterpiece) ascended skywards."

-Caricature (1924) of Dr. Koussevitzky, Guest Conductor in Madrid. The Upper Inscription Reads: "My People and My Sovereigns Applauded You. Do not Forget that my Unschooled Philharmonic Orchestra Follows your Baton Soulfully and with Good Will—Admiring your Art, Madrid."

The Symphony Orchestra (1929) at Rehearsal

Dr. Koussevitzky is Leading in a Tan-Colored Pull-Over, His Jacket at the Foot of the Conductor's Stand
From the Painting, Here Reproduced for the First Time, by Marie Danforth Page 12

Tickets for the First Season, 1881-82, of the Symphony
Concerts, with the Doorkeeper's
Punches

HENRY L. HIGGINSON

-Tickets for the First
Season, 1881-82, of the Symphony
Concerts, with the Doorkeeper's
Punches

HENRY L. HIGGINSON

SIR GEORGE HENSCHER

DR. SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY

Boston Music Hall.

SEASON 1881-82.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

MR. GEORG HENSCHEL, Conductor.

I. CONCERT.

SATURDAY, OCTOBER 22D, AT 8, P. M.

PROGRAMME.

OVERTURE, Op. 124, "Dedication of the House." BEETHOVEN.

AIR. (Orpheus.) GLUCK.

SYMPHONY in B flat. HAYDN.
(No. 12 of Breitkopf's edition.)

BALLET MUSIC. (Rosamunde.) SCHUBERT.

SCENA. (Odysseus.) MAX BRUCH.

FESTIVAL OVERTURE. WEBER.

SOLOIST:

MISS ANNIE LOUISE CARY.

The first programme of the Boston Symphony Orchestra

WORKS PERFORMED AT THE SYMPHONY CONCERTS
DURING THE SEASON OF 1930-1931

Works marked with an asterisk were performed for the first time at these concerts.
Works marked with a double asterisk were performed for the first time in Boston.
Works marked with a dagger were performed for the first time anywhere.
Artists marked with an asterisk appeared at these concerts for the first time.
Artists marked with a double asterisk appeared for the first time in Boston.
Artists marked with a dagger are members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

ALBENIZ: Two Pieces, "El Albaicin" and "Navarra," transcribed for orchestra by E. F. Arbos, January 23, 1931 (conducted by ARBOS)

ANONYMOUS (See KOUSSEVITZKY).

ARENSKY*: Variations on a Theme of Tchaikovsky,* Op. 35a, December 26, 1930

BACH: Two Preludes (Adagio, Vivace),† arranged for string orchestra by PICK-MANGIAGALLI, October 17, 1930 .

Prelude and Fugue in E-flat for organ (arranged for orchestra by SCHÖNBERG), December 19, 1930 . . .

Suite for Orchestra, No. 3, D major, March 27, 1931 . .

Brandenburg Concerto No. 5, March 28, 1931

Concerto, D minor, for two violins and string orchestra (RICHARD BURGIN† and JULIUS THEODOROWICZ†), March 27, 1931

Preludes and Fugues from "Well-Tempered Clavichord": G minor, No. 16; D major, No. 5; B-flat minor, No. 22; C-sharp major, No. 3 (ALEXANDER BOROVSKY), March 28, 1931

Cantatas No. 85,* "Ich bin ein Guter Hirt," and No. 20,* "O Ewigkeit, du Donnerwort" (Bach Cantata Club and AMY EVANS, soprano; MARGARET MATZENAUER, contralto; RICHARD CROOKS, tenor; FRASER GANGE, bass), March 27, 1931 (sung in German)1391-

Cantatas No. 4,* "Christ lag in Todesbanden" and No. 80,* "Ein feste Burg ist unser Gott," March 28, 1931 (singers as on March 27) (sung in English) 1394-

BEETHOVEN: Symphony No. 1, C major, Op. 21, January 2, 1931

Symphony No. 5, C minor, Op. 67, May 1, 1931

Symphony No. 7, A major, Op. 92, October 17, 1930 . . .

Overture, "Consecration of the House," October 10, 1930 (conducted by GEORGE HENSCHEL)

Overture to "Egmont," February 27, 1931

Concerto for pianoforte, No. 5, E-flat major (WALTER GIESEKING), November 28, 1930

Concerto for violin, D major (JASCHA HEIFETZ), February 27, 1931

BERLIOZ: Symphonie Fantastique, C major, Op. 14A, February 20, 1931

- BRAHMS: Symphony No. 1, C minor, Op. 68, April 3, 1931 . . .
 Symphony No. 2, D major, Op. 73, November 7, 1931 . . .
 Concerto for violin, D major, Op. 77 (NATHAN MILSTEIN). March 13, 1931
 Two Hungarian Dances: No. 2, F major; No. 1, G minor, March 13, 1931
 BRUCH: "Penelope's Sorrow," from "Odysseus" (MARGARET MATZENAUER), October 10, 1930
 CHABRIER: Prelude to Act II of "Gwendoline," February 27, 1931
 CORELLI: Suite (arranged by PINELLI), January 23, 1931 (conducted by E. F. ARBOS)
 DEBUSSY: "La Mer," October 24, 1930
 Prelude to "The Afternoon of a Faun" (Eclogue by S. Mallarmé) May 1, 1931
 ELGAR: Introduction and Allegro, Op. 47, for string orchestra, January 30, 1931
 FALLA, DE: Suite from "El Amor Brujo," January 23, 1931 (conducted by E. F. ARBOS)
 FRANCK: Symphony, D minor, January 23, 1931 (conducted by E. F. ARBOS)
 GLUCK: "Che farò senza Eurydice," from "Orfeo ed Eurydice" (MARGARET MATZENAUER), October 10, 1930
 GRIFFES: "The Pleasure-Dome of Kubla Khan," April 24, 1931
 HADLEY: "Salome," Tone Poem (after Wilde's tragedy), Op. 55 (conducted by the composer), January 16, 1931
 Suite for orchestra, "Streets of Pekin" (conducted by the composer), January 16, 1931
 HANDEL: Concerto Grosso for string orchestra, B minor, No. 12, November 7, 1930
 Concerto Grosso for string orchestra, Op. 6, No. 6, G minor, February 20, 1931
 HANSON: Symphony No. 2, "Romantic,"† November 28, 1930
 HAYDN: Symphony, B-flat (B. & H. No. 12), October 10, 1930 (conducted by GEORGE HENSCHER)
 Symphony No. 1, E-flat major, January 16, 1931 (conducted by HENRY HADLEY)
 Symphony, D major (B. & H. No. 10), March 13, 1931
 HILL: An Ode† (Poem by ROBERT HILLYER) (Harvard Glee Club and Radcliffe Choral Society; Reader, Mr. HILLYER), October 17, 1930
 Symphony No. 2,† in C major, February 27, 1931
 HINDEMITH: Konzertmusik for String and Brass Instruments,† April 3, 1931
 HONNEGGER: Symphony,† February 13, 1931; March 19, 1931 1930, KOUSSEVITZKY (See Anonymous): Overture,† October 31, 1930
 KŘENEK: Little Symphony, Op. 58, December 12, 1930 (conducted by Mr. BURGINT)

- LAMBERT: "The Rio Grande," for chorus (CECILIA SOCIETY), orchestra, and solo pianoforte (JESÚS MARÍA SANROMÁ); poem by Sacheverell Sitwell, April 24, 1931
 LOEFFLER: Canticum Fratris Solis (After St. Francis of Assisi) for voice (POVLA FRIJSH) and orchestra, February 13, 1931
 A Pagan Poem (after Virgil), Op. 14, for orchestra, English horn, and three trumpets obbligati, February 13, 1931
 LOURIÉ: "Sonate Liturgique" in the form of Four Chorales (with alto voices), January 2, 1931
 MCKINLEY: Masquerade,* January 16, 1931 (conducted by HENRY HADLEY)
 MAHLER: "Das Lied von der Erde" (RICHARD CROOKS,* tenor; MARGARET MATZENAUER, contralto), December 26, 1930
 MENDELSSOHN: Overture and Scherzo from music for "A Midsummer Night's Dream," March 19, 1931
 MOUSSORGSKY-RAVEL: "Pictures at an Exhibition," October 17, 1930
 MOZART: Overture to "The Magic Flute," November 14, 1930
 Concerto for clarinet (VICTOR POLATSCHEK†), November 14, 1930
 Concerto in A major for pianoforte (BRUCE SIMONDS) and orchestra, December 12, 1930 (conducted by RICHARD BURGINT)
 Symphony in G minor (K. 550), December 19, 1930
 NABOKOV: "Symphonie Lyrique," October 31, 1930 (first time in the United States)
 PICK-MANGIAGALLI (See BACH).
 PILATI: Suite for Pianoforte (JESÚS MARÍA SANROMÁ) and string orchestra, February 13, 1931
 PROKOFIEFF: Symphony No. 4, Op. 47,† November 14, 1930
 RAMEAU-MOTTL: Ballet Suite ("Platée," "Les Fêtes d'Hébé"), October 24, 1930
 RAVEL: La Valse, October 24, 1930
 Bolero, November 28, 1930
 (See MOUSSORGSKY.)
 RESPIGHI: Metamorphoseon, Modi XII (Theme and Variations),† November 7, 1930
 RIMSKY-KORSAKOV: Caprice on Spanish Themes, November 14, 1930
 "The Russian Easter," Overture on Themes of the Russian Church, Op. 36, April 3, 1931
 ROUSSEL: Symphony, G minor, Op. 42,† October 24, 1930
 SCHOENBERG (See BACH).
 SCHUBERT: Symphony, C major, No. 7, April 24, 1931
 Ballet Music from "Rosamunde," October 10, 1930 (conducted by GEORGE HENSCHER)
 SCHUMANN: Symphony No. 1, B-flat major, Op. 38, April 17, 1931

Concerto for Violoncello (GREGOR PIATIGORSKY), A minor, Op. 129, April 17, 1931

Overture to Byron's "Manfred," April 17, 1931

SIBELIUS: Symphony No. 1, E minor, Op. 39, December 12, 1930 (conducted by Mr. Burgin)

Symphony No. 7, Op. 105, January 30, 1931

STEINERT: Leggenda Sinfonica, March 13, 1931 (first time in the United States)

STRAUSS: "Ein Heldenleben," tone poem, Op. 40, January 2, 1931

Symphonia Domestica, Op. 53, January 30, 1931

Salome's Dance from "Salome," March 19, 1931

"Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks," Op. 28, May 1, 1931

STRAVINSKY: "Symphonie de Psaumes," for orchestra with chorus (Cecilia Society), December 19, 1930 (first time in the United States), February 20, 1931 594,

Capriccio for piano (JESÚS MARÍA SANROMÁ) and orchestra, December 19, 1930 (first time in the United States)

Suite from "L'Oiseau de Feu," April 24, 1931

TCHAIKOVSKY: Symphony No. 4, F minor, Op. 36, October 31, 1930

Concerto for pianoforte (VLADIMIR HOROWITZ) and orchestra, B-flat minor, No. 1, Op. 23, March 19, 1931

WAGNER: Overture to "Der Fliegende Hollaender," November 28, 1930

Prelude to "Parsifal," April 3, 1931

Prelude to "Die Meistersinger von Nuernberg," October 10, 1930; May 1, 1931 51,

ORCHESTRAL WORKS PERFORMED FOR THE FIRST TIME ANYWHERE

BACH: Two Preludes (arranged for string orchestra by PICK-MAN-GIAGALLI).

HANSON*: Symphony No. 2, "Romantic."

HILL*: An Ode (chorus and orchestra).
Symphony No. 2 in C major.

HINDEMITH*: Konzertmusik for string and brass instruments.

HONEGGER*: Symphony.

KOUSSEVITZKY*: Overture.

PROKOFIEFF*: Symphony No. 4, Op. 47.

RESPIGHI*: Metamorphoseon Modi XII.

ROUSSEL*: Symphony, G minor 10

SUMMARY

The following composers were represented for the first time at these concerts: Koussevitzky, Křenek, Lambert, Lourié, McKinley, Nabokov, Pilati.

ALBENIZ	2	LAMBERT	1
ARENSKY	1	LOEFFLER	2
BACH	14	LOURIÉ	1
BEETHOVEN	7	McKINLEY	1
BERLIOZ	1	MAHLER	1
BRAHMS	5	MENDELSSOHN	1
BRUCH	1	MOUSSORGSKY	1
CHABRIER	1	MOZART	4
CORELLI	1	NABOKOV	1
DEBUSSY	2	PILATI	1
ELGAR	1	PROKOFIEFF	1
FALLA, DE	1	RAMEAU	1
FRANCK	1	RAVEL	2
GLUCK	1	RESPIGHI	1
GRIFFES	1	RIMSKY-KORSAKOV	2
HADLEY	2	ROUSSEL	1
HANDEL	2	SCHUBERT	2
HANSON	1	SCHUMANN	3
HAYDN	3	SIBELIUS	2
HILL	2	STEINERT	1
HINDEMITH	1	STRAUSS	4
HONEGGER	2	STRAVINSKY	4
KOUSSEVITZKY	1	TCHAIKOVSKY	2
KŘENEK	1	WAGNER	4

GUEST CONDUCTORS

ARBOS, ENRIQUE FERNANDEZ. January 23, 1931. Corelli-Pinelli, Suite; Franck, symphony in D minor; De Falla, Suite from "El Amor Brujo"; Albeniz-Arbos, "El Albaicin,"

BURGIN,† RICHARD. December 12, 1930. Křenek, Little Symphony;
Mozart, Piano Concerto in A major (K.488) (BRUCE SIMONDS, pianist); Sibelius, Symphony No. 1, E minor, Op. 39.

HADLEY, HENRY. January 16, 1931. Haydn, Symphony No 1, E-flat major; McKinley, Masquerade*; Hadley, "Salome" (after Wilde's Tragedy), Op. 55; Hadley, Suite for orchestra, "Streets of Pekin."

HENSCHEL, SIR GEORGE. October 10, 1930. Beethoven, Overture to the "Consecration of the House"; Gluck, "Che farò senza Eurydice" (Mme. MATZENAUER); Haydn, symphony in B-flat (B. & H. No. 12); Schubert, Ballet Music from "Rosamunde"; Bruch, Penelope's Lament from "Odysseus" (Mme. MATZENAUER); Wagner, Prelude to "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg." The programme, with the exception of Wagner's Prelude, of the first concert of the orchestra (October 22, 1881), when Weber's Festival Overture was played.

TERCENTENARY RADIO CONCERT

Saturday	Evening	Oct. 4 at 7.00	Symphony Hall	Boston
Friday	Afternoon	Oct. 10 at 2.30	Symphony Hall	Boston
Saturday	Evening	Oct. 11 at 8.15	Symphony Hall	Boston
Thursday	Evening	Oct. 16 at 8.00	Sanders Theatre	Cambridge
Friday	Afternoon	Oct. 17 at 2.30	Symphony Hall	Boston
Saturday	Evening	Oct. 18 at 8.15	Symphony Hall	Boston
Wednesday	Evening	Oct. 22 at 8.00	Alumnæ Hall	Wellesley
Friday	Afternoon	Oct. 24 at 2.30	Symphony Hall	Boston
Saturday	Evening	Oct. 25 at 8.15	Symphony Hall	Boston
Friday	Afternoon	Oct. 31 at 2.30	Symphony Hall	Boston
Saturday	Evening	Nov. 1 at 8.15	Symphony Hall	Boston
Thursday	Evening	Nov. 6 at 8.00	Sanders Theatre	Cambridge
Friday	Afternoon	Nov. 7 at 2.30	Symphony Hall	Boston
Saturday	Evening	Nov. 8 at 8.15	Symphony Hall	Boston
Monday	Evening	Nov. 10 at 8.15	Symphony Hall	Boston
Wednesday	Afternoon	Nov. 12 at 4.00	Young People's Concert	Boston
Thursday	Afternoon	Nov. 13 at 4.00	Young People's Concert	Boston
Friday	Afternoon	Nov. 14 at 2.30	Symphony Hall	Boston
Saturday	Evening	Nov. 15 at 8.15	Symphony Hall	Boston
Tuesday	Evening	Nov. 18 at 8.15	Albee Theatre	Providence
Thursday	Evening	Nov. 20 at 8.30	Carnegie Hall	New York
Friday	Evening	Nov. 21 at 8.15	Academy of Music	Brooklyn
Saturday	Afternoon	Nov. 22 at 2.30	Carnegie Hall	New York
Tuesday	Afternoon	Nov. 25 at 3.00	Symphony Hall	Boston
Friday	Afternoon	Nov. 28 at 2.30	Symphony Hall	Boston
Saturday	Evening	Nov. 29 at 8.15	Symphony Hall	Boston
Thursday	Evening	Dec. 11 at 8.00	Sanders Theatre	Cambridge
Friday	Afternoon	Dec. 12 at 2.30	Symphony Hall	Boston
Saturday	Evening	Dec. 13 at 8.15	Symphony Hall	Boston
Monday	Evening	Dec. 15 at 8.15	Symphony Hall	Boston
Tuesday	Evening	Dec. 16 at 8.15	Albee Theatre	Providence
Friday	Afternoon	Dec. 19 at 2.30	Symphony Hall	Boston
Saturday	Evening	Dec. 20 at 8.15	Symphony Hall	Boston
Friday	Afternoon	Dec. 26 at 2.30	Symphony Hall	Boston
Saturday	Evening	Dec. 27 at 8.15	Symphony Hall	Boston
Sunday	Afternoon	Dec. 28 at 3.30	Pension Fund Concert	Boston
Friday	Afternoon	Jan. 2 at 2.30	Symphony Hall	Boston
Saturday	Evening	Jan. 3 at 8.15	Symphony Hall	Boston
Tuesday	Afternoon	Jan. 6 at 3.00	Symphony Hall	Boston
Thursday	Evening	Jan. 8 at 8.30	Carnegie Hall	New York
Friday	Evening	Jan. 9 at 8.15	Academy of Music	Brooklyn
Saturday	Afternoon	Jan. 10 at 2.30	Carnegie Hall	New York
Thursday	Evening	Jan. 15 at 8.00	Sanders Theatre	Cambridge

Friday	Afternoon	Jan. 16 at 2.30	Symphony Hall	Boston
Saturday	Evening	Jan. 17 at 8.15	Symphony Hall	Boston
Tuesday	Evening	Jan. 20 at 8.15	Albee Theatre	Providence
Friday	Afternoon	Jan. 23 at 2.30	Symphony Hall	Boston
Saturday	Evening	Jan. 24 at 8.15	Symphony Hall	Boston
Monday	Evening	Jan. 26 at 8.15	Symphony Hall	Boston
Friday	Afternoon	Jan. 30 at 2.30	Symphony Hall	Boston
Saturday	Evening	Jan. 31 at 8.15	Symphony Hall	Boston
Monday	Evening	Feb. 2 at 8.30	Mosque Auditorium	Richmond
Tuesday	Afternoon	Feb. 3 at 4.30	Constitution Hall	Washington
Wednesday	Evening	Feb. 4 at 8.30	Lyric Theatre	Baltimore
Thursday	Evening	Feb. 5 at 8.15	Academy of Music	Brooklyn
Friday	Evening	Feb. 6 at 8.30	Carnegie Hall	New York
Saturday	Afternoon	Feb. 7 at 2.30	Carnegie Hall	New York
Tuesday	Afternoon	Feb. 10 at 3.00	Symphony Hall	Boston
Friday	Afternoon	Feb. 13 at 2.30	Symphony Hall	Boston
Saturday	Evening	Feb. 14 at 8.15	Symphony Hall	Boston
Monday	Evening	Feb. 16 at 8.15	Symphony Hall	Boston
Thursday	Evening	Feb. 19 at 8.00	Sanders Theatre	Cambridge
Friday	Afternoon	Feb. 20 at 2.30	Symphony Hall	Boston
Saturday	Evening	Feb. 21 at 8.15	Symphony Hall	Boston
Tuesday	Afternoon	Feb. 24 at 3.00	Symphony Hall	Boston
Friday	Afternoon	Feb. 27 at 2.30	Symphony Hall	Boston
Saturday	Evening	Feb. 28 at 8.15	Symphony Hall	Boston
Tuesday	Evening	Mar. 3 at 8.00	John M. Greene Hall	Northampton
Wednesday	Evening	Mar. 4 at 8.15	Woolsey Hall	New Haven
Thursday	Evening	Mar. 5 at 8.30	Carnegie Hall	New York
Friday	Evening	Mar. 6 at 8.15	Academy of Music	Brooklyn
Saturday	Afternoon	Mar. 7 at 2.30	Carnegie Hall	New York
Tuesday	Afternoon	Mar. 10 at 3.00	Symphony Hall	Boston
Thursday	Evening	Mar. 12 at 8.00	Sanders Theatre	Cambridge
Friday	Afternoon	Mar. 13 at 2.30	Symphony Hall	Boston
Saturday	Evening	Mar. 14 at 8.15	Symphony Hall	Boston
Monday	Evening	Mar. 16 at 8.15	Symphony Hall	Boston
Saturday	Evening	Apr. 18 at 8.15	Symphony Hall	Boston
Tuesday	Afternoon	Apr. 21 at 3.00	Symphony Hall	Boston
Friday	Afternoon	Apr. 24 at 2.30	Symphony Hall	Boston
Saturday	Evening	Apr. 25 at 8.15	Symphony Hall	Boston
Monday	Evening	Apr. 27 at 8.15	Symphony Hall	Boston
Thursday	Evening	Apr. 30 at 8.00	Sanders Theatre	Cambridge
Friday	Afternoon	May 1 at 2.30	Symphony Hall	Boston
Saturday	Evening	May 2 at 8.15	Symphony Hall	Boston

Boston Symphony Orchestra

Fiftieth Anniversary Exhibition

The exhibition includes —

The portrait of Henry L. Higginson by John S. Sargent.

Paintings of the "rush line" by Duane Haley, and the orchestra in rehearsal by Marie D. Page.

Pictures of the Orchestra under various conductors, from its second season.

Pictures of the conductors, guest conductors, and prominent players.

Pictures and autographed letters of composers.

Press books from 1889, and programmes from the earliest days.

Manuscript scores written for the Orchestra's anniversary.

This exhibition is on view in the Huntington Avenue lobby (first balcony).

THE FOLLOWING HAVE ASSISTED IN PERFORMANCES

AMY EVANS, soprano; MARGARET MATZENAUER, contralto; RICHARD CROOKS,* tenor; FRASER GANGE, bass, in Bach's cantatas Nos. 85 and 20, March 27, 1931, and Nos. 4 and 80, March 28, 1931 (part of the Bach Festival). (Mme. EVANS was first heard here with the orchestra in Bach's Mass in B minor, March 24, 1931.)

MARIE MURRAY, contralto in Lambert's "Rio Grande," April 24, 1931. The BACH CANTATA CLUB, rehearsed by G. WALLACE WOODWORTH, its conductor, sang the choruses in the above-mentioned cantatas of Bach.

The HARVARD GLEE CLUB, DR. DAVISON conductor, and the RADCLIFFE CHORAL SOCIETY, MR. WOODWORTH conductor, sang Hill's "Ode" on October 17, 1930.

The CECILIA SOCIETY, ARTHUR FIEDLER conductor, was the chorus in Stravinsky's "Symphonie de Psaumes," December 19, 1930, and February 20, 1931; also in Lambert's "The Rio Grande," April 24, 1931.

Alto voices trained by Mr. FIEDLER sang in Lourié's "Sonate Liturgique" on January 2, 1931. December 19, 1930. JESÚS MARÍA SANROMÁ, pianist. Stravinsky's Capriccio for piano and orchestra.

February 13, 1931. Mr. SANROMÁ, pianist. Pilati's Suite for piano and string orchestra; Lambert's "The Rio Grande," April 24, 1931.

March 27, 1931. RICHARD BURGINT† and JULIUS THEODOROWICZ,† violinists. Bach's Concerto for two violins and string orchestra (Bach Festival).

March 28, 1931. ALEXANDER BOROVSKY, piano; RICHARD BURGINT,† violin; GEORGES LAURENT,† flute. Bach's Brandenburg Concerto No. 5 (Bach Festival).

Singers: Soprano, Povla Frijsh	1
Contralto, Margaret Matzenauer	1
Tenor, Richard Crooks*	1
Violinists: Jascha Heifetz, Nathan Milstein	2
Violoncellist: Gregor Piatigorsky	1
Clarinetist: Victor Polatschek†	1
Pianists: Alexander Borovsky, Walter Giesecking, Vladimir Horowitz, Bruce Simonds	4
	<hr style="width: 10%; margin-left: 0;"/> 11

WORKS PREVIOUSLY PERFORMED IN BOSTON, PLAYED FOR THE FIRST TIME AT THESE CONCERTS

McKINLEY: Masquerade.

OTHER WORKS PERFORMED IN BOSTON FOR THE FIRST TIME

ALBENIZ-ARBOS: "El Albaicin," "Navarra."

CORELLI-PINELLI: Suite.

ELGAR: Introduction and Allegro for string orchestra, Op. 47.

HADLEY: Suite for orchestra, "Streets of Pekin."

KŘENEK: Little Symphony, Op. 58.

LAMBERT: "The Rio Grande."

LOURIÉ: Sonate Liturgique. (First time in the United States.)

NABOKOV: Symphonie Lyrique. (First time in the United States.)

PILATI: Suite for piano and string orchestra.

STEINERT: Leggenda Sinfonica. (First time in the United States.)

STRAVINSKY: "Symphonie de Psaumes." (First time in the United States.)

THE FOLLOWING ARTISTS HAVE APPEARED AS SOLOISTS THIS SEASON

BOROVSKY, ALEXANDER, pianist (Four Preludes and Fugues from "Well-Tempered Clavichord"), March 28, 1931

CROOKS,* RICHARD, tenor (Mahler's "Lied von der Erde"), December 26, 1930

FRIJSH, POVLA, soprano (Loeffler's "Canticum Fratris Solis"), February 13, 1931

GIESEKING, WALTER, pianist (Beethoven, Concerto No. 5, E-flat major), November 28, 1930. Sketch

HEIFETZ, JASCHA, violinist (Beethoven's Concerto), February 27, 1931. Sketch

HOROWITZ, VLADIMIR, pianist (Tchaikovsky's Concerto, No. 1), March 19, 1931. Sketch

MATZENAUER, MARGARET, contralto (Gluck, "Che farò senza Euridice"; Bruch, "Penelope's Lament"), October 10, 1930 (Mahler's "Lied von der Erde"), December 26, 1930

MILSTEIN, NATHAN, violinist (Brahms, Concerto), March 13, 1931. Sketch

PIATIGORSKY, GREGOR (Schumann, Concerto), April 17, 1931. Sketch

POLATSCHEK,† VICTOR, clarinetist (Mozart's Concerto for clarinet), November 14, 1930. Sketch

SIMONDS, BRUCE, pianist (Mozart's piano concerto, A major) (K. 488)

EXTRA SYMPHONY CONCERTS

Six symphony concerts were given in Symphony Hall on Monday evenings, Dr. Koussevitzky conductor.

1930. November 10. Bach, Two Preludes (arranged for string orchestra by Pick-Mangiagalli); Respighi, Metamorphoseon, Modi XII; Beethoven, Symphony No. 7, A major.

December 15. Dr. Koussevitzky sick; Richard Burgin conducted. Handel, Concerto Grosso for String Orchestra, B minor, No. 12; Mozart, Concerto for violin, No. 5, A major (K. 219) (ANTON WITEK, violinist); Brahms, Symphony No. 2, D major.

1931. January 26. Mozart, Symphony in G minor (K. 550); Mozart, Piano Concerto, D minor (K. 466) (HORTENSE MONATH, pianist); Moussorgsky-Ravel, "Pictures at an Exhibition."

February 16. Elgar, Introduction and Allegro for string orchestra, Op. 47; Stravinsky, Capriccio for piano and orchestra (JESÚS MARÍA SANROMÁ, pianist); Strauss, Symphonía Domestica.

March 16. Beethoven, Overture to "Leonore," No. 3; Berezowsky, Symphony No. 1, Op. 10 (first performance; the composer conductor); Mendelssohn, Violin Concerto (LÉON ZIGHERA, violinist; his first appearance in the United States); Rimsky-Korsakov, Caprice on Spanish Themes.

April 27. Bach, Suite for Orchestra, D major, No. 3, "The Rio Grande," poem by Sacheverell Sitwell, and set for chorus, orchestra, and solo pianoforte by Constant Lambert (CECILIA SOCIETY, trained by ARTHUR FIEDLER); Brahms, Symphony, C minor, No. 1.

Six symphony concerts were given in Symphony Hall on Tuesday afternoons, Dr. Koussevitzky, conductor:

1930. November 25. Bach, Two preludes (arranged for string orchestra by Pick-Mangiagalli); Beethoven, Symphony No. 7, A major; Brahms, Symphony No. 2, D major.

1931. January 6. Wagner, Overture to "Rienzi"; Bacchanale from "Tannhaeuser"; Introduction to Act III of "Lohengrin"; Ride of the Valkyries from "The Valkyrie"; Prelude and Love-Death from "Tristan and Isolde"; Prelude to "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg."

February 10. Beethoven: Symphony No. 3, E-flat major, "Eroica"; Piano Concerto No. 4, G major (MYRA HESS, pianist); Overture to Goethe's "Egmont."

February 24. Sibelius, "Finlandia," Symphonic Poem; Sibelius, Symphony No. 7, Op. 105; Tchaikovsky, Symphony No. 4, F minor, Op. 36.

March 10. Mozart, Symphony, G minor (K. 550); Berlioz, Symphonie Fantastique, Op. 16A.

April 21. Chadwick, "Noël" from the "Symphonic Sketches" (in memory of the composer, who died on April 5, 1931); Schumann, Symphony, B-flat major, No. 1; Stravinsky, Capriccio for piano and orchestra (JESÚS MARÍA SANROMÁ, pianist); Strauss, "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks."

PENSION FUND CONCERTS

1930. December 28. Wagner, Overture to "The Flying Dutchman"; Prelude to "Lohengrin"; Stravinsky, Capriccio for piano and orchestra (JESÚS MARÍA SANROMÁ, pianist); Tchaikovsky, Symphony, F minor, No. 4. Dr. Koussevitzky, conductor.

1931. March 29. Bach's Mass in B minor. (AMY EVANS, soprano; MARGARET MATZENAUER, contralto; RICHARD CROOKS, tenor; FRASER GANGE, bass. HARVARD GLEE CLUB and RADCLIFFE CHORAL SOCIETY.) Dr. Koussevitzky, conductor. A repetition of the performance on March 24, the first day of the Bach Festival.

YOUNG PEOPLE'S CONCERTS

1930. November 12-13. Bach, Prelude arranged for string orchestra by Pick-Mangiagalli; Beethoven, Allegretto from Symphony No. 7; Mozart, Adagio from the Concerto for Clarinet (VICTOR POLATSCHEK,† clarinetist); Moussorgsky-Ravel, "Pictures at an Exhibition" (Promenade, Gnome, Tuileries, Bydlo, Promenade, Ballet of the Chicks in their Shells, Samuel Goldenberg and Schmuyle); Borodin, Polovetskian Dances from "Prince Igor." Dr. Koussevitzky and Mr. Burgin, conductors. Explanatory remarks (with lantern slides) by ALFRED H. MEYER.

1931. April 6, 7. Haydn, Symphony, D major (B. & H., No. 10), First Movement; Mendelssohn, scherzo from Incidental Music to "A Midsummer Night's Dream"; Handel-Casadesus, Andante from Concerto (JEAN LEFRANC,† viola solo); Honegger, "Pacific 231"; Rimsky-Korsakov, Caprice on Spanish Themes. Dr. Koussevitzky and Mr. Burgin, conductors. Explanatory remarks (with lantern slides) by ALFRED H. MEYER.

• • •

BACH FESTIVAL

Festival of the music of Johann Sebastian Bach, Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Koussevitzky conductor, given in the Orchestra's 50th season in honor of its founder, Henry L. Higginson. Assisted by HARVARD GLEE CLUB (Dr. ARCHIBALD T. DAVISON, conductor); RADCLIFFE CHORAL SOCIETY (G. WALLACE WOODWORTH, conductor); BACH CANTATA CLUB (Mr. WOODWORTH, conductor); AMY EVANS, soprano; ADELLE ALBERTS, soprano; MARGARET MATZENAUER, contralto; RICHARD CROOKS, tenor; FRASER GANGE, baritone; ALEXANDER BOROVSKY, piano; Mme. PATORNI-CASADESUS, harpsichord; WALLACE GOODRICH, organ; Messrs. BURGIN† and THEODOROWICZ,† solo violins; Messrs. LAURENT,† flute, GILLET,† oboe, SPEYER,† oboe d'amore, DEVERGIE,† oboe d'amore, MAGER,† trumpet, SNOW,† organ. Address on "H. L. Higginson" by BLISS PERRY.

Tuesday, March 24, 4.30 P.M., 8.30 P.M. Mass in B minor.

Wednesday, March 25, 8.30 P.M. Organ: Fantasia in C minor, Adagio from the Toccata in C major, Fugue in C major (Mr. GOODRICH). Address (Mr. PERRY). Harpsichord: Italian Concerto, Fantasia No. 3 in C minor, Gigue in D minor (Mme. PATORNI-CASADESUS). Organ: Choral Prelude, "Schmucke dich, o liebe Seele"; Fugue in G minor (Mr. GOODRICH).

Thursday, March 26, 8.30 P.M. Brandenburg Concerto No. 2, F major (solo violin Mr. BURGIN; flute, Mr. LAURENT; oboe, Mr. GILLET; trumpet, Mr. MAGER). Concerto for piano and orchestra, D minor (Mr. BOROVSKY, pianist). Magnificat.

Friday, March 27, 2.30 P.M. (20th Symphony Concert). Suite for orchestra No. 3, D major. Concerto, D minor, for two violins and orchestra (Messrs. BURGIN and THEODOROWICZ). Cantata No. 85, "Ich bin ein Guter Hirt" (sung in German). Cantata No. 20, first half of "O Ewigkeit, du Donnerwort" (sung in German).

Saturday, March 28, 8.15 P.M. (continuation of Symphony Concert No. 20). Easter cantata, "Christ lag in Todesbanden" (sung in English). Brandenburg Concerto No. 5 (solo piano, Mr. BOROVSKY; violin, Mr. BURGIN; flute, Mr. LAURENT). Preludes and Fugues from the "Well-Tempered Clavichord," Book I: Prelude and Fugue, G minor, No. 16; D major, No. 5; B-flat minor, No. 22; C-sharp major, No. 3 (Mr. BOROVSKY, pianist). Cantata No. 80, "Ein feste Burg ist unser Gott" (sung in English).

Sunday, March 29, 4.30 and 8.30 P.M. Repetition of Bach's Mass in B minor (in aid of the Orchestra's Pension Fund).

• • •

Eighty—but Still Keen

Sir George Henschel

From a Photograph Privately Taken at His Country House, Alt-na-Criche in the Scottish Highlands

YOUNG PEOPLE'S CONCERTS

1930. November 12-13. Bach, Prelude arranged for string orchestra by Pick-Mangiagalli; Beethoven, Allegretto from Symphony No. 7; Mozart, Adagio from the Concerto for Clarinet (VICTOR POLATSCHEK,† clarinetist); Moussorgsky-Ravel, "Pictures at an Exhibition" (Promenade, Gnome, Tuileries, Bydlo, Promenade, Ballet of the Chicks in their Shells, Samuel Goldenberg and Schmuyle); Borodin, Polovetskian Dances from "Prince Igor." Dr. Koussevitzky and Mr. Burgin, conductors. Explanatory remarks (with lantern slides) by ALFRED H. MEYER.

1931. April 6, 7. Haydn, Symphony, D major (B. & H., No. 10). First Movement; Mendelssohn, scherzo from Incidental Music to "A Midsummer Night's Dream"; Handel-Casadesus, Andante from Concerto (JEAN LEFRANC,† viola solo); Honegger, "Pacific 231"; Rimsky-Korsakov, Caprice on Spanish Themes. Dr. Koussevitzky and Mr. Burgin, conductors. Explanatory remarks (with lantern slides) by ALFRED H. MEYER.

BACH FESTIVAL

Festival of the music of Johann Sebastian Bach, Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Koussevitzky conductor, given in the Orchestra's 50th season in honor of its founder, Henry L. Higginson. Assisted by HARVARD GLEE CLUB (Dr. ARCHIBALD T. DAVISON, conductor); RADCLIFFE CHORAL SOCIETY (G. WALLACE WOODWORTH, conductor); BACH CANTATA CLUB (Mr. WOODWORTH, conductor); AMY EVANS, soprano; ADELLE ALBERTS, soprano; MARGARET MATZENAUER, contralto; RICHARD CROOKS, tenor; FRASER GANGE, baritone; ALEXANDER BOROVSKY, piano; Mme. PATORNI-CASADESUS, harpsichord; WALLACE GOODRICH, organ; Messrs. BURGIN† and THEODOROWICZ,† solo violins; Messrs. LAURENT,† flute, GILLET,† oboe, SPEYER,† oboe d'amore, DEVERGIE,† oboe d'amore, MAGER,† trumpet, SNOW,† organ. Address on "H. L. Higginson" by BLISS PERRY.

Tuesday, March 24, 4.30 P.M., 8.30 P.M. Mass in B minor.

Wednesday, March 25, 8.30 P.M. Organ: Fantasia in C minor, Adagio from the Toccata in C major, Fugue in C major (Mr. GOODRICH). Address (Mr. PERRY). Harpsichord: Italian Concerto, Fantasia No. 3 in C minor, Gigue in D minor (Mme. PATORNI-CASADESUS). Organ: Choral Prelude, "Schmucke dich, o liebe Seele"; Fugue in G minor (Mr. GOODRICH).

Thursday, March 26, 8.30 P.M. Brandenburg Concerto No. 2, F major (solo violin Mr. BURGIN; flute, Mr. LAURENT; oboe, Mr. GILLET; trumpet, Mr. MAGER). Concerto for piano and orchestra, D minor (Mr. BOROVSKY, pianist). Magnificat.

Friday, March 27, 2.30 P.M. (20th Symphony Concert). Suite for orchestra No. 3, D major. Concerto, D minor, for two violins and orchestra (Messrs. BURGIN and THEODOROWICZ). Cantata No. 85, "Ich bin ein Guter Hirt" (sung in German). Cantata No. 20, first half of "O Ewigkeit, du Donnerwort" (sung in German).

Saturday, March 28, 8.15 P.M. (continuation of Symphony Concert No. 20). Easter cantata, "Christ lag in Todesbanden" (sung in English). Brandenburg Concerto No. 5 (solo piano, Mr. BOROVSKY; violin, Mr. BURGIN; flute, Mr. LAURENT). Preludes and Fugues from the "Well-Tempered Clavichord," Book I: Prelude and Fugue, G minor, No. 16; D major, No. 5; B-flat minor, No. 22; C-sharp major, No. 3 (Mr. BOROVSKY, pianist). Cantata No. 80, "Ein feste Burg ist unser Gott" (sung in English).

Sunday, March 29, 4.30 and 8.30 P.M. Repetition of Bach's Mass in B minor (in aid of the Orchestra's Pension Fund).

Eighty—but Still Keen

Sir George Henschel

From a Photograph Privately Taken at His Country House, Alt-na-Criche in the Scottish Highlands

EARLY on Saturday afternoon, the conductor of the Symphony Orchestra, the president of the trustees, the managerial staff at Symphony Hall, went to meet the first guest of the Jubilee Year. With them was one of the surviving friends of his distant Bostonian day—Arthur Foote, the composer. The guest was Sir George Henschel, arriving at Commonwealth Pier from London and Liverpool, accompanied by his wife and their daughter. The greeters went cheerfully, inasmuch as Providence, a sound constitution and discreet living had preserved the conductor of the first pair of Symphony Concerts in the first season (1881-82) to return to that post, able and eager, for the first pair in the fiftieth (1930-31). They came back well content, having found Sir George less the man of eighty than the date-books will have him than the practicing musician of sixty, alert in body and mind, still keen for fresh and crowning adventure.

Other friends were waiting to escort Sir George to the house where he will be guest during his fortnight in Boston. (Since 1905, when he conducted at a concert for the Pension Fund of the orchestra, he has not revisited the city.) This morning he begins rehearsals at Symphony Hall, to continue daily through Thursday; on Friday and Saturday come the appointed concerts. Not to overtax himself, he will make it a week of work. Next a week of social opportunity; the hearing of the orchestra under Dr. Koussevitzky in music of this immediate day; thereafter, leisurely return to London.

Air-Minded

Early on Saturday evening, in unusual circumstances, the preliminary concert of the new season. Long ago, the Symphony Orchestra promised a contribution to the Tercentenary rites. Last spring, they had hardly begun before Dr. Koussevitzky departed to Paris. Now, they were nearly ended; but there was still room for a radio concert—the first ever undertaken by the orchestra for the air only. Originally, station WEEI was to broadcast it. Quickly the National Broadcasting Company proposed that it be relayed over its circuit—Southern Cities, Middle-Western cities, cities in California and Oregon, twenty-nine in all.

Symphony Hall readily agreed. Through an hour and a half, on this first Saturday of the Jubilee Year, it would be the seat of a national orchestra. The program, however, kept Bostonian quality: the longer half to three resident and living composers—Foote of the Suite that at each repetition brings fresh pleasure; Hill of "Lilacs" (after Amy Lowell's like-named verses); Loeffler, with "Pagan Poem"; the shorter half to two modern classics—Debussy's "Afternoon of a Faun" and Strauss's "Till Eulenspiegel."

All five are in the "active repertory"; but they were as carefully prepared as though the subscribers of Boston and New York awaited them. Dr. Koussevitzky does not "condescend" to a "radio audience."

Visible and Invisible

The circumstances, however, were different. At first, there were to be no guests at Symphony Hall. By itself the orchestra was to play for its invisible hearers through two microphones, suspended a third of the way down the auditorium. A visible audience had uses in that long tunnel. It might, as they used to say in wartime, stimulate morale. The conductor suggested that the families of the players be invited, along with a few friends of the orchestra. All told, they might have made a hundred-odd, seated just back of the broad cross-aisle. Of course, they were bidden, more than once, not to applaud. They took the command so urgently that they were the stillest audience yet known to Symphony Hall. They stirred neither hand nor foot; they almost breathed short. Not a coat or a skirt rustled. Through an hour and a half no cough, suppressed or unsuppressed, disturbed the musical peace. It can be done.

The orchestra was in usual place, but clothed as the subscribing public never sees it. One and all wore the jackets of rehearsal; while summer gray was as permissible as autumn black. Nor—if the faithful reporter is to tell the whole truth—did they sit the chairs with quite the dignity proper to Friday afternoons and to Saturday or Monday evenings. To every man his congenial position. The old hands noted also that the piano of "Pagan Poem" was now set at the left and in front of the orchestra; the celesta of other numbers moved equally forward. "Radio transmission" doubtless. These old hands further observed that, conducting to an "invisible audience," Dr. Koussevitzky used the same gestures to which he has accustomed his visible and watchful listeners. They are not mannerisms nor are they made "for effect." They are the conductor's natural expression of the music and himself upon the orchestra. (Memorandum: However much pianists and violinists may cultivate the short jacket for matinees, a long coat is essential to the conductor's "line.")

When there is no "visible audience," a symphony orchestra may tune its instruments on the stage—in these days rare experience in any concert-hall. When five numbers, two or three of appreciable length, must be crowded into ninety minutes—and not a moment over—it must also play virtually without pause. Add two speeches, though of the briefest, and not a second must be wasted. The Announcer's foot was on the step to the stage-microphone, as the last phrase of the orchestra sounded. Dr. Koussevitzky dropped his baton; spun on his heel; faced it manuscript in hand—all in a single motion. Accustomed to signify the pleasure of the court, Judge Cabot now stood by the stage waiting the pleasure of the Announcer. A radio world indeed; but one in which that same Announcer did himself credit by the reticence and the good taste of his introductory sentences. Neither the scandalous life and works of the inexhaustible Eulenspiegel, nor the Vergilian Eclogue behind Mr. Loeffler's tone-poem, nor even the "experiences"—as he chastely named them—of Mallarmé's and Debussy's "Faun" tempted him to overdo.

Speeches, But Brief

Said Dr. Koussevitzky for first interlude:

I am happy that my first speech on the radio is to welcome the Tercentenary of the State of Massachusetts. Today the Boston Symphony Orchestra takes part in your celebrations. We congratulate you on your great achievements during these three hundred years. Massachusetts possesses immense intellectual treasures: Harvard University, known as the most important center of culture and enlightenment; the Boston Symphony Orchestra, considered to be the leading orchestra of the whole musical world; a great number of first-class writers, painters, sculptors and composers of whom you may be proud—not only you people of Massachusetts but all the citizens of the United States.

Let me welcome you again, in the name of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and express our wish that the cultural life of Massachusetts always remains in the first rank, as it has been up to this day.

Said Judge Cabot when his moment came:

Fittingly, as part of the observance of Massachusetts's three hundredth anniversary, it is made possible for the people of Massachusetts and of our Nation to hear the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The early settlers set great store by the spoken word. They listened eagerly to exhortations expounding the ways of the spirit. Through their hearing, their imaginations were stirred. The first minister of Salem, the Reverend Francis Higginson, was a man of courage, patriotism and faith, giving all that he had to love of his people. It is well said that "he who dedicates his life to the beauty of holiness is not far from the sight of all beauty."

His direct descendant, Henry Lee Higginson, in the beginning of the last fifty-year period of the past 300 years, founded the Boston Symphony Orchestra, because, as he said, music was his inner world which he enjoyed in the depths of his soul as nothing else and he wished to make possible for others this great happiness. His characteristics, too, were courage, patriotism, friendship. He had faith that the great musical compositions could be produced by artists playing each year ever more perfectly under an interpreting master, so that the listeners would go forth rejoicing and live their lives refreshed.

What began thus in Boston has marvellously widened, extending today to countless numbers throughout the land. Yet the greatest happiness comes from listening in the presence of the artists themselves. Fittingly, therefore, in this fiftieth year of its assembly, this orchestra will hold a festival in the nation's capital and there in December, during four days, it will play the symphonies of Beethoven.

May each succeeding fifty years add to the orchestra's excellence and lasting significance in the life of Massachusetts and of the nation.

Reviewer's Epilogue

The purpose of this article is descriptive, not critical; but it would be at fault as record did it fail to note the quality of the orchestra. After three rehearsals it was unmistakably itself—in the vitalizing energy of its tone; the sensuous richness, the luminous texture, the instant plasticity. At call it gave back vigor or subtlety; its ear for euphony was unfailing; its technical prowess, the means to the musical end. For each composer and each music, it found the individualizing, intensifying voice. As for the chosen numbers, the "radio ear" may be this, that or the other; but it must have caught something of the poetizing and jewelling Debussy; of the keen-witted and keen-voiced Strauss. The grace and the fancy of Mr. Foote's Suite could not have escaped it, though it may have missed the fineness of his composing fingers. It must have felt the spring air blowing through Mr. Hill's "Lilacs," the note of reverie upon which it begins and ends—the New Englander musing over his own countryside. And which of us at first hearing, twenty-odd years ago, absorbed every spell of Mr. Loeffler's "Pagan Poem"? After all they have made and still make music in New England. Not yet is Euterpe chained "exclusively" in the market place of Manhattan.

As for the radio "up against" symphonic music from an orchestra of the first rank, the young Suzanne shall be spokeswoman. Her years are eleven and she listened on Saturday to Foote, Hill and Loeffler in the concert hall; to Debussy and Strauss off a neighboring set. "But, father," she said, as the last measures of "The Afternoon of a Faun" sounded, "there's something between." There is—machinery. H. T. P.

1930-31
A CONCERT GIVEN FOR THE RELIEF OF SUFFERERS FROM THE RECENT DISASTER IN HALIFAX, NOVA SCOTIA

BY

Hellie Melba
Fritz Kreisler
Dr. Karl Muck

AND THE
BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

AT

SYMPHONY HALL, BOSTON
SUNDAY AFTERNOON, DECEMBER 16, 1917

Upper Left—Autographed Program of One of the Notable Concerts of the Symphony Orchestra when Disaster Came Upon a Neighboring Community

Line" that Days and sic Hall in Tickets for

William F. Apthorp Recalls and Judges The Beginnings of George Henschel And the Symphony Orchestra

THURSDAY, March 3, 1881, is a memorable date in Boston musical annals, although it may be doubted whether more than one person suspected it at the time. On the afternoon of that day came the eighth, and last, of the sixteenth season of symphony concerts given in the Music Hall by the Harvard Musical Association, an affair which surely no one in those days—with the possible exception of John Sullivan Dwight—regarded as an "event." The fifth number on the program was: Henschel: Concert Overture (MS. 1870), first time. This was conducted by the composer in person; and hereby hangs the tale.

The Harvard Musical Association's symphony concerts, begun in December, 1865, and immensely successful at first, had been for some years dragging out a rather neglected and financially feeble existence; and there seemed little chance of anything turning up to check their decline. Most people who cared to think about the matter at all thought our local musical conditions in a discouragingly bad way; for very few knew that, for several years, there had been a man in Boston with a whole new scheme of symphony concerts fully matured in his head and ready to subsidize them out of his own pocket; and, of these few, only one or two had any inkling of who the man was. But he was there, waiting patiently for but one thing to enable him to make his scheme a fact. This man, as all Boston soon found out, was Henry L. Higginson. The whole plan was his conception, and like Colonel Sellers, he was only waiting for a "missing ingredient," for an orchestral conductor in whom he should have sufficient confidence to warrant his taking the first practical step. And it was the H. M. A. symphony concert of March 3, 1881, that at last brought this "missing ingredient" to his appreciative notice.

Miss Lillian Bailey, the admirable young soprano, had recently returned from Europe for a concert tour in this country, bringing in her train her London teacher, Mr. George Henschel, the baritone, who soon afterwards married her. Both sang at the concert in question, which billed a quite unusual array of solo performers; for, beside the two artists already named singing solos and a duet, Dr. Louis Maas played a pianoforte concerto of his own. There were only three purely orchestral numbers on the program, one of which was Mr. Henschel's overture; and the H. M. A. concert-committee had willingly granted his request to be allowed to conduct it himself. The result was an overwhelming "Veni, vidi, vici" success. It may even be said that the quality of the composition itself was well-nigh lost sight of in the general enthusiasm for the vigor, power and effectiveness of the performance. Here seemed to be a man who held an orchestra in the very hollow of his hand, and could make it do what he list! Mr. Higginson, who was in the audience, may be fancied as breathing a soft, but heartfelt, "Eureka!"

Whether his mind was made up on the spot, or he first consulted some of the professional friends whose opinion he was accustomed to value, the present writer knoweth not. [Naturally, Mr. Henschel did know and the shade of Mr. Apthorp may pardon one of his successors for intercalating a page from the conductor's "Memoirs and Musings."]

"It was at the house of Mrs. George D. Howe," it says, "that, a few days after that concert of the Harvard Musical Society, Major Higginson asked me to meet him, and there, in a few words, as was his wont, he revealed to me his plan for establishing in Boston, on a firm, financial basis, an annual series of orchestral concerts on a large scale, and asked me if, eventually, I would undertake to form the new orchestra and be its first conductor. There would be no committee. I would be my own master as regards the making of the programs, number of rehearsals, indeed in every respect. He also hinted at a very substantial salary, being, as he remarked, sensible of the fact that such a position would naturally not leave me as free to earn as much by my singing as would otherwise be the case.

"The offer was a very tempting one, especially since the regular conducting of a big symphony orchestra had for a long time been one of my ambitions, but there was the question of casting myself—perhaps for good—adrift from so much that was dear to me in Europe, and I begged to be allowed to think the matter over.

"Two days after my marriage, it was in Washington, where part of our honeymoon was spent, I received a telegram from Major Higginson, followed by a letter, in which he definitely offered me the post. And since we had already in our first interview agreed that it would be better for us not to bind ourselves for more than a year, thus giving, after the expiration of it, each of us the option of either renewing or discontinuing the agreement, I accepted. All details were

Upper Middle—The "Seat Line" that Waited through Five Days and Nights at the Old Music Hall in September, 1889, to Buy Tickets for the Symphony Concerts

Boys' four-piece suits
sized 8 to 16; were $25
coat, vest, two knicker
$16.50 to $30 now!

Boys' four-piece suits
sized 8 to 16; were $25
coat, vest, two knicker
$16.50 to $30 now!

Boys' four-piece suits
sized 8 to 16; were $25
coat, vest, two knicker
$16.50 to $30 now!

1930-31

last night's score would have been not a more experienced goal tender d not have looked very strong, and ger opponents the Crimson attack dustly still to be developed. Against ly characterizes Harvard teams that s and the perfect teamwork of expert ing were all in the nature of expert Stubs put on the ice during the e several spots yet to be polished off.
rough spots yet to be polished off.
id make it a strong contender against s of its own class, though there are showed signs of potential speed that for top flight competition. Tech, eam has a long way to go before it ing fashion, but it was evident that ing forwards and defense men in son was able to blast its way through he Engineers very considerably, the the Garden last night. Outweigh-

William F. Apthorp Recalls and Judges The Beginnings of George Henschel And the Symphony Orchestra

THURSDAY, March 3, 1881, is a memorable date in Boston musical annals, although it may be doubted whether more than one person suspected it at the time. On the afternoon of that day came the eighth, and last, of the sixteenth season of symphony concerts given in the Music Hall by the Harvard Musical Association, an affair which surely no one in those days—with the possible exception of John Sullivan Dwight—regarded as an "event." The fifth number on the program was:

Henschel: Concert Overture (MS. 1870), first time
This was conducted by the composer in person; and hereby hangs the tale.

The Harvard Musical Association's symphony concerts, begun in December, 1865, and immensely successful at first, had been for some years dragging out a rather neglected and financially feeble existence; and there seemed little chance of anything turning up to check their decline. Most people who cared to think about the matter at all thought our local musical conditions in a discouragingly bad way; for very few knew that, for several years, there had been a man in Boston with a whole new scheme of symphony concerts fully matured in his head and ready to subsidize them out of his own pocket; and, of these few, only one or two had any inkling of who the man was. But he was there, waiting patiently for but one thing to enable him to make his scheme a fact. This man, as all Boston soon found out, was Henry L. Higginson. The whole plan was his conception, and like Colonel Sellers, he was only waiting for a "missing ingredient," for an orchestral conductor in whom he should have sufficient confidence to warrant his taking the first practical step. And it was the H. M. A. symphony concert of March 3, 1881, that at last brought this "missing ingredient" to his appreciative notice.

Miss Lillian Bailey, the admirable young soprano, had recently returned from Europe for a concert tour in this country, bringing in her train her London teacher, Mr. George Henschel, the baritone, who soon afterwards married her. Both sang at the concert in question, which billed a quite unusual array of solo performers; for, beside the two artists already named singing solos and a duet, Dr. Louis Maas played a pianoforte concerto of his own. There were only three purely orchestral numbers on the program, one of which was Mr. Henschel's overture; and the H. M. A. concert-committee had willingly granted his request to be allowed to conduct it himself. The result was an overwhelming "Veni, vidi, vinci" success. It may even be said that the quality of the composition itself was well-nigh lost sight of in the general enthusiasm for the vigor, power and effectiveness of the performance. Here seemed to be a man who held an orchestra in the very hollow of his hand, and could make it do what he list! Mr. Higginson, who was in the audience, may be fancied as breathing a soft, but heartfelt, "Eureka!"

Whether his mind was made up on the spot, or he first consulted some of the professional friends whose opinion he was accustomed to value, the present writer knoweth not. [Naturally, Mr. Henschel did know and the shade of Mr. Apthorp may pardon one of his successors for intercalating a page from the conductor's "Memoirs and Musings."]

"It was at the house of Mrs. George D. Howe," it says, "that, a few days after that concert of the Harvard Musical Society, Major Higginson asked me to meet him, and there, in a few words, as was his wont, he revealed to me his plan for establishing in Boston, on a firm, financial basis, an annual series of orchestral concerts on a large scale, and asked me if, eventually, I would undertake to form the new orchestra and be its first conductor. There would be no committee. I would be my own master as regards the making of the programs, number of rehearsals, indeed in every respect. He also hinted at a very substantial salary, being, as he remarked, sensible of the fact that such a position would naturally not leave me as free to earn as much by my singing as would otherwise be the case.

"The offer was a very tempting one, especially since the regular conducting of a big symphony orchestra had for a long time been one of my ambitions, but there was the question of casting myself—perhaps for good—adrift from so much that was dear to me in Europe, and I begged to be allowed to think the matter over.

"Two days after my marriage, it was in Washington, where part of our honeymoon was spent, I received a telegram from Major Higginson, followed by a letter, in which he definitely offered me the post. And since we had already in our first interview agreed that it would be better for us not to bind ourselves for more than a year, thus giving, after the expiration of it, each of us the option of either renewing or discontinuing the agreement, I accepted. All details were settled upon after my return to Boston. I engaged the members of the orchestra, selecting them, at Mr. Higginson's very wise suggestion, as nearly as possible from those of the old Harvard Society, and among other local players, so as not to arouse too much opposition." [To resume with Mr. Apthorp.] The opening concert was given in the following fall, in the Music Hall, on Saturday evening, Oct. 22, 1881. [There had been a "public rehearsal" on Friday afternoon.]

And Mr. Henschel? Well, the Sunday and Monday papers were of various opinions about his conducting; there was certainly no unanimous praise. A good deal of fault was found, in some quarters, with his manner, which was undeniably and even somewhat robustly dramatic. Still his conducting did, in some way, seem to warrant Mr. Higginson's high expectations of him. His command of the orchestra seemed as sure, and, as the phrase goes, "magnetic" as at the H. M. A. concert of the preceding spring; the performance was throughout vigorous, fiery, and exciting; in Haydn's symphony even rather excessively strenuous. It was, however, a disappointment to find Mr. Henschel's command over the orchestra decidedly more secure than his command over himself; he hurried rapid tempi inordinately, and the playing of the symphony smacked more of Berlioz, or Verdi, than of good Papa Haydn. But this might well have been the effect of the natural nervousness attending a first official appearance. There seemed to be no cause for discouragement, for the "magnetic" quality was still clearly there.

But the second concert made us stare! What had happened in the interval? I, for one, have never been able to answer this question fully to my own satisfaction. If what was adverse in the criticism of his conducting at the first concert had affected Mr. Henschel, one could not but wonder at a man of so pronounced a personality being so thin-skinned and flinching. But somehow he did seem cowed; not only had he quite put off his robustious manner, but, with it, all his mastery. What the real reason was is, as I have said, problematical; the fact remains that, after the opening concert, Mr. Henschel lost his grip—and never regained it! Of course a man of his talent, genius, and musicianship could not go on conducting an orchestra for three years (this was the term of his engagements) without learning something of his trade; but the old magic of his conducting, which he had twice brilliantly displayed, was irrevocably gone.

The truth is—and at this distance of time we can, as the Germans say, pour pure wine over it—that the choice of Mr. Henschel as conductor was made without due circumspection. For not only is a composer's conducting of his own composition, in general, a ticklish criterion of

of the Symphony Orchestra, the Handel and Haydn found itself forced to draw upon nearly the whole of its guaranty fund. It never gave another triennial!

Of course this aspect of the Symphony Orchestra's success called forth no little grumbling; people were not wanting who called the new organization "our musical dog in the manger." Proverbial expressions, like "Live and let live," were worked pretty hard. But this all-absorbing quality was really part and parcel of those new conditions at which I have already hinted. Some well-qualified judges thought these conditions intrinsically regrettable; for they certainly put an end to the musical autonomy of Boston, to our relying upon our own resources alone. I think, however, that it is quite idle to discuss this point; for I can not but hold these conditions, whether good or bad, to have been practically inevitable, and their growth fully in accordance with the nature of things. . . .

This is quite enough to indicate my line of argument. To cut short a long and tedious discussion, let me ask two simple questions: Where would Boston now be in the general musical race if she had continued to rely on her own resources ever since 1911? And how many of us would be satisfied with her position? Moreover, if some of us be still inclined to lament our loss of musical autonomy, let us reflect that Boston does not by any means stand alone in this respect, but that her situation is that of every other prominent musical city in the world—New York at the head of them! Boston has grown to be a great and recognized musical center; and as musical center nowadays relies exclusively upon its own resources, not even Paris—though Paris comes nearest to doing it. What a city cannot do for and by itself, it has to pay others to do for it. My friends, we must swim with the current; stemming it is out of the question. Furthermore, an old-fashioned naphtha launch cannot race with a modern motor boat.

But to return: with and in spite of all that has been said of Mr. Henschel, it should not be forgotten that he was an exceedingly cultivated musician and a man of genius. Such a man must needs, in one way or another, exert a good influence. As a program-maker, Boston has seldom seen his equal; he had quite peculiar tact and insight in this matter. The programs for the three years of his conductorship may not look very enticing now; but ah! if there is anything that makes an old stager feelingly aware of the flight of time it is the perusal of programs from the past. It seems now as if the years from 1881 to 1884 could hardly have come within a very brilliant period of musical production; for, of the twenty novelties of the important sort brought out ("first time") by Henschel, barely two or three remain on the active list today. Cowen's "Scandinavian" Symphony (given on Jan. 27, 1883) may still be played occasionally in England, but hardly elsewhere. What do we now know his ability in that line, but it was perfectly well known that Mr. Henschel was very nearly a complete tyro in the art. He may have conducted a thing or two in his life before coming to America, but he had never held a position as orchestral conductor anywhere. Betting on his technical skill was, to say the least, risky. And Mr. Higginson could not have been long in realizing that, instead of putting his finger upon the conductor whose coming he had so long awaited, he was (in plain English) paying Mr. Henschel a high salary, in those days, for learning his trade in public. No doubt, on the other hand, Mr. Henschel had no easy time of it, with the critical hornet's nest he raised about his ears; but then, what could he expect?

[Again, with apology to Mr. Apthorp beyond The Styx, the successor risks another intercalation—from an article written for The Transcript in September, 1911, by H. E. Krehbiel of the New York Tribune, recounting the early fortunes in that city of the orchestra. In the course of it is a paragraph in which Mr. Henschel confesses to an apprenticeship.]

"What the orchestra was in its first lustrum," wrote Mr. Krehbiel, "New York was not permitted to learn, and the activities of Mr. Henschel do not come legitimately into this desultory review. But perhaps I may contribute a mite to the history of that early period. In the early summer of 1884 or 1885 I spent an afternoon with Mr. Henschel at the home of one of his friends in a beautiful old house overlooking the Hudson. We talked of music, of course, and I asked questions concerning Major Higginson's undertaking. Mr. Henschel was enthusiastic in praise, but laid stress not on what he had done for the orchestra, but what the orchestra had done for him. 'I had little or no experience in conducting when I took the appointment,' he said, 'and shall never forget what it did for me. I learned more in six months in Boston than I could have learned in as many years in Germany.'"

Twenty concerts and twenty public rehearsals made up the first season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra (1881-82). The younger generation of today (1911) should know that the organization, in its first few years, was by no means what it grew to be afterwards. Its material, derived largely from the old orchestra of the Harvard Musical Association, was not entirely of the best; for the quality of that older band has been pretty accurately indicated by a talented visiting French violinist, Ovide Musin, when he spoke of it as "a fortuitous aggregation of heterogeneous elements." That H. M. A. Orchestra was, in the full sense of the term, a "scratch team"; and most of its material was taken into the new organization. Still it should not be forgotten that the new orchestra was considerably larger than its predecessor, and the added material was, for the most part, of better quality, in some cases extremely good.

Thus the Boston Symphony Orchestra had, from the first, some elements of superiority over its predecessor of the Harvard Musical Association. First and foremost of these was its being really a fixed and definite organization, the players having (or being supposed to have) nothing to do but rehearse and play under one conductor, without frittering away their energies, or losing their esprit de corps, by filling haphazard engagements outside. Other good items were the greater time it could spend on rehearsals, its superior numerical force, and at least a sprinkling of better material. That its playing still left a good deal to be desired, judged by a high standard, need hardly be said. Yet it may be doubted how much acrimonious criticism its shortcomings would have called forth, from press or public, had the playing of the old H.M.A. orchestra been all we had to compare it with; but, fortunately or unfortunately, this was not the case.

For some years previous, the flying visits of Theodore Thomas's New York Orchestra, unquestionably one of the finest in the world at the time, had given us striking practical examples of absolutely superb orchestral performance; and, considering the expectations raised by the founding of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, it was not unnatural that people should compare it with Thomas's, instead of with its older resident forerunner. Neither was it unnatural, though not entirely just, that most of this adverse criticism, should fall to the lot of Mr. Henschel himself. His conductorship was no bed of roses.

The material success of the Symphony Concerts, in the way of drawing large audiences, was, however, indisputable from the first and it has never waned since. In the second season (1882-83) the number of concerts and public rehearsal was raised to twenty-six each; it was not until the third season that the number was permanently fixed at twenty-four. And, looking back upon the matter from a distance of thirty years, I think one can say quite distinctly that this material success of the enterprise was in the beginning and for some time after, the most noteworthy item in the whole business. One very striking new element, directly connected therewith, was not long in making itself felt—the enormous swath the Symphony Concerts cut, the unprecedentedly large place they filled in the musical life of the city. This was to be recognized as the beginning of essentially new conditions. Indeed, the founding of the Boston Symphony Orchestra has often been accepted as the transition from the old to the new musical Boston; and this is, to a certain extent correct. Barring occasional visits from Theodore Thomas, we had theretofore relied wholly upon our own resources in the matters of conductor and orchestra, but now an era of importation began. Mr. Henschel was the first of a long line of imported conductors. And the importing system, once begun, flourished wonderfully!

I have spoken of the swath the Symphony Concerts cut. Good earnest of this is the fact that, with the exception of the choral clubs—the Apollo, the Cecilia and the Boylston Club, which could hardly be called concert-giving organizations for the general public, as their audiences were made up exclusively of subscribing members, and no tickets to their concerts were publicly sold—everything else of the musical sort in the city suffered. The Harvard Musical Association gave only one more season of concerts (in the Boston Museum, ending on March 9, 1882); but this was natural enough. Resident artists who had for years been giving successful recitals or chamber-concerts suddenly found their audiences dwindling away; neither did distinguished visiting singers or players have a very good time of it.

Probably the most notable instance of all was the Handel and Haydn Society. This organization, in addition to its regular performances of oratorios, had, for some time past, been giving triennial festivals, of a week's duration; it had been in the habit of applying to rich music-lovers in the city to subscribe to a "guaranty fund" for each festival, but had been so successful financially as never to have had to draw upon it; the triennial festivals had paid their own way and even made money. But, for the one given shortly after the establishment of Volkmann's Second Symphony in B-flat major (Dec. 22, 1883), or Raff's "Winter" Symphony, No. 11, in A (Jan. 19, 1884)? Joachim Raff was a much-discussed man then, and a new work of his was looked forward to with interest. Eheu, fugaces! If I mention Brahms's "Tragic Overture," George W. Chadwick's "Thalia," Bizet's "Roma," and the Prelude to Wagner's "Parsifal," I think I give all of Mr. Henschel's "novelties" that have held their own down to our time. Yet I have still to speak of the most thrilling of all (most thrilling then!) Dvorák's first Symphony, in D major (Oct. 27, 1883). The work is dead as a door-nail now, but made our hearts beat when we first heard it! The opening phrase may still be acknowledged as one of the most superb in all orchestral writing; but, as one got to know the symphony better, one began to see that that lordly phrase was about all there was in it. And one phrase cannot keep a whole symphony alive.

One element in Mr. Henschel's programmes was very welcome to audiences at the time, though it has lapsed almost completely from the "serious" concert repertory since; light French and German overtures—to Herold's "Zampa," Nicolai's "Merry Wives of Windsor," Auber's "Lac des Fées," and several others. Such things have quite naturally fallen out of line, for I doubt if anybody but a few of us older ones would enjoy them today; they have even stopped getting more than prefatory applause at The Pops. Tempus edax rerum has swallowed few of his children more thoroughly than the old French Opéra-Comique and German Singspiel repertories!

On Sept. 30, 1911, Mr. W. F. Apthorp, the revisiting the city which had known him as reviewer and man of letters, host and biographer, contributed to The Transcript an article about the early days of the Symphony Orchestra under Henschel and Gericke. It was printed to mark the beginning of the orchestra's thirtieth year. With minor omissions, so much as related to Mr. Henschel's term, reappears above.

Georg Henschel, the first conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra in 1881.

Oct 5, 1930

By PHILIP HALE

The 50th season of the Boston Symphony orchestra will open next Friday afternoon, when the concert will have a sentimental interest. Sir George Henschel, the first conductor of the orchestra, will then present the program, with one exception, that he prepared for the first concert on Oct. 22, 1881: Beethoven, "Consecration of the House"; Gluck, "Che faro senza Eurydice" from "Orfeo ed Eurydice"; Haydn, Symphony, B flat (B. & H. No. 12); Schubert, ballet music from "Rosamunde"; Bruch, Penelope's Lament; but instead of Weber's festival overture, Sir George, for some unknown reason, will conduct the prelude to "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg"; Annie Louise Cary was the singer at the first concert; Mme. Matzenauer will sing next Friday.

In the late seventies Mr. H. L. Higginson was planning the establishment of a permanent orchestra. The time of the players for "careful training" and for the 20 concerts each season was to be engaged in advance. But who was to be the conductor?

Isidor Georg Henschel, born at Breslau on Feb. 18, 1850, came with his betrothed, Lillian Bailey, to Boston in 1880 for a concert tour in the United States. He was then known and applauded in Europe as a singer. He had sung in England with Miss Bailey, having been one of her teachers. Their first appearance in Boston was at a concert in the Old Bay State Course on Nov. 1, 1880.

On March 3, 1881, an Overture (ms.) by Mr. Henschel was performed for the first time at a concert of the Harvard Musical Association. Mr. Henschel was invited to conduct his overture. Mr. Higginson was in the audience, which was pleased by the vigor of the performance. The newspapers of Boston in April, 1881, published his plan for the new concerts. He then named Mr. Henschel as the conductor. Now Mr. Henschel had had no experience in Europe in training an orchestra or in the interpretation of orchestral works.

Any one can learn by consulting the newspapers published during the three years of Mr. Henschel's conductorship that the concerts were often bitterly criticised; that criticism of the conductor was often savage. Mr. Henschel had no easy time of it. Even his friend Mr. Apthorp, writing to the Evening Transcript in 1911, about the early years, said that the choice of the conductor was made "without due circumspection"; that Mr. Higginson was "in plain English paying Mr. Henschel a high salary for those days, for learning his trade in public." It should not be forgotten that there were "unfortunate elements" in the orchestra. Bernhard Listemann, the concert master, a remarkable violinist in certain ways, and a sound musician, was a nervous, high-strung man, constitutionally unfit for the position. He was wont to hurry the tempo; he insisted on playing the music in his own way; without the intention of usurping the conductor's throne, he could not follow any conductor. Then there were intrigues against Mr. Henschel in the orchestra and out of it.

Mr. Henschel's programs were generally well arranged and interesting—in those years. How many of the "novelties" in 1882-84 are heard today? Who is now familiar with Cowen's "Scandinavian" symphony, Volkmann's symphony No. 2, Raff's "Winter" symphony, Dvorak's symphony No. 1? The conductor did not refuse a hearing to light overtures, as Auber's "Lac des Fees," Herold's "Zampa," Nicolai's "Merry Wives of Windsor." There should be room today during a season for a light and joyous overture, a waltz by Strauss, ballet music by Goldmark, Rubinstein, Gounod, Massenet, Delibes. Too much of the ballet music written today and performed at the Symphony concerts, is sour and laboriously contrived.

The experience thus gained by Mr. Henschel—he was knighted in 1914—no doubt profited him when he returned to England. Even while he was busy as a singer and teacher of singing he established in 1886 the London Symphony Concerts, a feature of that city's musical life for 11 years. He revived forgotten works, and brought out many that were unknown. In 1893-95 he conducted the Scottish Orchestra in Glasgow. Though he gave his farewell song recital at London in April 1914, he has appeared occasionally in recent years as orchestral conductor and as singer.

In December, 1902, at a concert of the Cecilia Society he conducted his "Requiem," composed in memory of his wife. His daughter Helen then sang the music for the soprano. His first wife had died at London in 1901.

Dr. Koussevitzky will first appear at the concerts on Oct. 17 and 18, to conduct an ode for orchestra and chorus, written for the orchestra's anniversary by Edward Burlingame Hill. The text is by Robert Hillyer. This will be the first of a list of new scores which have been especially composed for the orchestra's jubilee year by foremost composers. They include a "Symphonie de Psaumes" by Stravinsky; also symphonies by Roussel, Honnegger, Prokofieff and Hill. There will be a symphonic ode by Copland, and shorter pieces by Ravel, Dukas, Hindemith and Sibelius; also a piano concerto by Bax. The Russian composers Lourie, Nabokoff and Trebinsky and the French composer Ferroud will also be represented. This music will be performed in the course of the regular concerts.

Other features of the season will be a Beethoven festival, to be given in Washington, D. C., through the first week of December, and a Bach festival to be given in Boston next spring in memory of Henry L. Higginson.

Opening This Afternoon in Symphony Hall of Its Rare Collection of Memorabilia

At the intermission in the Symphony Concert this afternoon so many of the audience as wander the corridors will discover a strange, new thing in Symphony Hall—a memorial exhibition. It is hung upon the walls and distributed through cases in the rectangular room on the back of the first balcony along Huntington Avenue. There, during The Pops, one may eat or, if one has the taste for them, absorb the sugary drinks of intemperate prohibition. Now the room wears another aspect. It is brightly lighted; there is space in which to walk about; while all around, to suit this jubilee year, are memorabilia from public and private collections, from the archives of Symphony Hall itself, to recall the fifty seasons that the Boston Symphony Orchestra is now celebrating.

Three paintings first catch the observing eye. In the center of one of the long walls, as in place of honor, hangs Sargent's portrait of Henry Lee Higginson, founder of the orchestra in 1881, sustainer of it thenceforth through 1916-17. Harvard University lent it to be focal point of the memorial exhibition. Not far away is the little known picture by Marie Danforth Page of the orchestra at rehearsal in this Koussevitzkian day. The conductor, in characteristic motion, may be discovered in a tan-colored pull-over, his morning jacket flung aside at the edge of his little platform. Under close inspection, not a few members of the orchestra are recognizable. The other painting is more familiar—Duane Haley's picture of the waiters for the "rush seats" before the portico of Symphony Hall in the bright sunlight of a wintry morning. Needless to say, most of them are feminine. Hence in frocks and hats, color.

Around the Walls

These three noted, the visitor may begin a tour of the four walls. Turning to the left, he sees newspaper-pages assembling photographs of the ancient instruments in the Casadesus Collection down the corridor. Or stringing together figures from the weekly pursuers of those same "rush seats." Next he encounters three familiar drawings—each characteristic—of Mr. Higginson. Then follow programs of the concert that opened the old Music Hall, down town, on Nov. 20, 1852, and the new Symphony Hall, up town, on Oct. 15, 1900. (Mr. Gericke conducting; "a report" from Mr. Higginson.) Further on, hang a photograph of the interior of the old Music Hall; another, reproduced on this page, of the "seat line" that, in September of 1889, waited through five days and five nights to be first comers at the ticket-window. The subsequent auctions indoors had not yet begun.

36

Next the inevitable array of photographs of the successive conductors: Henschel; Gerike, in both his terms; Nikisch; Paur; Muck variously; Fiedler; Rabaud; Monteux—a capital likeness; Koussevitzky. Along with them, their several orchestras on the stage assembled from the earliest times to the present day. Mr. Gerike and his men may be observed in the old Music Hall, fringed by a meagre chorus. Or Dr. Muck stands before the far larger forces joined together for his performance of Bach's "Matthew Passion." Or Dr. Koussevitzky presents Dr. Davison, Mr. Woodworth and their Harvard-Radcliffe choirs to the audience at the end of the Beethoven Festival. Interlude is a photograph of the orchestra at ease on railroad tracks, its special train in the background, when it journeyed in 1915 to San Francisco for a series of concerts at the Panama-Pacific Exhibition.

Then digression. From the collection of Boaz Piller, bassoonist of the band, comes an amusing collection of German colored prints of orchestral players and their instruments, done in semi-caricature. From them we learn that "lady-harpists," as the polite English call them, are no recent addition to the orchestral ranks; that Mephistopheles, at will or need, could play upon the flute; while, beside him, a fat and saintly friar rumbles through the tuba.

Around the turn miscellaneous, the setting designed by Robert Edmond Jones for The Pops, first used last spring. Beyond, for new acquaintance, the aquiline features of L. S. Ipsen, designer long ago of the familiar front-cover of the weekly program-book. . . . Next virtuosos that in time past have adorned the orchestra: Frank Kneisel from his younger days onward; Willy Hess and Anton Witek, also concert-masters; Georges Longy of the oboe; for supplement the Kneisel Quartet in its palmiest days. Then, in photographs, the guest-conductors bidden to the orchestra in recent years while Dr. Koussevitzky was on holiday. If they happen to be composers as well, they usually left behind, in the Piller collection, a few autographed measures. Prints and photographs disclose other composers, ancient, classic, modern, or of our own time, now and again with an autographed letter or a signed theme. Best is the shaggy, fat-bodied Brahms; shoulders squared, head thrown back, feet firmly planted as he plays the piano.

Among the Cases

So to the door again and down the center of the room to glance through the cased memorabilia. Under one glass are programs from the old Music Hall—of concerts by Patti, Nilsson, Theodore

Thomas and his orchestra; von Bülow as pianist; the Harvard Musical Association whose orchestra preceded the Symphony; even of Rubinstein, playing for the last time in Boston. Along with them, the twenty small, thin sheets, printed in black and white, that were the "official program" through the first season of the orchestra. Hard by, two or three examples of the earlier tickets, one reproduced herewith. In little rectangles, the date of each concert bordered these cards. The doorkeepers punched them. Years passed before the management issued the present books of detachable tickets. Companion-piece is an early contract with a player, recorded in pen and ink on blue legal paper, signed by him and Mr. Higginson. Programs, as well, of concerts by Mr. Henschel and Lillian Bailey, his wife; of the Kneisel Quartet and other affiliated musical groups in the days when "the founder and sustainer" also fostered chamber music.

Next in the course, encased manuscripts of the "works" contributed by commissioned composers to the current jubilee—Roussel's and Prokofiev's symphonies; Respighi's Variations; Mr. Hill's Ode—all four lately heard; Honegger's symphony and Copland's "Symphonic Ode" to come. Beyond, Koussevitzkiana—early photographs of a slender young man, playing the double bass or conducting at concerts in Russia; caricatures from Boston and New York as far as Madrid; programs of the festivals with which he has enriched our musical life. Singular above the rest, a record in German prose by Oskar Ble and in fine-lined drawings by Sterl of Koussevitzky's voyage in steamer up and down the Volga, halting in city or town to give concerts by his floating orchestra.

Last—for the case that is to contain the memorabilia of The Pops was not arranged yesterday—a selection from the teeming scrap-books in the archives. One is open at an amusing full-page picture in colors, printed by the Globe in 1892, representing the young ladies as they leave the old Music Hall. Another discloses a cartoon, from the dead-and-gone Beacon, of embarrassed comers to the Music Hall in search of a Symphony Concert, only to discover that a boxing match is in progress. Other pages are upturned at the interviews that heralded Nikisch, Muck and other conductors when they first descended upon Boston. If one has the time and the will, one may reread reviews of notable concerts; smile at yellowing sketches and caricatures; discover that there was once a brood of Saturday evening and Sunday morning newspapers in Boston that appeared on no other day. . . . Fifty years of the Symphony Orchestra around these walls and through these cases; fifty years as well of this little, neatly self-contained world, which is Boston.

H. T. P.

FIFTIETH SEASON, NINETEEN HUNDRED THIRTY AND THIRTY-ONE

First Programme

FRIDAY AFTERNOON, OCTOBER 10, at 2.30 o'clock

SATURDAY EVENING, OCTOBER 11, at 8.15 o'clock

SIR GEORGE HENSCHEL

(Conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra 1881-1884)

will conduct these concerts

- | | |
|---------------------|-----------------------------------------------------------------------------------|
| Beethoven | Overture, Op. 124, "Consecration of the House" |
| Gluck | Recitative and Air, "Che farò senza Eurydice" from "Orfeo ed Eurydice" |
| Haydn | Symphony in B-flat (B. & H. No. 12) |
| | I. Largo: Allegro vivace. |
| | II. Adagio. |
| | III. Minuetto: Allegro: Trio. |
| | IV. Finale: Presto. |
| Schubert | Ballet Music from "Rosamunde" |
| Bruch | Recitative and Aria, "Thou far-darting Sun" ("Penelope's Sorrow") from "Odysseus" |
| Wagner | Prelude to "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg" |

SOLOIST

MARGARET MATZENAUER

There will be an intermission after the symphony

The works to be played at these concerts may be seen in the Allen A. Brown Music Collection of the Boston Public Library one week before the concert

36
through five days and five nights to be first comers at the ticket-window. The subsequent auctions indoors had not yet begun.

Next the inevitable array of photographs of the successive conductors; Henschel; Gericke, in both his terms; Nikisch; Paur; Muck variously; Fiedler; Rabaud; Monteux—a capital likeness; Koussevitzky. Along with them, their several orchestras on the stage assembled from the earliest times to the present day. Mr. Gericke and his men may be observed in the old Music Hall, fringed by a meagre chorus. Or Dr. Muck stands before the far larger forces joined together for his performance of Bach's "Matthew Passion." Or Dr. Koussevitzky presents Dr. Davison, Mr. Woodworth and their Harvard-Radcliffe choirs to the audience at the end of the Beethoven Festival. Interlude is a photograph of the orchestra at ease on railroad tracks, its special train in the background, when it journeyed in 1915 to San Francisco for a series of concerts at the Panama-Pacific Exhibition.

Then digression. From the collection of Boaz Piller, bassoonist of the band, comes an amusing collection of German colored prints of orchestral players and their instruments, done in semi-caricature. From them we learn that "lady-harpists," as the polite English call them, are no recent addition to the orchestral ranks; that Mephistopheles, at will or need, could play upon the flute; while, beside him, a fat and saintly friar rumbles through the tuba.

Around the turn miscellaneous, the setting designed by Robert Edmond Jones for The Pops, first used last spring. Beyond, for new acquaintance, the aquiline features of L. S. Ipsen, designer long ago of the familiar front-cover of the weekly program-book. . . . Next virtuosos that in time past have adorned the orchestra: Frank Kneisel from his younger days onward; Willy Hess and Anton Wittek, also concert-masters; Georges Longy of the oboe; for supplement the Kneisel Quartet in its palmiest days. Then, in photographs, the guest-conductors bidden to the orchestra in recent years while Dr. Koussevitzky was on holiday. If they happen to be composers as well, they usually left behind, in the Piller collection, a few autographed measures. Prints and photographs disclose other composers, ancient, classic, modern, or of our own time, now and again with an autographed letter or a signed theme. Best is the shaggy, fat-bodied Brahms; shoulders squared, head thrown back, feet firmly planted as he plays the piano.

Among the Cases

So to the door again and down the center of the room to glance through the cased memorabilia. Under one glass are programs from the old Music Hall—of concerts by Patti, Nilsson, Theodore

Thomas and his orchestra; von Bülow as pianist; the Harvard Musical Association whose orchestra preceded the Symphony; even of Rubinstein, playing for the last time in Boston. Along with them, the twenty small, thin sheets, printed in black and white, that were the "official program" through the first season of the orchestra. Hard by, two or three examples of the earlier tickets, one reproduced herewith. In little rectangles, the date of each concert bordered these cards. The doorkeepers punched them. Years passed before the management issued the present books of detachable tickets. Companion-piece is an early contract with a player, recorded in pen and ink on blue legal paper, signed by him and Mr. Higginson. Programs, as well, of concerts by Mr. Henschel and Lillian Bailey, his wife; of the Kneisel Quartet and other affiliated musical groups in the days when "the founder and sustainer" also fostered chamber music.

Next in the course, encased manuscripts of the "works" contributed by commissioned composers to the current jubilee—Roussel's and Prokofiev's symphonies; Respighi's Variations; Mr. Hill's Ode—all four lately heard; Honegger's symphony and Copland's "Symphonic Ode" to come. Beyond, Koussevitzkiana—early photographs of a slender young man, playing the double bass or conducting at concerts in Russia; caricatures from Boston and New York as far as Madrid; programs of the festivals with which he has enriched our musical life. Singular above the rest, a record in German prose by Oskar Ble and in fine-lined drawings by Sterl of Koussevitzky's voyage in steamer up and down the Volga, halting in city or town to give concerts by his floating orchestra.

Last—for the case that is to contain the memorabilia of The Pops was not arranged yesterday—a selection from the teeming scrap-books in the archives. One is open at an amusing full-page picture in colors, printed by the Globe in 1892, representing the young ladies as they leave the old Music Hall. Another discloses a cartoon, from the dead-and-gone Beacon, of embarrassed comers to the Music Hall in search of a Symphony Concert, only to discover that a boxing match is in progress. Other pages are upturned at the interviews that heralded Nikisch, Muck and other conductors when they first descended upon Boston. If one has the time and the will, one may reread reviews of notable concerts; smile at yellowing sketches and caricatures; discover that there was once a brood of Saturday evening and Sunday morning newspapers in Boston that appeared on no other day. . . . Fifty years of the Symphony Orchestra around these walls and through these cases; fifty years as well of this little, neatly self-contained world, which is Boston.

H. T. P.

First Programme

FRIDAY AFTERNOON, OCTOBER 10, at 2.30 o'clock

SATURDAY EVENING, OCTOBER 11, at 8.15 o'clock

SIR GEORGE HENSCHEL

(Conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra 1881-1884)

will conduct these concerts

Beethoven . . . Overture, Op. 124, "Consecration of the House"

Gluck Recitative and Air, "Che farò senza Eurydice" from "Orfeo ed Eurydice"

Haydn Symphony in B-flat (B. & H. No. 12)

I. Largo: Allegro vivace.

II. Adagio.

III. Minuetto: Allegro: Trio.

IV. Finale: Presto.

Schubert Ballet Music from "Rosamunde"

Bruch . . . Recitative and Aria, "Thou far-darting Sun" ("Penelope's Sorrow") from "Odysseus"

Wagner Prelude to "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg"

SOLOIST

MARGARET MATZENAUER

There will be an intermission after the symphony

The works to be played at these concerts may be seen in the Allen A. Brown Music Collection of the Boston Public Library one week before the concert

MARGARET MATZENAUER
Prima-Donna Contralto
Metropolitan Opera Company

Symphony's First Conductor Vigorous in His Old Role

Sir George Henschel Leads Famous Orchestra
Again and Receives Scores of Old Friends

At Close of a Stirring Afternoon

Herald Oct. 11, 1930

The concert was over. The conductor had finished leading the huge Boston Symphony orchestra in the final number, "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg."

Without eyeglasses, without faltering, without glancing at his score, he had vigorously bent to the tremendous task of bringing a great overture once more into being through the timed and studied genius of 100 skilled musicians.

It was a job to leave a younger man tired and nervous, and on trigger-edge.

LEADS AFTER 46 YEARS

The conductor, Sir George Henschel, sound and sturdy despite his 80 years, his bearing almost military in its erectness, with a merry twinkle in his eyes, turned to face the clamorous applause of his audience. He was leading the symphony again after 46 years. He bowed, and then strode rapidly upstairs to a reception room where old friends awaited him.

Some one in the reception room pushed forward a chair. Sir George laughed, and declined to sit. Instead, he made room for Mrs. Henry Lee Higginson, 92, a little, old lady dressed in black, to sit down. She was the widow of his old friend, whose enthusiasm started and built, and whose fortune endowed the great musical organization. But even more important to Sir George was the fact that she was herself a patron of his art, and one who never misses the Friday concerts of the symphony.

The applause of the audience could still be heard below, augmented by salvos of clapping from the orchestra itself, the members swept away by admiration for their conductor. For a long time the sound continued unabated, but finally died out. Then, young musicians and the sons and daughters and grandsons of Sir George's earlier admirers began to climb the stairs to shake the hand which still wields the magic wand of music with such fine and certain touch. Beside them, more slowly and painfully, climbed the older ones—those who heard Sir George's first concert here and those who have been getting to the concerts with increasing difficulty but undiminished eagerness down the years.

GREETES OLD FRIENDS

There were tall, dignified, elderly women dressed according to the conservative fashion of certain venerable streets in Cambridge and the Back Bay who weekly are in their places at the Sanders theatre or Symphony Hall for the internationally famous concerts.

Sir George kissed several of them affectionately on the cheek in the Continental manner, and he gave his old friend and first manager, Charles A. Ellis, a little push on the shoulder as they parted. He autographed the programs of dozens of music lovers, and shook hands with as many more. He remembered the grandfathers and aunts and great-aunts of several eager young chaps who pressed forward to meet him.

"Well, I feel better now than I did this forenoon," he said to one man, though he denied that he had been suffering from stage fright this time. "I was looking forward to the concert with great pleasure," he said. "It gives one a wonderful feeling to lead such an orchestra."

The symphony has doubled and the ability of the musicians has been added to a hundredfold since he was leader of it. He recalled the change briefly, with great optimism for the present.

DAUGHTER ATTENDS

His tall and charming daughter, "Georgie," dressed in blue, was smoking a cigarette and greeting her father's old friends smilingly. Sir George put an unlighted cigarette in his mouth, but was a long time waiting for a chance to light it. He was enjoying the reception immensely.

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, present conductor of the orchestra, was beaming with pleasure at the reception tendered Sir George. "It is a very fine audience which attends the Friday afternoon concerts," he said. "They are so eager and appreciative. These people who have been attending concerts for 50 years have a wonderful musical education. It is a pleasure to lead for them."

Telegrams were arriving from musical leaders throughout the country. One came from A. Van Rensselaer, president of the Philadelphia Orchestra Association. It said:

The 50th season of the Boston Symphony orchestra is an important event in the musical life of America. This occasion is made doubly notable by the appearance at these concerts of Sir George Henschel, your first conductor.

The founding of a symphony orchestra by a group of music lovers 50 years ago would have been unusual. But this act by a private citizen was a unique occurrence, and such an undertaking as Maj. Higginson's has not been repeated since.

On behalf of the board of directors of the Philadelphia Orchestra Association I send you congratulations on the long and distinguished career of the Boston Symphony orchestra.

It was the superb music of your players that inspired Philadelphia to want an orchestra of its own, and to you the Philadelphia orchestra and other orchestras in the United States are much indebted.

Adella Prentiss Hughes and Nikolai Sokoloff sent a telegram on behalf of the Cleveland organization, and the Rochester philharmonic committee's message said: "The Rochester Philharmonic orchestra committee extends its congratulations to you, to Mr. Henschel, and the Boston Symphony orchestra on its 50th birthday. America is indebted to your organization for the high standard of achievement you have maintained."

SYMPHONY CONCERT

By PHILIP HALE

The first concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's 50th season took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony hall. Sir George Henschel—in 1881 Mr. Georg (sic) Henschel—was invited to conduct the opening concert of this anniversary season, for as the first conductor of the orchestra he arranged the program for its first concert given in Music hall on Oct. 22, 1881. This program with one exception—the substitution of the Prelude to "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg" for Weber's

"Festival" overture—was as follows: Beethoven, overture to "The Consecration of the House"; Gluck, "Che faro senza Eurydice" from "Orfeo ed Eurydice"; Haydn, symphony, B flat (B. & H. No. 12); Schubert, ballet music from "Rosamunde"; Bruch, Penelope's Sorrow from "Odysseus"; Wagner, the prelude to "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg." The substitution of Wagner's music for Weber's is to be regretted, for the program of 1881 in full would have given the audience of yesterday a better idea of what those assembled in Music hall 50 years ago applauded, or condemned as "radical," "too modern," "anarchistic."

If Wagner's Prelude is left out of consideration, the program of 1881 now seems respectable enough, respectably prosaic, or as some would say, dull. What conductor today would put the "Consecration of the House" in rehearsal if Beethoven's name were not signed to it? Yet for many years in the history of this orchestra the overture was solemnly performed and reverently heard. Suppose a composer in 1930 should hand this work to Dr. Koussevitzky, or Mr. Toscanini or Mr. Stokowski and ask for a performance?

Haydn's Symphony No. 12 is not one of his most characteristic works. Schubert's music was charming 50 years ago and delights the ear today; nor in this instance is Schubert's prolixity fatal. What prima donna in 1930 would deliberately choose Bruch's air from "Odysseus"? But for several seasons Bruch's "Odysseus," "Arminius," "Achilleus" were regarded by the orthodox as masterpieces of choral song. How paltry, how labored this air of Penelope seemed yesterday after Gluck's great air! The singer at the concert in 1881 was Annie Louise Cary; yesterday Margaret Matzenauer. Par nobile sororum!

It would be interesting to know how many in the audience yesterday were at the concert of 50 years ago; and of those, how many display the mental and physical activity of Sir George? He conducted with the force and the gusto of a young man exultant in the direction of a great orchestra. It is doubtful whether as a young man of 31 he conducted with the same confidence and vigor.

When Dr. Koussevitzky and Sir George appeared on the stage, there was the now customary scene of homage: audience rising, applauding while standing, all in a friendly and joyous spirit. Dr. Koussevitzky spoke a few words, not merely by way of introduction—for Sir George's name and reputation have long been known even to those who have never seen him conduct, never heard him sing—but as a graceful tribute to the man who had the arduous task of the first years and now must rejoice in the present splendor of the orchestra—nor did Dr. Koussevitzky neglect to remind the audience that it was Maj. Higginson's courage, one might say his artistic obstinacy in the face of many discouragements, as well as his princely munificence that enabled Sir George and his successors to carry out their own musical aims and win at last the world-wide fame acknowledged even by rivals.

The occasion yesterday was one for sentimental reminiscences. Hearing the music was associated to some, perhaps to many, with memories of the past; of singers who once gave delight but whose lips have long been dumb; of violinists and pianists whose brave deeds are now only a tradition. But here is Sir George amazingly buoyant, enthusiastic, virile.

The concert will be repeated tonight. The program next week will be as follows: Bach, Two Preludes arranged for strings by Pick-Mangiagalli (first time here). Beethoven, Symphony No. 7, A major. Hill, an Ode (for the 50th anniversary of the Boston Symphony orchestra), poem by Robert Hillier (first performance). Moussorgsky-Ravel, "Pictures at an Exhibition." The chorus for Mr. Hill's music will be the Harvard Glee Club, joined by the Radcliffe Choral Society.

First Concert Recalled For Fiftieth Year

Sir George Henschel Acclaimed, Matter and A Moral from The Old Program

AFTER the event human speculation before it often seems futile, sounds silly. . . . When it was hinted last winter that Sir George Henschel, conductor at the first concerts in the first year of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, would also be conductor next October at the first concert of the fiftieth season, conjecture ran wide. Sir George would return in his eighty-first year. Unless they had encountered him in London, few hereabouts had looked upon him for a quarter of a century. Report had it that he was well-preserved and active. But could he endure the journey over the Atlantic—he who had crossed it many times when steamers were no "floating hotels"? Would he be able to lead through the whole concert of a Friday and a Saturday? Or must he confine himself to one or two numbers, say at the beginning and the end? Imaginative eyes saw a feeble old man advancing cautiously to the conductor's stand, recalling his métier and gathering his strength to wave a stick over an understanding orchestra; then receiving the plaudits of an audience that had looked and heard as at some resurrection from the musical history-books.

To the foot of the letter actually belied this half-remembered expectation. As prompt to the hour as though Mr. Higginson were watching from the Elysian Fields, Sir George and Dr. Koussevitzky emerged, yesterday afternoon at Symphony Hall, from the door to the right of the stage. Sir George, a stocky figure in formal clothes, led the way. His shoulders drooped little; his step was firm; his thick hair and beard less white than grizzling. Dr. Koussevitzky, in the jacket of conductorial ease, followed, clapping with uplifted hands. The orchestra rose, each choir, according to its means, making the usual noises of welcome. For once, the audience stood spontaneously; in a hail of applause mentally escorted Sir George to the conductor's platform. At odds with custom, was hailed, trimmed with greenery, provided with a chair. Into it, after any acknowledgments, he settled, for a first and the only time throughout a concert; while Dr. Koussevitzky made a second speech of his six years at Symphony Hall. (The Beethoven Festival was occasion for the other.) Cast English, it was brief, ardent and, middle distance, difficult to catch. Praised the orchestra "at zenith of its power"; twice it saluted the guest as a wonderful man. Sir George, better accustomed to English reticence than Russian effusion, ran both hands uneasily through his hair.

Under cover of applause, Dr. Koussevitzky vanished; the orchestra sat; Sir George rose; the concert began. For the first time, the old-new conductor was more interesting than the old-new number—Beethoven's Overture to "The Dedication of the House"—which was first piece. Sir George conducted scoreless, beating measure clear and crisp, without superfluous or exaggerated gesture. He moved quietly, save when he turned to the orchestra or to the choir. His left hand sparingly supplemented his right. One mannerism was to hold it akimbo, the hip. Old-fashioned conducting (if the hearer liked) doing its work in the rehearsal-room rather than the concert-hall, proffering the finished product, finding rather than adjuring the orchestra; but with a clear mind and a will behind.

Old-fashioned conducting again in reticence and poise, in quality of tone and reverence to the composer. In the so-

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, present conductor of the orchestra, was beaming with pleasure at the reception tendered Sir George. "It is a very fine audience which attends the Friday afternoon concerts," he said. "They are so eager and appreciative. These people who have been attending concerts for 50 years have a wonderful musical education. It is a pleasure to lead for them."

Telegrams were arriving from musical leaders throughout the country. One came from A. Van Rensselaer, president of the Philadelphia Orchestra Association. It said:

The 50th season of the Boston Symphony orchestra is an important event in the musical life of America. This occasion is made doubly notable by the appearance at these concerts of Sir George Henschel, your first conductor.

The founding of a symphony orchestra by a group of music lovers 50 years ago would have been unusual. But this act by a private citizen was a unique occurrence, and such an undertaking as Maj. Higginson's has not been repeated since.

On behalf of the board of directors of the Philadelphia Orchestra Association I send you congratulations on the long and distinguished career of the Boston Symphony orchestra.

It was the superb music of your players that inspired Philadelphia to want an orchestra of its own, and to you the Philadelphia orchestra and other orchestras in the United States are much indebted.

Adella Prentiss Hughes and Nikolai Sokoloff sent a telegram on behalf of the Cleveland organization, and the Rochester philharmonic committee's message said: "The Rochester Philharmonic orchestra committee extends its congratulations to you, to Mr. Henschel, and the Boston Symphony orchestra on its 50th birthday. America is indebted to your organization for the high standard of achievement you have maintained."

SYMPHONY CONCERT

By PHILIP HALE

The first concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's 50th season took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony hall. Sir George Henschel—in 1881 Mr. Georg (sic) Henschel—was invited to conduct the opening concert of this anniversary season, for as the first conductor of the orchestra he arranged the program for its first concert given in Music hall on Oct. 22, 1881. This program with one exception—the substitution of the Prelude to "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg" for Weber's

"Festival" overture—was as follows: Beethoven, overture to "The Consecration of the House"; Gluck, "Che faro senza Eurydice" from "Orfeo ed Eurydice"; Haydn, symphony, B flat (B. & H. No. 12); Schubert, ballet music from "Rosamunde"; Bruch, Penelope's Sorrow from "Odysseus"; Wagner, the prelude to "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg." The substitution of Wagner's music for Weber's is to be regretted, for the program of 1881 in full would have given the audience of yesterday a better idea of what those assembled in Music hall 50 years ago applauded, or condemned as "radical," "too modern," "anarchistic."

If Wagner's Prelude is left out of consideration, the program of 1881 now seems respectable enough, respectably prosaic, or as some would say, dull. What conductor today would put the "Consecration of the House" in rehearsal if Beethoven's name were not signed to it? Yet for many years in the history of this orchestra the overture was solemnly performed and reverently heard. Suppose a composer in 1930 should hand this work to Dr. Koussevitzky, or Mr. Toscanini or Mr. Stokowski and ask for a performance?

Haydn's Symphony No. 12 is not one of his most characteristic works. Schubert's music was charming 50 years ago and delights the ear today; nor in this instance is Schubert's prolixity fatal. What prima donna in 1930 would deliberately choose Bruch's air from "Odysseus"? But for several seasons Bruch's "Odysseus," "Arminius," "Achilleus" were regarded by the orthodox as masterpieces of choral song. How paltry, how labored this air of Penelope seemed yesterday after Gluck's great air! The singer at the concert in 1881 was Annie Louise Cary; yesterday Margaret Matzenauer. Par nobile sororum!

It would be interesting to know how many in the audience yesterday were at the concert of 50 years ago; and of those, how many display the mental and physical activity of Sir George? He conducted with the force and the gusto of a young man exultant in the direction of a great orchestra. It is doubtful whether as a young man of 31 he conducted with the same confidence and vigor.

When Dr. Koussevitzky and Sir George appeared on the stage, there was the now customary scene of homage: audience rising, applauding while standing, all in a friendly and joyous spirit. Dr. Koussevitzky spoke a few words, not merely by way of introduction—for Sir George's name and reputation have long been known even to those who have never seen him conduct, never heard him sing—but as a graceful tribute to the man who had the arduous task of the first years and now must rejoice in the present splendor of the orchestra—nor did Dr. Koussevitzky neglect to remind the audience that it was Maj. Higginson's courage, one might say his artistic obstinacy in the face of many discouragements, as well as his princely munificence that enabled Sir George and his successors to carry out their own musical aims and win at last the world-wide fame acknowledged even by rivals.

The occasion yesterday was one for sentimental reminiscences. Hearing the music was associated to some, perhaps to many, with memories of the past; of singers who once gave delight but whose lips have long been dumb; of violinists and pianists whose brave deeds are now only a tradition. But here is Sir George amazingly buoyant, enthusiastic, virile.

The concert will be repeated tonight. The program next week will be as follows: Bach, Two Preludes arranged for strings by Pick-Mangiagalli (first time here). Beethoven, Symphony No. 7. A major. Hill, an Ode (for the 50th anniversary of the Boston Symphony orchestra), poem by Robert Hillyer (first performance). Moussorgsky-Ravel, "Pictures at an Exhibition." The chorus for Mr. Hill's music will be the Harvard Glee Club, joined by the Radcliffe Choral Society.

First Concert Recalled Fiftieth Sir George Henschel Matter and A Matter The Old Program

AFTER the event of the week before it sounds silly. It was hinted last week on North Street that the "C" Symphony Orchestra, weeks short of the fiftieth season, would visit its eighty-first year. Unless it had looked upon the visit of a century. Report was well-preserved and could endure the Atlantic—he who had times when steamers were "hotels"? Would he be through the whole carnival and a Saturday? Or of the himself to one or two

the beginning and the end? Imaginative eyes saw a feeble old man advancing cautiously to the conductor's stand, recalling his métier and gathering his strength to wave a stick over an understanding orchestra; then receiving the plaudits of an audience that had looked and heard as at some resurrection from the musical history-books.

To the foot of the letter actually belied this half-remembered expectation. As prompt to the hour as though Mr. Higginson were watching from the Elysian Fields, Sir George and Dr. Koussevitzky emerged, yesterday afternoon at Symphony Hall, from the door to the right of the stage. Sir George, a stocky figure in formal clothes, led the way. His shoulders drooped little; his step was firm; his thick hair and beard less white than grizzling. Dr. Koussevitzky, in the jacket of conductorial ease, followed, clapping with uplifted hands. The orchestra rose, each choir, according to its means, making the usual noises of welcome. For once, the audience stood spontaneously; in a hail of applause mentally escorted Sir George to the conductor's platform. At odds with custom, it was railed, trimmed with greenery, provided with a chair. Into it, after many acknowledgments, he settled, for the first and the only time throughout the concert; while Dr. Koussevitzky made the second speech of his six years at Symphony Hall. (The Beethoven Festival was occasion for the other.) Cast in English, it was brief, ardent and, at middle distance, difficult to catch. It praised the orchestra "at zenith of zenith": twice it saluted the guest as "wonderful man." Sir George, better accustomed to English reticence than Russian effusion, ran both hands uneasily through his hair.

Under cover of applause, Dr. Koussevitzky vanished; the orchestra sat; Sir George rose; the concert began. For the instant, the old-new conductor was more engrossing than the old-new number—Beethoven's Overture to "The Dedication of the House"—which was first piece. Sir George conducted scoreless, beating the measure clear and crisp, without superfluous or exaggerated gesture. He stood quietly, save when he turned to stay or summon group or choir. His left hand sparingly supplemented his right. His one mannerism was to hold it akimbo on the hip. Old-fashioned conducting (if the hearer liked) doing its work in the rehearsal-room rather than the concert-hall, proffering the finished product, reminding rather than adjuring the orchestra; but with a clear mind and a firm will behind.

Old-fashioned conducting again in reticence and poise, in quality of tone and reverence to the composer. In the sonorities of Beethoven's Overture. George preferred smooth and melior brass to the piercing intensities of the twentieth-century practice. In the two songs by Mme. Matzenauer, he consisted the singer, fusing voice and orchestra rather than taking imperious command. In the Symphony from Haydn he withheld no "inner voices"; did no feat of superhuman fleetness. Rather his spaced, unforced accent, deft phrasing, light and shade, Haydn's simplicity, Haydn's musical cunning. In the dances from Schubert's music to "münde," melodic sweetness and rhythmic light went hand in hand, with the lative virtuosi of the wind choir for lude to "Die Meistersinger" unfroved slow and clear, full-voiced and statelthough to dim, speed or otherwise rulate so magnificent a flood of music mere vanity and pettiness. In stconducting born of musical intelligdirected by a musical will, making purely musical effect. Fifty years the reviewers reproached Sir Georgevehemence and impetuosity. Now flow and measure.

Wagner's golden Prelude to "Die tersinger" replaced Weber's faded bilee Overture," that the anniveconcert might end on a festal notter attuned to present ears. Mme. zenauer was singer in successic Annie Louise Cary. Otherwise the gram of Oct. 10, 1930, repeated, ite item, the program of Oct. 21, 1881. eighteenth-century air from Gluck's pheus" again sounded unchanging undying. From all else exhaled the sens of the past. Six miscellaneous pieces where three or four more or less unifie now suffice. A decorative singer, other wise unrelated to the scheme of a pogram designed to be ceremonial and festival hodge-podge. Exhibitional airs fo her, one of which happens to be a martepee; while the other—Penelope's ment and prayer from Bruch's dead-and gone "Odysseus"—owed all its momerary virtue to performance in the gran style. An "occasional" overture of Beehoven, mildly interesting in the Handeian pomps of the introduction and th Handelian vigors of the final fugue; one and again in the sweep of a sonority o the thrust of a phrase suggesting th great Ludwig, himself. A minor Syrphony by Haydn, fluent, nicely made pleasing to his noble patrons, but lon since on the semi-retired list. Tw dances of Schubert, amiable and chaacteristic, but more likely nowadays t be heard at The Pops between cigarette and chatter.

Our Symphony Concerts have changed for the better we say proudly, pointing to the substitution, yesterday, of the Prelude to "Die Meistersinger." But have all our likings changed with them? Certainly not—by the clear evidence of Friday afternoon. Grant Sir George Henschel his measure of the applause that followed every number, swelling at the intermission and the close. Grant Mme. Matzenauer hers as an eminent singer, in the air from "Odysseus" in the full exercise of voice and manner. Allow the orchestra its portion for so norous and upspringing Beethoven; for light-lipped, light-fingered, brightly sturned Haydn; for Schubert that was beauty of tone double-distilled. Even so, enough palms were beaten together to prove how pleased were many in the audience with this six-fold musical miscellany, with this return to a decorative singer, with the run of the musical mill in every piece but the air from "Orpheus" and the Prelude to "Die Meistersinger." Clap hands and leave the hateful brood of reviewers to their grumblings, to their morals on a festal day. Yet even they had compensations. If Mme. Matzenauer treated rudely the delicate inflections, the fine-woven pathos, the haunting beauty of Gluck's air, she and Sir George with her filled Bruch's stilted and empty "Scena" with the pleasing deceptions of the nineteenth-century "grand style." And for the thousandth time the splendors of the Prelude to "Die Meistersinger" swept all else away. From that summit of music, our symphonic jubilee may take its six-months flight. H. T. P.

HENSCHEL CONDUCTS OPENING CONCERT

First Conductor of Orchestra Cheered

Fiftieth Anniversary Symphony Season Under Way

Oct. 11, 1930
Sir George Henschel, the first conductor of the Boston Symphony, led as guest yesterday afternoon at the opening concert of the orchestra's 50th season, the program he conducted in the old Music Hall, Oct. 22, 1881, at the first Boston Symphony concert ever given. Margaret Matzenauer, contralto, sang the two solos allotted in 1881 to Annie Louise Cary.

In the present orchestra there is no player who was a member in 1881. In yesterday's audience were, however, a number of listeners who have attended through the 49 intervening seasons.

One of them, Mrs Henry Lee Higginson, widow of the founder and sustainer of the Boston Symphony, was given a great bunch of roses during the intermission. When the audience saw these flowers carried to where Mrs Higginson sat in her usual place, there was an outburst of applause.

When the last warning bell had sounded before the concert, and all the doors of the hall were shut, there was a moment of silence. Then from the right of the stage came Dr Koussevitzky, preceding a brisk, alert figure, bearded and gray-haired, but with no hint of hoary age. One would have deemed Sir George Henschel a man in his late 50s. Yet he is in his 80th year.

Chair on Stand

The conductor's stand was railed in with laurel and gilt. On it was a chair. When Sir George had acknowledged the hearty applause of the orchestra and audience, who stood to greet him, he seated himself in this chair. Not, however, to conduct. Merely to listen to a speech of welcome and congratulation from Dr Koussevitzky, the present conductor of the Boston Symphony has ventured at the Friday concerts.

"And so the longing and dream of Lee Higginson were realized 50 years ago," began Dr Koussevitzky, pointing to Sir George Henschel and the orchestra. His speech has, naturally, a foreign accent, but his English was carefully and correctly phrased. Once or twice he hesitated over an idiom, but most of his delivery was fluent.

"I shall not now pay tribute to Maj Higginson. For that there will be an occasion next March when we shall give a Bach festival in his honor. Today I wish to congratulate this man, this wonderful man, who has come back to us after so many years to conduct again the program of our orchestra's first concert.

"I am very happy to be able to say to him and to you that our orchestra is now by common consent at its zenith of zeniths." This remark brought a burst of applause.

"Not merely Boston, but all America should be proud of the Boston Symphony," concluded its present conductor, to more applause.

Sir George, whose impatience to begin had become obvious before the end of Dr Koussevitzky's brief speech, rose to his feet, bowed his thanks, raised his baton and without glancing at the score on his desk, bade the orchestra begin the Beethoven overture "Dedication of the House."

Except for the accompaniments to Mme Matzenauer's solos, he conducted from memory throughout the concert, in itself something of a feat for a man of any age. Nor did he again make use of the chair placed for him, but remained standing to conduct.

One, of course, was prepared to discover in Sir George Henschel a musician of high rank. His great reputation as a conductor, a composer, a pianist, a singer, and a teacher of singing was established long ago. What one had not expected from a man of 80 was the energy, the vitality of such a musician in his prime.

He conducted the Beethoven overture, a Haydn Symphony in B Flat, the ballet music from Schubert's "Rosemunde" and the prelude to Wagner's "Die Meistersinger" with unflagging zest as well as refinement of style and precision of detail.

For each number he sought the quality and intensity of tone appropriate, reserving the great sonorities of the modern orchestra for the music of Bruch and Wagner, written for it. His tempi were invariably rightly chosen. His adagio was a true adagio without lingering and broken phrases. His allegro was bright and clear, fluent or pompous, as the music dictated.

Mme Matzenauer sang "Che faro senza Eurydice" from Gluck's "Orpheus," and the prayer of Penelope from Max Bruch's "Odysseus" with a restraint and a sense of style that made the use of her voice as remarkable as its volume and quality have long been. She had taken the trouble to memorize both numbers, words as well as music, and she was eager to share the applause for them with Sir George Henschel. For her share in the concert there can be nothing but praise.

The orchestra, as was to be expected, did its very best for Sir George Henschel. It again proved its right to be counted among the foremost in the world. For its present high estate credit must go to Mr Monteux and Dr Koussevitzky, its conductors since the tragic collapse a dozen years ago, when for a time one feared the Boston Symphony Orchestra would become not the least of the casualties due to the World War, and also to the present trustees and guarantors, whose ability and generosity make the continuance of the concerts possible.

norities of Beethoven's Overture, Sir George preferred smooth and mellowed brass to the piercing intensities of twentieth-century practice. In the two airs sung by Mme. Matzenauer, he considered the singer, fusing voice and orchestra rather than taking imperious command. In the Symphony from Haydn he wrested out no "inner voices"; did no feats of superhuman fleetness. Rather his care was rounded phrase, melody curved and spaced, unforced accent, deft play of light and shade, Haydn's simplicity and Haydn's musical cunning. In the two dances from Schubert's music to "Rosamunde," melodic sweetness and rhythmic light went hand in hand, with the superlative virtuosi of the wind choir for voice to both. The tonal pageant of the Prelude to "Die Meistersinger" unfolded slow and clear, full-voiced and stately, as though to dim, speed or otherwise manipulate so magnificent a flood of music were mere vanity and pettiness. In sum, a conducting born of musical intelligence, directed by a musical will, making a purely musical effect. Fifty years ago the reviewers reproached Sir George for vehemence and impetuosity. Now all is flow and measure.

Wagner's golden Prelude to "Die Meistersinger" replaced Weber's faded "Jubilee Overture," that the anniversary concert might end on a festal note better attuned to present ears. Mme. Matzenauer was singer in succession to Annie Louise Cary. Otherwise the program of Oct. 10, 1930, repeated, item by item, the program of Oct. 21, 1881. The eighteenth-century air from Gluck's "Orpheus" again sounded unchanging and undying. From all else exhaled the sense of the past. Six miscellaneous pieces, where three or four more or less unified now suffice. A decorative singer, otherwise unrelated to the scheme of a program designed to be ceremonial and festival hodge-podge. Exhibitional airs for her, one of which happens to be a masterpiece; while the other—Penelope's lament and prayer from Bruch's dead-and-gone "Odysseus"—owed all its momentary virtue to performance in the grand style. An "occasional" overture of Beethoven, mildly interesting in the Handelian pomps of the introduction and the Handelian vigors of the final fugue; once and again in the sweep of a sonority or the thrust of a phrase suggesting the great Ludwig, himself. A minor Symphony by Haydn, fluent, nicely made, pleasing to his noble patrons, but long since on the semi-retired list. Two dances of Schubert, amiable and characteristic, but more likely nowadays to be heard at The Pops between cigarettes and chatter.

hony Concerts have changed er we say proudly, pointing stitution, yesterday, of the "Die Meistersinger." But
likings changed with them?
t—by the clear evidence of noon. Grant Sir George s measure of the applause
d every number, swelling at sion and the close. Grant nauer hers as an eminent air from "Odysseus" in the of voice and manner. Alchestra its portion for so-upspringing Beethoven; for light-fingered, brightly in; for Schubert that was e double-distilled. Even so, s were beaten together to pleased were many in the h this six-fold musical mis-

IDA for a return to a decorative n of the musical mill ie air from "Orpheus"

"Die Meistersinger." ave the hateful brood r grumbings, to their day. Yet even they If Mme. Matzeny the delicate inflecen pathos, the haunt-ck's air, she and Sir led Pruch's stilted and h the pleasing deceptions century "grand style."
andth time the splende to "Die Meisterelse away. From that our symphonic jubilee nths flight. H. T. P.

CHSCHL CONDUCTS FOPENING CONCERT

Conductor of Orchestra Cheered
Anniversary Symphony Season Under Way

George Henschel, the first con-the Boston Symphony, led as terday afternoon at the openert of the orchestra's 50th he program he conducted in Music Hall, Oct 22, 1881, at the first Boston Symphony concert ever given. Margaret Matzenauer, contralto, sang the two solos allotted in 1881 to Annie Louise Cary.

In the present orchestra there is no player who was a member in 1881.
In yesterday's audience were, however, a number of listeners who have attended through the 49 intervening seasons.

One of them, Mrs Henry Lee Higginson, widow of the founder and sustainer of the Boston Symphony, was given a great bunch of roses during the intermission. When the audience saw these flowers carried to where Mrs Higginson sat in her usual place, there was an outburst of applause.

When the last warning bell had sounded before the concert, and all the doors of the hall were shut, there was a moment of silence. Then from the right of the stage came Dr Kousse-vitzky, preceding a brisk, alert figure, bearded and gray-haired, but with no hint of hoary age. One would have deemed Sir George Henschel a man in his late 50s. Yet he is in his 80th year.

Chair on Stand

The conductor's stand was railed in with laurel and gilt. On it was a chair. When Sir George had acknowledged the hearty applause of the orchestra and audience, who stood to greet him, he seated himself in this chair. Not, however, to conduct.
Merely to listen to a speech of welcome and congratulation from Dr Koussevitzky, the present conductor of the Boston Symphony has ventured at the Friday concerts.

"And so the longing and dream of Lee Higginson were realized 50 years ago," began Dr Koussevitzky, pointing to Sir George Henschel and the orchestra. His speech has, naturally, a foreign accent, but his English was carefully and correctly phrased. Once or twice he hesitated over an idiom, but most of his delivery was fluent.

"I shall not now pay tribute to Maj Higginson. For that there will be an occasion next March when we shall give a Bach festival in his honor. Today I wish to congratulate this man, this wonderful man, who has come back to us after so many years to conduct again the program of our orchestra's first concert.

"I am very happy to be able to say to him and to you that our orchestra is now by common consent at its zenith of zeniths." This remark brought a burst of applause.

"Not merely Boston, but all America should be proud of the Boston Symphony," concluded its present conductor, to more applause.

Sir George, whose impatience to begin had become obvious before the end of Dr Koussevitzky's brief speech, rose to his feet, bowed his thanks, raised his baton and without glancing at the score on his desk, bade the orchestra begin the Beethoven overture
"Dedication of the House."

Except for the accompaniments to Mme Matzenauer's solos, he conducted from memory throughout the concert, in itself something of a feat for a man of any age. Nor did he again make use of the chair placed for him, but remained standing to conduct.

One, of course, was prepared to discover in Sir George Henschel a musician of high rank. His great reputation as a conductor, a composer, a pianist, a singer, and a teacher of singing was established long ago.
What one had not expected from a man of 80 was the energy, the vitality of such a musician in his prime.

He conducted the Beethoven overture,
a Haydn Symphony in B Flat, the ballet music from Schubert's "Rosemunde" and the prelude to Wagner's "Die Meistersinger" with unflagging zeal as well as refinement of style and precision of detail.

For each number he sought the quality and intensity of tone appropriate, reserving the great sonorities of the modern orchestra for the music of Bruch and Wagner, written for it.
His tempi were invariably rightly chosen. His adagio was a true adagio without lingering and broken phrases. His allegro was bright and clear, fluent or pompous, as the music dictated.

Mme Matzenauer sang "Che faro senza Eurydice" from Gluck's "Orpheus," and the prayer of Penelope from Max Bruch's "Odysseus" with a restraint and a sense of style that made the use of her voice as remarkable as its volume and quality have long been. She had taken the trouble to memorize both numbers, words as well as music, and she was eager to share the applause for them with Sir George Henschel. For her share in the concert there can be nothing but praise.

The orchestra, as was to be expected, did its very best for Sir George Henschel. It again proved its right to be counted among the foremost in the world. For its present high estate credit must go to Mr Monteux and Dr Koussevitzky, its conductors since the tragic collapse a dozen years ago, when for a time one feared the Boston Symphony Orchestra would become not the least of the casualties due to the World War, and also to the present trustees and guarantors, whose ability and generosity make the continuance of the concerts possible.

Dream Realized

No one who cares for great music could now bear to face the prospect of living in a Boston without the Symphony concerts. Major Higginson's dream, 50 years ago, of a Symphony Orchestra which should do for Boston what the great orchestras of Europe do for their respective cities, in coming true so gloriously, has put us so greatly in his debt that there are no words in which one can express the obligation.

The same program will be conducted tonight by Sir George Henschel for the Saturday subscribers. For the sake of the record, here it is.

Overture, "Dedication of the House," Beethoven; air "Che farò," from "Orpheus," Gluck; symphony in B flat, Haydn; ballet music from "Rosemunde," Schubert; air of Penelope from "Odysseus," Bruch; prelude to "Die Meistersinger," Wagner. Soloist, Margaret Matzenauer.

The Wagner number was substituted yesterday for Weber's "Festival Overture," the only change in the numbers of the program of Oct. 22, 1881. There was some gossip in the audience over this change.

One's guess is that it is what Sir George Henschel really wanted to conduct in 1881. The new orchestra could hardly have been ready at its first concert for Wagner's exacting, and then relatively unfamiliar prelude. But yesterday it made an appropriate and triumphant close to an unusually satisfying commemoration of a great anniversary date.

P. R.

SYMPHONY LED BY ITS FIRST HEAD

Post ——— Oct. 11, 1930
50th Season Opens
With Sir George Henschel Conducting

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

This simple announcement in the programme-book told the story: "Sir George Henschel (conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra 1881-1884) will conduct these concerts."

Here was the Symphony Orchestra entering upon its 50th season and with its first conductor, his appearance giving the lie to the 80 years with which he is credited, at the helm. This was indeed an occasion.

DR. KOUSSEVITZKY SPEAKS

When Sir George Henschel yesterday

Wanted

TRIST

Optical departments. Position open in Massachusetts. Excepted to men with Massachusetts. Preferably men of CLAID & OPTICAL. Evidence. R. I.

man, in every town. to represent Chicago company in hand samples and almanacs, from house to house. Can be handled in science not necessary. Men selected must write today telling all we stamped envelope. st., Chicago, Ill.

ED for permanent promotion and good necessary. Apply 216

Instruction

Postoffice Clerks—3-45. Steady work. ment. Paid vacation. today sure for full. *k11&18&25n1 a make good money McCARRIE SCHOOL. TISTRY. 142 Berkemobiles

ET COUPE

at condition. Terms.

CASH PAID

Commonwealth 8071. mechanical condition. price $150. MRS. ne st., Everett.

ASS. COUPE, $165; wner, Granite 7212.

on

YOU UNTIL 8 LESSONS
MONT ST.

course $5;
TO SCHOOL.
im 5263.

call for you.
SCHOOL.
St., Medford

TOOL rt Course $5 Somerset 5290

ce

ther; all ears k co's. PAUL rty 6334.

ice. A Stock ty insurance.
5. Hub. 6765.

business address, are habits and le.
sive territay right mean-Boston Pea-

anted

I AND PERS V
IRA

Sir George Henschel's Return

Monitor, Oct. 11, 1930. By L. A. SLOPER

AMID the plaudits of a standing orchestra and audience, Sir George Henschel, on the afternoon of Oct. 10, stood once more upon the dais which he had left 46 years ago at the conclusion of the third season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

At the end of the first concert of the orchestra's fiftieth season, hearers and players rose to him again, and Symphony Hall resounded with "bravos" and cheers.

The acclaim on his appearance had been warm greeting to a welcome and honored guest; the ovation an hour and three-quarters later was tribute to a masterful and musicianly conductor. Sir George had proved in that period that he was no revenant from a romantic past, but a vital, stimulating leader.

Sir George was ushered to the platform by Dr. Koussevitzky, who, relinquishing his baton for the occasion, must first do the honors as host. If his enthusiasm somewhat exceeded the fluency of his English, that was evidence of his warm-hearted generosity. Indeed, this Slavic warmth was too much for the composure of Sir George, who was manifestly embarrassed at hearing himself repeatedly described as "this wonderful man" who had "made come to life" the dream of Major Higginson. But he did not seem to mind Dr. Koussevitzky's pleasure in "repeating the general opinion" that the Boston orchestra is now "at the zenith of zeniths."

Sir George directed on this occasion the same program he had given at the orchestra's first concert, Oct. 22, 1881, with the exception of one number. The concert opened with Beethoven's Overture, op. 124, "Consecration of the House," and continued with the Recitative and Air, "Che farò senza Eurydice," from Gluck's "Orfeo ed Eurydice"; Haydn's B flat Symphony (B. & H. No. 12); the Ballet Music from Schubert's incidental music to "Rosamunde," and the Recitative and Aria, "Thou Far-darting Sun," from Bruch's "Odysseus." The closing number on the original program was Weber's "Festival" Overture. For this Sir George substituted at the concert under notice the "Meistersinger" Prelude, in order to give full play for once to the sonority of an orchestra twice the size of that he first led.

The soloist at the original concert was Miss Anna Louise Cary. In her place, 49 years later, stood that fine artist Margaret Matzenauer. Mme. Matzenauer brought to the occasion her compelling dramatic power and, to a degree, the superb quality of her full-rounded tones—but she was not in quite her best voice; neither her production nor her control was flawless, and her intonation was sometimes uncertain. Yet her superior musicianship gave pleasure and won her warm applause.

Sir George Henschel, as we have intimated, earned the acclaim bestowed upon him by a grateful audience. It was evident in the early items that he was in full control of his forces and had their willing cooperation. In the symphony it was made clear that he possessed qualities not always united in a leader—an awareness of form, a sensitivity to tonal values, a feeling for the outline of a phrase, a nice sense of balance, rhythmic vigor and aristocratic taste. The "Rosamunde" music emphasized these qualities; and the "Meistersinger" Prelude revealed that while Sir George is remarkable for delicacy of perception and lightness of touch, he can also ride the storm at need with the best of them. Wagner's music was brought to pulsing, glowing life.

Sir George graciously shared with the orchestra the praises which were showered upon him. It must indeed have been an extraordinary experience for him to return after these decades to such a magnificent musical organism, grown from the seed he had sown. For the orchestra, even under a guest conductor, showed no sign of early season uncertainty. It stands, at the beginning of its fiftieth season, in its full strength and vigor, an honor to its founder, and to Sir George Henschel and all the mentors who have followed him.

Dream Realized

No one who cares for great music could now bear to face the prospect of living in a Boston without the Symphony concerts. Major Higginson's dream, 50 years ago, of a Symphony Orchestra which should do for Boston what the great orchestras of Europe do for their respective cities, in coming true so gloriously, has put us so greatly in his debt that there are no words in which one can express the obligation.

The same program will be conducted tonight by Sir George Henschel for the Saturday subscribers. For the sake of the record, here it is.

Overture, "Dedication of the House," Beethoven; air "Che farò," from "Orpheus," Gluck; symphony in B flat, Haydn; ballet music from "Rosamunde," Schubert; air of Penelope from "Odysseus," Bruch; prelude to "Die Meistersinger," Wagner. Soloist, Margaret Matzenauer.

SYMP LED FIRS

Post

50th Sec

With Sir C

schel C

BY WARREN

This simple programme-book George Henschel Boston Symphony (1884) will con-

Here was the orchestra entering up and with its first appearance giving years with which the helm. This session.

DR. KOUSSE

When Sir George Henschel yesterday

conducted the orchestra at whose baptism he had presided, he was accompanied by his present successor, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky. Orchestra and audience stood in greeting and there was long and warm applause. But Dr. Koussevitzky, as it soon appeared, was not there merely to do the honors of host. For the first time in the regular course of the Symphony Concerts he addressed an audience.

Dr. Koussevitzky's words came a little haltingly and he spoke them as the phrase goes, with an accent. But they were eloquent and to the point. "This wonderful man," he said of Sir George, "realized the dream of Henry Lee Higginson." And therein lay the kernel of his brief speech. Though it should be mentioned that when he referred to the present Symphony Orchestra as being at the zenith of its powers he was interrupted by applause.

Conducts From Memory

A wonderful man, in truth, is Sir George Henschel. With his 81st birthday a little over four months away, he has the outward appearance and the seeming vitality of a man 15 or 20 years younger. He conducted with authority; his beat was firm, his gestures decisive. And all the music of the afternoon, except the accompaniment to two vocal solos, he conducted from memory. If this does not suggest mental powers unimpaired, what else would? There was a chair placed on the podium, but only once or twice did the conductor deign to make use of it, and then only for an instant.

It was appropriate that yesterday's programme should have been a replica of the first programme that the Boston Symphony Orchestra ever played; and that, save for a trifling change, it was. On the original list the closing number was the "Jubil," Overture of Weber. Yesterday's concert ended instead with the "Meistersinger" Prelude of Wagner. No doubt Sir George felt that the pre-

One's guess is that it is what Sir George Henschel really wanted to conduct in 1881. The new orchestra could hardly have been ready at its first concert for Wagner's exacting, and then relatively unfamiliar prelude. But yesterday it made an appropriate and triumphant close to an unusually satisfying commemoration of a great anniversary date.

tion
OH YOU UNTIL
2. 8 LESSONS
REMON ST.

short course $5:
AUTO SCHOOL.
idum 5263.

We call for you.
TO SCHOOL,
ley St., Medford

SCHOOL
short Course $5
Somerset 5290

ince higher; all cars took co's. PAUL liberty 6334. ervice. A Stock
ility insurance.
505. Hub. 6765.

business address, a habits and sive territy right mean
Boston Pea

Wanted

N AND PPERS V HRA

Sir George Henschel's Return

Monitor, Oct. 11, 1931. By L. A. SLOPER

AMID the plaudits of a standing orchestra and audience, Sir George Henschel, on the afternoon of Oct. 10, stood once more upon the dais which he had left 46 years ago at the conclusion of the third season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

At the end of the first concert of the orchestra's fiftieth season, hearers and players rose to him again, and Symphony Hall resounded with "bravos" and cheers.

The acclaim on his appearance had been warm greeting to a welcome and honored guest; the ovation an hour and three-quarters later was tribute to a masterful and musicianly conductor. Sir George had proved in that period that he was no revenant from a romantic past, but a vital, stimulating leader.

Sir George was ushered to the platform by Dr. Koussevitzky, who, relinquishing his baton for the occasion, must first do the honors as host. If his enthusiasm somewhat exceeded the fluency of his English, that was evidence of his warm-hearted generosity. Indeed, this Slavic warmth was too much for the composure of Sir George, who was manifestly embarrassed at hearing himself repeatedly described as "this wonderful man" who had "made come to life" the dream of Major Higginson. But he did not seem to mind Dr. Koussevitzky's pleasure in "repeating the general opinion" that the Boston orchestra is now "at the zenith of zeniths."

Sir George directed on this occasion the same program he had given at the orchestra's first concert, Oct. 22, 1881, with the exception of one number. The concert opened with Beethoven's Overture, op. 124, "Consecration of the House," and continued with the Recitative and Air, "Che farò senza Eurydice," from Gluck's "Orfeo ed Eurydice"; Haydn's B flat Symphony (B. & H. No. 12); the Ballet Music from Schubert's incidental music to "Rosamunde," and the Recitative and Aria, "Thou Far-darting Sun," from Bruch's "Odysseus." The closing number on the original program was Weber's "Festival" Overture. For this Sir George substituted at the concert under notice the "Meistersinger" Prelude, in order to give full play for once to the sonority of an orchestra twice the size of that he first led.

The soloist at the original concert was Miss Anna Louise Cary. In her place, 49 years later, stood that fine artist Margaret Matzenauer. Mme. Matzenauer brought to the occasion her compelling dramatic power and, to a degree, the superb quality of her full-rounded tones—but she was not in quite her best voice; neither her production nor her control was flawless, and her intonation was sometimes uncertain. Yet her superior musicianship gave pleasure and won her warm applause.

Sir George Henschel, as we have intimated, earned the acclaim bestowed upon him by a grateful audience. It was evident in the early items that he was in full control of his forces and had their willing coöperation. In the symphony it was made clear that he possessed qualities not always united in a leader—an awareness of form, a sensitivity to tonal values, a feeling for the outline of a phrase, a nice sense of balance, rhythmic vigor and aristocratic taste. The "Rosamunde" music emphasized these qualities; and the "Meistersinger" Prelude revealed that while Sir George is remarkable for delicacy of perception and lightness of touch, he can also ride the storm at need with the best of them. Wagner's music was brought to pulsing, glowing life.

Sir George graciously shared with the orchestra the praises which were showered upon him. It must indeed have been an extraordinary experience for him to return after these decades to such a magnificent musical organism, grown from the seed he had sown. For the orchestra, even under a guest conductor, showed no sign of early season uncertainty. It stands, at the beginning of its fiftieth season, in its full strength and vigor, an honor to its founder, and to Sir George Henschel and all the mentors who have followed him.

Dream Realized

No one who cares for great music could now bear to face the prospect of living in a Boston without the Symphony concerts. Major Higginson's dream, 50 years ago, of a Symphony Orchestra which should do for Boston what the great orchestras of Europe do for their respective cities, in coming true so gloriously, has put us so greatly in his debt that there are no words in which one can express the obligation.

The same program will be conducted tonight by Sir George Henschel for the Saturday subscribers. For the sake of the record, here it is.

Overture, "Dedication of the House," Beethoven; air "Che farò," from "Orpheus," Gluck; symphony in B flat, Haydn; ballet music from "Rosamunde," Schubert; air of Penelope from "Odysseus," Bruch; prelude to "Die Meistersinger," Wagner. Soloist, Margaret Matzenauer.

The Wagner number was substituted yesterday for Weber's "Festival Overture," the only change in the numbers of the program of Oct. 22, 1881. There was some gossip in the audience over this change.

One's guess is that it is what Sir George Henschel really wanted to conduct in 1881. The new orchestra could hardly have been ready at its first concert for Wagner's exacting, and then relatively unfamiliar prelude. But yesterday it made an appropriate and triumphant close to an unusually satisfying commemoration of a great anniversary date.

P. R.

valuing tameness and tepidity of his inaugural programme required, as a concession to modern taste, at least an exciting close.

Mme. Matzenauer Soloist

A four-page insert in the programme-book offered the portraits of Major Higginson, Sir George Henschel and Dr. Koussevitzky and also a facsimile of the programme of the concert of Saturday, Oct. 22, 1881. And thus it ran: Overture, Op. 124, "Dedication of the House," Beethoven; Air (Orpheus), Gluck; Symphony in B flat, Haydn (No. 12 of Breitkopf's edition); Ballet Music (Rosamunde), Schubert; Scena (Odysseus), Max Bruch; Festival Overture, Lee Higginson. And Weber. Soloist: Miss Annie Louise Cary. Yesterday the singer was Mme. Margaret Matzenauer, and, as was said above, Weber yielded place to Wagner.

Reethoven's Overture, composed in 1822 for the opening of a theatre in Vienna, just misses actual dullness. Gluck's "Che farò senza Eurydice" is, of course, a noble air. The Symphony not often heard is agreeable Haydn; at times as in the slow movement, something more. The "Rosamunde" music is amiable. The Bruch's Scena had vitality yesterday chiefly in the tones of Mme. Matzenauer's voice and Sir George's orchestra.

And all the music of except the accompaniment solos, he conducted for this does not suggest unimpaired, what else was a chair placed on only once or twice designed to make use of for an instant.

It was appropriate the programme should have of the first programme conductor the performance of the Pre-Symphony Orchestra elude would have dispelled them. As a that, save for a trifling matter of fact there was impressive On the original list the conducting and notable playing was the "Jubil," Over throughout the afternoon. And it hard-Yesterday's concert end need be added that the end brought the "Meistersinger" Pre many plaudits for all concerned.

No doubt Sir George for

When Sir George Henschel yesterday

DR. KOUSSEVITZKY

Conducts From

Uses Slower Pace

BY WARREN

50th Sec

With Sir C

schel C

Post

SYMP

LED

FIRS

Post

50th Sec

With Sir C

schel C

Post

SYMP

LED

FIRS

Post

50th Sec

With Sir C

schel C

Post

SYMP

LED

FIRS

Post

50th Sec

With Sir C

schel C

Post

SYMP

LED

FIRS

Post

50th Sec

With Sir C

schel C

Post

SYMP

LED

FIRS

Post

50th Sec

With Sir C

schel C

Post

SYMP

LED

FIRS

Post

50th Sec

With Sir C

schel C

Post

SYMP

LED

FIRS

Post

50th Sec

With Sir C

schel C

Post

SYMP

LED

FIRS

Post

50th Sec

With Sir C

schel C

Post

SYMP

LED

FIRS

Post

50th Sec

With Sir C

schel C

Post

SYMP

LED

FIRS

Post

50th Sec

With Sir C

schel C

Post

SYMP

LED

FIRS

Post

50th Sec

With Sir C

schel C

Post

SYMP

LED

FIRS

Post

50th Sec

With Sir C

schel C

Post

SYMP

LED

FIRS

Post

50th Sec

With Sir C

schel C

Post

SYMP

LED

FIRS

Post

50th Sec

With Sir C

schel C

Post

SYMP

LED

FIRS

Post

50th Sec

With Sir C

schel C

Post

SYMP

LED

FIRS

Post

50th Sec

With Sir C

schel C

Post

SYMP

LED

FIRS

Post

50th Sec

With Sir C

schel C

Post

SYMP

LED

FIRS

Post

50th Sec

With Sir C

schel C

Post

SYMP

LED

FIRS

Post

50th Sec

With Sir C

schel C

Post

SYMP

LED

FIRS

Post

50th Sec

With Sir C

schel C

Post

SYMP

LED

FIRS

Post

50th Sec

With Sir C

schel C

Post

SYMP

LED

FIRS

Post

50th Sec

With Sir C

schel C

Post

SYMP

LED

FIRS

Post

50th Sec

With Sir C

schel C

Post

SYMP

LED

FIRS

Post

50th Sec

With Sir C

schel C

Post

SYMP

LED

FIRS

Post

50th Sec

With Sir C

schel C

Post

SYMP

LED

FIRS

Post

50th Sec

With Sir C

schel C

Post

SYMP

LED

FIRS

Post

50th Sec

With Sir C

schel C

Post

SYMP

LED

FIRS

Post

50th Sec

With Sir C

schel C

Post

SYMP

LED

FIRS

Post

50th Sec

With Sir C

schel C

Post

SYMP

LED

FIRS

Post

50th Sec

With Sir C

schel C

Post

SYMP

LED

FIRS

Post

50th Sec

With Sir C

schel C

Post

SYMP

LED

FIRS

Post

50th Sec

With Sir C

schel C

Post

SYMP

LED

FIRS

Post

50th Sec

Faith and Works

Arthur Foote

Bachrach (C.)

Listener at the Symphony Concerts Through Fifty Years; Contributor to the Programs as Composer Through Forty-Three; Yesterday Informal Lecturer About Past and Present

Fifty Years Described In Fifty Minutes

Over the Symphony Concerts, With Arthur Foote As Eye-and-Ear Witness

Tuesday, Oct. 10, 1930

HERE was new departure at the Public Library yesterday afternoon. By precedent the company in the Lecture-Hall should have listened to description, with examples and comment, of the pieces to be played at the Symphony Concerts today and tomorrow. On the platform, indeed, stood a piano ready for that purpose. From it, however, not a note sounded; while in an hour's discourse, the impending program was but cursorily mentioned. Yes: it was to begin with Beethoven's last overture, "Dedication of the House"—in vogue in the eighteen-eighties for ceremonial occasions, now fallen into disuse and relegated to the "minor works." As the speaker said, it was more Handelian than Beethoven. The familiar air, "Che faró" from Gluck's opera, "Orpheus" was to follow; later on another air, likewise for contralto, from Bruch's "Odysseus." In those eighteen-eighties they were favorite concert-pieces with Annie Louise Cary, American singer of remarkable voice, then at the height of her powers. Now Mme. Matzenauer would undertake them. And a Symphony by Haydn, and the dances that Schubert wrote for the forgotten play of "Rosamond, Queen of Cyprus." Finally, the Prelude to Wagner's opera, "Die Meistersinger." But that was a desirable substitution for Weber's trumpety "Jubilee Overture" with climax in "God Save the King" or "Heil dir im Siegeskranz," according as the concert-room was English or German.

By this time the secret was out. The program in question, save only Wagner's "Prelude," was the program of the first concerts, in the old Oct. 21 and 22, repeated at the 50th year of the present 1 and 12, 1930. It was also to be the only alive but a century after, at the Public Library, the course, Mr. Music Library, Tom; dispensed the Symphony at times to the man of twenty-seven he was a. As composer heard at the 187 in the over-Only last Saturday repeated from Suite for Strings, speaker for the e in the light of e sheet of blue ding from it as were sitting by beginning—with Handel and Haydn uence of a peace- end of the War as choral music. ceived, a manu- Twenty-five acerts were afoot ears on, and the lutions of 1848 in flight to Bos- other European Germania Orches- tral playing on were concerts al Club, of a a. The ulti- Harvard Musi- king an annual icerts from 1856 risen Symphony them. In the ew them at first as "influential" eir day, drawing provided with vere conservative, including most then worth the the modern com- as classics, were en Bruch passed ward greatness; m Raff or Rubin- and debatable as

e" from Ravel or to say, the open- he liberal side. s of the Harvard eclined. The con- to be cliquish, to tive courses. Theo- er, had begun to Boston. His pro- nd sounded fresh- mance ran higher kably he excelled s. The orchestra sical Association parison. (Imagine of Muck or Kous- ne, of the players any could give symphonic work. as forsaking the e of the last of believed that he hel the conductor new orchestra he Foote recounted digressed to the of Mr. Henschel: ts as pianist and ublic appearance, ne. (Years after- radio, Sir George hat city and in- anyone remem- ties—Mr. Foote stablished singer; tising his profes- nning to expand sician he was ul- ng-recitals first With him was the first Mrs. artnership, noted descanted.

Boston with ner in Ohio, was a voice and what musicality. She r. Foote was her to London; was el. At their con- as Mr. Foote sang solo-pieces; duets; while Mr. nist throughout, d complement to and down Eu- erica long after onductor of the of the orchestra and maintained London. To the e dedicated his in degree made "Stabat Mater."

Faith and Works

Arthur Foote

Bachrach (C.)

Listener at the Symphony Concerts Through Fifty Years; Contributor to the Programs as Composer Through Forty-Three; Yesterday Informal Lecturer About Past and Present

Chant for 40 Dead Echo in St. Pa

The Great and the O Join to Honor Victim the R-101

New York Evening Post Foreign Copyright, 1930, by New York Evening

London, Oct. 10—The forty-four of the R-101 received the homage of the nation today, resting in state in the lofty oak beams of Westminster, draped in royal purple and each by the Union Jack. Here they were visited by their relatives, and the great and the obscure in a stream, that flowed all day through the ancient hall.

At St. Paul's Cathedral a memorial tribute was paid in a memorial service attended by the Prince of Wales, the prime minister and his cabinet, the dominion prime ministers and the representatives of foreign governments.

Westminster Hall was a sea of flowers from kings, queens, ambassadors. They were mingled with bouquets from working men in all parts of the country. The drowsy highway was to be at once filled with these flowers.

The coffins were on a dais in the center of the hall, surrounded by a pathway of purple and gray, flanked by a purple rope supported by pillars. These coffins—in one the unidentified remains of the pilot, in another the unidentified remains of the airship's galley boy, by the side by side—gave a new sense of the magnitude of the disaster. The Royal Air Force stood guard at the end of the hall, their former comrades, their rifles and their heads bared. The guard at the end of the hall stood motionless with their hands.

The crowd moved silently through the nave of St. Stephen's porch to the right down the steps to the hall where Charles I and V were tried and where the pair of Symphony Concerts, in the old Boston Music Hall, on Oct. 21 and 22, 1881. It was now to be repeated at the first concerts of the fiftieth year of the Symphony Orchestra, in the present Symphony Hall, on Oct. 11 and 12, 1930. The conductor of 1881 was also to be the conductor of 1930—not only alive but able and practicing half a century afterward. In short, the meeting at the Public Library was an anniversary occasion. Therefore the director of the course, Mr. R. G. Appel of the Brown Music Library, had put by rule and custom; dispensed with exposition; bidden Mr. Arthur Foote summarize the course of the Symphony Concerts from the earliest times to the present day. As a young man of twenty-eight he began to attend them. As an elderly man of seventy-seven he was still regularly in his place. As composer of music, Mr. Foote was heard at the Symphony Concerts in 1887 in the overture, "In the Mountains." Only last Saturday the orchestra had repeated from its present repertory his Suite for Strings. By all odds he was the speaker for the occasion, standing at ease in the light of the desk-lamp, lifting one sheet of blue paper after another, reading from it as informally as though he were sitting by his own fireside.

Earliest Times

Mr. Foote began at the beginning—with the foundation of the Handel and Haydn Society in 1815, as consequence of a peace-jubilee to celebrate the end of the War of 1812. Its concern was choral music. (It asked, but never received, a manuscript from Beethoven.) Twenty-five years later orchestral concerts were afoot in a small way. Eight years on, and the aftermath of the revolutions of 1848 brought young musicians in flight to Boston from Paris and other European cities. They formed the Germania Orchestra, which put orchestral playing on a better level. There were concerts as well of a Musical Club, of a Philharmonic Orchestra. The ultimate residue was the Harvard Musical Association, undertaking an annual series of orchestral concerts from 1856 to 1882, when the newly risen Symphony Orchestra extinguished them. In the later years Mr. Foote knew them at first hand. He reported them as "influential" and "important" for their day, drawing "fine audiences," well provided with money. The programs were conservative but generally admirable, including most of the symphonic music then worth the hearing—when most of the modern composers, now counted as classics, were unborn or unknown; when Bruch passed for a figure rising toward greatness; when a "new work" from Raff or Rubinstein seemed as notable and debatable as

"from Ravel or to say, the open- liberal side. s of the Harvard declined. The con- to be cliquish, to tive courses. Theo- er, had begun to Boston. His pro- nd sounded fresh- mance ran higher kably he excelled s. The orchestra sical Association parison. (Imagine of Muck or Kous- ne, of the players any could give symphonic work. was forsaking the e of the last of believed that he shel the conductor new orchestra he Foote recounted digressed to the of Mr. Henschel; ts as pianist and ublic appearance, ne. (Years after- radio, Sir George hat city and in- anyone remem- nties—Mr. Foote stablished singer; tising his profes- nning to expand sician he was ul- ong-recitals first With him was the first Mrs. artnership, noted descanted.

Boston with her in Ohio, was a voice and what musicality. She r. Foote was her to London; was el. At their con- as Mr. Foote sang solo-pieces; duets; while Mr. nist throughout. d complement to and down Eu- erica long after onductor of the of the orchestra and maintained London. To the e dedicated his in degree made "Stabat Mater."

Faith and Works

Arthur Foote

Bachrach (C.)

Listener at the Symphony Concerts Through Fifty Years; Contributor to the Programs as Composer Through Forty-Three; Yesterday Informal Lecturer About Past and Present

Chant for

Dead E in S

The Great and Join to Honor the R-

New York Evening P
Copyright, 1930, by New

London, Oct. 10—T of the R-101 received nation today, resting lofty oak beams of draped in royal purp by the Union Jack visited by their re great and the obscu stream, that flowed ancient hall.

At St. Paul's Cath tribute was paid in attended by the P prime minister and minion prime minis
tives of foreign gov

Westminster Ha flowers from king ambassadors. The bouquets from wor in all parts of t entered the drows was to be at once
of these flowers.

The coffins wer center of the ha pathway of purple
by a purple rope pillars. These co
the unidentified re son, in another th of the airship's ga side by side—gav magnitude of the Royal Air Force former comrades and their heads guard at the end sword. He stood hands.

The crowd mo trance of St. Ste to the right do hall where Char ings were tried a of James II. and on armored horses for th parliament. Here nobody state since the death of Ed

It was a solemn rather crowd. At St. Paul's sole the keynote, due to the r mality of the memorial ser haps to the inadequacy of the service, characteristic state occasions. The chant and prayers were not broken sonal message, for there wa and even these were made the echo and could only va
lowed even from the text.
the singing of the hymn Ages" and "Jesus, Lover in which the great congreg thousand joined, came a co of sympathy and warmth.

Boy and Girl I in Coast-Coa

Laura Ingalls and Ro Leave Pacific Within Hour

Los Angeles, Oct. 10 (A.P.) continental flyers took off for return flights to the board. Miss Laura Ingalls flying a D.H. Moth biplane, dale airport, at 6.13 A. M., re man, Ariz., at 10.30. Robert old Elizabeth. N. J., flyer, de
A. M., for the same destin set westward transcontine the one for women flyers a for junior flyers. They at the respective eastward re Ingalls faced a stretch of weather. With Cajon Pass San Bernardino Mountains
she planned to fly through Pass to the southward, w conditions are somewhat bet of the air route to Kingma clear. Miss Ingalls was fly ship in which she set a wor 714 consecutive barrel rolls the coast from New York in minutes flying time.

Bankruptcy Petition

Today

Frank C. Neren, engineer ford; liabilities, $22,382; asse Ray S. Buckingham, mach ton: liabilities, $941; no asse

nowadays a "first time" from Ravel or Stravinsky. Needless to say, the open-minded Foote was on the liberal side.

In time, the concerts of the Harvard Musical Association declined. The controlling powers tended to be cliquish, to fall into ultra-conservative courses. Theodore Thomas, moreover, had begun to bring his orchestra to Boston. His programs ranged wider and sounded fresher; his level of performance ran higher and livelier. Unmistakably he excelled the resident conductors. The orchestra of the Harvard Musical Association seemed elderly in comparison. (Imagine it beside the orchestra of Muck or Koussevitzy!) Few, or none, of the players were virtuos. Hardly any could give full time and energy to symphonic work.
A dissatisfied public was forsaking the concerts, when, at one of the last of them, Major Higginson believed that he had found in Mr. Henschel the conductor he was seeking for the new orchestra he had in mind.

The Henschels

Before, however, Mr. Foote recounted the familiar story, he digressed to the career and the qualities of Mr. Henschel; recalled his boyish feats as pianist and singer; noted his first public appearance, aged sixteen, at Cologne. (Years afterward, in these days of radio, Sir George was broadcasting to that city and inquired vainly whether anyone remembered.) By the seventies—Mr. Foote went on—he was an established singer;
settled in London, practising his profession with praise, beginning to expand into the "all-round" musician he was ultimately to be. Song-recitals first brought him to Boston. With him was Lillian Bailey, later the first Mrs.
Henschel. Upon this partnership, noted in its time, Mr. Foote descanted.

Miss Bailey, come to Boston with her family from Columbus in Ohio, was a singer of rare presence, voice and what we should now call musicality. She made her way here—Mr. Foote was her first pianist—migrated to London; was attracted to Mr. Henschel. At their concerts—"ideally perfect" as Mr. Foote recalled them—each sang solo-pieces;
joined their voices in duets; while Mr.
Henschel was accompanist throughout.
The pair were offset and complement to each other, singing up and down Europe, returning to America long after he had ceased to be conductor of the Symphony Orchestra or of the orchestra that he assembled and maintained through ten years in London. To the memory of his wife he dedicated his Mass of Requiem; for her in degree made his setting of the hymn, "Stabat Mater."

In these later years, Sir George (as he then was) had become full-fledged composer. Early he had begun the practice of that calling. He was conducting in a youthful Concert Overture when he caught Major Higginson's eye and ear. With all his work at the Symphony Concerts, he found time and zest to write a comic opera, for which the novelist, Howell, who liked to dabble in the theater, wrote text and verses. It was never published and never performed; but there is Mr. Foote's word that it kept contained much good and charming music. So much for Sir George's "fulfilling and successful life," putting with to use manifold musical abilities.

From Henschel to Gericke

Back then to the first years of the Symphony Orchestra—to the free land and the absolute control that Major Higginson gave Mr. Henschel and his successors, through half a century established principle and policy; to the score and parts that Mr. Henschel assembled as nucleus of an orchestral library after fifty years hardly to be matched in Europe or America; to the Henschelian program-making, a model in its kind; to the long battle in the newspapers over the first conductor's abilities and courses; the bitter. The writers of "letters to the editor" spared no words. Fortunately Mr. Henschel kept the confidence of those that counted most. Throughout, the younger public of the Symphony Concerts was on his side—liberal-minded then as now.

Next to the first coming of Gericke, in succession to Mr. Henschel, and the transformation of the orchestra. In the earlier day, resident players had filled it. Gericke judged many of them poor in quality and began importations from Europe—importations of young men to replace old. Loud but impotent was the local hubbub. Moreover, these youngsters spoke for themselves. Mr. Foote recalled the concerts at which the boyish Kneisel—Mr. Gericke's "imported" concert-master—was to play Beethoven's Concerto. His displaced predecessor and many another veteran went to hear him "go wrong"; in spite of themselves departed admiring. Gericke taught the Bostonian public what the preparation of orchestral concerts should be. In chamber-music the Kneisel Quartet enforced this lesson—and Mr. Foote again digressed to praise its work and example, nowadays half-forgotten. For a year it busied itself with Franck's quartet before it was ready to play it publicly. Its quality encouraged composer after composer to write for it. Mr. Foote could name at least a dozen pieces. At the end of Gericke's first conductorship, there was a new standard of performance for the orchestra; a new insistence from the public upon it.

ning List

kisch, the one "young genius" line of conductors, electrical r of concerts, his next. At his departure, the ans Richter was "Major Hig- vice; but though the contract it was never signed. For ded the change to a new world Major Higginson then sought Thomas. Reasons of health, inclination, prompted him to a fine sense of obligation to o that had sheltered him and his orchestra prevailed. Ma- son understood; like Thomas, secret. Finally, Paur from in Mr. Foote's opinion an ated conductor.

more briefly onward, through second term and the transfer perts from the old Music Hall, a fire-trap, to the new Sym- through Muck's two years from Berlin; through the four another underestimated con- the return of Muck. Gericke back free-handed and larger- Muck's seven years were the conductor at the maturity of powers. A word about the difficulties and controversies; out the decline of the orches- Rabaud. The first years of and the internal dissensions in the still remembered through a year there was ould the orchestra in num- ality, to regain little by lit- tige lost in Boston and still York. With the liberalizing ams and the production in t the opportune moment of "Le Sacre de Printemps," st proceeded.

eux, and to complete it, the sevitzky and a virtually new be his instrument. Under phony Concerts at the pitch o, and which the youngest gen- at all s them. Gone is the old nderance in the repertory. nce gives room to Rus- s, Italians and English, that can hold their own elving a just and hospi- regards ment. The older music ding to nth and the eighteenth venteen as place beside that of central The program of six or sevenous items has yielded to fect of three or four, length- partiel- trated, better unified. another tive "soloist" has van- tionary s, new methods, but more diversified, more quarters ment. . . . Mr. s of Ala- ast Blue sheet. Into been con- had condensed fifty z Tabaro, ony Orchestra. rnambuca

H. T. P.

HENSCHEL'S RETURN

Oct 12, 1930

The First Conductor—Past and Present of The Boston Symphony Orchestra

By OLIN DOWNES.

THERE is more than local interest and significance in the return to Boston of Sir George Henschel to conduct last Friday afternoon and yesterday evening the opening pair of concerts of the fiftieth anniversary season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The sentiment which attaches to the occasion and which is warm in Boston today is caused less by Sir George's fame as an orchestral leader than by the character of the man and the fact that he led one of the most famous orchestras of the world through the first three years of its rise to rank and international repute.

It was George Henschel, pianist, singer, teacher, composer and conductor of sorts, whose presence in Boston and prowess as conductor of a concert of the Harvard Musical Association persuaded Henry L. Higginson that he had found the leader needed to develop a permanent orchestra in his native city. Without Henschel the dream of a Boston Symphony Orchestra might have waited much longer than it did to become reality. Now, half a century from the time of the beginnings of the organization, has come the hour when the first conductor, who is 80 years of age, and the orchestra can again join forces, to the edification of the august public assembled. Great has been the joy and honor of the observance. But there is a wider import to the business because, although there are older American orchestras than the Boston Symphony, and the oldest of them in this city, it was the creation of the Boston organization and the standards of orchestral performance which it soon enforced that marked a new period in the whole musical life of America and one fraught with significance for its whole future.

* * *

Tuning will cease the moment the conductor gives the signal for doing so.

No member of the orchestra, even if his presence be not needed for the moment, will leave the hall during the time of the rehearsals and concerts without the consent of the conductor.

The folios containing the parts will be closed after each rehearsal and concert.

Inasmuch as we are engaged for musical purposes we will not talk of private matters during rehearsals and concerts.

These precepts and rulings are now part of the routine of all professional orchestral bodies, but it is evident that they were novel and in need of emphasis at the founding of the Boston Symphony.

Mr. Henschel in the course of his memoirs, "Musings and Memories of a Musician," gives us further details of his work. "Being absolutely my own master as regards the orchestra and its work, I tried several experiments in the way of placing the orchestra, dividing, for instance, the strings into equal halves on my right and left, with the object of enabling the listeners on either side of the hall to have the full effect of the whole string quintet. These experiments I submitted in letters, illustrated by diagrams, to Brahms, who most kindly, in his answers, commented upon their practicability or otherwise. 'But,' he writes on one occasion, 'by far the best feature in your arrangements of the orchestra is the fact that no committee will be sitting in front of it. There is not a kapellmeister on the whole of our continent who would not envy you that.'"

In making his programs Mr. Henschel, who, if his abilities as conductor were severely handled by the press, was unconditionally recognized as program maker of the first

In these later years, Sir George (then was) had become full-fledged poser. Early he had begun the p of that calling. He was conducting youthful Concert Overture which caught Major Higginson's eye and With all his work at the Symphon cerpts, he found time and zest to w comic opera, for which the no Howells, who liked to dabble i theater, wrote text and verses. never published and never perf but there is Mr. Foote's word t contained much good and cha music. So much for Sir George's interesting and successful life," p to use manifold musical abilities.

From Henschel to Gericke

Back then to the first years Symphony Orchestra—to the free and the absolute control that Major ginson gave Mr. Henschel and his sors, through half a century lished principle and policy; to the and parts that Mr. Henschel asse as nucleus of an orchestral library fifty years hardly to be matched rope or America; to the Henschella gram-making, a model in its kind; long battle in the newspapers ovi first conductor's abilities and c This and that reviewer was hosti bitter. The writers of "letters i editor" spared no words. Fortu Mr. Henschel kept the confider those that counted most. Throu the younger public of the Sym Concerts was on his side—liberal- then as now.

Next to the first coming of G in succession to Mr. Henschel, a transformation of the orchestra. earlier day, resident players had it. Gericke judged many of them in quality and began importations Europe—importations of young n replace old. Loud but impotent w local hubbub. Moreover, these sters spoke for themselves. Mr. recalled the concerts at which the Kneisel—Mr. Gericke's "imported cert-master—was to play Beeth Concerto. His displaced predecessor many another veteran went to him "go wrong"; in spite of then departed admiring. Gericke taug Bostonian public what the prep of orchestral concerts should b chamber-music the Kneisel Quart forced this lesson—and Mr. Foote digressed to praise its work and ex nowadays half-forgotten. For a busied itself with Franck's quar for it was ready to play it public quality encouraged composer afte poser to write for it. Mr. Foote name at least a dozen pieces. end of Gericke's first conduct there was a new standard of pance for the orchestra; a new ins from the public upon it.

The Lengthening List

Then to Nikisch, the one "young genius" in the long line of conductors, electrical at one pair of concerts, t ig his ease at the next. At his depart re, the celebrated Hans Richter was "ajar Hig ginson's choice; but though he contract was drawn, it was never signed. For Richter dreaded the change to a new world overseas. Major Higginson then sought Theodore Thomas. Reasons of health, ambition, inclination, prompted him to Boston; but a fine sense of obligation to the Chicago that had sheltered him and maintained his orchestra prevailed. Major Higginson understood; like Thomas, kept their secret. Finally, Paur from Germany; in Mr. Foote's opinion an under-estimated conductor.

More and more briefly onward, through Gericke's second term and the transfer of the concerts from the old Music Hall, which was a fire-trap, to the new Sym phony Hall; through Muck's two years "on loan" from Berlin; through the four of Fiedler, another underestimated conductor, to the return of Muck. Gericke had come back freer-handed and larger-minded. Muck's seven years were the years of a conductor at the maturity of remarkable powers. A word about the war-time difficulties and controversies; another about the decline of the orches tra under Rabaud. The first years of Monteux, and the internal dissensions culminating in the still remembered "strike." Through a year there was only to rebuild the orchestra in num bers and quality, to regain little by lit tle the prestige lost in Boston and still more in New York. With the liberalizing of the programs and the production in both cities at the opportune moment of Stravinsky's "Le Sacre de Printemps," the re-conquest proceeded.

After Monteux, and to complete it, the present Koussevitzky and a virtually new orchestra to be his instrument. Under him the Symphony Concerts at the pitch and range at which the youngest generation knows them. Gone is the old German preponderance in the repertory. A better balance gives room to Rus sians, Parisians, Italians and English, to Americans that can hold their own beside them, receiving a just and hospitable encouragement. The older music of the seventeenth and the eighteenth centuries now has place beside that of the twentieth. The program of six or seven miscellaneous items has yielded to the program of three or four, lengthier, more concentrated, better unified. The merely decorative "soloist" has van ished. New ways, new methods, but always to ampler, more diversified, more catholic accomplishment. . . . Mr. Foote turned his last blue sheet. Into fifty minutes he had condensed fifty years of the Symphony Orchestra.

H. T. P.

HENSCHEL'S RETURN

Oct 12, 1930

The First Conductor—Past and Present of The Boston Symphony Orchestra

By OLIN DOWNES.

THERE is more than local interest and significance in the re turn to Boston of Sir George Henschel to conduct last Fri day afternoon and yesterday evening the opening pair of concerts of the fiftieth anniversary season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The sentiment which attaches to the oc casion and which is warm in Boston today is caused less by Sir George's fame as an orchestral leader than by the character of the man and the fact that he led one of the most fa mous orchestras of the world through the first three years of its rise to rank and international repute.

It was George Henschel, pianist, singer, teacher, composer and con ductor of sorts, whose presence in Boston and prowess as conductor of a concert of the Harvard Musical As sociation persuaded Henry L. Hig ginson that he had found the leader needed to develop a permanent or chestra in his native city. Without Henschel the dream of a Boston Sym phony Orchestra might have waited much longer than it did to become reality. Now, half a century from the time of the beginnings of the organization, has come the hour when the first conductor, who is 80 years of age, and the orchestra can again join forces, to the edification of the august public assembled. Great has been the joy and honor of the ob servance. But there is a wider im port to the business because, al though there are older American orchestras than the Boston Sym phony, and the oldest of them in this city, it was the creation of the Bos ton organization and the standards of orchestral performance which it soon enforced that marked a new period in the whole musical life of America and one fraught with sig nificance for its whole future.

* * *

Tuning will cease the moment the conductor gives the signal for do ing so.

No member of the orchestra, even if his presence be not needed for the moment, will leave the hall during the time of the rehearsals and concerts without the consent of the conductor.

The folios containing the parts will be closed after each rehearsal and concert.

Inasmuch as we are engaged for musical purposes we will not talk of private matters during rehears als and concerts.

These precepts and rulings are now part of the routine of all professional orchestral bodies, but it is evident that they were novel and in need of emphasis at the founding of the Boston Symphony.

Mr. Henschel in the course of his memoirs, "Musings and Memories of a Musician," gives us further details of his work. "Being absolutely my own master as regards the orchestra and its work, I tried several experi ments in the way of placing the or chestra, dividing, for instance, the strings into equal halves on my right and left, with the object of enabling the listeners on either side of the hall to have the full effect of the whole string quintet. These experiments I submitted in letters, illustrated by diagrams, to Brahms, who most kindly, in his answers, commented upon their practicability or other wise. 'But,' he writes on one occa sion, 'by far the best feature in your arrangements of the orchestra is the fact that no committee will be sitting in front of it. There is not a kapellmeister on the whole of our conti nent who would not envy you that.'"

In making his programs Mr. Hen schel, who, if his abilities as con ductor were severely handled by the press, was unconditionally recog nized as program maker of the first rank, was guided, if you please, by the principles of good drama laid down by Gustav Freytag.

Sir George's first program, given on Oct. 22, 1881, was scheduled to be repeated, with the exception of one composition, at the concerts of Friday afternoon and last night in Boston, and was as follows: Beethoven, overture, "Consecration of the House"; Gluck, aria, "Che faro senza Eurydice"; Haydn, Symphony in B flat (B. & H. No. 12); Schubert, ballet music from "Rosamunde"; Bruch, "Penelope's Lament"; Weber, "Festival" overture. The exception noted was the substitution of Wagner's "Meistersinger" prelude for Weber's overture. The place of Anna Louise Cary was announced to be taken by Margarete Matzenauer.

AMONG "first performances" under Henschel's directorship were Cowen's "Scandinavian" symphony, which probably no one of the younger generation of symphony audiences or critics has heard, at least in this country; Volkmann's Second Symphony; Raff's "Winter" symphony. In 1911 William Foster Apthorp, writing for The Boston Transcript about the early years of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, mentioned as the principal novelties of enduring worth produced by Henschel Chadwick's "Thalia" overture, Bizet's "Roma," Brahms's "Tragic" overture and music from Wagner's "Parsifal." It will be seen that the first two of this list have been virtually forgotten. The work of Mr. Chadwick's early period which survives is not his "Thalia" but his "Melpomene" overture, which should be more often played, and it is probable that a good quarter of the compositions which made the programs of the first three seasons of the Boston Symphony repertory have been consigned to the outer darkness. To how many does the name of Volk-mann even occur today? Where is Raff? We would fain hear again his "Leonore" symphony, with the march that so stirred the breast of the heroine of "The First Violin." Bizet's "Roma" is now café music. And there are greater ones that vanished. Where is Rubinstein in the modern orchestral repertory? The list could be lengthily extended. A great event was the performance of Dvorak's First Symphony. There were references to the "cacophonous dreariness of Wagner," and a Brahms movement was labeled "the sapient musings of some brilliant idiot." * * *

MR. HENSCHEL returned to Europe, whence Clara Schumann had written in tones of shocked inquiry. "Do you want to forsake Europe altogether? You can imagine how the news of your having accepted for a second year astonishes me, and how much I, and doubtless many with me, deplore it. What will Brahms say to it?" Good heavens! What would Brahms say to it? It is not exactly the condition today. Find the composer or musician in Europe who will not announce it as matter for rejoicing to family and friends that he has a good American engagement in his pocket.

Further tokens of the times might be read into the return of George Henschel—who, by the way, taught in New York as late as 1905 at the Institute of Musical Art. But there has been enough "interpretation" of his visit, with its many reminders and its admonitions of the passage of time and the mortality of many things. The things that do not pass are the fellowship of men who labor in a great cause, and all that Major Higginson and the sincere and admirable musician accomplished for the good of their fellow-citizens, the advancement of human understanding and the glory of art.

With an enthusiasm almost continual in its fervor, musical Boston, usually one of the most sedate and proper audiences in the world, last night thumped on the floor, cheered, and cried, "Bravo!" when Sir George Henschel, leading the great orchestra after an absence of 46 years, turned around at the conclusion of the overture to the "Mastersingers of Nuremberg."

Such noisy enthusiasm was almost unheard of in an audience noted for its serious regularity, dignified intellectuality, and utter lack of wild enthusiasms. Some of the listeners were visibly shocked. But most of the people in that fashionable throng were releasing their admiration through their hands and feet and voices.

VICTORY FOR WAGNER

Staid old Symphony hall had not witnessed such a symphony concert Saturday night since the brilliant young Russian pianist, Vladimir Horowitz, came to Boston. It cheered then. This time it cheered for an old man—80 years old—who led the Wagnerian overture as vigorously as a Koussevitzky or any of his other successors.

It was a victory for Wagner as well as for Henschel. Fifty years ago Boston was shocked by Wagner, and wondered if the heavy Richard was writing music or merely spoofing them with futuristic stuff. One 1880 critic said that such things might be looked on as music 30 years from that day, but that Henschel had done Boston a questionable favor in introducing Wagner.

Today they are saying the same things about new composers, moderns, jazzists, and the like. They still grow excited when a composer introduces new ideas. They wonder if what he writes is music.

Last night the Wagner offering was the great work on a program which seemed to some a trifle quaint and archaic. Yet the Wagner piece was the only number which would have been considered radical 50 years ago, and the only one not on the first program of the symphony.

DRAMATIC IMPORTANCE

The dramatic importance of the occasion impressed itself on many minds. Times change, and faces, but human nature goes on, in music as in everything else, composed of conservatives, cautious ones, daring ones and moderns.

There were many in the audience who had heard Sir George 50 years ago. The orchestra was so overwhelmed with admiration for its guest leader that the members refused to arise when he asked them to share the applause. Instead, they applauded, and held their seats, until the aged conductor insisted they stand up. The audience was loath to go home, but remained many minutes. An usher said that the audience was the largest he had ever seen in the corridors for an intermission. Usually, many Bostonians remain in their seats, and do not go out to the lobby to argue and exclaim.

Behind the scenes upstairs, Sir George met many old friends after the performance. Carl Behr of Asheville, N. C., George U. Stewart of Brighton, and Ernest Regestein of Lexington, were among the original members of the symphony who attended. Others included Heinrich Gebhard, Helen Hopekirk, James R. Haughton and Jesus Sanroma.

Attended First Concerts

The return of Sir George Henschel as conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra for the two opening performances this season calls to mind the early days of the orchestra when he served as its first conductor. Among the symphony patrons who attended concerts during his regime were Mrs. Oliver Ames, Mr. Percy Lee Atherton, Mrs. D. M. Babcock, Mrs. Frances A. M. Bird, Mrs. Arthur W. Blake, Miss M. L. Blake, Mrs. E. D. Brandegee, Mrs. Marian D. Briggs and Mr. George W. Chadwick.

Others are Mrs. George O. G. Coale, Miss C. A. Codman, Mr. Richard H. Dana, Miss Mabel W. Daniels, Mme. Emma Eames, Miss Gertrude Edmands, Mr. and Mrs. William Ellery, Mr. Augustus H. Ellis, Mrs. Ada R. Esdalle, Miss Sally Fairchild, Dr. and Mrs. John W. Farlow, Mrs. E. M. Farnsworth, Mr. William S. Fenollosa, Mr. Arthur Foote, Mrs. John Chipman Gray, Mr. C. E. Hay, Mrs. Henry Lee Higginson, Mr. Elliot Hubbard, Miss Helen Hopekirk and Miss Abby W. Hunt.

Also Mrs. Edward F. Jacobs, Mr. Clayton Johns, Mrs. B. J. Lang, Miss Margaret R. Lang, Mrs. W. B. Lancaster, Mrs. H. H. Logan, Mrs. Hall McAllister, Dr. and Mrs. George W. Monks, Mr. E. T. Paine, 2d, Mrs. Henry Parkman, Mrs. Endicott Peabody, Mr. A. E. Prescott, Miss Helen M. Ranney, Mr. and Mrs. Henry M. Rogers, Miss Catherine E. Russell, Mr. Clement Ryder, Mr. Charles E. Sampson, Dr. Henry F. Sears, Mrs. Montgomery Sears.

Others are Mr. H. J. Storer, Miss Rose Stewart, Miss Mary A. Tappan, Mrs. H. M. Whitney, Mrs. George H. Wilson and Mr. Owen Wister.

Members of the original orchestra were Daniel Kuntz of Boston, Carl Behr of Asheville, N. C.; Paul Fisher of Germany, Ernst Regestein of Lexington, George W. Stewart of Brighton, and Eustach Strasser of Westwood. Joining in 1882-83 were C. Martin Loeffler of Medfield and E. B. Marble of Woodstock. L. E. Menoly of New York joined in 1883-84.

FIFTIETH SEASON, NINETEEN HUNDRED THIRTY AND THIRTY-ONE

Second Programme

FRIDAY AFTERNOON, OCTOBER 17, at 2.30 o'clock

SATURDAY EVENING, OCTOBER 18, at 8.15 o'clock

Bach Two Preludes (Arranged for String Orchestra by Pick-Mangiagalli)

- I. Adagio.
- II. Vivace.

(First Performance)

Beethoven Symphony No. 7 in A major, Op. 92

- I. Poco sostenuto; Vivace.
- II. Allegretto.
- III. Presto; Assai meno presto; Tempo primo.
- IV. Allegro con brio.

Hill An Ode (For the Fiftieth Anniversary of the Boston Symphony Orchestra) Poem by Robert Hillyer (To be read by the author)

(First Performance)

Moussorgsky "Pictures at an Exhibition," Pianoforte Pieces arranged for Orchestra by Maurice Ravel

Promenade—Gnomes—Tuleries—Bydlo—Ballet of Chickens in their Shells—Samuel Goldenberg and Schmuyle—Limoges; the Market-place—Catacombs (Con mortuis in lingua mortua)—The Hut on Fowls' Legs—The Great Gate at Kiev.

CHORUS FROM

THE HARVARD GLEE CLUB, Dr. Archibald T. Davison, Conductor
THE RADCLIFFE CHORAL SOCIETY, G. Wallace Woodworth, Conductor

STEINWAY PIANO USED

There will be an intermission after the symphony

The works to be played at these concerts may be seen in the Allen A. Brown Music Collection of the Boston Public Library one week before the concert

Attended First Concerts

The return of Sir George Henschel as conductor of the Boston Symphony orchestra for the two opening performances this season calls to mind the early days of the orchestra when he served as its first conductor. Among the symphony patrons who attended concerts during his regime were Mrs. Oliver Ames, Mr. Percy Lee Atherton, Mrs. D. M. Babcock, Mrs. Frances A. M. Bird, Mrs. Arthur W. Blake, Miss M. L. Blake, Mrs. E. D. Brandegee, Mrs. Marian D. Briggs and Mr. George W. Chadwick.

Others are Mrs. George O. G. Coale, Miss C. A. Codman, Mr. Richard H. Dana, Miss Mabel W. Daniels, Mme. Emma Eames, Miss Gertrude Edmands, Mr. and Mrs. William Ellery, Mr. Augustus H. Ellis, Mrs. Ada R. Esdaile, Miss Sally Fairchild, Dr. and Mrs. John W. Farlow, Mrs. E. M. Farnsworth, Mr. William S. Fenollosa, Mr. Arthur Foote, Mrs. John Chipman Gray, Mr. C. E. Hay, Mrs. Henry Lee Higginson, Mr. Eliot Hubbard, Miss Helen Hopekirk and Miss Abby W. Hunt.

Also Mrs. Edward F. Jacobs, Mr. Clayton Johns, Mrs. B. J. Lang, Miss Margaret R. Lang, Mrs. W. B. Lancaster, Mrs. H. H. Logan, Mrs. Hall McAllister, Dr. and Mrs. George W. Monks, Mr. E. T. Paine, 2d, Mrs. Henry Parkman, Mrs. Endicott Peabody, Mr. A. E. Prescott, Miss Helen M. Ranney, Mr. and Mrs. Henry M. Rogers, Miss Catherine E. Russell, Mr. Clement Ryder, Mr. Charles E. Sampson, Dr. Henry F. Sears, Mrs. Montgomery Sears.

Others are Mr. H. J. Storer, Miss Rose Stewart, Miss Mary A. Tappan, Mrs. H. M. Whitney, Mrs. George H. Wilson and Mr. Owen Wister.

Members of the original orchestra were Daniel Kuntz of Boston, Carl Behr of Asheville, N. C.; Paul Fisher of Germany, Ernst Regestein of Lexington, George W. Stewart of Brighton, and Eustach Strasser of Westwood. Joining in 1882-83 were C. Martin Loeffler of Medfield and E. B. Marble of Woodstock. L. E. Menoly of New York joined in 1883-84.

Second Programme

FRIDAY AFTERNOON, OCTOBER 17, at 2.30 o'clock

SATURDAY EVENING, OCTOBER 18, at 8.15 o'clock

Bach Two Preludes (Arranged for String Orchestra by Pick-Mangiagalli)

- I. Adagio.
- II. Vivace.

(First Performance)

Beethoven Symphony No. 7 in A major, Op. 92

- I. Poco sostenuto; Vivace.
- II. Allegretto.
- III. Presto; Assai meno presto; Tempo primo.
- IV. Allegro con brio.

Hill An Ode (For the Fiftieth Anniversary of the Boston Symphony Orchestra) Poem by Robert Hillyer (To be read by the author)

(First Performance)

Moussorgsky "Pictures at an Exhibition," Pianoforte Pieces arranged for Orchestra by Maurice Ravel

Promenade—Gnomes—Tuleries—Bydlo—Ballet of Chickens in their Shells—Samuel Goldenberg and Schmuyle—Limoges; the Market-place—Catacombs (Con mortuis in lingua mortua)—The Hut on Fowls' Legs—The Great Gate at Kiev.

CHORUS FROM

THE HARVARD GLEE CLUB, Dr. Archibald T. Davison, Conductor
THE RADCLIFFE CHORAL SOCIETY, G. Wallace Woodworth, Conductor

STEINWAY PIANO USED

There will be an intermission after the symphony

The works to be played at these concerts may be seen in the Allen A. Brown Music Collection of the Boston Public Library one week before the concert

SYMPHONY CONCERT

Herald By PHILIP HALE Oct. 18, 1930
The program of the concert given by

ference, the willingness to "let the music speak for itself," an excuse given by uninspired or lazy conductors for tame, perfunctory performance. That of yesterday was charged with the

Sealing Fifty Years of Mutual Good Will

Harvard University Salutes the Symphony Orchestra

Robert Hillyer, Poet, of the English Department, and Edward Burlingame Hill, Composer, of the Division of Music, Who Have Joined Hands in An Anniversary Ode to Be Heard at the Symphony Concerts Tomorrow and Saturday

(Bachrach C.)

work of the composer as he does, he with his valiant artists gave an incomparable interpretation of Beethoven's symphony. Not that he endeavored to make all things new, but as is his way with Beethoven's music, familiarity with it does not in him breed indifference, the willingness to "let the music speak for itself," an excuse given by uninspired or lazy conductors for tame, perfunctory performance. That of yesterday was charged with the

there was vely move-

Bacchic Allegretto sentiment-tors find the great a manner "anic" be- as fond of llen style,

Mr. Hill's erses; then ned chorus d the Rad- were also

All this, ossible ex- lating with no music. ed well the a work a r clear ef- s; and for interludes asteful in- d then sus- clarations.

Mr. Hill an beings as orches- wldly used tat seemed dens from niform but the stage sh of red. etter have d not, lift- th a great have ex- they sang ndy," not d "violins the more anza filled men and teristically with the e unto a ment pre- e was no and stress paniment Poet and d.

rformance ky's Suite f marked atly ask.

for the

piano is not nearer to the Russian's impression of Hartmann's pictures than is Ravel's elaborate transcription, if the title might not well be "Study in Orchestration by Ravel with Helpful Hints by Moussorgsky." The two names are not easily associated.

The concert will be repeated tonight.

Herald By PHILIP HALE Dec. 18, 1930

PRINTED BY TICHNOR BROS. INC. AT CAMBRIDGE, MASS. U. S. A.

SYMPHONY HALL

116304 of Ravel's idea of Moussorgsky's Suite for piano, a performance of marked virtuosity. One might justly ask, whether the original version for the piano is not nearer to the Russian's impression of Hartmann's pictures than is Ravel's elaborate transcription, if the title might not well be "Study in Orchestration by Ravel with Helpful Hints by Moussorgsky." The two names are not easily associated.

The concert will be repeated tonight.

SYMPHONY HALL AND HORTICULTURAL HALL, MASSACHUSETTS AVENUE, BOSTON, MASS.

SYMPHONY CONCERT

Herald By PHILIP HALE Oct. 18, 1930

The program of the concert given by the Boston Symphony orchestra yesterday afternoon in Symphony hall was as follows: Bach-Pick-Mangiagalli, two preludes; Adagio and Vivace, for string orchestra (first performance); Beethoven, symphony No. 7. Hill, An Ode (Robert Hillier's poem) for the 50th Anniversary of the Orchestra (first performance); Moussorgsky-Ravel, "Pictures lures at an exhibition."

They will not let Bach alone; they think he stands in need of transcriptions for orchestra to make his name more illustrious. In London we heard a few months ago a thunderous orchestral version by Respighi of the Passacaglia, which was written originally for a species of pedal piano. Mr. Pick-Mangiagalli was more modest in his homage as a transcriber. He took the slow movement of an organ prelude to a fugue in D minor, music that suggests the treatment he gave it. For the quick movement he chose a prelude in Bach's Partita No. 3, which, utilized by Bach for other purposes, has been made familiar by organists as well as violinists. For the latter prelude he kept the original first violin part, and under it wrote other parts in the "strict contrapuntal manner of Bach."

In saying this he was not presumptuous. His own Fugue played here a year ago proved that he had a mastery of counterpoint and not merely in the pedant's sense, for his music had vitality and when grace and beauty were needed they were not missing. The first prelude played yesterday might have been transcribed by Bach himself for strings; it was so ingenious, at the same time so serene, so lovely in its tenderness. The Fugue, taken at a most rapid pace, was exciting. The parts written by the transcriber added to the musical excitement and seemed a necessary integral part; there was no hint at modernization. The expressive euphony of performance in the first prelude, the dazzling brilliance of the strings in the second were at once appreciated, warmly appreciated by the audience. Seldom is a new, unknown work so cordially received.

Mr. Koussevitzky was heartily welcomed when he came on the platform. Orchestra and audience stood to greet him. The welcome was spontaneous on the part of the audience, hearty and sincere. Having conducted the transcriptions with gusto, admiring the work of the composer as he does, he with his valiant artists gave an incomparable interpretation of Beethoven's symphony. Not that he endeavored to make all things new, but as is his way with Beethoven's music, familiarity with it does not in him breed indifference, the willingness to "let the music speak for itself," an excuse given by uninspired or lazy conductors for tame, perfunctory performance. That of yesterday was charged with the composer's Dionysiac spirit; there was the wildness of joy in the lively movements, the poetic frenzy, Bacchic revelry, while the famous Allegretto was free from the lethargic sentimentalism that some conductors find necessary for contrast. Here the great Beethoven was revealed in a manner that made the epithet "titanic" bestowed on him by biographers fond of purple phrases and the swollen style, seem not extravagant.

Before the performance of Mr. Hill's "Ode," the poet spoke his verses; then they were sung by the combined chorus of the Harvard Glee Club and the Radcliffe Choral Society. They were also printed in the program book. All this, so that there might be no possible excuse for those present not dilating with the right emotions, music or no music.

The poetic sentiments served well the musician, who made of his work a little cantata, conspicuous for clear effective writing for the chorus; and for an instrumental prelude and interludes that, while they displayed tasteful instrumentation, anticipated and then sustained the poet's various declarations. In writing for the chorus, Mr. Hill treated the singers as human beings with vocal limitations, not as orchestral instruments. He shrewdly used female voices for a stanza that seemed to require them. The maidens from Radcliffe clad in a Fascist uniform but with white collars came on the stage in solemn procession. A dash of red, or even of heliotrope, would better have suited the occasion. They did not, lifting up their voices, lament with a great lamentation, as one would have expected from their garb. They sang sweetly and smoothly of "Windy," not waterlogged, flute, harp, and "Violins of graver phrase," while the more heroic spirit of the third stanza filled the breasts of the Harvard men and was expelled in their characteristically broken, syllabic sentences with the staccato that often was like unto a bark. Mr. Hill's accompaniment preserved due proportion; there was no attempt to outvie in strength and stress the vocal forces; the accompaniment supported and embellished. Poet and composer were duly applauded.

There was a compelling performance of Ravel's idea of Moussorgsky's Suite for piano, a performance of marked virtuosity. One might justly ask, whether the original version for the piano is not nearer to the Russian's impression of Hartmann's pictures than is Ravel's elaborate transcription. If the title might not well be "Study in Orchestration by Ravel with Helpful Hints by Moussorgsky." The two names are not easily associated.

The concert will be repeated tonight.

Symphonic Afternoon Of Rhythm

Return of Dr. Koussevitzky, Triple Tour de Force and An Anniversary Ode

FIRST to the anniversary rites that through six months to come will alter the face of the Symphony Concerts. A week ago, they began with the return of Sir George Henschel to conduct at the first pair of concerts in the fiftieth season, even as he had in the first pair of 1881. On the Friday, Dr. Koussevitzky escorted him to his place, made a brief speech in his honor. Otherwise, through both concerts, the present conductor was no more than appreciative listener. Yesterday afternoon, he returned to his post, while a confused audience hardly knew how to re-welcome him. There was general and hearty applause but not the usual gust to greet his annual return. Some—the orchestra included—rose eagerly; others hesitatingly; many kept their seats. The confusion of purpose was evident and innocent. The Symphony Concerts are an institution. A semi-centennial may not depart from routine without consequences. Dr. Koussevitzky smiled as though he perceived as much.

The whole program of the first pair of concerts was commemorative; at the second one commemorative piece suffices—a Choral Ode written by Robert Hillyer, set to music by Edward Burlingame Hill, both of Harvard, sung by a choir from the Harvard Glee Club and the Radcliffe Choral Society; happy signalling in an anniversary hour of the long-standing tie between orchestra and university. Elsewhere on this page are Mr. Hillyer's verses, distinctly oddish, as the seventeenth and the eighteenth centuries in England cultivated the form and understood the term. He himself, mounting the conductor's stand, read them out to yesterday's audience in clear voice and just phrasing, Professor Hill's music spoke for itself; will speak again this evening; brought a warm call for the composer.

12% + 1/2 d tones were commis-
9% + 1/2 d commissioned work
20% - 2% sider. When the con-
8% + 2 tees of the Symphony a piece for its anniver-russel or Stravinsky, the that the composer project simmering in proceeded forthwith to But Mr. Hillyer could incubating commemora-1% Hill meditating upon 6% - 1/2 ture when each, last his commission. Pregan at the beginning, to 7% - 1/2 result. The usual fate
5% - 1/2 onal" pieces is to be
1% - 1/2 fortune of a few excep-
8% - 1/2 nguished. Mr. Hillyer's
1/2 + 3-16 Hill's music are neither 1% - 1/2 other.

13 - 2 ext, bears witness to a 16 - 2 with the chosen form.
20 - 4% s in appropriate inven-
12 + 1 1/2 ist's sense of the pre-3% - 1/2 Yet in itself or when 15 - 5% em is no masterpiece.
12 - 1/2 ic, similarly attests Mr.
the orchestral medium:
appropriate matter well regard for ceremonial shares no pigeon-hole ony, his tone-poem of tes of "Stevensoniana."
Indeed, there was clear Hill is no instinctive, d composer for chorus.
ble than is he would mbridge choirs to more and stimulating pur-that reason Dr. Daviand Mr. Woodworth's
l short of their usual
ality of their voices m; their security with
m. their spirit in per-Better outcome possi-and in other commis-are to strew the year.

PERS QUAE

the program traversed ons for string choir from the Italian, Pick-Mangia-r the first time at any
's adaptation for orches-ky's "Pictures at An Ex-Boards de force on the part of
- reveals actor and players; Beetho-Symphony, in the per-ining to which Dr. Koussevitzky
ns. ed his audience. The ori-forecast agiagalli's Adagio and Vi-but this dy been set forth in this ere is a there was only to listen ome sec-uch felicitous music. The ers, indi-in be exuberant with his ress, or Fugue of last autumn various he Czech in him can also le two pieces now heard,

his sense of measure mended him. The Ada flowing music, free fro culence of instrument in rounded phrase an riods; more intimate th composer who mused ing serene vistas of staves. Composer and the glowing surfaces, depths of strings in song. Dr. Koussevitzky their askings. The Viv and rhythm; springs f edgy counterpoint; is technical exercise into creation. Mr. Burgin ions ran with him.
keen workmanship was

The piano-pieces in recalled the sketches, h hibition, of Hartmann, tour de force in the music might hardly go f five suggestion of sights gesture, trait, mood; ar graphic rhythm. Mus his illusion by the limit percussive instrument, scoring the "Pictures" tensifies delineation by more various means medium; yet nowhere c modernizes. Under the piano Musorgsky com color. An orchestra b uses a full palette of o images that rose be eyes; like him gives th ty by rhythm; the characterization, deep suggestion, by every t in combination, that yield. The gnome nips comic gait; the whee cart rumble across th fawns and circles abo superior Goldenberg;
sounds pierce the cat gate at Kiev rises in old Russia. Again s orchestral resource, in thy. Dr. Koussevitz Musorgsky's eyes;
rhythm; tingles to characterization; run sonorities. In his tur absorbed in his wil tour de force. To "Pictures" becomes the orchestra.

That Commemorat afternoon was an a For the Seventh Sym is little else than in motion. (Moder

400 Na
900 Na
100 Na
900 Ne
200 Ne
200 Ne
100 Ne
500 Ne
100 Ne
10 Ne
100 Ne
900 Ne
100 NY
100 NY
600 NY
1300 NY
25 NY
100 Ne
3600 Ne
5800 Ne
56000 Ni
59600 Ni
1900 Ni
1000 Ni
1600 Ni
1900 Ni
900 No
2600 No
100 No
200 No
4600 No
300 No
400 No
2800 No
100 No
100 Ind
100 N'r
2800 N'r
50 N'r
10 N'r
600 N'r
800 No
1200 Oh
300 Oh
10 Oh
30 Oh
4100 Oils
900 Oils
1200 Out
1700 Out
100 Ove
600 Pac
4900 Pac
3600 Pac
5200 Pac
1900 Pand
500 Pant
500 Para
400 Park
0600 Penn
300 Penn
3100 Penn
1700 Peon

their reliance upon rhythm as unifying, vitalizing force, might point back to it oftener than they do.) The Seventh Symphony, again, is music unalloyed and absolute. There is no fitting a plausible program to it. Theorizing about it is as contradictory as it is vain. One man's imaginative and emotional reaction to it is as good as another's—and as personal. An introduction deep with tonal mystery and still suspense; a first movement that is a masterful energizing of motifs, a releasing, upswelling progress to this day irresistible; a slow movement in which Beethoven stands apart and sings, alight with musical, not heavy with moral, purpose; a scherzo, too prolix, but fiery or mellow in alternate breaths; a finale that begins in rhythmic energy where the first movement ends; drives on to a whirling ecstasy of motion that music-paper may not quite bear or human Corybantes quite accomplish. From the kernel of the beginning to the frenzy of the end a symphony of rhythm manifold and glorified. Therefore a symphony for Dr. Koussevitzky and the orchestra he has made in his own image. They outdo themselves and none shall say them nay when Beethoven drives.
H. T. P.

NEW ODE SUNG AT SYMPHONY CONCERT

Anniversary Piece by Two Harvard Professors

Dr Koussevitzky Applauded on First
Bow of Season

An ode written at the request of the trustees of the Boston Symphony to commemorate the 50th anniversary of the orchestra was sung at yesterday's Symphony concert by a chorus from the Harvard Glee Club and the Radcliffe Choral Society. The verses are by Robert Hillyer, the musical setting for chorus and orchestra by Edward Burlingame Hill. Both men are well-known members of the faculty of arts and sciences at Harvard.

Dr Koussevitzky, making his first appearance as conductor for the present season, was warmly welcomed by orchestra and audience.

Symphonic Afternoon Of Rhyt

Return of Dr. Koussev Triple Tour de Force An Anniversary Ode

FIRST to the anniversary rit through six months to co alter the face of the Sym Concerts. A week ago, t gan with the return of Sir Georg schel to conduct at the first pair certs in the fiftieth season, even had in the first pair of 1881. Friday, Dr. Koussevitzky escort to his place, made a brief speech honor. Otherwise, through bot certs, the present conductor was n than appreciative listener. Ye afternoon, he returned to his post a confused audience hardly knew re-welcome him. There was gene hearty applause but not the usu to greet his annual return. Son orchestra included—rose eagerly; hesitatingly; many kept their sea confusion of purpose was evide innocent. The Symphony Conce an institution. A semi-centennik not depart from routine without quences. Dr. Koussevitzky sm though he perceived as much.

The whole program of the fir of concerts was commemorati the second one commemorative suffices—a Choral Ode written by Hillyer, set to music by Edward game Hill, both of Harvard, sun choir from the Harvard Glee Cl the Radcliffe Choral Society; hap nalling in an anniversary hour long-standing tie between orchest university. Elsewhere on this pa Mr. Hillyer's verses, di-tinctly ode the seventeenth and the eighteen turies in England cultivated th and understood the term. He l mounting the conductor's stand them out to yesterday's audience l the voice and just phrasing, Professo music spoke for itself; will spea this evening; brought a warm the composer.

Both words and tones were commis sioned work, and commissioned work puzzles the outsider. When the con ductor and trustees of the Symphony Orchestra asked a piece for its annivers ary year of Roussel or Stravinsky, the presumption is that the composer thought of some project simmering in his creative mind; proceeded forthwith to accomplish it. But Mr. Hillyer could hardly have been incubating commemora tive verse or Mr. Hill meditating upon its musical vesturé when each, last spring, received his commission. Pre sumably both began at the beginning, to end in creditable result. The usual fate of such "occasional" pieces is to be banal; the rare fortune of a few excep tions to be distinguished. Mr. Hillyer's verse and Mr. Hill's music are neither the one nor the other.

The Ode, as text, bears witness to a craftsman's skill with the chosen form, a poet's readiness in appropriate inven tion, an opportunist's sense of the pre scribed occasion. Yet in itself or when compared, the poem is no masterpiece. The Ode, as music, similarly attests Mr. Hill's command of the orchestral medium; his sense of appropriate matter well devised; his just regard for ceremonial necessity. Yet it shares no pigeon-hole with his symphony, his tone-poem of lilacs, his two suites of "Stevensoniana." In one respect, indeed, there was clear shortcoming. Mr. Hill is no instinctive, adept or practiced composer for chorus. Musicians less able than is he would have used the Cambridge choirs to more diverse, effective and stimulating pur pose. Perhaps for that reason Dr. Davi son's young men and Mr. Woodworth's young women fell short of their usual mettle. The quality of their voices again praised them; their security with phrase and rhythm, their spirit in per formance did not. Better outcome possi bly this evening, and in other commis sioned pieces that are to strew the year.

For the rest, the program traversed two transcriptions for string choir from Bach made by the Italian, Pick-Mangia galli, heard for the first time at any concerts; Ravel's adaptation for orches tra of Musorgsky's "Pictures at An Ex hibition," tour de force on the part of arranger, conductor and players; Beetho ven's Seventh Symphony, in the per formance with which Dr. Koussevitzky has often swayed his audience. The ori gins of Pick-Mangiagalli's Adagio and Vi vace have already been set forth in this place. Yesterday there was only to listen to them as so much felicitous music. The Italian in him can be exuberant with his medium, as his Fugue of last autumn richly proved. The Czech in him can also strike fire. In the two pieces now heard, his sense of measure mended him. The Ada flowing music, free fro culence of instrument; in rounded phrase an riads; more intimate tl composer who mused; ing serene vistas of staves. Composer and the glowing surfaces, depths of strings in song. Dr. Koussevitzky their askings. The Viv and rhythm; springs f edgy counterpoint; is c technical exercise into creation. Mr. Burgin ions ran with him. J keen workmanship was The piano-pieces in recalled the sketches, i hibition, of Hartmann, tour de force in the music might hardly go f tive suggestion of sights gesture, trait, mood; ar graphic rhythm. Mus his illusion by the limit percussive instrument, scoring the "Pictures" tensifies delineation by more various means medium; yet nowhere c modernizes. Under the piano Musorgsky con color. An orchestra t uses a full palette of ol images that rose be eyes; like him gives th ty by rhythm; the characterization, deep suggestion, by every t in combination, that yield. The gnome nips comic gait; the whee cart rumble across th fawns and circles ab superior Goldenberg; sounds pierce the ca gate at Kiev rises in old Russia. Again s orchestral resource, h thy. Dr. Koussevitz Musorgsky's eyes; rhythm; tingles to characterization; rur sonorities. In his tur absorbed in his wil tour de force. To "Pictures" becomes the orchestra.

That Commemorati afternoon was an a For the Seventh Syn is little else than in motion. (Moder

400 Na
900 Na
100 Na
900 Ne
200 Ne
200 Ne
100 Ne
800 Ne
100 Ne
10 Ne
100 Ne
900 Ne
100 NY
100 NY
600 NY
1300 NY
25 NY
100 Ne
3600 Ne
5800 Ne
56000 Ni
59600 Ni
1800 Ni
1000 Ni
1600 Ni
1900 Ni
900 No
2600 No
100 No
200 No
4800 No
300 No
400 No
2800 No
100 No
100 Ind
100 N
2800 N
50 N
10 N
600 N
800 No
1200 Oh
300 Oh
10 Oh
30 Oh
4100 Olls
900 Olls
1200 Out
1700 Out
100 Ove
600 Pac
4900 Pac
3600 Pac
5200 Pac
1000 Pan
500 Pant
500 Para
400 Park
0600 Penn
300 Penn
3100 Penn
1700 Peon

their reliance upon rhythm as unifying, vitalizing force, might point back to it oftener than they do.) The Seventh Symphony, again, is music unalloyed and absolute. There is no fitting a plausible program to it. Theorizing about it is as contradictory as it is vain. One man's imaginative and emotional re-action to it is as good as another's—and as personal. An introduction deep with tonal mystery and still suspense; a first movement that is a masterful energizing of motifs, a releasing, upswelling progress to this day irresistible; a slow movement in which Beethoven stands apart and sings, alight with musical, not heavy with moral, purpose; a scherzo, too prolix, but fiery or mellow in alternate breaths; a finale that begins in rhythmic energy where the first movement ends; drives on to a whirling ecstasy of motion that music-paper may not quite bear or human Corybantes quite accom plish. From the kernel of the beginning to the frenzy of the end a symphony of rhythm manifold and glorified. There fore a symphony for Dr. Koussevitzky and the orchestra he has made in his own image. They outdo themselves and none shall say them nay when Beethoven drives.
H. T. P.

NEW ODE SUNG AT SYMPHONY CONCERT

Anniversary Piece by Two Harvard Professors

Dr Koussevitzky Applauded on First Bow of Season

An ode written at the request of the trustees of the Boston Symphony to commemorate the 50th anniversary of the orchestra was sung at yesterday's Symphony concert by a chorus from the Harvard Glee Club and the Radcliffe Choral Society. The verses are by Robert Hillyer, the musical setting for chorus and orchestra by Edward Burlingame Hill. Both men are well-known members of the faculty of arts and sciences at Harvard.

Dr Koussevitzky, making his first appearance as conductor for the present season, was warmly welcomed by orchestra and audience.

Symphonic Afternoon Of Rhythm

Return of Dr. Koussevitzky Triple Tour de Force: An Anniversary Ode

FIRST to the anniversary ritual through six months to alter the face of the Symphony Concerts. A week ago, the orchestra began with the return of Sir George Schell to conduct at the first pair of concerts in the fiftieth season, even had in the first pair of 1881. Friday, Dr. Koussevitzky escorted to his place, made a brief speech of honor. Otherwise, through both pairs, the present conductor was more than appreciative listener. Yesterday afternoon, he returned to his post a confused audience hardly knew how to re-welcome him. There was general hearty applause but not the usual to greet his annual return. Some orchestra included—rose eagerly; hesitatingly; many kept their sea of confusion of purpose was evident. The Symphony Concerts are an institution. A semi-centennial not depart from routine without quences. Dr. Koussevitzky smiles though he perceived as much.

The whole program of the first of concerts was commemorative of the second one commemorative of the first—a Choral Ode written by Robert Hill, set to music by Edward Elgar, both of Harvard, sung by the choir from the Harvard Glee Club and the Radcliffe Choral Society; haply, in an anniversary hour, long-standing tie between orchestra and university. Elsewhere on this path, Mr. Hill's verses, distinctly ode formance with which Dr. Koussevitzky the seventeenth and the eighteenth centuries in England cultivated the voice and just phrasing, Professor music spoke for itself; will speak this evening; brought a warm welcome to the composer.

Both words and tones were commissioned work, and commissioned work puzzles the outsider. When the conductor and trustees of the Symphony Orchestra asked a piece for its anniversary year of Roussel or Stravinsky, the presumption is that the composer thought of some project simmering in his creative mind; proceeded forthwith to accomplish it. But Mr. Hill could hardly have been incubating commemorative verse or Mr. Hill meditating upon its musical vesture when each, last spring, received his commission. Presumably both began at the beginning, to end in creditable result. The usual fate of such "occasional" pieces is to be banal; the rare fortune of a few exceptions to be distinguished. Mr. Hill's verse and Mr. Hill's music are neither the one nor the other.

The Ode, as text, bears witness to a craftsman's skill with the chosen form, a poet's readiness in appropriate invention, an opportunist's sense of the prescribed occasion. Yet in itself or when compared, the poem is no masterpiece. The Ode, as music, similarly attests Mr. Hill's command of the orchestral medium; his sense of appropriate matter well devised; his just regard for ceremonial necessity. Yet it shares no pigeon-hole with his symphony, his tone-poem of lilacs, his two suites of "Stevensoniana." In one respect, indeed, there was clear shortcoming. Mr. Hill is no instinctive, adept or practiced composer for chorus. Musicians less able than he would have used the Cambridge choirs to more diverse, effective and stimulating purpose. Perhaps for that reason Dr. Davidson's young men and Mr. Woodworth's young women fell short of their usual mettle. The quality of their voices again praised them; their security with phrase and rhythm, their spirit in performance did not. Better outcome possibly this evening, and in other commissioned pieces that are to strew the year.

For the rest, the program traversed two transcriptions for string choir from Bach made by the Italian, Pick-Mangiagalli, heard for the first time at any concerts; Ravel's adaptation for orchestra of Musorgsky's "Pictures at an Exhibition," tour de force on the part of arranger, conductor and players; Beethoven's Seventh Symphony, in the performance with which Dr. Koussevitzky has often swayed his audience. The origins of Pick-Mangiagalli's Adagio and Vivace have already been set forth in this mounting the conductor's stand place. Yesterday there was only to listen them out to yesterday's audience and to them as so much felicitous music. The voice and just phrasing, Professor music spoke for itself; will speak this evening; brought a warm welcome to the composer.

his sense of measure and style commended him. The Adagio is a warm and flowing music, free from any Italian succulence of instrumental song; Bach-like in rounded phrase and full-spaced periods; more intimate than stately; of the composer who mused as he wrote, opening serene vistas of beauty along the glowing surfaces, the transparent depths of strings in such sustained song. Dr. Koussevitzky's choir gave back their askings. The Vivace sharpens tone and rhythm; springs forward in spare, edgy counterpoint; is of Bach whipping technical exercise into spirited musical creation. Mr. Burgin and his companions ran with him. Pick-Mangiagalli's keen workmanship was also spur.

The piano-pieces in which Musorgsky recalled the sketches, in posthumous exhibition, of Hartmann, his friend, are a tour de force in themselves. Piano-music might hardly go farther in delineative suggestion of sights, sounds, speech, gesture, trait, mood; and all by dint of graphic rhythm. Musorgsky wrought his illusion by the limited means of that percussive instrument, the piano. Ravel, scoring the "Pictures" for orchestra, intensifies delineation by the larger, richer, more various means of a multiple medium; yet nowhere distorts or unduly modernizes. Under the limitations of the piano Musorgsky composed in water color. An orchestra before him, Ravel uses a full palette of oils. He evokes the images that rose before Musorgsky's eyes; like him gives them musical vitality by rhythm; then sharpens the characterization, deepens the graphic suggestion, by every timbre, in itself or in combination, that an orchestra may yield. The gnome nips along in uncanny, comic gait; the wheels of the peasant-cart rumble across the plain; Schmuyle fawns and circles about the portly and superior Goldenberg; strange lights and sounds pierce the catacombs; the great gate at Kiev rises in tonal apotheosis of old Russia. Again a tour de force of orchestral resource, imagination, sympathy. Dr. Koussevitzky also sees with Musorgsky's eyes; feels his graphic rhythm; tingles to Ravel's colors and sonorities. In his turn, with an orchestra absorbed in his will, achieves a third tour de force. To return to these "Pictures" becomes the fiftieth year of the orchestra.

W ODE SUNG AT YMPHONY CONCERT

niversary Piece by Two Harvard Professors

Koussevitzky Applauded on First Bow of Season

ode written at the request of the trustees of the Boston Symphony to commemorate the 50th anniversary of the orchestra was sung at yesterday's phony concert by a chorus from Harvard Glee Club and the Radcliffe Choral Society. The verses are by Robert Hill, the musical setting by Edward Elgar. Both men are well-known members of the faculty of arts and sciences at Harvard. Dr. Koussevitzky, making his first appearance as conductor for the present season, was warmly welcomed by orchestra and audience.

Mr Hillyer recited his ode to the audience before it was sung by the chorus. It runs as follows:

Silence, yield! We lay too long
Thrall to thee and strange to song;
Now our fifty singing years
Have flown beyond the reach of time,
And Earth's reverberant echoes climb
To sweet accord with her companion stars.

Windy flute of pastoral themes,
Call to fold our wandering dreams;
Harp, remember leafy light
That danced above our younger days;
And violins of graver phrase,
Oh, follow love with voices down the night!

Bannered horn of golden doom
Where the clouded bastions loom,
Flaming dark with ancient wars,
With nobler music now prevail,
While native trumpets mildly hail
The trumpets calling clear from farther shores.

When these many songs be done,
Merge their harmonies in one!
Mortal past and future yearn
For music vaster than their own;
The Orphic chord, the final tone,
Before the silence whither all return.

One cannot expect of verses and music written to honor a particular occasion more than that they shall be correct in form and dignified in manner. The history of both poetry and music offers only the rarest instances when a masterpiece has been produced by such a request as that made to Mr Hillyer and Mr Hill.

Of their joint contribution to the commemoration of the Boston Symphony's anniversary, then, it is only necessary to say that it was above rather than below the level struck by most such occasional pieces in the past. Mr Hill's music belong more obviously to the 20th century than do Mr Hillyer's verses, which might almost have been written in 17th century England.

The concert began with two effective arrangements by Pick-Mangiagalli of preludes by J. S. Bach, scored for string orchestra. The first of these is in D minor, based on the ninth prelude in the Bach Gesellschaft edition of the organ preludes and fugues. The second is the prelude of the third partita, in E major, originally for violin alone. For this the arranger has supplied other parts in Bach's manner, retaining the first violin part as Bach wrote it. These arrangements, performed yesterday for the first time in public, will be welcomed by those who believe it desirable to make more of Bach's music playable by a modern orchestra.

They are open, however, to the obvious objection that all such transcription must face, of taking an unwarrantable liberty with the work of a dead master. Pick-Mangiagalli has done his task in a competent and musicianly manner. But would it not be preferable to have an organist play the D minor prelude, not severed from the fugue which ought to follow; and a violinist play the whole partita if these numbers are to be included on a Symphony program.

Another arrangement on yesterday's program, the now familiar one by Ravel of Musorgsky's piano pieces "Pictures at an Exhibition," is worked out with such astonishing brilliance and such fidelity to the spirit of the original that one is compelled to except it from the foregoing strictures. In this number Dr Koussevitzky, as on several previous occasions, was yesterday at the height of his powers, conducting with the utmost eloquence and verve.

In Beethoven's Seventh Symphony, however, conductor and orchestra were not at their best. In the first movement their noisy and lumbering performance was very disappointing. Of this music d'Indy has said that it should be "like the song of a bird." But yesterday the coarse tone of the strings and the painful overstraining of all strong accents did violence to both the letter and the spirit of a masterpiece.

The other movements fared somewhat better. The tempo in the famous allegretto, for instance, kept to the proper pace and avoided the misplaced languors of some now fashionable interpretations. The finale was well played. No doubt the old excuse that the season has just begun is now in order.

Next week the French composer Roussel will be present to hear the first performances anywhere of his new Symphony in G minor, one of the several important works commissioned by the Boston Symphony for its anniversary season. Partly, no doubt, in his honor, the rest of the program is from French composers. The other numbers are to be Berlioz' "Benvenuto Cellini" overture, Debussy's "La Mer," and Ravel's "La Valse."

P. R.

The Boston Symphony

The first of the compositions written in honor of the fiftieth season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra appeared on the program of the concerts of Oct. 17 and 18. This was an Ode for mixed chorus and orchestra composed by Edward Burlingame Hill to a poem written for the occasion by Robert Hillyer. The singers were from the Harvard Glee Club and the Radcliffe Choral Society.

Another work which had its first performance at the Friday afternoon concert was Riccardo Pick-Mangiagalli's arrangement for string orchestra of two Preludes of J. S. Bach. The symphony of the week was Beethoven's Seventh, and the program closed with the Moussorgsky-Ravel "Pictures at an Exhibition."

Mr. Hillyer read to the audience his verses, which follow:

Silence, yield! We lay too long
Thrall to thee and strange to song;
Now our fifty singing years
Have flown beyond the reach of time,
And Earth's reverberant echoes climb
To sweet accord with her companion stars.

Windy flute of pastoral themes,
Call to fold our wandering dreams;
Harp, remember leafy light
That danced above our younger days;
And violins of graver phrase,
Oh, follow love with voices down the night!

Bannered horn of golden doom
Where the clouded bastions loom,
Flaming dark with ancient wars,
With nobler music now prevail,
While native trumpets mildly hail
The trumpets calling clear from farther shores.

When these many songs be done,
Merge their harmonies in one!
Mortal past and future yearn
For music vaster than their own;
The Orphic chord, the final tone,
Before the silence whither all return.

The music provided by Mr. Hill was well mated to these verses. It will be observed that Mr. Hillyer's poem has the virtue of brevity, and contents itself with naming only five of the instruments of the orchestra, rather than giving a complete catalogue in the classic style. Mr. Hill, though he employs a full orchestra, has not been inspired by the verses to become diffuse. There is a brief prelude, after which the full chorus sings the first verse. Then women's voices sing the second verse, men's voices the third and their combined tones are heard again in the fourth. Everything is well put together, the accents are precisely placed, and the flutes, violins and so on speak up when their names are called. The whole affair is over in a short time, and nobody the worse for it. Yet we feel that Mr. Hill's "Lilacs" and his Symphony in B flat will in the long run reflect more honor on the Boston orchestra and on their distinguished composer than this work.

The first of the Bach preludes here transcribed is that in D minor, preceding the D minor Fugue No. 9 for organ in the Bach Gesellschaft Edition. The second is the Prelude of the Third Partita, in E major. These arrangements brought joy to at least one listener. We do not feel the horror professed by some at seeing the hand of the transcriber laid on the scores of Bach; provided due respect is preserved for the spirit of the original, as it is in this instance. The first Prelude is a sustained lyric delight, and the second is vivacious and compelling. The string choirs played them superbly, and Dr. Koussevitzky was most solicitous for every tonal loveliness, and for exquisite balance—except that he allowed the first violins to lay on a little too heavily in the second of the preludes.

The symphony was as meticulously directed and as brilliantly played as if it had just been discovered. There was brilliance, too, in the Moussorgsky-Ravel item; but there was also some uncertainty in the wind.

Dr. Koussevitzky, who was making his first appearance of the jubilee year as conductor, was received with the customary obeisances, and presided with his invariable energy.

L. A. S.

Early Season at the Bostonian Concert Halls

Koussevitzky's First Program, at the Bostonian Concert Halls

Today and Saturday Dr. Koussevitzky addresses himself to the anniversary season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Sir George come and won his laurels. sent conductor makes his first. Before leaving Boston he planned that the centenary season might well be (he was concerned) with a new one work composed for the occasion. To Professor he confided his intention—a commemorative piece. This week's program stands as "Fiftieth Anniversary of the Boston Symphony Orchestra," poem (also of the University), by B. Hill. The work is orchestral. For it a hundred the Harvard Glee Club Choral Society, trained by Mr. Woodworth, will Professor Hill gives as "absolutely nothing" piece, but lets slip the

Mr. Hillyer recited his ode to the audience before it was sung by the chorus. It runs as follows:

Silence, yield! We lay too long
Thrall to thee and strange to song;
Now our fifty singing years
Have flown beyond the reach of time,
And Earth's reverberant echoes climb
To sweet accord with her companion stars.

Windy flute of pastoral themes,
Call to fold our wandering dreams;
Harp, remember leafy light
That danced above our younger days;
And violins of graver phrase,
Oh, follow love with voices down the night!

Bannered horn of golden doom
Where the clouded bastions loom,
Flaming dark with ancient wars,
With nobler music now prevail,
While native trumpets mildly hall
The trumpets calling clear from farther shores.

When these many songs be done,
Merge their harmonies in one!
Mortal past and future yearn
For music vaster than their own;
The Orphic chord, the final tone,
Before the silence whither all return.

One cannot expect of verses and music written to honor a particular occasion more than that they shall be correct in form and dignified in manner. The history of both poetry and music offers only the rarest instances when a masterpiece has been produced by such a request as that made to Mr. Hillyer and Mr. Hill.

Of their joint contribution to the commemoration of the Boston Symphony's anniversary, then, it is only necessary to say that it was above rather than below the level struck by most such occasional pieces in the past. Mr. Hill's music belong more obviously to the 20th century than do Mr. Hillyer's verses, which might almost have been written in 17th century England.

The concert began with two effective arrangements by Pick-Mangiagalli of preludes by J. S. Bach, scored for string orchestra. The first of these is in D minor, based on the ninth prelude in the Bach Gesellschaft edition of the organ preludes and fugues. The second is the prelude of the third partita, in E major, originally for violin alone. For this the arranger has supplied other parts in Bach's manner, retaining the first violin part as Bach wrote it. These arrangements, performed yesterday for the first time in public, will be welcomed by those who believe it desirable to make more of Bach's music playable by a modern orchestra.

They are open, however, to the obvious objection that all such transcription must face, of taking an unwarrantable liberty with the work of a dead master. Pick-Mangiagalli has done his task in a competent and musicianly manner. But would it not be preferable to have an organist play the D minor prelude, not severed from the fugue which ought to follow; and a violinist play the whole partita if these numbers are to be included on a Symphony program.

Another arrangement on yesterday's program, the now familiar one by Ravel of Musorgsky's piano pieces "Pictures at an Exhibition," is worked out with such astonishing brilliance and such fidelity to the spirit of the original that one is compelled to except it from the foregoing strictures. In this number Dr. Koussevitzky, as on several previous occasions, was yesterday at the height of his powers, conducting with the utmost eloquence and verve.

In Beethoven's Seventh Symphony, however, conductor and orchestra were not at their best. In the first movement their noisy and lumbering performance was very disappointing. Of this music d'Indy has said that it should be "like the song of a bird." But yesterday the coarse tone of the strings and the painful overstraining of all strong accents did violence to both the letter and the spirit of a masterpiece.

The other movements fared somewhat better. The tempo in the famous allegretto, for instance, kept to the proper pace and avoided the misplaced languors of some now fashionable interpretations. The finale was well played. No doubt the old excuse that the season has just begun is now in order.

Next week the French composer Roussel will be present to hear the first performances anywhere of his new Symphony in G minor, one of the several important works commissioned by the Boston Symphony for its anniversary season. Partly, no doubt, in his honor, the rest of the program is from French composers. The other numbers are to be Berlioz' "Benvenuto Cellini" overture, Debussy's "La Mer," and Ravel's "La Valse."

The Boston Symphony

The first of the compositions written in honor of the fiftieth season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra appeared on the program of the concerts of Oct. 17 and 18. This was an Ode for mixed chorus and orchestra composed by Edward Burlingame Hill to a poem written for the occasion by Robert Hillyer. The singers were from the Harvard Glee Club and the Radcliffe Choral Society.

Another work which had its first performance at the Friday afternoon concert was Riccardo Pick-Mangiagalli's arrangement for string orchestra of two Preludes of J. S. Bach. The symphony of the week was Beethoven's Seventh, and the program closed with the Moussorgsky-Ravel "Pictures at an Exhibition."

Mr. Hillyer read to the audience his verses, which follow:

Silence, yield! We lay too long
Thrall to thee and strange to song;
Now our fifty singing years
Have flown beyond the reach of time,
And Earth's reverberant echoes climb
To sweet accord with her companion stars.

Windy flute of pastoral themes,
Call to fold our wandering dreams;
Harp, remember leafy light
That danced above our younger days;
And violins of graver phrase,
Oh, follow love with voices down the night!

Bannered horn of golden doom
Where the clouded bastions loom,
Flaming dark with ancient wars,
With nobler music now prevail,
While native trumpets mildly hall
The trumpets calling clear from farther shores.

When these many songs be done,
Merge their harmonies in one!
Mortal past and future yearn
For music vaster than their own;
The Orphic chord, the final tone,
Before the silence whither all return.

The music provided by Mr. Hill, well mated to these verses. It will be observed that Mr. Hillyer's poem is the virtue of brevity, and contents self with naming only five of the instruments of the orchestra, rather than giving a complete catalogue the classic style. Mr. Hill, though employs a full orchestra, has not been inspired by the verses to become diffuse. There is a brief prelude, and which the full chorus sings the first verse. Then women's voices sing the second verse, men's voices the third and their combined tones are heard again in the fourth. Everything is put together, the accents are precisely placed, and the flutes, violins so on speak up when their names are called. The whole affair is over a short time, and nobody will be for it. Yet we feel that Mr. Hill's "Lilacs" and his Symphony in B will in the long run reflect more honor on the Boston orchestra and their distinguished composer than any work.

The first of the Bach preludes transcribed is that in D minor, preceding the D minor Fugue No. 9 in the Bach Gesellschaft edition. The second is the Prelude of Third Partita, in E major. These arrangements brought joy to at least one listener. We do not feel the honor professed by some at seeing the handwriting of the transcriber laid on the score of Bach; provided due respect is preserved for the spirit of original, as it is in this instance. The first Prelude is a sustained lyric delight, and the second is vivacious and compelling. The string choirs played them superbly, and Dr. Koussevitzky was most solicitous for every tonal loveliness, and for exquisite balance—except that he allowed the first violins to lay on a little too heavily in the second of the preludes.

The symphony was as meticulously directed and as brilliantly played as if it had just been discovered. There was brilliance, too, in the Moussorgsky-Ravel item; but there was also some uncertainty in the wind.

Dr. Koussevitzky, who was making his first appearance of the jubilee year as conductor, was received with the customary obeisances, and presided with his invariable energy.

L. A. S.

Early Season In Bostonian Concert Halls

Koussevitzky's First Program, Recitals Near and Far, Other Prospects

ON Friday and Saturday Dr. Koussevitzky addresses himself to the anniversary season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Sir George Henschel has come and won his laurels. Now the present conductor makes his festive beginnings. Before leaving Boston last spring he planned that the concerts of the fiftieth season might well be a program containing one work composed specifically for the occasion. To Professor Hill of Harvard he confided his intention; requested a commemorative piece.

Thus upon this week's program stands "An Ode for the Fiftieth Anniversary of the Boston Symphony Orchestra," poem by Robert Hillyer (also of the University), music by Edward B. Hill. The work is choral as well as orchestral. For it a hundred members of the Harvard Glee Club and the Radcliffe Choral Society, trained by Dr. Davison and Mr. Woodworth, will perform the choir. Professor Hill gives assurance that there is "absolutely nothing to say" about the piece, but lets slip the information that it is seven minutes in length; that the respective verses are to be sung by full chorus, by women's chorus, by men's chorus; that there are no solos. He further says that, to make the Ode entirely new at the time of first performance, Mr. Hillyer's poem will not be released for print until it has been heard at the concert of Friday afternoon. For once, the thrills of novelty may not be even mildly anticipated.

Yet another item of the program comes to first orchestral hearing anywhere. The reader probably infers transcription, and rightly so. For orchestral transcription from the works of the great Johann Sebastian goes on apace. This time the Italian, Pick-Mangiagalli, remembered at these concerts for an exceedingly musical Prelude and Fugue played a year ago, has laid hands upon the chief among the Bachs. Out of two works of diverse kind he has drawn movements for a new grouping of his own. The program announces simply, "Two Preludes—Adagio, Vivace, arranged for String Orchestra."

The Adagio proves to be in E minor, the Vivace in E major. The Adagio is taken from a familiar Prelude and Fugue for Organ in D minor, transposed (as well as transcribed) into E minor, to be companion-piece to the Vivace which remains in its own key. Indeed, this is probably not the first time the little piece has been transcribed. Schweitzer argues that "from its construction and general style we may draw the conclusion that it was written for the harpsichord." Bach took this harpsichord-prelude, joined it with his own transcription for organ of the second movement of his Violin Sonata in G minor; then published the two under the caption above noted. Thus he himself has given ample precedent for further transcription. Pick-Mangiagalli has taken a leaf out of Bach's own book in yet another sense. For the arranger's companion-piece also comes from one of the composer's violin-sonatas (or partitas), the one most played by violinists, in E major. Any "Kreisler-fan" will have heard it; in fact all violinists keep it in their active repertory.

Organists are wont to play this Prelude with great solidity and majestic dignity. Bach gave no tempo-indication. Pick-Mangiagalli has labelled it "Adagio," and the disposition of the orchestral voices is such that a lyric mood fairly flows from the printed page. In the Vivace, the music retains all the brightness and zest of the violin-piece. The score was published during the present year, 1930. A. H. M.

A CRUI

WHERE THE T

world, Altered with ation
the pped onors coninary those most er of heard realize y, to earth-o redents

y renified over ound n one

Paul,
d, and stle.
physincient aid to and of r than

March
a. m. shorter day.
later week in

Third Programme

FRIDAY AFTERNOON, OCTOBER 24, at 2.30 o'clock

SATURDAY EVENING, OCTOBER 25, at 8.15 o'clock

Rameau Ballet Suite (Edited by Felix Mottl)

- I. Menuet from "Platée."
- II. Musette from "Les Fêtes d'Hébé."
- III. Tambourin from "Les Fêtes d'Hébé."

Roussel Symphony in G minor, Op. 42

- I. Allegro vivo.
- II. Adagio.
- III. Vivace.
- IV. Allegro con spirito.

(First Performance: Composed for the 50th Anniversary of the Boston Symphony Orchestra)

Debussy "La Mer," Trois Esquisses Symphoniques

- I. De l'aube à midi sur la mer (From Dawn till Noon on the Ocean).
- II. Jeux de Vagues (Play of the Waves).
- III. Dialogue du Vent et de la Mer (Dialogue of Wind and Sea).

Ravel "La Valse," Choregraphic Poem

There will be an intermission after the symphony

The works to be played at these concerts may be seen in the Allen A. Brown Music Collection of the Boston Public Library one week before the concert

Yet another item of the program comes to first orchestral hearing anywhere. The reader probably infers transcription, and rightly so. For orchestral transcription from the works of the great Johann Sebastian goes on apace. This time the Italian, Pick-Mangiagalli, remembered at these concerts for an exceedingly musical Prelude and Fugue played a year ago, has laid hands upon the chief among the Bachs. Out of two works of diverse kind he has drawn movements for a new grouping of his own. The program announces simply, "Two Preludes—Adagio, Vivace, arranged for String Orchestra."

arranged for String Orchestra.
The Adagio proves to be in E minor, the Vivace in E major. The Adagio is taken from a familiar Prelude and Fugue for Organ in D minor, transposed (as well as transcribed) into E minor, to be companion-piece to the Vivace which remains in its own key. Indeed, this is probably not the first time the little piece has been transcribed. Schweitzer argues that "from its construction and general style we may draw the conclusion that it was written for the harpsichord." Bach took this harpsichord-prelude, joined it with his own transcription for organ of the second movement of his Violin Sonata in G minor; then published the two under the caption above noted. Thus he himself has given ample precedent for further transcription. Plick-Mangiagalli has taken a leaf out of Bach's own book in yet another sense. For the arranger's companion-piece also comes from one of the composer's violin-sonatas (or partitas), the one most played by violinists, in E major. Any "Kreisler-fan" will have heard it; in fact all violinists keep it in their active repertory.

Organists are wont to play this Prelude with great solidity and majestic dignity. Bach gave no tempo-indication. Pick-Mangialagalli has labelled it "Adagio," and the disposition of the orchestral voices is such that a lyric mood fairly flows from the printed page. In the Vivace, the music retains all the brightness and zest of the violin-piece. The score was published during the present year, 1930. A. H. M.

A CRUI

WHERE THE Tnally

Tnally
world,
A, nited with ation
the pped onors coninary those

Almost er of heard realize y, to earth-o re-
dents ey renified
over round

n one

Paul,
4, and istle.
physincient aid to and of

r than

March
a. m. shorter day.
later
week in

FIFTIETH SEASON, NINETEEN HUNDRED THIRTY AND THIRTY-ONE

FRIDAY AFTERNOON, OCTOBER 24, at 2.30 o'clock

SATURDAY EVENING, OCTOBER 25, at 8.15 o'clock

Rameau Ballet Suite (Edited by Felix Mottl)

- I. Menuet from "Platée."
- II. Musette from "Les Fêtes d'Hébé."
- III. Tambourin from "Les Fêtes d'Hébé."

Roussel Symphony in G minor, Op. 42

- I. Allegro vivo.
- II. Adagio.
- III. Vivace.
- IV. Allegro con spirito.

(First Performance: Composed for the 50th Anniversary of the Boston Symphony Orchestra)

Debussy "La Mer," Trois Esquisses Symphoniques

- I. De l'aube à midi sur la mer (From Dawn till Noon on the Ocean).
- II. Jeux de Vagues (Play of the Waves).
- III. Dialogue du Vent et de la Mer (Dialogue of Wind and Sea).

Ravel "La Valse," Choregraphic Poem

There will be an intermission after the symphony

The works to be played at these concerts may be seen in the Allen A. Brown Music Collection of the Boston Public Library one week before the concert

information that length; that the be sung by full chorus, by men's no solos. He fur the Ode entirely performance, Mr. be released for heard at the con For once, the th be even mildly a Yet another ite to first orchestra reader probably rightly so. For from the works bastian goes on Italian, Pick-Ma these concerts fo Prelude and Fu has laid hands u Bachs. Out of t he has drawn mot ing of his own. simply, "Two Pi arranged for Str The Adagio pi the Vivace in E taken from a fan for Organ in D n as transcribed) in panion-piece to th in its own key. not the first th been transcribe that "from its c style we may dra was written for took this harps with his own tr the second moven in G minor; then the caption abov self has given a ther transcriptio taken a leaf out yet another sen companion-piece the composer's tas), the one mos E major. Any heard it; in fact their active reper Organists are ude with great s nity. Bach gav Pick-Manglagalli and the disposit voices is such t flows from the Vivace, the musi ness and zest of score was publi year, 1930.

SECOND IN JUBILEE OF SYMPHONY

Harvard and Radcliffe Singers Heard in Hill's Ode

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

The rites with which the Boston Symphony Orchestra is marking the beginning of its 50th season will continue. At the concerts of last Friday and Saturday there was the first conductor, Sir George Henschel, leading the orchestra through what was virtually a repetition of its first programme. This week Dr. Koussevitzky is in command, and among the pieces offered is an Ode written and composed especially for this golden jubilee by Robert Hillyer and Edward Burlingame Hill.

VERSES READ AND SUNG

Before the performance of this Ode yesterday Mr. Hillyer, escorted to the platform by Dr. Koussevitzky, recited his verses which later were sung by a chorus drawn from the Harvard Glee Club and the Radcliffe Choral Society. Since Mr. Hillyer is an assistant professor in English at Harvard and Mr. Hill the head of the department of music in that university, Cambridge could consider itself well represented. Mr. Hill's music, made by a practiced hand, will probably not escape the oblivion that awaits most occasional uses and personally around the world, leave the United incisco, the city with beautiful location o many decades the alifornia. Outstripped for population honors San Francisco con- dity of extraordinary s, especially to those astern States. an Francisco, almost ince the disaster of ave probably heard to make them realize while in the city, to and not of the earth- worth while to re- ost of the residents d "Frisco." They re- reap and undignified that looks out over for a cruise around they have chosen one

bservant tizen

ompanion of St. Paul, ne Third Gospel, and Acts of the Apostle. o have been a physi- er, and some ancient existence are said to by him. int of painters and of egins rising later than on time. middle of next March rising before 6 a. m. re now getting shorter e minute each day. begin appearing later the second week in

† † †

Third Programme

FRIDAY AFTERNOON, OCTOBER 24, at 2.30 o'clock
SATURDAY EVENING, OCTOBER 25, at 8.15 o'clock

Rameau Ballet Suite (Edited by Felix Mottl)
I. Menuet from "Platée."
II. Musette from "Les Fêtes d'Hébé."
III. Tambourin from "Les Fêtes d'Hébé."

Roussel Symphony in G minor, Op. 42
I. Allegro vivo.
II. Adagio.
III. Vivace.
IV. Allegro con spirito.
(First Performance: Composed for the 50th Anniversary of the Boston Symphony Orchestra)

Debussy "La Mer," Trois Esquisses Symphoniques
I. De l'aube à midi sur la mer (From Dawn till Noon on the Ocean).
II. Jeux de Vagues (Play of the Waves).
III. Dialogue du Vent et de la Mer (Dialogue of Wind and Sea).

Ravel "La Valse," Choregraphic Poem

There will be an intermission after the symphony

The works to be played at these concerts may be seen in the Allen A. Brown Music Collection of the Boston Public Library one week before the concert

information that length; that the be sung by fu chorus, by men's no solos. He fur the Ode entirely performance, Mr. be released for heard at the con For once, the th be even mildly at Yet another ite to first orchestra reader probably rightly so. For from the works bastian goes on Italian, Pick-Mar these concerts fo Prelude and Fu has laid hands u Bachs. Out of t he has drawn mo ing of his own. simply, "Two Pr arranged for Stri

The Adagio pr the Vivace in E taken from a fan for Organ in D r as transcribed) i panion-piece to th in its own key. not the first t been transcribe that "from its c style we may dra was written for took this harps with his own tr the second moven in G minor; then the caption abov self has given a ther transcription taken a leaf out yet another sen companion-piece the composer's tas), the one mos E major. Any " heard it; in fact their active reper Organists are ude with great s nity. Bach gav Pick-Manglagalli and the disposit voices is such t flows from the Vivace, the musi ness and zest of score was publi year, 1930.

SECOND JUBILEE SYM

Harvard and Singers Hill's

BY WARREN ST

The rites with v Symphony Orchest beginning of its 50t tinuc. At the conce and Saturday there ductor, Sir George the orchestra throu tually a repetition gramme. This w vitzky is in commar pieces offered is an composed especially jubilee by Robert H Burlingame Hill.

VERSES REA

Before the perfor yesterday Mr. Hilly platform by Dr. K his verses which lat chorus drawn from Club and the Radel Since Mr. Hillyer is fessor in English a Hill the head of music in that uni could consider itself Mr. Hill's music, ticed hand, will p the oblivion that awaits most occasional pieces, but for the moment it gave much pleasure; it caressed or stirred the ear and it seemed well fitted to the lines that gave it birth. These last, herewith reproduced, may speak for themselves:

Bannered horn of golden doom
Where the clouded bastions loom,
Flaming dark with ancient wars,
With nobler mien now prevail.
While native trumpets mildly hail
The trumpets calling clear from farther shores.

When these many songs be done,
Merge their harmonies in one!
Mortal past and future yearn
For music vaster than their own;
The Orphic chord, the final tone,
Before the silence whither all return.

Silence, yield! We lay too long
Thrall to thee and strange to song;
Now our fifty singing years
Have flown beyond the reach of time.
And Earth's reverberant echoes climb
To sweet accord with her companion stars.
Windy flute of pastoral themes,
Call to fold our wandering dreams;
Harp, remember, leafy light
That danced above our younger days;
And violins of graver phrase,
Oh, follow love with voices down the night!

Called to the Stage

After the performance of this Ode yesterday Mr. Hill was summoned to the stage by Dr. Koussevitzky that he might acknowledge in person the warm applause that his music had provoked. Mr. Hill is primarily a composer for orchestra but he has written here gracefully and effectively for voices. More mature singers would perhaps have done his music fuller justice.

Familiar matter made most of the balance of yesterday's programme though there came as opening number a pair of preludes of Bach, the one for organ, the other for violin, transcribed for string orchestra by Pick-Manglagalli. These arrangements valuably extend the range of orchestral Bach and they make yet another vehicle through which Dr. Koussevitzky can display the tonal and technical virtues of his string choir.

Ravel and Moussorgsky

Upon these preludes followed yesterday the Seventh Symphony of Beethoven and in a performance that was in many respects noteworthy. In particular was the Allegretto, one of the finest of all of Beethoven's flights of fancy, beautifully and illuminatingly played.

But no matter how signally Dr. Koussevitzky and his men may triumph with the classics it is in contemporary music that they become truly inimitable. The final number yesterday was Moussorgsky's "Pictures at an Exhibition," in the more than masterly orchestration of Ravel, and the performance of this so graphic music gave authority to the claim made by Dr. Koussevitzky in his address of last week that the orchestra is now "at its zenith of zeniths."

Third Programme

FRIDAY AFTERNOON, OCTOBER 24, at 2.30 o'clock

SATURDAY EVENING, OCTOBER 25, at 8.15 o'clock

Rameau Ballet Suite (Edited by Felix Mottl)
I. Menuet from "Platée."
II. Musette from "Les Fêtes d'Hébé."
III. Tambourin from "Les Fêtes d'Hébé."

Roussel Symphony in G minor, Op. 42
I. Allegro vivo.
II. Adagio.
III. Vivace.
IV. Allegro con spirito.
(First Performance: Composed for the 50th Anniversary of the Boston Symphony Orchestra)

Debussy "La Mer," Trois Esquisses Symphoniques
I. De l'aube à midi sur la mer (From Dawn till Noon on the Ocean).
II. Jeux de Vagues (Play of the Waves).
III. Dialogue du Vent et de la Mer (Dialogue of Wind and Sea).

Ravel "La Valse," Choregraphic Poem

There will be an intermission after the symphony

The works to be played at these concerts may be seen in the Allen A. Brown Music Collection of the Boston Public Library one week before the concert

Down Distances He Looks

Obverse of Medal Struck in Paris to mark Roussel's Sixtieth Birthday (1929)

The Sea Sang to Him

Reverse of Medal Struck in Paris to mark Roussel's Sixtieth Birthday (1929)

By Courtesy of The Composer

Symphony in D-flat

I

II

III

IV

Boston 12 October 1930

Arthur Roussel

MUSIC

contemplative dramatic in its apuntal treatement by its lopment does rable expecta-low. Here is ty. Mark also rk, how firmly dazzles by its mphony there neity of musi-had not been oser's previous

Roussel Writes Out the Principal Motif in Each Movement of His New Symphony of the finest ebussy's Three fact that Mr.

years an ofvy has never usical sugges-ly crossed the so deep-sea they retired felt in houses ds.) Perhaps n too gentle:
the sky and But each comwn ocean. To id melancholy id Milton it impressed bene. Now Deen as he saw ere he found not sufficient-could be savof the second at its sunlit had his own vidly what it o are pleased ys an ironist, r, that in "La the expense rs, especially akewise piffle!
nly would not to "parody" igods at the
The Viennese le the greater i be rememed the music on the stage.
ert; one that ussel, for ex-to say, and tritter away

ated tonight.
ek will beature by an clausump. Note the fugue in the slow movement—an unusual place to find a fugue—a fugue that is not merely a perfunctory scholastic section to serve by anonymous composer (first performance); Symphony by Nobokov (first time in the United States; Tchaikovsky's Symphony No. 4.

By Courtesy of The Composer

Max Kluge, Former Symphony Member, Dies Abroad

Trans. Oct. 9, 1930

Word has been received from Germany of the death of Max Kluge, a former member of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. He enjoyed the unique distinction of having played under Henschel, Gericke, Nikisch, Paur, Muck, Max Fiedler, Rabaud, Monteux and Koussevitzky; in fact, he was the only member who had played under every conductor the orchestra has had.

Mr. and Mrs. Kluge had been visiting relatives and friends in Germany and Switzerland, and he passed away in Munich on Sept. 17 after a short illness.

MUSIC

SYMPHONY CONCERT

By PHILIP HALE Oct. 25, 1930

The third concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Koussevitzky, conductor, took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. It had been announced that the opening number would be the overture to Berlioz's "Benvenuto Cellini." At the last moment it was put aside, to the regret of many. A Ballet Suite arranged by Felix Mottl, from Rameau's "Plater" (menuet) and "Les Fetes d'Hebe" (Musette and Tambourin) was substituted. There was a certain fitness in the selection, for Debussy's fondness for Rameau is well known—he was never weary of urging young composers to hark back to that French composer and he would have been pleased to see his name associated with Rameau on a program.

Then followed Albert Roussel's new Symphony in G Minor composed expressly for the 50th anniversary of the orchestra; Debussy's "La Mer" and Ravel's "La Valse." Mr. Roussel was present. He acknowledged modestly the hearty applause of orchestra and audience that followed the performance of his symphony. This applause was by no means only courtesy; the composer richly deserved it. The symphony, it is true, is a piece of occasion, but it bids fair to be a piece of many occasions. Eight of his more important symphonic works had been performed in Boston since 1912, six of them at concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra; no one of them excited such genuine admiration on the part of the general public or even among musicians, who, gladly acknowledging the technical skill of Roussel his contrapuntal and harmonic mastery, his knowledge of orchestration, his high ideals, yet found much of his music purely cerebral, lacking warmth, emotional inspiration, sensuous color and ravishing tints.

But the Roussel of the symphony seems to be another man. This symphony has frankly a festival character. More than one page, especially in the Scherzo and the Finale, is a triumphant, exultant hymn, chanting sonorously the glorious life of the orchestra now in its full and splendid maturity, but as a Festival Symphony, it is as free from bombast as it is from that which by its obviousness would appeal to those delighting chiefly in the thunder of the captains and the shouting.

Again Mr. Roussel displays, as he has displayed before, his admirable musicianship. Note the fugue in the slow movement—an unusual place to find a fugue—a fugue that is not merely a perfunctory scholastic section to serve by way of contrast to the contemplative pages—but one that is dramatic in its evolution and in its contrapuntal treatment. The opening movement by its themes and their development does more than to arouse favorable expectation of what is to follow. Here is warmth as well as dignity. Mark also the conciseness of the work, how firmly knit it is. The Scherzo dazzles by its brilliance. And in this symphony there is an elasticity, a spontaneity of musical thought that many had not been able to find in the composer's previous compositions.

The performance was of the finest quality as was that of Debussy's "Three Sketches." It is a curious fact that Mr. Roussel though for some years an officer in the French navy has never looked to the ocean for musical suggestion, while Debussy merely crossed the English channel. (And so deep-sea sailors of Cape Cod when they retired to their villages often dwelt in houses inland far from salt winds.) Perhaps some find Debussy's ocean too gentle; they miss the "spasms of the sky and the shatter of the sea." But each composer, each poet has his own ocean. To Bryant it was a gray and melancholy waste, to Aeschylus and Milton it laughed; Laforgue was impressed because it had no other name. Now Debussy loved the ocean, even as he saw it from seaside resorts, where he found that men and women did not sufficiently respect it. He knew it could be savage—witness the ending of the second Sketch—he also knew that its sunlight was beautiful. He had his own ocean and he expressed vividly what it had said to him. Some who are pleased to think that Ravel is always an ironist, in music as in speech, say that in "La Valse" he was ironical at the expense of the Viennese masters, especially Johann Strauss. Tush! Likewise piffle! Likewise, go to! He certainly would not have taken the trouble to "parody" Metra or Waldteufel, demigods at the Parisian Opera balls. The Viennese dance forms naturally made the greater appeal to him. It should be remembered that when he sketched the music he thought of a production on the stage.

A most interesting concert: one that was not too long. Mr. Roussel, for example, knew what he had to say, and having said it well, did not fritter away its force.

The concert will be repeated tonight. The program for next week will be—i.e., is announced as, Overture by an anonymous composer (first performance); Symphony by Nobokov (first time in the United States); Tchaikovsky's Symphony No. 4.

ALBERT ROUSSEL

By PHILIP HALE

Albert Roussel is in town. He will hear his new symphony played by the Boston Symphony orchestra tomorrow afternoon, the symphony written expressly for the 50th anniversary of the orchestra. He came to this country, invited by Mrs. Elizabeth Sprague Coolidge to attend her Chicago Festival of Chamber Music at which his Trio for flute, viola and piano was performed. Mr. Loeffler's Partita for violin and piano was played at the same concert on Oct. 15.

The name of Roussel is by no means unknown here. His orchestral pieces have been performed by at least three orchestras—one the scratch orchestra, brought here by Mr. Toscanini, when he first visited Boston. Some of his songs have also been heard. He was born at Tourcoing, department of the north, France, in 1869. His people were manufacturers, but the ocean had its lure; he entered the French navy and as a passed midshipman went on the gunboat Styx to the east. Impressions of the Orient led to certain compositions, as his "Evocations," and later a ballet-opera. He resigned from the navy to devote himself to music. On his return to Paris he spent some years as pupil, also teacher, at the Schola Cantorum. One or two writers about him hint at differences of opinion between him and Vincent d'Indy. Others say that Roussel looks on d'Indy as his great and only teacher. As a matter of fact, he studied with Gigout and others. Within the last years Roussel's music has been much played at Paris. There was a Roussel festival of three concerts at Paris and a fourth at Fontainebleau in 1929. (We note in Paris journals that on Sunday, Oct. 12, 1930, his "Festival of the Spider" was performed at the Colonne concert, and on the same day his piano concerto was played at the Lamoureux concert by Mme. Caffaret.) Leading critics in Paris have written more or less elaborate essays in the peculiar character of his music. The Revue Musicale has published a whole number in his honor.

At the symphony concerts tomorrow afternoon and Saturday evening Roussel's Symphony will follow a Suite formed by Felix Mott from two ballets of Rameau. The overture to "Benvenuto Cellini" had been announced but it was withdrawn at the last moment for the Ballet Suite. The second part of the program will comprise Debussy's Three Sketches, "La Mer" and Ravel's "La Valse."

The program of the concerts of Oct. 31, Nov. 1, as now planned, is as follows: An overture by an anonymous composer; a symphony written for the 50th anniversary by Nabokov, and Tchaikovsky's Symphony No. 4.

ROUSSEL'S NEWEST BY SYMPHONY

French Composer's G Minor Work Written for Jubilee

lost ——— Oct. 25, 1930
BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

A programme of French music which included a symphony in G minor by Albert Roussel, especially composed for the 50th anniversary of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, made the third Friday afternoon concert of this jubilee season. Monsieur Roussel, who is now making his initial visit to this country, heard his music from a seat in the hall and, called afterwards to the stage, he was warmly acclaimed, the players standing in tribute.

THE NEW SYMPHONY

Although one listener may have come away yesterday chiefly impressed by the singularly revealing, glamorous and poetic performance of Debussy's "The Sea" and another have had ears only for Ravel's "The Waltz," conducted by Dr. Koussevitzky, and played by his men, with more than usual seductiveness, it is the new symphony that deserves first and most extensive mention.

When Dr. Koussevitzky gave out the imposing list of composers who had written pieces for the Symphony Orchestra's 50th season there was reason to fear that many, if not most of these commemorative works, would prove merely dutiful and perfunctory. And so they may. But the symphony of yesterday, at least, bears witness to a genuine fervor of creation, a labor not of respect but of love. It is not necessary to discuss whether or not Roussel has wrought a masterpiece;

for the present it is enough to say that his music gave pleasure and that it aroused a desire for further and deeper acquaintance with it.

Roussel has prevailingly seemed a reserved, detached, austere and cerebral maker of music, in this respect a later counterpart of Vincent d'Indy, though without the latter's loftiness and breadth of utterance. The immediate predecessor of the symphony of yesterday, the one in B-flat played here six years ago, at once attracted and repelled. The composer's thoughts arrested but the expression of them irritated; there was an avoidance of all geniality and sensuousness, there was a hint of crabbedness and perversity.

Per contra, the new symphony, after an acidulous opening which sets a key that many no doubt were relieved not to find maintained, sounds spontaneous, is almost gay, is here and there frankly tuneful. And the slow movement has melody that is warmly emotional, a richness of texture and not infrequently a sheer beauty of orchestral sound that would seem to signify a change of heart. Not that Roussel has anywhere achieved the magical sonorities, at once rich and luminous, that succeed each other kaleidoscopically throughout the course of Debussy's "The Sea," but at least he has admitted that the ear has its claims as well as the mind.

Agreeable and Distinctive

In short, an agreeable symphony, not too long and not too involved, yet with enough that is individual and distinctive to give it a quality and flavor of its own and make of it something more than a piece to be heard once, politely applauded and as politely dismissed. The performance yesterday bore witness to great pains in the preparation and Dr. Koussevitzky conducted with enthusiasm and, as it seemed, with sympathy and understanding. The wonder of it was that there was still time during the week to work the miracle with "The Sea" to add a few finishing touches to the already scintillant version of "The Waltz."

The familiar Rameau-Mottl ballet suite began the concert, and in playing this delightful music Dr. Koussevitzky wisely employed a reduced string orchestra.

Incidents and Prospects

There are few changes for the new season in the personnel of the Symphony Orchestra. From Vienna comes a new andid, is very like one of those calls first clarinet of note, Mr. Polatschek, with which boys summon one another making four in all; Mr. T. Grundey is the sixth trumpet-player. There is one more viola-player, Mr. R. Jacob; but the ten double-basses have receded for the present to nine. Four, instead of five, trombones also suffice.

Monitor Oct. 25, 1930
Roussel's New Symphony

Weekly musical genuflections to the jubilee year of the Boston Symphony Orchestra seem to be the rule. The third program of the fiftieth season—for the Symphony Hall concerts of Oct. 24 and 25—contained as its principal item the Third Symphony of Albert Roussel, op. 42, in G minor. This work, which had its first performance at the Friday afternoon concert, was composed for the orchestra's anniversary, and its author was present to receive the acclamations of the audience. If M. Roussel was aware of the habitual detachment of a Friday afternoon audience in Symphony Hall, he must have been pleased with the demonstration provoked by his offering. There was in the applause a spontaneity and a warmth far transcending that expression of pleasure which is required by the laws of hospitality.

In searching for the musical reasons which prompted this remarkable cordiality, it is necessary to probe below any surface manifestations; for the symphony is not obvious or ingratiating music. It consists of a first movement in regular form; an Adagio into which M. Roussel has had the novel idea of introducing a fugue; a Scherzo labeled Vivace, and an Allegro con spirito. A motto proclaimed at the climax of the first movement is used as the theme of the Adagio, and is called on again to bring the finale to a smashing conclusion—a nod in the direction of César Franck.

We have said that this music is not ingratiating; this is not to imply that it is forbidding. M. Roussel has been charged with lack of invention. No such lack is evident in this symphony. There are themes in plenty, and their voices are interwoven in the composer's well-known manner. Some of them are lyric, some more like rhythmic figures. One of them, we were assured by a colleague, comes from a jazz song. None of them truck us on a first hearing as dis-inguished, and the motto, to be ing. Nevertheless, this motto and these hemes, as manipulated with the in-enuity of an accomplished musician, result in something impressive. After all, you wouldn't think much of the

All this sounds very much as if M. Roussel had written austere "pure" music, and so far as any indication from him is concerned, that is precisely what he has done. Yet listening with the most "absolute" of intentions, one found one's self hearing a dramatic story, very similar to that told by the B flat Symphony. There was a sense of struggle, of aspiration, of recollected joys, possibly of triumph but certainly not of peace at the close. Roussel is a composer who is individual but not free of eclecticism. He is a descendant of Debussy in his harmonic coloring (see the "Evocations"), of Franck in his form; and he has not been immune to the rhythmic influence of the "Sacre." But this symphony reveals in him also a romantic. There is a most un-French strain, really a Teutonic mood. Out of regard for Gallic pride, we should like to say it is a bequest from Berlioz, but there is nothing febrile about it; no, it must be Teutonic.

The Roussel opus was preceded by the Rameau-Mottl Ballet Suite, and was followed by Debussy's "La Mer" and Ravel's "La Valse." The performance of both these latter was more brilliant than hermeneutic. The Boston orchestra is at a high point of virtuosity; we hope it is not going to be overtrained before the season is well under way. L. A. S.

Symphony Concert,
Wellesley Fashion
Sept. 22, 1933

ALUMNAE HALL at Wellesley is a true shrine of music. Last evening it was the scene of a concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Despite the significance of the occasion as marking the return of Dr. Koussevitzky and the musicians to open the new season, interest was centered in the music itself as apart from agencies and circumstances. Dr. Koussevitzky received a quick, warm welcome as he stepped upon the stage, but the audience readily hushed to an attentive attitude. Other factors contributed to the general impression. Alumnae Hall renewed its reputation for fine acoustics. The musicians exhibited an exceptional mellowness and blend of ensemble tone. As for the audience, even youth's awareness to fashion, evident in the cut and length of every gown, as well as the social amenities observed at

...rts, may be construed as fit-
...e to music.
...ven's Seventh Symphony Dr.
...y and the musicians seemed
...duce music by voluntary
...to invoke it and let it
...s own right. The con-
...often as otherwise, gave the
...all reign, moving his baton
...possible and directing with
...ind more than with active
...prevailing mellowness of the
...was at all times their most
...ontribution and should be the
...is review. Some of this qual-
...doubt from the hall; largely,

s into stand-said
t E. presi-

Ayles-Broadortant move-gnified arvey of the pany, ity is doubt, from the fact, I have been a new fineness of tech- developed early in the sea- the cause, the woodwinds gretto with more than usual uading; the strings attacked ovements of the finale with sion. The quality of tone y good, whatever the tempo ce or difficulty of figuration. wo Preludes as orchestrated agalli, these columns have ble description. Suffice it nd (the Vivace) seemed to who sat in the audience and also to be a violinist, more he richer orchestral form ar exercise for solo violin.

the originals; he has amplified and given them instruction. Here again, on the part of the precision of the violin, Burgin, was remarkable. He held no more recent than Debussy's "Nocturne" for example, of composition, than Debussy's "Nocturne of a Faun." Familiar with it is, its position on a program, together with the plasticity which marked its appeal, it has moments of grandeur and scintillation. Heard by itself, it smoothes into melody, appealing to the ear as a melody, it appeals to the eye. In such mixtures of tone and rhythm and climax, it is an exceptional

ES

as well

CO

Prelude to "Die Meistersinger" that were of the kind which have become the staple of the brass. Dr. Kouschnitzky's Wagner is not serious but majestic, curved, graceful sonorities. His playing has the bustling angularity characteristic of Wagner.

N. M. J.

Afternoon Of The French at Symphony Hall

Roussel's Notable Symphony,
Debussy, Ravel, Rameau,
To Keep Him Company

THE EXPERIENCE of Friday afternoon at the Symphony Concert was the first performance anywhere of a new Symphony, in G, by Albert Roussel. Under usual circumstance attended the occasion. By invitation of Mrs. Elizabeth Shurtleff Coolidge, Mr. Roussel came from Paris to the United States to be a guest at her festival of chamber-music in Chicago. A journey thence to Boston, for the production of the new Symphony, was easy and inevitable. Since the visit of Ravel, the Symphony Orchestra has entertained no composer of such eminence. It paid him, indeed, exceptional homage when, with one accord, at the end of the performance, it rose in its place to salute him. By that time Dr. Koussevitzky had called him from his seat in the balcony and escorted him in friendly fashion to the stage. There, once, twice and three times over, the audience heaped him with quick, honest, hearty applause. Within memory "at these concerts," no new symphony had made such instant and glowing impression upon audience and orchestra. For once professional judgment and laymen's notions went hand in hand.

No wonder Mr. Roussel betrayed an emotion as genuine as the plaudits. Now he shook Dr. Koussevitzky's or Mr. Burgin's hand; again he turned to the orchestra, himself applauding; or else bowed in warm acknowledgment to the eager audience. There was time, indeed, to observe him—a slender, dark, olive-skinned gentleman, looking less than his sixty years, free from any affectation, wearing none of the musician's earmarks. Yet again a few elderly romantics, scattered about the house, deplored the failure of modern eminence in the in full panoply the orchestra first. Thereafter, whatever the mutation, however spacious the de-it, seldom escapes the follow-

nd. In the slow movement, built
Mr. Roussel ventures fugal and aperture from orthodox precedent.
al, when he chooses a course of n, it seems the significant expres-underlying thought and com-mood, as clear as it is persuasive.
ts of the first movement, again in-erzo, Mr. Roussel writes a music eding lightness of texture. Not a ouds it. Often there are measures
ft pace—unflecked. Again meas-mounting vigor, but never hud-thickened. Throughout, indeed, a of timbres, transparently distrib-
and interweaving instrumental

is no avowed program to Mr.
's Symphony; no token, after two
s. of programmatic intent at the the composer's mind. The most ative listener may hardly fit to the any literary or pictorial vesture, in it any delineative suggestion.
the audience hear the pervading and follow it, in new flowering aw flowering, to the end. Enough is a musical thought released with nvention, touched by emotion. In-he play of harmonies and timbres, d fertile as source; means both to lation and to ardor. We hear otivs, for the most part contained single movements; discover them tain-heads of melodies, one close hother, imparting to this Symn G immediate and ingratiating
They kindle the mind; warm art; surprise and delight by of substance, progress and vesthey may be as light and flowing look its distinction. In these the simpler the better.

The new Symphony commends itself, by brevity, filling less than half an hour performance, albeit four movements long. Mr. Roussel writes with metallic precision of matter and economical means. Not a purposeless, and more superfluous, note encumbers his

Yet from the pages flows a impression of completeness. He has at his design; released his musical out; set out his skill, fancy, imagina-emotion. And all this with an eminently Gallic quality—lucid minous clearness. The motto-mo-servading the whole Symphony in Franckian fashion, seizes the ear in full panoply the orchestra first yms it. Thereafter, whatever the utation, howsoever spacious the de-tent, it seldom escapes the follow-
nd. In the slow movement, built t, Mr. Roussel ventures fugal and departure from orthodox precedent.
al, when he chooses a course of
n, it seems the significant expres-
f underlying thought and com-
mood, as clear as it is persuasive.
ts of the first movement, again in ierzo, Mr. Roussel writes a music eding lightness of texture. Not a ouds it. Often there are measures
ft pace—unflecked. Again meas-
e mounting vigor, but never hud-thickened. Throughout, indeed, a
of timbres, transparently distrib-
and interweaving instrumental

is no avowed program to Mr. e. l.'s Symphony; no token, after two s. of programmatic intent at the t. of the composer's mind. The most ative listener may hardly fit to the any literary or pictorial vesture, s- r in it any delineative suggestion. or the audience hear the pervading s and follow it, in new flowering ew flowering, to the end. Enough is a musical thought released with nvention, touched by emotion, in- he play of harmonies and timbres, d fertile as source: means both to lation and to ardor. We hear otivs, for the most part contained single movements; discover them tain-heads of melodies, one close tother, imparting to this Sym- n G immediate and ingratiating. They kindle the mind: warm art; surprise and delight by of substance, progress and ves- they may be as light and flowing

"Fate" motif if you had never heard the rest of the Fifth Symphony.

All this sounds very much as if Roussel had written austere "pure" music, and so far as any indication from him is concerned, that is precisely what he has done. Yet listening with the most "absolute" of intentions, one found one's self hearing dramatic story, very similar to that told by the B flat Symphony. There was a sense of struggle, of aspiration of recollected joys, possibly of triumph but certainly not of peace at the close. Roussel is a composer who is individual but not free of eclecticism. He is a descendant of Debussy in his harmonic coloring (see the "Evocations"), of Franck in his form; and he has not been immune to the rhythmic influence of the "Sacre." But this symphony reveals in him also a romantic. There is a most un-French strain, really a Teutonic mood. Out of regard for Gallic pride, we should like to say it is a bequest from Berlioz, but there is nothing febrile about it; no, it must be Teutonic.

The Roussel opus was preceded by the Rameau-Mottl Ballet Suite, and was followed by Debussy's "La Mer" and Ravel's "La Valse." The performance of both these latter was more brilliant than hermeneutic. The Boston orchestra is at a high point of virtuosity; we hope it is not going to be overtrained before the season is well under way.

L. A. S.

Symphony Concert, Wellesley Fashic

Trans. — Oct. 22, 1930

ALUMNAE HALL at Wellesley is a true shrine of music. Last evening it was the scene of a concert by Boston Symphony Orchestra. Despite significance of the occasion as marking the return of Dr. Koussevitzky and musicians to open the new season, interest was centered in the music itself apart from agencies and circumstances. Dr. Koussevitzky received a quick, warm welcome as he stepped upon the stage but the audience readily hushed to an attentive attitude. Other factors contributed to the general impression. Alumni Hall renewed its reputation for fine acoustics. The musicians exhibited exceptional mellowness and blend of ensemble tone. As for the audience, eye youth's awareness to fashion, evident in the cut and length of every gown, as well as the social amenities observed at these concerts, may be construed as fitting homage to music.

In Beethoven's Seventh Symphony Dr. Koussevitzky and the musicians seemed less to produce music by voluntary effort than to invoke it and let it follow of its own right. The conductor, as often as otherwise, gave the orchestra full reign, moving his baton as little as possible and directing with watchful mind more than with active hand. The prevailing mellowness of the instruments was at all times their most impressive contribution and should be the theme of this review. Some of this quality came, no doubt, from the hall; largely, it may have been a new fineness of technique. Whatever the cause, the woodwinds sang the Allegretto with more than usual delicacy of shading; the strings attacked the quick movements of the finale with flawless precision. The quality of tone was amazingly good, whatever the tempo of performance or difficulty of figuration. Of Bach's two Preludes as orchestrated by Pich-Mangiagalli, these columns have held considerable description. Suffice it that the second (the Vivace) seemed to one listener, who sat in the audience and who happens also to be a violinist, more inviting in the richer orchestral form than as familiar exercise for solo violin. The present-day Italian who has adapted these pieces had not altered the essential character of the originals: he has amplified their sonority and given them instrumental color. Here again, on the performance side, the precision of the violins, led by Mr. Burgin, was remarkable.

The program held no more recent music, in point of composition, than Debussy's "Afternoon of a Faun." Familiar piece though it is, its position on a "standard" program, together with the subtlety and plasticity which marked its performance, gave it new allure. Heard in Symphony Hall, it has moments of some brilliance and scintillation. Heard in Alumnæ Hall, it smoothes into melting timbres, appealing to the ear as a rich tapestry appeals to the eye. In such evenly blended mixtures of tone and subtle variations of rhythm and climax, Dr. Koussevitzky is an exceptional master.

Last of all, the Prelude to "Die Meistersinger." The beauties that were of the strings and woodwinds here became the glories that are of the brass. Dr. Koussevitzky's way with Wagner is not so idently pompous, but majestic, curved, abundant in graceful sonorities. He avoids much of the bustling angularity which others emphasize in Wagner.

N. M. J.

Afternoon Of The French at Symphony Hall

Roussel's Notable Symphony,
Debussy, Ravel, Rameau,
To Keep Him Company

Trans. — Oct. 25, 1930

THE EXPERIENCE of Friday afternoon at the Symphony Concert was the first performance anywhere of a new Symphony, in G, by Albert Roussel. Under usual circumstance attended the occasion. By invitation of Mrs. Elizabeth Shurtleff Coolidge, Mr. Roussel came from Paris to the United States to be a guest at her festival of chamber-music in Chicago. A journey thence to Boston, for the production of the new Symphony, was easy and inevitable. Since the visit of Ravel, the Symphony Orchestra has entertained no composer of such eminence. It paid him, indeed, exceptional homage when, with one accord, at the end of the performance, it rose in its place to salute him. By that time Dr. Koussevitzky had called him from his seat in the balcony and escorted him in friendly fashion to the stage. There, once, twice and three times over, the audience heaped him with quick, honest, hearty applause. Within memory of these concerts, no new symphony had made such instant and glowing impression upon audience and orchestra. For the audience hear the pervading notions went hand in hand.

No wonder Mr. Roussel betrayed an emotion as genuine as the plaudits. Now he shook Dr. Koussevitzky's or Mr. Burgin's hand; again he turned to the orchestra, himself applauding; or else bowed in warm acknowledgment to the eager audience. There was time, indeed, to observe him—a slender, dark, olive-skinned gentleman, looking less than his sixty years, free from any affectation, wearing none of the musician's earmarks. Yet again a few elderly romantics, scattered about the house, deplored the failure of modern eminence in the look its distinction. In these he simpler the better.

new Symphony commends itself, by brevity, filling less than half an performance, albeit four movements long. Mr. Roussel writes with Gallic precision of matter and economical means. Not a purposeless, and more superfluous, note encumbers his

Yet from the pages flows a impression of completeness. He has at his design; released his musical at; set out his skill, fancy, imagination. And all this with an eminently Gallic quality—lucid, minous clearness. The motto-motiv pervading the whole Symphony in Franckian fashion, seizes the ear in full panoply the orchestra first utters it. Thereafter, whatever the notation, however spacious the delineation, it seldom escapes the follow-up. In the slow movement, built up, Mr. Roussel ventures fugue and usual circumstance attended the occasion. By invitation of Mrs. Elizabeth Shurtleff Coolidge, Mr. Roussel came from Paris to the United States to be a guest at her festival of chamber-music in Chicago. A journey thence to Boston, for the production of the new Symphony, was easy and inevitable. Since the visit of Ravel, the Symphony Orchestra has entertained no composer of such eminence. It paid him, indeed, exceptional homage when, with one accord, at the end of the performance, it rose in its place to salute him. By that time Dr. Koussevitzky had called him from his seat in the balcony and escorted him in friendly fashion to the stage. There, once, twice and three times over, the audience heaped him with quick, honest, hearty applause. Within memory of these concerts, no new symphony had made such instant and glowing impression upon audience and orchestra. For the audience hear the pervading notions went hand in hand.

is no avowed program to Mr. Roussel's Symphony; no token, after two of programmatic intent at the composer's mind. The most attentive listener may hardly fit to the any literary or pictorial vesture, in it any delineative suggestion. For the audience hear the pervading notions went hand in hand. Enough is a musical thought released with invention, touched by emotion, in the play of harmonies and timbres, as fertile as source; means both to elation and to ardor. We hear motifs, for the most part contained in single movements; discover them in heads of melodies, one close to another, imparting to this Symphony in G immediate and ingratiating art; surprise and delight by of substance, progress and vestment they may be as light and flowing

"Fate" motif if you had never heard the rest of the Fifth Symphony.

All this sounds very much as if Roussel had written austere "pure music, and so far as any indication from him is concerned, that is precisely what he has done. Yet listening with the most "absolute" of intentions, one found one's self hearing dramatic story, very similar to that told by the B flat Symphony. There was a sense of struggle, of aspiration, of recollected joys, possibly of triumph but certainly not of peace at the close. Roussel is a composer who is individual but not free of eclecticism. He is a descendant of Debussy in his harmonic coloring (see the "Evocations"), of Franck in his form; and he has not been immune to the rhythmic influence of the "Sacre." But this symphony reveals in him also a romantic. There is a most un-French strain, really a Teutonic mood. Out of regard for Gallic pride, we should like to say it is a bequest from Berlioz, but there is nothing febrile about it; no, it must be Teutonic.

The Roussel opus was preceded by the Rameau-Mottl Ballet Suite, and was followed by Debussy's "La Mer" and Ravel's "La Valse." The performance of both these latter was more brilliant than hermeneutic. The Boston orchestra is at a high point of virtuosity; we hope it is not going to be overtrained before the season is well under way.

L. A. S.

Symphony Concert, Wellesley Fashion

ALUMNAE HALL at Wellesley is a true shrine of music. Last evening it was the scene of a concert by Boston Symphony Orchestra. Despite significance of the occasion as marking the return of Dr. Koussevitzky and musicians to open the new season, interest was centered in the music itself apart from agencies and circumstances. Dr. Koussevitzky received a quick, warm welcome as he stepped upon the stage but the audience readily hushed to an attentive attitude. Other factors contributed to the general impression. Alumnae Hall renewed its reputation for acoustics. The musicians exhibited exceptional mellowness and blend of ensemble tone. As for the audience, youth's awareness to fashion, evident in the cut and length of every gown, as well as the social amenities observed at these concerts, may be construed as fitting homage to music.

In Beethoven's Seventh Symphony Dr. Koussevitzky and the musicians seemed less to produce music by voluntary effort than to invoke it and let it rule of its own right. The conductor, as often as otherwise, gave the orchestra full reign, moving his baton as little as possible and directing with watchful mind more than with active hand. The prevailing mellowness of the instruments was at all times their most impressive contribution and should be the theme of this review. Some of this quality came, no doubt, from the hall; largely, it may have been a new fineness of technique already developed early in the season. Whatever the cause, the woodwinds sang the Allegretto with more than usual delicacy of shading; the strings attacked the quick movements of the finale with flawless precision. The quality of tone was amazingly good, whatever the tempo of performance or difficulty of figuration. Of Bach's two Preludes as orchestrated by Pick-Mangiagalli, these columns have held considerable description. Suffice it that the second (the Vivace) seemed to one listener, who sat in the audience and who happens also to be a violinist, more inviting in the richer orchestral form than as familiar exercise for solo violin. The present-day Italian who has adapted these pieces had not altered the essential character of the originals; he has amplified their sonority and given them instrumental color. Here again, on the performance side, the precision of the violins, led by Mr. Burgin, was remarkable.

The program held no more recent music, in point of composition, than Debussy's "Afternoon of a Faun." Familiar piece though it is, its position on a "standard" program, together with the subtlety and plasticity which marked its performance, gave it new allure. Heard in Symphony Hall, it has moments of some brilliance and scintillation. Heard in Alumnae Hall, it smoothes into melting timbres, appealing to the ear as a rich tapestry appeals to the eye. In such evenly blended mixtures of tone and subtle variations of rhythm and climax, Dr. Koussevitzky is an exceptional master.

Last of all, the Prelude to "Die Meistersinger." The beauties that were of the strings and woodwinds here became the glories that are of the brass. Dr. Koussevitzky's way with Wagner is not suddenly pompous, but majestic, curved, abundant in graceful sonorities. He avoids much of the bustling angularity which others emphasize in Wagner.

N. M. J.

Afternoon The Symphony

Roussel's No.
Debussy, R.
To Keep It

THE EXPERIENCE afternoon Concert was

phony, in G, by usual circumstance. By invitation of Shurtleff Coolidge from Paris to the guest at her fest in Chicago. A job, for the production, was easy. The visit of Ravestrchestra has entered such eminence. It is exceptional homage at the end of the its place to salute Dr. Koussevitzky his seat in the balcony in friendly fashion once, twice and the audience heaped hearty applause. These concerts, made such instant sion upon audience once professional notions went hand.

No wonder Mr. emotion as genuine. Now he shook Dr. Burgin's hand; ag orchestra, himself bowed in warm eager audience. To observe him—a skinned gentleman sixty years, free wearing none of marks. Yet again ties, scattered about the failure of mo operation of

"We ask Control Plan ballot Nov. solicit the v end that pub
the employee

On Prison I

Controversy labor at the County. Of

Council pre that situati for legislati tions in the

"To furth State Prison
sachusetts,

following rep shows the and inmate

April.
May.
June.
July.
August.
September.

"At the p on the job
ters, electri fitters, po engineers,

also emplo tion forem

struction.
The brick ployed on

"A con Cavanaugh
ing the B

Johnson a with refer

on the job
ment of b

It was su of the B.

their Loca
theri grie

Building with the t

Building was not a

of the B.
quence the and plaste

job.
"We be convict la legislative coming lea that the arts to look its distinction. In these days, the simpler the better.

The new Symphony commends itself, first, by brevity, filling less than half an hour in performance, albeit four movements long. Mr. Roussel writes with truly Gallic precision of matter and economy of means. Not a purposeless, and therefore superfluous, note encumbers his staves. Yet from the pages flows a clear impression of completeness. He has wrought his design; released his musical thought; set out his skill, fancy, imagination, emotion. And all this with another eminently Gallic quality—lucid and luminous clearness. The motto-motiv, pervading the whole Symphony in quasi-Franckian fashion, seizes the ear when in full panoply the orchestra first proclaims it. Thereafter, whatever the transmutation, however spacious the development, it seldom escapes the following mind. In the slow movement, built upon it, Mr. Roussel ventures fugal and other departure from orthodox precedent. As usual, when he chooses a course of his own, it seems the significant expression of underlying thought and compelling mood, as clear as it is persuasive. In parts of the first movement, again in the scherzo, Mr. Roussel writes a music of exceeding lightness of texture. Not a blur clouds it. Often there are measures at swift pace—unflecked. Again measures of mounting vigor, but never huddled or thickened. Throughout, indeed, a master of timbres, transparently distributing and interweaving instrumental voices.

There is no avowed program to Mr. Roussel's Symphony; no token, after two hearings, of programmatic intent at the back of the composer's mind. The most imaginative listener may hardly fit to the music any literary or pictorial vesture, discover in it any delineative suggestion. We of the audience hear the pervading motif and follow it, in new flowering after new flowering, to the end. Enough that it is a musical thought released with warm invention, touched by emotion, inviting the play of harmonies and timbres, vital and fertile as source; means both to contemplation and to ardor. We hear other motifs, for the most part contained within single movements; discover them as fountain-heads of melodies, one close upon another, imparting to this Symphony in G immediate and ingratiating appeal. They kindle the mind; warm the heart; surprise and delight by felicity of substance, progress and vesture. They may be as light and flowing as those of the scherzo; as active and vigorous as those of the finale. They may expand and ascend, more and more luminous, as in the first movement, until the motto-motiv emerges lustrous. Almost everywhere a poetry of tones tinges them. It gilds with charm or fancy; lingers for a moment beside beauty; quickens into ardor fine and high.

For the Roussel of this new Symphony is not the Roussel of the harsh timbres, piercing harmonies, grating progressions, preoccupied, sombre and grim, through the Symphony in B-flat, heard six years ago. No more is he the sumptuous craftsman, the sensuous tone-poet, of "Evocations," first heard at Symphony Hall in 1929. He is not finding "very personal" procedures to express "very personal" sensations as he did in the compact audacity of "Pour une Fête de Printemps." Rather through the present Symphony goes the Roussel of what the French call "douceur," of what we in another language might name, after Matthew Arnold, sweetness and light. Needless to say the old Adam in him will not quite down. In the fugal treatment of the slow movement, in the whole strange course of it, he is again the Roussel who will find expression, in his own way, for the thought and the mood within him. They shall quicken as well as deepen into intensity. Yet the quiet of the end unmistakably suggests this new "douceur."

A few harsh chords to show us the cloven hoof of the old Roussel, and the first movement ascends into sweetness and light. Fancy wings the scherzo; while a supple hand directs the flight. A fine ardor, rather than a bold sweep of power, upbuilds the finale. As often as not, the more lyrical measures, throughout the symphony, are gentle. Only the motto-motiv at full expansion proclaims the loftier Roussel. Upon the latter days of poets—recall the Shakespeare of "Cymbeline" and "The Tempest"; upon the latter days of sensitive actresses—remember La Duse—this "douceur," this mood of sweetness and light, often descended. Mr. Roussel, embracing it, keeps good company.

It was the pleasure of the composer, at the final rehearsal, to hail as "perfect" the performance of his Symphony by Dr. Koussevitzky and the orchestra. This single word, which the reviewer may modestly repeat, was just reward for three weeks of sympathetic care, unflagging pains and quick sensibility, to Mr. Roussel's few suggestions. In this jubilee and a touch of dedicate the works a conductor, and ing his and their s, in point of per-sy's "La Mer" and filling the second

45.00 aphic poem" has at Symphony Hall years, has served conductor's convener at least was pre-adbare. Instead, if am-music of its par-Roussel's Symphony sombre, fantastical graphically in the nillar rhythm, in the r acrid instrumental were the moods of s after the end of an old civilization ties torn to tatters;
it seemed, the threat
se implications hard-

Ma
ston

ess iany Work, Raise

Service
ng Post, Inc.
ombat unreached a lutions to ry educa-of youths en to fif-Democrats ed by the ce to the uggestions jobs, espe-
and to om forty-low birth result in n the em-last year.

We listen to "La of Ravel, whatever eans; for the responor and orchestra.
hearers debated the Debussy's sea-pieces.
as—the very curl of nd rising; the spray
the lights that tra-inds that blew upon aginative ears might into the contours of motion of manifold the colorings, what the tone-poet whence rang, diffusing sug-Now, a quarter of rd, "La Mer" is a rt-hall. We listen to of scope and power ere sensibility; who essionistic" strokes, as in the sonorities en Wind and Sea" nation and full rethe virtuosi of the
as, strings, brass—arvels; speculate beer Dr. Koussevitzky, Debussyan master-
times slow the pace, ly this or that de-nge and we change to centuries to three u's pages had the the pure sonorities, ur," that should be ssel's Symphony.
H. T. P.

ROUSSEL ATTENDS SYMPHONY CONCERT

French Composer Hears His G Minor Symphony

First Performance of Modern Work

Rouses Unusual Enthusiasm

Globe

Oct. 25, 1930

Albert Roussel, the noted French composer, heard at yesterday's Boston Symphony concert the first public performance of his new Symphony in G Minor, one of the many important new works commissioned by the Boston Symphony Orchestra for its 50th anniversary season. Seldom does the first performance of a new symphony win or deserve such an outburst of enthusiasm as came from players and audience yesterday. The composer was called from his place in the audience to the stage. The orchestra stood to applaud him. He was repeatedly called back to bow his acknowledgments. Even before the audience realized that the composer was present the clapping was loud and eager.

Roussel, born in 1869, began life as a naval officer, but from the age of 25 devoted himself to music. He studied under Gigout and under d'Indy at the Schola Cantorum. His "Evocations," symphony in B flat, suite from "Padmavati," and suite in F major have been previously heard at Boston Symphony concerts. In France his reputation as one of the chief composers of the day is firmly established. Not long ago the Revue Musicale devoted an entire issue to Roussel, an honor it has given to very few others, among them Debussy and Liszt.

Yesterday's audience saw Roussel as a slender, erect, dignified man, with a black mustache and bearded chin, not looking nearly his real age, and acknowledging an ovation with an obviously genuine modesty and simplicity.

Twenty years of concert going make one a bit wary of new symphonies. This of Roussel yesterday is the only one out of a large number heard and promptly forgotten of which one would venture a heartfelt wish to hear it often, and a prophecy that it may in fact become part of the standard repertory.

That Roussel has heard and been influenced by the music of many of his contemporaries and some of his juniors is obvious. The first movement of this G minor symphony begins with rhythms and instrumentation that recall Stravinsky and Prokofieff.

One thought, listening to the whole work, of composers as diverse as Honegger and Ravel, Debussy and d'Indy.

Yet, despite this eclecticism of manner, the substance of the music is wholly original. Roussel's musical ideas are ingratiating, his treatment of them plays on one's emotions. To most modern symphonies one's first reaction is the thought, how well, or perhaps, how poorly they are written. This one is certainly well written, but one is too much carried away by its emotional appeal to note the fact carefully at a first hearing.

What really matters is not the use of cyclical forms and germinating motives, as recommended by d'Indy in his "Course of Musical Composition," not the ingenuity and clarity of the instrumentation, but the vitality, the imaginative energy of Roussel's music. On the evidence of this symphony, which to one hearer yesterday represented an immeasurable advance over the composer's earlier work, one would class Roussel as a composer who, like Cesar Franck, has at last found his true musical utterance at an age when most others grew stale and repetitious.

The musical and imaginative character of this G minor Symphony would strengthen the faith of those who believe the French a Nation apart from the others. It has the lightness of heart, the smiling gayety and grace of Couperin and Rameau and Gretry, with not a few touches of the genuine and heartfelt pathos that touches so much of their best work. But then one thinks of Mozart, who also wrote a Symphony in G minor, a symphony with which this one is not wholly unworthy to be named, immortal though the classic may be. If one is to go back, as many composers now try to do, to the purity of form, the clarity and grace of style of the 18th century, it ought certainly to be done as Roussel has done it here, with an unforced spontaneity and charm, and no conscious attempt to revive the idioms of vanished age. Mozart, writing in 1930, would probably have produced something not so very different in kind, though greater in quality, than this G minor Symphony of Roussel.

Dr. Koussevitzky conducted with the utmost eloquence and zeal in the rest of an all-French program, which included a suite by Rameau, substituted at the last moment for the announced Berlioz overture, Debussy's "La Mer" and Ravel's "La Valse." His interpretations were, as always, highly personal and open to strictures on that account. To his conducting must go not a little of the credit for the great success of the new symphony.

For the next week an overture by an anonymous composer, the first anonymous work ever to be played at these concerts; a new symphony by a Russian named Nabokoff, unknown here, and Tchaikovsky's Fourth Symphony are the works announced for performance.

P. R.

as those of the scherzo; as active year, with confidence and a touch of pride, composers may dedicate the works of their hands to such a conductor, and may expand and ascend, more and more to such musicians doing his and their luminous, as in the first movement. Companion-pieces, in point of performance, were Debussy's "La Mer" and everywhere a poetry of tones. Ravel's "La Valse," filling the second half of the concert.

For the Roussel of this new Symphony is not the Roussel of the harsh, piercing harmonies, grating progress, preoccupied, sombre and grim, the Symphony in B-flat, heard six months ago. No more is he the sun-craftsman, the sensuous tone-poet, "Evocations," first heard at Symphony Hall in 1929. He is not finding "personal" procedures to express "personal" sensations as he did in the past audacity of "Pour une Fête Printemps." Rather through the ent Symphony goes the Roussel of the French call "douceur," of which in another language might name Matthew Arnold, sweetness and Needless to say the old Adam in him not quite down. In the fugal treatment of the slow movement, in the strange course of it, he is again Roussel who will find expression in his own way, for the thought and the within him. They shall quicken as deepen into intensity. Yet the end of the end unmistakably suggests new "douceur."

A few harsh chords to show cloven hoof of the old Roussel, first movement ascends into sky and light. Fancy wings the while a supple hand directs the fine ardor, rather than a bold power, upbuds the finale. As not, the more lyrical measures, out the symphony, are gentle. motto-motiv at full expansion of the loftier Roussel. Upon the days of poets—recall the Shakspeare "Cymbeline" and "The Tempest" the latter days of sensitive act remember La Duse—this "douceur" mood of sweetness and light, ascended. Mr. Roussel, embracing good company.

It was the pleasure of the conductor at the final rehearsal, to hail as the performance of his Symphony Koussevitzky and the orchestra single word, which the review, modestly repeat, was just reworked three weeks of sympathetic care, giving pains and quick sensibility. Roussel's few suggestions. In this year, with confidence and a touch of pride, composers may dedicate the works of their hands to such a conductor, and may expand and ascend, more and more to such musicians doing his and their luminous, as in the first movement. Companion-pieces, in point of performance, were Debussy's "La Mer" and everywhere a poetry of tones. Ravel's "La Valse," filling the second half of the concert.

Ravel's "choreographic poem" has been played so often at Symphony Hall within the past ten years, has served so many times as conductor's convenience, that one listener at least was prepared to find it threadbare. Instead, if one must hear program-music of its particular day after Mr. Roussel's Symphony unalloyed, here was a sombre, fantastical scheme, worked out graphically in the manipulation of a familiar rhythm, in the usage of sensuous or acrid instrumental voices. Here, too, were the moods of 1920, only two years after the end of the German war—an old civilization crumbled, its suavities torn to tatters; the anguish and, as it seemed, the threat of a new world. These implications hardly signify in 1930. We listen to "La Valse" for the skill of Ravel, whatever his matter or his means; for the responsive skill of conductor and orchestra.

Once upon a time hearers debated the "impressionism" of Debussy's sea-pieces. How wonderful it was—the very curl of the waves, falling and rising; the spray that topped them; the lights that traversed them; the winds that blew upon them; the voices imaginative ears might hear, all transmuted into the contours of musical speech, the motion of manifold rhythms; the chords, the colorings, what not? On every page the tone-poet whence these inventions sprang, diffusing suggestion and illusion. Now, a quarter of a century afterward, "La Mer" is a classic of the concert-hall. We listen to it for the Debussy of scope and power who transcended mere sensibility; who was not all "impressionistic" strokes, who could compose, as in the sonorities of "Dialogue between Wind and Sea" out of large imagination and full resource. Or we hear the virtuosi of the orchestra—wood-winds, strings, brass—doing each their marvels; speculate between whiles whether Dr. Koussevitzky, spellbound by this Debussyan masterpiece, does not sometimes slow the pace, etch in too precisely this or that detail. The times change and we change with them. Back two centuries to three dances from Rameau's pages had the conductor to go to find the pure sonorities, the pervading "douceur," that should befit prelude to Mr. Roussel's Symphony.

H. T. P.

ROUSSEL ATTENDS SYMPHONY CONCERT

French Composer Hears His G Minor Symphony

First Performance of Modern Work

Rouses Unusual Enthusiasm

Globe

Oct. 25, 1930

Albert Roussel, the noted French composer, heard at yesterday's Boston Symphony concert the first public performance of his new Symphony in G Minor, one of the many important new works commissioned by the Boston Symphony Orchestra for its 50th anniversary season. Seldom does the first performance of a new symphony win or deserve such an outburst of enthusiasm as came from players and audience yesterday. The composer was called from his place in the audience to the stage. The orchestra stood to applaud him. He was repeatedly called back to bow his acknowledgment. Even before the audience realized that the composer was present the clapping was loud and eager.

Roussel, born in 1869, began life as a naval officer, but from the age of 25 devoted himself to music. He studied under Gigout and under d'Indy at the Schola Cantorum. His "Evocations," symphony in B flat, suite from "Padma-vati," and suite in F major have been previously heard at Boston Symphony concerts. In France his reputation as one of the chief composers of the day is firmly established. Not long ago the Revue Musicale devoted an entire issue to Roussel, an honor it has given to very few others, among them Debussy and Liszt.

Yesterday's audience saw Roussel as a slender, erect, dignified man, with a black mustache and bearded chin, not looking nearly his real age, and acknowledging an ovation with an obviously genuine modesty and simplicity.

Twenty years of concert going make one a bit wary of new symphonies. This of Roussel yesterday is the only one out of a large number heard and promptly forgotten of which one would venture a heartfelt wish to hear it often, and a prophecy that it may in fact become part of the standard repertory.

That Roussel has heard and been influenced by the music of many of his contemporaries and some of his juniors is obvious. The first movement of this G minor symphony begins with rhythms and instrumentation that recall Stravinsky and Prokofiev.

One thought, listening to the whole work, of composers as diverse as Honegger and Ravel, Debussy and d'Indy.

Yet, despite this eclecticism of manner, the substance of the music is wholly original. Roussel's musical ideas are ingratiating, his treatment of them plays on one's emotions. To most modern symphonies one's first reaction is the thought, how well, or perhaps, how poorly they are written. This one is certainly well written, but one is too much carried away by its emotional appeal to note the fact carefully at a first hearing.

What really matters is not the use of cyclical forms and germinating motives, as recommended by d'Indy in his "Course of Musical Composition," not the ingenuity and clarity of the instrumentation, but the vitality, the imaginative energy of Roussel's music. On the evidence of this symphony, which to one hearer yesterday represented an immeasurable advance over the composer's earlier work, one would class Roussel as a composer who, like Cesar Franck, has at last found his true musical utterance at an age when most others grow stale and repetitious.

The musical and imaginative character of this G minor Symphony would strengthen the faith of those who believe the French a Nation apart from the others. It has the lightness of heart, the smiling gayety and grace of Couperin and Rameau and Gretry, with not a few touches of the genuine and heartfelt pathos that touches so much of their best work. But then one thinks of Mozart, who also wrote a Symphony in G minor, a symphony with which this one is not wholly unworthy to be named, immortal though the classic may be. If one is to go back, as many composers now try to do, to the purity of form, the clarity and grace of style of the 18th century, it ought certainly to be done as Roussel has done it here, with an unforced spontaneity and charm, and no conscious attempt to revive the idioms of vanished age. Mozart, writing in 1780, would probably have produced something not so very different in kind, though greater in quality, than this G minor Symphony of Roussel.

Dr. Koussevitzky conducted with the utmost eloquence and zeal in the rest of an all-French program, which included a suite by Rameau, substituted at the last moment for the announced Berlioz overture, Debussy's "La Mer" and Ravel's "La Valse." His interpretations were, as always, highly personal and open to strictures on that account. To his conducting must go not a little of the credit for the great success of the new symphony.

For the next week an overture by an anonymous composer, the first anonymous work ever to be played at these concerts; a new symphony by a Russian named Nabokoff, unknown here, and Tchaikovsky's Fourth Symphony are the works announced for performance.

P. R.

Words for Music

Text of Robert Hillyer's Commemorative Ode for the Fiftieth Year of the Symphony Orchestra

THE TRUSTEES and the conductor of the Symphony Orchestra desired a commemorative choral piece to begin its fiftieth year. At their request Robert Hillyer, poet and Assistant Professor of English in Harvard College, wrote an Ode. In turn Professor Edward Burlingame Hill, of the Division of Music at Harvard, clothed it in music for mixed chorus and orchestra. At the Symphony Concert on Friday afternoon, a choir from the Harvard Glee Club and the Radcliffe Choral Society joined the orchestra in first performance. Serge Koussevitzky was conductor. Here follows the text:

SILENCE, yield! We lay too long
Thrall to thee and strange to song;
Now our fifty singing years
Have flown beyond the reach of time,
And Earth's reverberant echoes climb
To sweet accord with her companion stars.

Windy flute of pastoral themes,
Call to fold our wandering dreams;
Harp, remember leafy light
That danced above our younger days;
And violins of graver phrase,
Oh, follow love with voices down the night!

Bannered horn of golden doom
Where the clouded bastions loom,
Flaming dark with ancient wars,
With nobler music now prevail,
While native trumpets mildly hail
The trumpets calling clear from farther shores.

When these many songs be done,
Merge their harmonies in one!
Mortal past and future yearn
For music vaster than their own;
The Orphic chord, the final tone,
Before the silence whither all return,

Fourth Programme

FRIDAY AFTERNOON, OCTOBER 31, at 2.30 o'clock

SATURDAY EVENING, NOVEMBER 1, at 8.15 o'clock

Anonymous Overture
(First Time: Written for the 50th Anniversary of the Boston Symphony Orchestra)

Nabokov Symphonic Lyrique
I. Allegro.
II. Largo.
III. Allegro.
(First Time in the United States)

Tchaikovsky Symphony No. 4 in F minor, Op. 36
I. Andante sostenuto; moderato con anima (In movimento di valse).
II. Andantino in modo di canzona.
III. Scherzo; pizzicato ostinato: Allegro.
IV. Finale: Allegro con fuoco.

STEINWAY PIANO USED

There will be an intermission after the symphony of Nabokov

The works to be played at these concerts may be seen in the Allen A. Brown Music Collection of the Boston Public Library one week before the concert

Words for Music

Text of Robert Hillyer's Commemorative Ode for the Fiftieth Year of the Symphony Orchestra

THE TRUSTEES and the conductor of the Symphony Orchestra desired a commemorative choral piece to begin its fiftieth year. At their request Robert Hillyer, poet and Assistant Professor of English in Harvard College, wrote an Ode. In turn Professor Edward Burlingame Hill, of the Division of Music at Harvard, clothed it in music for mixed chorus and orchestra. At the Symphony Concert on Friday afternoon, a choir from the Harvard Glee Club and the Radcliffe Choral Society joined the orchestra in first performance. Serge Koussevitzky was conductor. Here follows the text:

SILENCE, yield! We lay too long
Thrall to thee and strange to song;
Now our fifty singing years
Have flown beyond the reach of time,
And Earth's reverberant echoes climb
To sweet accord with her companion stars.

Windy flute of pastoral themes,
Call to fold our wandering dreams;
Harp, remember leafy light
That danced above our younger days;
And violins of graver phrase,
Oh, follow love with voices down the night!

Bannered horn of golden doom
Where the clouded bastions loom,
Flaming dark with ancient wars,
With nobler music now prevail,
While native trumpets mildly hail
The trumpets calling clear from farther shores.

When these many songs be done,
Merge their harmonies in one!
Mortal past and future yearn
For music vaster than their own;
The Orphic chord, the final tone,
Before the silence whither all return.

FIFTIETH SEASON, NINETEEN HUNDRED THIRTY AND THIRTY-ONE

Fourth Programme

FRIDAY AFTERNOON, OCTOBER 31, at 2.30 o'clock

SATURDAY EVENING, NOVEMBER 1, at 8.15 o'clock

Anonymous Overture
(First Time: Written for the 50th Anniversary of the Boston Symphony Orchestra)

Nabokov Symphonic Lyrique
I. Allegro.
II. Largo.
III. Allegro.
(First Time in the United States)

Tchaikovsky Symphony No. 4 in F minor, Op. 36
I. Andante sostenuto; moderato con anima (In movimento di valse).
II. Andantino in modo di canzona.
III. Scherzo; pizzicato ostinato: Allegro.
IV. Finale: Allegro con fuoco.

STEINWAY PIANO USED

There will be an intermission after the symphony of Nabokov

The works to be played at these concerts may be seen in the Allen A. Brown Music Collection of the Boston Public Library one week before the concert

Serge Koussevitzky, Conductor

From a Recent Sketch by Anton Kamp

SYMPHONY CONCERT

Herald By PHILIP HALE Nov. 1, 1936

The program of the fourth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Koussevitzky conductor, given in Symphony hall yesterday afternoon, was as follows: Anonymous, Overture. (Written for the 50th anniversary of the orchestra. First performance.) Nabokov, symphonie lyrique (first time in the United States). Tchaikovsky, symphony No. 4, F minor.

A good many years ago a German prince was addicted to musical composition. Of course some of his works were performed. There was discussion of them among musicians. One said: "It is never prudent to speak lightly of music by a prince, for no one knows who wrote it." This remark has been attributed to Brahms, who had a faculty of saying disagreeable, bitter words. It has also been attributed to Hans von Bülow, who like Mr. Brown in Bret Harte's poem, "was a most sarcastic man."

It was not necessary to speak thus about the overture performed yesterday. The identity of the composer was not revealed by the management of Symphony hall. There were rumors; there was natural curiosity. It was known that the composer had made a graceful "gesture," to use the jargon of the newspapers, by thus paying homage to the orchestra. A short account of the work was sent out from Symphony hall, in which it was stated that the author of the overture seldom composes; that the chief theme was taken from Glinka's opera "A Life for the Tsar," because to the composer this theme "one of the most solemn and glorifying themes existing in musical literature," responded to the idea he had of a stately overture for this orchestra's jubilee; that the second theme was original.

The overture, for the most part following conventional form, begins quietly with the chief theme announced by the organ. This theme is worked with ever increasing intensity. The second theme, one of a sentimental nature, is slightly developed. A figure of an exciting nature takes the place of the repetition section and rushes into a long, sonorous coda in which the first theme is used for the apotheosis.

The overture was enthusiastically received. The allusion to Glinka's opera and the wording of the statement made by the composer aroused suspicion as to his identity. When the orchestra stood, during the long continued applause, and joined in it, suspicion was turned to certainty. Dr. Koussevitzky acknowledged modestly the tribute paid him.

Nicholas Nabokov, born at Leningrad in 1903, was driven out of Russia by the revolution. With other musicians, victims of the revolution, he lives in Paris, where some of them attempt to be revolutionary in composition. It is said that he is of a high-born family, some members of which held honorable positions before the upsetting storm; that he studied at the Hochschule in Berlin, and also at Stuttgart. He became prominent in Paris and in London by his music for an extraordinary, spectacular ballet-oratorio entitled "Ode," produced by the Ballet Russe in 1928.

The symphony heard yesterday is in three movements, not irritatingly contemporaneous in its harmonic scheme; not orchestrally far fetched. The first allegro has more or less of the wildness expected from a member of the young Russian school, but the movement has vitality, also individuality, although it has been said in Paris that he is strongly influenced by Stravinsky and Prokofiev. This influence is not too apparent, if it is felt to be at all. The slow movement contains passages of genuine beauty, with touches of the melancholy, or the wistfulness that is not displeasing. The finale has much of a scherzo character. It is to us the most maturely wrought, the most definitely planned and executed, the most constantly interesting of the three movements. The impetuous rhythm, the headlong rush ends with a long pause, after which a few impressive chords for the full orchestra bring an unexpectedly dramatic ending. The symphony was well received; a reception unusual for a work by a composer of whom little or nothing was known.

Dr. Koussevitzky with the orchestra gave an amazingly effective interpretation of Tchaikovsky's symphony for which the composer wrote an extended program to aid Mme. Meck in full appreciation of the musical contents. This symphony may be called a "human document," to use the phrase dear to Zola and the Goncourts; the autographic music of a self-torturer. There have been of late explanations, perhaps unnecessary, of early circumstances that gave this composer a sad and troubled outlook on life; that as a young man he fell in with Nihilists who had no belief in humanity or God. (But has not the Russian for years been constitutionally melancholy; now superstitiously religious; now exercised, as Dostoevsky's heroes, about the possibility of individual survival and the existence of an all-knowing God?) And in the later years of Tchaikovsky there was a reason for his self-torturing. Modest Tchaikovsky, a devoted brother, did not in writing Peter's life tell all that he might have told. It was reserved for Richard

Specht in his life of Johannes Brahms, recently translated into English, to give a personal reason for Brahms's dislike of Tchaikovsky and his music.

But how could Brahms appreciate Peter? How could Peter enjoy the music of Johannes? Peter in his sadness, in his mental agony sometimes shrieks; but Brahms in his pessimistic mood, even in his forced gaiety, often whines.

It was an experience to hear the fourth symphony performed as it was yesterday; interpreted with understanding, national spirit, artistic gusto by Dr. Koussevitzky; performed so eloquently and with as phenomenal a display of technical proficiency, by this incomparable orchestra.

The concert will be repeated tonight. The program of next week comprises Handel's Concerto Grosso for strings, B minor No. 12; Mozart's Clarinet concerto (Mr. Polatschek, clarinetist); the seventh Symphony of Sibelius; and Respighi's "Metamorphoseon" (theme and 12 variations written for the 50th anniversary of the orchestra.

Music

Monitor Nov. 1, 1930
Koussevitzky as Composer

On the fourth program of the jubilee season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra (Oct. 31-Nov. 1) stood an Overture by one who preferred to be listed as "Anonymous," an overture written expressly for the fiftieth anniversary of the orchestra and at this time given its first hearing. There followed a Symphony by Nicolas Nabokov and the Tchaikovsky Symphony No. 4 in F minor.

Despite the effort of the composer of the anniversary overture to maintain his anonymity, his hand betrayed him. Not only his hand, but his thematic material as well. And if that were not sufficient evidence, one must be dull indeed who could not guess his identity when, upon the completion of the number, the orchestra rose as one man and saluted its conductor. With orchestra standing, the audience felt need for more complete outlet to its enthusiasm, and also rose, the while it gave vigorous approval of a composition which, after all, Dr. Koussevitzky need not be modest in acknowledging. It is based upon two themes, the principal one of which, from "A Life for the Tsar," was chosen by the composer as peculiarly befitting the occasion. The opening lines are given out by the organ. There follows an excellent piece of contrapuntal writing in which the entire orchestra is utilized. The second theme is avowedly Dr. Koussevitzky's own, yet it has a strangely haunting melody, which persistently recalls the Concerto for double-bass which this virtuoso of the instrument has made familiar to Boston audiences. The principal theme is worked out at considerable length, and the overture is brought to a smashing close with fortissimi in all the choirs—the sort of close calculated to bring one up standing, if one has projected oneself into the piece. In all a brilliantly sonorous composition, worthy the name of its composer, who after all, was a musical virtuoso before he became a conductor, a fact which we are sometimes prone to overlook in the light of his more recent accomplishments.

Sharing the program, by way of novelty, came the symphony by Nabokov, given its first performance in the United States. This composer is widely recognized as the author of a ballet-oratorio which he named "Ode," and numerous other works for piano and orchestra. Built upon thematic material of singular beauty, the symphony is well knit. The form is clear, in fact, extremely orthodox, and the movements, of which there are three, all hold the attention. One might express a preference for the second, a Largo, and in no wise deprecate the remaining two. Although the composer had not so indicated it, the program contained the additional word "Lyric" in announcing the number. The word is correctly descriptive, yet in each movement come passages as virile as any penned by even the great Tchaikovsky himself. The symphony was extraordinarily well received.

A masterly performance of the Tchaikovsky Fourth Symphony once more brought to our attention that the plinth upon which this tonal giant stands is firmly grounded upon the whole-hearted approbation of an appreciative public. Dr. Koussevitzky and his men richly deserved the storm of applause at the conclusion of the symphony, which closed one more all-Russian program of distinction.

G. M. S.

Conductor Discovered As Composer

Koussevitzky Doubly Heard in His Own Festival Overture, Two Russian Symphonies

Nov. 1, 1930

A ten minutes to three yesterday afternoon the mystery-play, acted—none too effectively—at Symphony Hall during the past week, came to an end. At that moment sounded the last chord of the overture contributed anonymously to the current celebration of the orchestra's fiftieth year. Applause swelled quickly after the sonorous close. Dr. Koussevitzky turned to acknowledge it. On the instant, at a pre-concerted signal from Mr. Burgin, the orchestra—at the full strength that the score demanded—rose as one man; with bows and hands made lively sounds of approval; so saluted the conductor as the anonymous composer. Through as many as thirty seconds Dr. Koussevitzky betrayed the irritation of one caught in his own ruse; as speedily forgot it in the clapping before and behind him. By this time excitable ladies were on their feet with more or less of the audience straggling behind them, renewed applause; a warm recall; and it was time to amend the program leaf:

Festival Overture on a Theme from Glinka's Opera, "A Life for the Tsar," S. Koussevitzky (First Performance)

Did one hundred and ten men, in this gossiping town or anywhere else, ever keep a secret? No: outside old legend or newer romance? And at the rehearsal of last Monday, Dr. Koussevitzky had confided his authorship to the orchestra. Did no one believe when our contemporary, The Post, heard and printed as much next day? Not yet is distrust of "the paper" at quite such pitch. He who runs could read when the able analyst for The Transcript cited certain singularities in the score pointing toward Dr. Koussevitzky, and no one else, as the composer. Admittedly a Russian had written the overture—for precisely the number of instruments constituting the orchestra, in exactly the groups into which it is divided. More: he had used as second theme a motif next of kin to one in a Concerto for Double-Bass not unknown at Symphony Hall. The venerable and learned editor of the program had no need to take cover behind quotation from Mr. Shaw's epistle to "Fanny's First Play." He must know, like most of us in his trade, receptivity of the matinee audience for such a familiar trait. Does it absorb a gossip secret less avidly than music? Doubtfully not.

Moreover what more natural and creditable to Dr. Koussevitzky than the will to write such an anniversary piece? He did not merely practice his profession with the Boston Symphony Orchestra. In its fiftieth year it is the work of his life, the pride of his heart, the pre-occupation of his mind. He gives no more than he exacts. One after another his hands were coming the works of composers commissioned to celebrate the occasion. Was it only to be marked out in the family mansion? Should not the house make also his contribution? Dr. Koussevitzky has impulses of the rest of us; he thought himself of a hymn-theme from "A Life for the Tsar" to many a Russian, noble and both—put pen to music-paper in leisure of summer. When he finished his holiday-task, the organ had declaimed the theme; the orchestral choirs caught and merged it. To fugal progress and measures interposed had succeeded, at last, upswelling climax. Rejoice, and yet remember obligation and the artist's honor.

In survey, reviewer-fashion, an anniversary overture so conceived and befitting would be as impertinent as to a critical memorandum to the author of a birthday speech. Do we who tell the full-hearted spokesman in transitions his discourse sagged; we should have preferred a more direct and slowly-mounting peroration that his management of words—or his instance instruments—might have been clearer and more idiomatic? If we do so much, we do so in the bosom of family—in the intimacy that after years prevails between conductor and hearers at Symphony Hall. Rather than look behind to the impelling will—the sincere, overflowing desire that the jubilee of the orchestra should be marked by composition in its own name. Loyalties made this festival overture eagerly, earnestly, honestly. For secret of Polichinelle that there is no keeping. Remember, however, that an act of prideful devotion.

The symphonies divided the remainder of the afternoon. One, new, brief, youthful lyric, was work of Nicolas Nabokov, Russian exile in Paris, about whom and fellow-composer, Dukelsky, elsewhere in this paper. The other, Tchaikovsky's Fourth, in F minor, as Specht in his life of Johannes Brahms, recently translated into English, to give a personal reason for Brahms's dislike of Tchaikovsky and his music.

But how could Brahms appreciate Peter? How could Peter enjoy the music of Johannes? Peter in his sadness, in his mental agony sometimes shrieks; but Brahms in his pessimistic mood, even in his forced gaiety, often whines.

It was an experience to hear the fourth symphony performed as it was yesterday; interpreted with understanding, national spirit, artistic gusto by Dr. Koussevitzky; performed so eloquently and with as phenomenal a display of technical proficiency, by this incomparable orchestra.

The concert will be repeated tonight. The program of next week comprises Handel's Concerto Grosso for strings, B minor No. 12; Mozart's Clarinet concerto (Mr. Polatschek, clarinetist); the seventh Symphony of Sibelius; and Respighi's "Metamorphoseon" (theme and 12 variations written for the 50th anniversary of the orchestra.

Music

Monitor Nov. 1, 1930
Koussevitzky as Composer

On the fourth program of the Jubilee season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra (Oct. 31-Nov. 1) stood an Overture by one who preferred to be listed as "Anonymous," an overture written expressly for the fiftieth anniversary of the orchestra and at this time given its first hearing. There followed a Symphony by Nicolas Nabokov and the Tchaikovsky Symphony No. 4 in F minor.

Despite the effort of the composer of the anniversary overture to maintain his anonymity, his hand betrayed him. Not only his hand, but his thematic material as well. And if that were not sufficient evidence, one must be dull indeed who could not guess his identity when, upon the completion of the number, the orchestra rose as one man and saluted its conductor. With orchestra standing, the audience felt need for more complete outlet to its enthusiasm, and also rose, the while it gave vigorous approval of a composition which, after all, Dr. Koussevitzky need not be modest in acknowledging. It is based upon two themes, the principal one of which, from "A Life for the Tsar," was chosen by the composer as peculiarly befitting the occasion. The opening lines are given out by the organ. There follows an excellent piece of contrapuntal writing in which the entire orchestra is utilized. The second theme is avowedly Dr. Koussevitzky's own, yet it has a strangely haunting melody, which persistently recalls the Concerto for double-bass which this virtuoso of the instrument has made familiar to Boston audiences. The principal theme is worked out at considerable length, and the overture is brought to a smashing close with fortissimi in all the choirs—the sort of close calculated to bring one up standing, if one has projected oneself into the piece. In all a brilliantly sonorous composition, worthy the name of its composer, who after all, was a musical virtuoso before he became a conductor, a fact which we are sometimes prone to overlook in the light of his more recent accomplishments.

Sharing the program, by way of novelty, came the symphony by Nabokov, given its first performance in the United States. This composer is widely recognized as the author of a ballet-oratorio which he named "Ode," and numerous other works for piano and orchestra. Built upon thematic material of singular beauty, the symphony is well knit. The form is clear, in fact, extremely orthodox, and the movements, of which there are three, all hold the attention. One might express a preference for the second, a Largo, and in no wise deprecate the remaining two. Although the composer had not so indicated it, the program contained the additional word "Lyric" in announcing the number. The word is correctly descriptive, yet in each movement come passages as virile as any penned by even the great Tchaikovsky himself. The symphony was extraordinarily well received.

A masterly performance of the Tchaikovsky Fourth Symphony once more brought to our attention that the plinth upon which this tonal giant stands is firmly grounded upon the whole-hearted approbation of an appreciative public. Dr. Koussevitzky and his men richly deserved the storm of applause at the conclusion of the symphony, which closed one more all-Russian program of distinction.

G. M. S.

Conductor Discovers As C

Koussevitzky D His Own Fest Two Russian

At ten minutes after noon acted—none Symphony I week, came to an end sounded the last ch contributed anony celebration of the year. Applause swell sonorous close. Dr. to acknowledge it. pre-concerted signal orchestra—at the fu score demanded—ros bows and hands ma approval; so saluted anonymous composer as thirty seconds I trayed the irritation own ruse; as speed clapping before and time excitable ladle with more or less of gling behind them, warm recall; and it the program leaf:

Festival Overture on a Opera, "A Life for the (First Pe

Did one hundred gossiping town or keep a secret? No: newer romance? An last Monday, Dr. K fided his authorshi Did no one believe rary, The Post, he much next day? "the paper" at quit runs could read w for The Transcrip larities in the score Koussevitzky, and composer. Admitte written the overtu number of instrum orchestra, in exac which it is divided as second theme a one in a Concerto f known at Symphony Hall. The venerable and learned editor of the program-book had no need to take cover behind an apt quotation from Mr. Shaw's epilogue to "Fanny's First Play." He must have known, like most of us in his trade. The receptivity of the matinee audience is familiar trait. Does it absorb a gossipers' secret less avidly than music? Probably not.

Moreover what more natural and creditable to Dr. Koussevitzky than the will to write such an anniversary piece? He does not merely practice his profession upon the Boston Symphony Orchestra. In its fiftieth year it is the work of his hand, the pride of his heart, the pre-occupation of his mind. He gives no less than he exacts. One after another into his hands were coming the works of composers commissioned to celebrate the jubilee. Was it only to be marked outside the family mansion? Should not the head of the house make also his contribution? Dr. Koussevitzky has impulses as the rest of us; bethought himself of the hymn-theme from "A Life for the Tsar"—to many a Russian, noble and festive both—put pen to music-paper in the leisure of summer. When he finished his holiday-task, the organ had declaimed the theme; the orchestral choirs caught and energized it. To fugal progress and gentler measures interposed had succeeded stately, upswelling climax. Rejoice, be glad; yet remember obligation and keep the artist's honor.

To survey, reviewer-fashion, an anniversary overture so conceived and bestowed would be as impertinent as to send a critical memorandum to the maker of a birthday speech. Do we who listened tell the full-hearted spokesman that in transitions his discourse sagged; that we should have preferred a more spacious and slowly-mounting peroration; that his management of words—or in this instance instruments—might have been clearer and more idiomatic? If we hint as much, we do so in the bosom of the family—in the intimacy that after seven years prevails between conductor and hearers at Symphony Hall. Rather we look behind to the impelling will—the simple, sincere, overflowing desire that the jubilee of the orchestra should be celebrated by composition in its own house. Loyalties made this festival overture, eagerly, earnestly, honestly. Forget a secret of Polichinelle that there was no keeping. Remember, however imperfect, an act of prideful devotion.

Two symphonies divided the remainder of the afternoon. One, new, brief, youthful and lyric, was work of Nicolas Nabokov. Russian exile in Paris, about whom his friend and fellow-composer, Dukelsky, writes elsewhere in this paper. The other was Chaikovsky's Fourth, in F minor, as in annual pilgrimage to a favorite spot re-lighted since Dr. Koussevitzky, abouts, became high priest. Yesterday, with the Fourth, he chose the illumination was magnificent. The conductor has his moods with each the composer's surviving symphony. Yesterday, with the Fourth, he chose the epic vein. In the introduction he the orchestra thunder forth the most overwhelming fate. It sounded as will of all the gods upon all human. The orchestra sang the melancholy tune and mortals fondled ruefully sensuous being. The orchestra for these measures; tossed about in the less, importunate, dolorous Chaikov mood. The conductor dramatized it it sounded universal. He hushed the movement into a fantasmal music, sad-eyed phantoms of remembrance. scherzo of the plucked strings was wardly the feat of virtuosi; in imitation, mankind's fancies coming troubled wisps, spinning out of now, vanishing no whither. The finale rioted Russian; but most of us have known such desperate flogging of our gayer energies. And now and again the gods' decree sounded through, immutable, unescapable.

So to dramatize this Fourth Symphony is to put out of mind Chaikovsky's shortcomings and mannerisms as symphonist. So to turn him epic is to lift to heroic and universal plane the introspection, the avowals, the self-pitying outcry of a singular and haunted temperament. The Symphony in F minor endured this exaltation above its intrinsic self; gave reason, as it seemed, for this plangent, far-spreading voice. Beside it, so transfigured, even the Fifth—to say nothing of the inferior "Pathetic"—paled. The moral is clear: In these days no conductor can play Chaikovsky objectively. literally, or as "repertory." Even to the Fourth and the Fifth symphonies, there must be new imaginative approach or they fail. Dr. Koussevitzky finds it variously. The ghost of Chaikovsky, wandering, no doubt restless and mournful-eyed among the shades, should warm as it hears him.

Mr. Nabokov's symphony is brief and rhythmic, as becomes his time and surroundings. It traverses only three movements; the last a scherzo-finale, mostly scherzo until, after pause, a few chords bring the end, deeper-toned and grave, in a moment of firm imagination. Elsewhere scherzo-like motifs and rhythmic figures play about, directed with skill, sped by fancy, owing little in casual hearing to the usually unescapable Stravinsky or Prokofiev. Expose a romantic composer of the middle of the nineteenth century to the influence of the current musical air and he might have written so, with his undercurrent of melody. Old feeling, new expression go hand in hand. The listener cannot choose but hear. The first movement is as buoyantly and impetuously rhythmic. Above or piercing through, firmly outlined motifs yield an ardent but not too obvious melody. The changeable mood is the mood of romantic fantasia.

The listener begins to suspect a young composer with a personal will, inventing his own matter, choosing his own manner. The slow movement is confirmation. The darker and the lighter strings persist in songful measures. They flow firm and warm, musing-melancholy. At moments they sound strange, and Mr. Nabokov's countrymen say that old Russian melody haunts them. The harmonic and instrumental color accords, yet partakes of this immediate day. New and old again and once more the romantic vein. Believably, Mr. Nabokov has a future. H. T. P.

RUSSIAN MUSIC AT SYMPHONY CONCERT

"Anonymous" Overture Is by Koussevitzky

New "Lyric Symphony," by Nabokov, in First American Performance

By Globe Nov. 1, 1936

The program of yesterday's Boston Symphony concert began with an overture, "First time: Written for the 50th anniversary of the Boston Symphony Orchestra." In place of the composer's name stood, for the first time in 50 seasons, the word "Anonymous." A program note stated "The author seldom composes, and for this reason does not wish to make known his identity."

But at the end of the piece the players in the orchestra gave the secret away by standing in a body and applauding their conductor. The audience, grasping the situation, also, for the most part, rose, and clapped Dr. Koussevitzky loud and long. So gossip and newspaper reporters turned out to be accurate in indicating who wrote the much talked of "anonymous" piece.

If a malicious rumor, more than once published in recent years, that Dr. Koussevitzky "cannot read an orchestral score," had reached his ears, he took an ingenious way of refuting it. Plainly, a man able to write an orchestral score can read one written by somebody else. It ought to have been obvious that nobody unable to read score could conduct with any approximation to the conspicuous success of Dr. Koussevitzky. So absurd a story would not deserve mention here had it not recently been revived by a periodical with national circulation.

For the principal theme of his overture, Dr. Koussevitzky turned to Glinka's opera "A Life for the Tsar," and borrowed one which seemed to him, rightly enough, to have the imaginative quality appropriate to a solemn commemoration of the orchestra's jubilee. This theme is worked out contrapuntally. For a contrasting episode there is a slow melody, of Dr. Koussevitzky's own. This is not developed.

The instrumentation of the overture is ingenious. It begins with a passage for organ alone, and eventually works up to a climax for full orchestra and organ. The counterpoint, like the form of the work, is free rather than orthodox. The whole piece has the mounting sonorities, the heaped-up rhythms one expects of a festival overture. It is frankly an "occasional piece" and as such serves its purpose adequately.

Another novelty on the program was a "Symphonie Lyrique" by Nicolas Nabokov, a young Russian living in Paris. This work, first performed by the Orchestre Symphonique de Paris, Pierre Monteux, conductor, last February, is in three relatively brief movements. Its style recalls Tchaikovsky and Glazunov rather than Stravinsky and Prokofiev, though there are, especially in the first movement, passages relatively modern in harmony.

Nabokov's themes are often frankly, not to say conventionally, melodious. Like most Russians, he repeats them in alternation without much effort at the kind of development that has dominated German music since Beethoven. This work is mildly agreeable at a first hearing, but in no way memorable. Its brevity is its outstanding merit.

Tchaikovsky's Fourth Symphony, the remaining number on an all-Russian program, brought out Dr. Koussevitzky's best powers. No other conductor known here approaches his eloquence and emotional intensity in this music. He shapes its melodies with the utmost subtlety and tact. He builds up its climaxes with an amazing virtuosity. Yesterday's performance was, like others he has given, memorable. It is improbable that we shall ever hear Tchaikovsky so magnificently interpreted by anyone else. In his music, at all events, Dr. Koussevitzky's supremacy cannot now be challenged.

After each movement there were bursts of applause, promptly suppressed. At the end there was no mistaking the fervor of the audience.

A listener who has always disliked what seems to him the vulgarity, the bombast, the not infrequent triviality of Tchaikovsky was forced yesterday to admit that this Fourth Symphony, rightly interpreted, is a masterpiece of its kind. Its hysterical outbursts may be offensive, its sins against good taste manifold. But one cannot listen to it unmoved, and a certain reluctant admiration mingles with one's irritations. After all, it says something for this symphony that after 50 years fastidious listeners are still arguing heatedly over Tchaikovsky's qualities and defects as a composer, and average audiences are being deeply stirred by his eloquence.

Next week the new first clarinet of the Boston Symphony, Victor Polatschek, from Vienna, will play a Mozart concerto. The other numbers are Sibelius' Seventh Symphony, a Handel concerto grosso in B minor, and a new work by Respighi, entitled "Metamorphoseon," a set of variations written especially for the 50th anniversary of the orchestra.

P. R.

SYMPHONY HONORED BY CONDUCTOR

Koussevitzky's Over- ture Scores Tre- mendous Hit

Post Nov. 1, 1930.

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

Neither Anonymous, that versatile and prolific writer, nor Serge Koussevitzky had appeared as composer upon a programme of a Symphony Concert until yesterday afternoon when they made their bow as authors of the same piece; an overture, written, so the programme-book stated, for the 50th anniversary of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

RISES TO COMPOSER

That programme book, to be sure, gave all the credit to Anonymous. But it was Dr. Koussevitzky who received and acknowledged the swelling, long-continued plaudits of an orchestra and audience standing in spontaneous tribute.

Had not the orchestra, with Mr. Burgin at its head, risen first, no doubt many in the audience might be wondering to this minute who Anonymous was. But when the players stood and began to clap or, if they were suitably equipped, to strike the wood of their bows against the backs of their fiddles, everyone must have realized that Anonymous and Dr. Koussevitzky were one.

Effectively Written

"The author," so read the programme-notes, "seldom composes, and for this reason does not wish to make known his identity." But "the author" was far too modest. His piece does him credit.

It is workmanlike and effective; it is well put together and well written for the instruments; it sounds; it breathes both a solemn and a festal note. The end is exciting, and the audience would most surely have applauded the piece had its authorship remained an unsolved riddle or had some name other than that of a well-beloved figure been signed to it.

For the chief theme of his Overture Dr. Koussevitzky went to his countryman, Glinka, specifically to that composer's masterwork, the opera, "A Life for the Tzar," which yielded him a melody that he believed to be ideally suited to his conception of a solemn overture on the Boston Symphony's Jubilee.

The second theme bears a striking resemblance to one in Dr. Koussevitzky's own highly effective concerto for the double bass that he has twice played in Boston. Indeed, it was this resemblance that confirmed the suspicions of certain members of the orchestra when the overture was first put in rehearsal last Monday. Instead of the conventional development, Dr. Koussevitzky has written a fugue—and a good one—and there is a jubilant coda. Incidentally, the piece is scored for an orchestra exactly the size of the Boston Symphony, so that every man had a part to play.

New Symphony Pleases

The remaining numbers on an all-Russian programme were a new Symphony by Nicolas Nabokov, a young man of 27, one of the numerous Russian expatriates who have found a home in Paris, and the Fourth Symphony of Tchaikovsky.

The Symphony of Nabokov reveals a graceful and agreeable talent. The piece is, in fact, entitled "Symphonie Lyrique," and it proved in the hearing not only fluently but pleasantly melodious.

There were even Kagernian hints and suggestions, if not actual reminiscences. Have our young men then become again romantic and emotional? Are they turning their backs on the Stravinsky of "Le Sacre" and going unashamedly to "Tristan," that storehouse from which their fathers helped themselves liberally? By the evidence of Mr. Nabokov, that is exactly what they are doing, but we must wait and see whether he is typical of his generation or is merely satisfying an individual lyric impulse in defiance of existing musical tendencies. But if, as Vincent d'Indy has suggested, art moves ever in a spiral, romanticism and melody should some day come back. There will be those who will not complain if they do.

The performance of Tchaikovsky's Symphony was one in which all the salient features, the most characteristic qualities of this intensely personal music, were brought out, and hence one that did not disguise or minimize its occasional blatant vulgarity.

FIFTIETH SEASON, NINETEEN HUNDRED THIRTY AND THIRTY-ONE

Fifth Programme

FRIDAY AFTERNOON, NOVEMBER 7, at 2.30 o'clock

SATURDAY EVENING, NOVEMBER 8, at 8.15 o'clock

Handel Concerto Grosso for String Orchestra in B minor, No. 12
Largo—Allegro—Larghetto e piano—Largo—Allegro

Respighi Metamorphoseon, Modi XII (Theme and Variations)

(First Performance: composed for the fiftieth anniversary of the Boston Symphony Orchestra)

- Theme : Andante moderato.
- Modus I: Moderato non troppo.
- Modus II: Allegretto.
- Modus III: Lento.
- Modus IV: Lento espressivo.
- Modus V: Molto vivace.
- Modus VI: Viva.
- Modus VII: Allegro moderato (Cadenze).
- Modus VIII: Andantino.
- Modus IX: Lento.
- Modus X: Molto allegro.
- Modus XI: Molto allegro.
- Modus XII: Vivo non troppo.

Brahms Symphony No. 2 in D major, Op. 73

- I. Allegro non troppo.
- II. Adagio non troppo.
- III. Allegretto grazioso, quasi andantino.
- IV. Allegro con spirito.

There will be an intermission before the symphony

The works to be played at these concerts may be seen in the Allen A. Brown Music Collection of the Boston Public Library one week before the concert

SYMPHONY HONORED BY CONDUCTOR

Koussevitzky's Over- ture Scores Tre- mendous Hit

Post Nov. 1, 1930.

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

Neither Anonymous, that versatile and prolific writer, nor Serge Koussevitzky had appeared as composer upon a programme of a Symphony Concert until yesterday afternoon when they made their bow as authors of the same piece; an overture, written, so the programme-book stated, for the 50th anniversary of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

RISES TO COMPOSER

That programme book, to be sure, gave all the credit to Anonymous. But it was Dr. Koussevitzky who received and acknowledged the swelling, long-continued plaudits of an orchestra and audience standing in spontaneous tribute.

Had not the orchestra, with Mr. Burgin at its head, risen first, no doubt many in the audience might be wondering to this minute who Anonymous was. But when the players stood and began to clap or, if they were suitably equipped, to strike the wood of their bows against the backs of their fiddles, everyone must have realized that Anonymous and Dr. Koussevitzky were one.

Effectively Written

"The author," so read the programme-notes, "seldom composes, and for this reason does not wish to make known his identity." But "the author" was far too modest. His piece does him credit.

It is workmanlike and effective; it is well put together and well written for the instruments; it sounds; it breathes both a solemn and a festal note. The end is exciting, and the audience would most surely have applauded the piece had its authorship remained an unsolved riddle or had some name other than that of a well-beloved figure been signed to it.

For the chief theme of his Overture Dr. Koussevitzky went to his countryman, Glinka, specifically to that composer's masterwork, the opera, "A Life for the Tzar," which yielded him a melody that he believed to be ideally suited to his conception of a solemn overture on the Boston Symphony's Jubilee.

The second theme bears a striking resemblance to one in Dr. Koussevitzky's own highly effective concerto for the double bass that he has twice played in Boston. Indeed, it was this resemblance that confirmed the suspicions of certain members of the orchestra when the overture was first put in rehearsal last Monday. Instead of the conventional development, Dr. Koussevitzky has written a fugue—and a good one—and there is a jubilant coda. Incidentally, the piece is scored for an orchestra exactly the size of the Boston Symphony, so that every man had a part to play.

New Symphony Pleases

The remaining numbers on an all-Russian programme were a new Symphony by Nicolas Nabokov, a young man of 27, one of the numerous Russian expatriates who have found a home in Paris, and the Fourth Symphony of Tchaikovsky.

The Symphony of Nabokov reveals a graceful and agreeable talent. The piece is, in fact, entitled "Symphonie Lyrique," and it proved in the hearing not only fluently but pleasantly melodious.

There were even Kagernian hints and suggestions, if not actual reminiscences. Have our young men then become again romantic and emotional? Are they turning their backs on the Stravinsky of "Le Sacre" and going unashamedly to "Tristan," that storehouse from which their fathers helped themselves liberally? By the evidence of Mr. Nabokov, that is exactly what they are doing, but we must wait and see whether he is typical of his generation or is merely satisfying an individual lyric impulse in defiance of existing musical tendencies. But if, as Vincent d'Indy has suggested, art moves ever in a spiral, romanticism and melody should some day come back. There will be those who will not complain if they do.

The performance of Tchaikovsky's Symphony was one in which all the salient features, the most characteristic qualities of this intensely personal music, were brought out, and hence one that did not disguise or minimize its occasional blatant vulgarity.

FIFTIETH SEASON, NINETEEN HUNDRED THIRTY AND THIRTY-ONE

Fifth Programme

FRIDAY AFTERNOON, NOVEMBER 7, at 2.30 o'clock

SATURDAY EVENING, NOVEMBER 8, at 8.15 o'clock

Handel Concerto Grosso for String Orchestra in B minor, No. 12
Largo—Allegro—Larghetto e piano—Largo—Allegro

Respighi Metamorphoseon, Modi XII (Theme and Variations)

(First Performance: composed for the fiftieth anniversary of the Boston Symphony Orchestra)

Theme : Andante moderato.
Modus I: Moderato non troppo.
Modus II: Allegretto.
Modus III: Lento.
Modus IV: Lento espressivo.
Modus V: Molto vivace.
Modus VI: Viva.
Modus VII: Allegro moderato (Cadenze).
Modus VIII: Andantino.
Modus IX: Lento.
Modus X: Molto allegro.
Modus XI: Molto allegro.
Modus XII: Vivo non troppo.

Brahms Symphony No. 2 in D major, Op. 73

I. Allegro non troppo.
II. Adagio non troppo.
III. Allegretto grazioso, quasi andantino.
IV. Allegro con spirito.

There will be an intermission before the symphony

The works to be played at these concerts may be seen in the Allen A. Brown Music Collection of the Boston Public Library one week before the concert

LAVIOSA

OTTORINO RESPIGHI

Respighi studied music at first with his father. Later he entered the Liceo Musicale of Bologna, and studied violin playing with Federico Sarti; composition with Giuseppe Martucci.* Graduated in 1901, he journeyed in foreign countries. Living in Russia for a time, he took lessons of Rimsky-Korsakov in Leningrad, with Max Bruch in Berlin. In 1913 he was appointed professor of composition in the Liceo Musicale, Bologna. He resigned this position in 1923 to become director of the Santa Cecilia Conservatory in Rome. This position he gave up in 1926.

MUSIC

SYMPHONY CONCERT

By PHILIP HALE

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Koussevitzky conductor, gave the fifth concert of the present, the 50th season, yesterday afternoon. The program was as follows: Handel, Concerto Grosso for string orchestra, B minor No. 12; Respighi, "Metamorphoseon, Mod. XII," which being interpreted means "Theme and 12 Variations"—first performance, written for the orchestra jubilee. Brahms, Symphony, D major, No. 2.

Respighi's "Metamorphoseon" is a perfunctory work, interesting only by the brilliance of the orchestration. The musical ideas are negligible when they are not wholly lacking. The theme is neither impressive in stateliness nor charming by reason of beauty. This Italian gentleman who has given pleasure by his arrangements of old airs for the lute; by his "Fountains" and his "Pines" of Rome; by the dramatic fury of his "Ballade of the Gnomides" accepted a task. He could not therefore write spontaneously. There was a forced draught. Already by his "Roman Festivals" he showed that his inventive flow was checked; that he was obliged to rely chiefly on gorgeous clothing for his anaemic musical body; on gorgeous clothing and on thunderous sonority. Is it not possible that he has been writing too much and without critical thought?

This latest composition is first of all monotonous by reason of an apparently persistent tonality, also by scholastic and hard labor in the variation form. It evidently occurred to him that this orchestra was blessed with skilful solo players of instruments; so he said to himself: "Come now, I will write cadenzas for these gifted players, so that they may show their dexterity, and men of the harp, horn, flute, violin, oboe, clarinet, etc., rejoicing in an opportunity of exhibiting their skill, will use up and call me blessed." The various artists thus called on did their prettiest, but the cadenza variation reminded one of examination-day at a music school. It is surprising that Respighi did not introduce a cadenza for the organ pedals. The organ was there; the organist was capable and the organ helped swell the din in the expected apotheosis designed to excite applause.

Dr. Koussevitzky and the players did all that could be done to give distinction to this music. For once their labor was in vain; there could be no glorification of what was inherently without true strength or beauty, for splendor of orchestration will not cover paucity of musical ideas.

The latest biographers of Johannes Brahms differ curiously concerning the character of the second symphony. The excellent Walter Niemann finds a tragic undercurrent; ghostly elements "glimmering in a supernatural uncanny way"; even "mysterious Wagnerian visions." The equally excellent Richard Specht finds sunshine, fair days, warm winds, clarity and tenderness. The performance yesterday was pleasing, effective in that Dr. Koussevitzky found music in this symphony and shared his enjoyment with the audience.

Brahms can on occasion be gloomy and crabbed enough. Why cannot Mr. Niemann, a devoted admirer of Johannes, allow him to be cheerful once in a while, as in this second symphony?

Handel's concerto in B minor is nearly 200 years old. The vitality of the allegri; the eloquent simplicity, the serenity of the slow movement; the calm olympian authority displayed throughout—these put the rhythmic frenzy, the melodic sterility, the search after "originality" characterizing so much contemporaneous music to shame and confusion.

"Beauty lives not for the self-glorification of the priests of any art, but for the enjoyment of priests and laity alike. He is the best art-priest who brings most beauty most home to the hearts of most men," wrote Samuel Butler in a note book. For his idolatrous worship of Handel one can forgive Butler for attempting to compose in the Handelian manner, as one has a warmer liking for Stravinsky because he too endeavored in his "Oedipus Rex" to pay "the most superb personage one meets in the history of music" a similar homage.

The concert will be repeated tonight. The program of next week is announced as comprising these works: Mozart's Overture to "The Major Flute"; also his Clarinet Concerto (Mr. Polatschek, clarinetist); Prokofieff's Symphony No. 4 (composed for the orchestra's jubilee); Rimsky-Korsakov's Caprice on Spanish themes.

VIRTUOSITY TESTS FOR SYMPHONY

Respighi's Variations Climaxed in the Seventh

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

Save for the first, which marked the semi-centenary is another way, each of the programmes of the five pairs of concerts of the current Symphony season has offered a piece written in commemoration of the orchestra's 50th anniversary. Yesterday, as it will be again this evening, this new piece was one from the hand of Ottorino Respighi, bearing the imposing title "Metamorphoseon, Modi XII." (Theme and Variations.)

GLIB RATHER THAN POETIC

Signor Respighi is a fluent and fertile maker of music. Since 1920 a dozen pieces by him have been played at the Symphony concerts, and there are operas and other works that Boston does not know. All of these compositions show the hand of an able craftsman, especially of one who has solved the mysteries and mastered the complexities of modern orchestration. But the very soundness of Respighi's technical equipment, combined with a ready flow of musical ideas, enables him to talk easily and also agreeably even when he has nothing much to say. Not all of his subsequent works have attained to the level of the "Fountains of Rome," by which a decade ago the orchestral Respighi was first made known to us. Some, indeed, have fallen far below it. And the new Variations must be considered of the glib and resourceful rather than of the imaginative and poetic Respighi.

The theme itself, richly proclaimed, is arresting and impressive, and for a time the variations firmly hold the attention. One of them in particular, the seventh, caught the audience's ear, and no wonder. To this variation is affixed the caption Cadenze. In turn, yesterday, the harp of Mr. Zighera, the cello of Mr. Bedetti, the violin of Mr. Burgin, the viola of Mr. Lefranc, the horn of Mr. Boettcher, the bassoon of Mr. Laus, the flute of Mr. Laurent, the clarinet of Mr. Polatschek and the oboe of Mr. Gilet were heard in displayful passages that might have been culled from concertos for the several instruments. But from then on it became an increasingly difficult task to listen to the "Metamorphoseon" with attentive interest. In particular, the eighth and ninth variations seemed superfluous, and the sonorous close could not altogether efface the impression that Respighi had grown diffuse and verbose, that much of this latest music was manufactured, lacking the true creative impulse.

Change in List

Incidentally these Variations, and not only that of the showy cadenzas, are taxing even for a virtuoso orchestra, so taxing in fact that the preparation of them made necessary certain changes in the announced programme. For the Seventh Symphony of Sibelius and the Clarinet Concerto of Mozart, Dr. Koussevitzky must needs substitute the Second Symphony of Brahms, a work that the orchestra has at its finger-tips. As it happened the change was a fortunate one. After Respighi, Brahms was good to hear, especially in the first movement, which is the glory of this Second Symphony.

Of this Symphony, Dr. Koussevitzky achieved an eloquent and glowing performance. Notably played, too, was Handel's Twelfth Concerto Grosso which the concert opened, not the most ingratiating of the set, although it does contain a noble Larghetto that only Handel could have written. Furthermore, the performance of the "Metamorphoseon" represented a signal triumph over formidable difficulties. With reason at the conclusion of the piece, Dr. Koussevitzky bade his players rise and take the applause unto themselves.

Eleventh Hour Rescue of the Symphonic Day

Respighi's Empty Variations, Over-Strained Handel, Saving Brahms

IT WAS bound to happen. It might have come sooner and it might have been worse. . . . At the suggestion of Dr. Koussevitzky twelve or more composers are under commission to write "new and original" pieces for the present fiftieth year of the Symphony Concerts. Since the Boston Orchestra has regained international fame, the choice of contributors to its jubilee rites ranges as widely. One by one they are delivering their manuscripts, to be the property of Symphony Hall through a year. First came Mr. Hill's Commemorative Ode at a respectable level of occasional music. Next, the notable Symphony of Roussel, received as warmly as it was written. Then, without commission, followed the Solemn Overture of the conductor himself. It was made from the heart to release his pride in the orchestra at this semi-centenary season, his devotion, past, present, future, to its fortunes. It touched reciprocating feeling, if it did not always persuade the ear. Prokofiev's new Symphony is announced for next week. Stravinsky's Psalms lie on the library shelf. Other contributions—three, at least, from American hands—await Dr. Koussevitzky's pleasure.

Yesterday it was the turn of Mr. Respighi, and the eminent Italian had evidently found himself in the plight that even now may be harassing one and another of his commissioned colleagues. He had accepted an invitation that did him honor; but when he came to fulfill it, his mind was alight with no creative idea. No new tonal pageant of Rome outspread upon his imagination, to be added to the fountains, the pines, the festivals, that have made his reputation at home and abroad. He had exhausted cathedral windows; put by the sinister grotesquerie of his early Gnomides. He could not transcribe Bach of the organ-loft, as he did for Mr. Toscanini and the Philharmonic Society of New York. Nor could he put together a Suite of old airs and dances for te—enhanced into a light modern tra. The commission asked inde it work.

posers are but men; and the human, as the professional, refuge in such cy was formalism. Ready to perience hand lay too convenient alner. It is true that of a theme riations Strauss made one of his pieces, "Don Quixote." In the best ernist operas, "Wozzeck," Berg has them to potent theatric and dram age. Brahms's "St. Antoni" varia- Elgar's "Enigma" variations, Reg- riations and fugue on a theme by each sings the composer's praises. a thousand and one other com- this tempting form has been cloak ssing or continuous sterility.

mingly the Signore salves an un- conscience. He gives his theme and variations a semi-fantastic, semi- ly, title. Together they shall make tamorphoseon"; while each varia- all be labelled a "Modus." Through e way their course shall recall the ss of a symphony: slow introduc- ulcker-paced first movement; slow ent; scherzo—to be followed, first, ecorative intermezzo; then by slow ng to an upspringing finale. This at variation shall not lack quasi- ate melody; more than one shall i display the virtuosity of a band iosi. At the end there shall be no d, climactic, roof-shaking fugue. when Mr. Respighi undertook to se thirteen waiting jars, scarcely cal idea came to him. The or- announces his theme; ear and eceive it—with no other sensation statement in notes devoid of dis- quality. Twelve times over, he s to transform, diversify and deco- Only as decoration do the varia- terest or impress—intermittently. he may, Mr. Respighi cannot fer- s theme; lead it through a dozen tions in as many moods. His faculty is dormant. His scholar- erts him. There is no room for d pictorial sense. But the Sig- a master of orchestration—true the finesse and piquancy of the sumptuous, and occasionally resource of Strauss; but in his a master none the less. To it, lth endless play of instrumental eked out with harmonic vesture thmic impetus. The orchestra n masse, in groups, in individual In a whole variation of cadenzas, e bassoon and the bass-clarinet urn. There are ornamental fig- curring passage-work, anything ything that an orchestra and all rein is can do—not too subtly.

VIRTUOSITY TESTS FOR SYMPHONY

Respighi's Variations Climaxed in the Seventh

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

Save for the first, which marked the semi-centenary is another way, each of the programmes of the five pairs of concerts of the current Symphony season has offered a piece written in commemoration of the orchestra's 50th anniversary. Yesterday, as it will be again this evening, this new piece was one from the hand of Ottorino Respighi, bearing the imposing title "Metamorphoseon, Modi XII." (Theme and Variations.)

GLIB RATHER THAN POETIC

Signor Respighi is a fluent and fertile maker of music. Since 1920 a dozen pieces by him have been played at the Symphony concerts, and there are operas and other works that Boston does not know. All of these compositions show the hand of an able craftsman, especially of one who has solved the mysteries and mastered the complexities of modern orchestration. But the very soundness of Respighi's technical equipment, combined with a ready flow of musical ideas, enables him to talk easily and also agreeably even when he has nothing much to say. Not all of his subsequent works have attained to the level of the "Fountains of Rome," by which a decade ago the orchestral Respighi was first made known to us. Some, indeed, have fallen far below it. And the new Variations must be considered of the glib and resourceful rather than of the imaginative and poetic Respighi.

The theme itself, richly proclaimed, is arresting and impressive, and for a time the variations firmly hold the attention. One of them in particular, the seventh, caught the audience's ear, and no wonder. To this variation is affixed the caption Cadenze. In turn, yesterday, the harp of Mr. Zighera, the cello of Mr. Bedetti, the violin of Mr. Burgin, the viola of Mr. Lefranc, the horn of Mr. Boettcher, the bassoon of Mr. Laus, the flute of Mr. Laurent, the clarinet of Mr. Polatschek and the oboe of Mr. Gillet were heard in displayful passages that might have been culled from concertos for the several instruments. But from then on it became an increasingly difficult task to listen to the "Metamorphoseon" with attentive interest. In particular, the eighth and ninth variations seemed superfluous, and the sonorous close could not altogether efface the impression that Respighi had grown diffuse and verbose, that much of this latest music was manufactured, lacking the true creative impulse.

Change in List

Incidentally these Variations, and not only that of the showy cadenzas, are taxing even for a virtuoso orchestra, so taxing in fact that the preparation of them made necessary certain changes in the announced programme. For the Seventh Symphony of Sibelius and the Clarinet Concerto of Mozart, Dr. Koussevitzky must needs substitute the Second Symphony of Brahms, a work that the orchestra has at its finger-tips. As it happened the change was a fortunate one. After Respighi, Brahms was good to hear, especially in the first movement, which is the glory of this Second Symphony.

Of this Symphony, Dr. Koussevitzky achieved an eloquent and glowing performance. Notably played, too, was Handel's Twelfth Concerto Grosso, which the concert opened, not the most ingratiating of the set, although it does contain a noble Larghetto that only Handel could have written. Furthermore, the performance of the "Metamorphoseon" represented a signal triumph over formidable difficulties. With reason at the conclusion of the piece, Dr. Koussevitzky bade his players rise and take the applause unto themselves.

Eleventh Rescue Symph

Respighi's Em Over-Strai Saving

IT WAS bound to have come soon, been worse. tion of Dr. K. more composers ar to write "new and the present fiftieth phony Concerts. S chestra has regaine the choice of contr rites ranges as wide are delivering their the property of Syn a year. First came ration Ode at a resp sional music. Nex phony of Roussel, r it was written. Th sion, followed the Sc conductor himself. the heart to release chestra at this se his devotion, past, r fortunes. It touche ing, if it did not alw Prokofiev's new Sy for next week. Str on the library shelf. —three, at least, fro await Dr. Koussevit

Yesterday it was pighi, and the emi dently found himse even now may be another of his cor He had accepted : him honor; but whe his mind was aligh No new tonal page upon his imaginati fountains, the pti have made his re abroad. He had e flows; put by the : his early Gnomides Bach of the organ Toscanini and th of New York. Na

a third Suite of old airs and dances for the lute—enhanced into a light modern orchestra. The commission asked independent work.

Composers are but men; and the human, as well as the professional, refuge in such exigency was formalism. Ready to his experienced hand lay too convenient a container. It is true that of a theme and variations Strauss made one of his masterpieces, "Don Quixote." In the best of modernist operas, "Wozzeck," Berg has turned them to potent theatric and dramatic usage. Brahms's "St. Antoni" variations, Elgar's "Enigma" variations, Regier's variations and fugue on a theme by Hiller, each sings the composer's praises. But to a thousand and one other composers this tempting form has been cloak for passing or continuous sterility.

Becomingly the Signore salves an uneasy conscience. He gives his theme and twelve variations a semi-fantastic, semi-scholarly, title. Together they shall make a "Metamorphoseon"; while each variation shall be labelled a "Modus." Through half the way their course shall recall the progress of a symphony: slow introduction, quicker-paced first movement; slow movement; scherzo—to be followed, first, by a decorative intermezzo; then by slow preluding to an upspringing finale. This and that variation shall not lack quasi-Italianate melody; more than one shall tax and display the virtuosity of a band of virtuos. At the end there shall be no extended, climactic, roof-shaking fugue.

Yet when Mr. Respighi undertook to fill these thirteen waiting jars, scarcely a musical idea came to him. The orchestra announces his theme; ear and mind receive it—with no other sensation than a statement in notes devoid of distinctive quality. Twelve times over, he proceeds to transform, diversify and decorate it. Only as decoration do the variations interest or impress—intermittently. Try as he may, Mr. Respighi cannot fertilize his theme; lead it through a dozen incarnations in as many moods. His creative faculty is dormant. His scholarship deserts him. There is no room for his vivid pictorial sense. But the Signore is a master of orchestration—true without the finesse and piquancy of Ravel or the sumptuous, and occasionally diabolic, resource of Strauss; but in his degree a master none the less. To it, then, with endless play of instrumental timbres eked out with harmonic vesture and rhythmic impetus. The orchestra sounds en masse, in groups, in individual voices. In a whole variation of cadenzas, even the bassoon and the bass-clarinet take a turn. There are ornamental figures, recurring passage-work, anything and everything that an orchestra and all that therein is can do—not too subtly.

Now, a quarter of an hour of such entertainment is amusing when the virtuosi of Symphony Hall are excelling themselves, jointly and severally; when Dr. Koussevitzky has honorably persuaded himself that Mr. Respighi's piece contains twice as much as is really there and he must draw forth the double quantity. Thirty-five minutes of uninterrupted instrumental gewgaws, gim-cracks and miscellaneous confections are another thing. The listening ears are cloyed and wearied, which condition was evident in the clapping hands when Mr. Respighi at last was done. They no more than sufficed to bring the conspicuous jugglers of cadenzas, and then the whole orchestra, to its feet. Thereupon, as though it suspected toilsome rehearsal and repeated practice at home, the audience applauded loudly. . . . And so addio to Signor Respighi. May he next return in better form—say in his orchestral transcription of Bach's Passacaglia at the spring festival.

To begin the concert, the string choir played five of the six divisions of Handel's Concerto Grosso in B minor, handsomely and justly restored to the active repertory by Dr. Koussevitzky after twenty years of neglect by his predecessors. Yet in the performance one read—or fancied one read—the nervous strain of that incessantly rehearsed "Metamorphoseon." The conductor took the slow movements at a dragging pace. Occasionally there, oftener in the quicker divisions, the strings sounded with a surprisingly edgy tone. Cassandra-like, the program-book quoted Monsieur Romain Rolland as saying that in performance Handel's instrumental music should sound like "a constant improvisation." For the first time, from Dr. Koussevitzky's hand, one of these Concerti Grossi fell short of such impression. The dragging pace in the slow movements stiffened the curve of the Handelian melody, cribbed its spaciousness, dried its beauty. Sharp tones do not suit the quick, smooth stride, the flowing counterpoint, the animated figures, of his Allegros. Throughout the Concerto it was the over-strained playing of over-tired men—as though Respighi haunted them.

Only in Brahms's Second Symphony were conductor and orchestra themselves, retrieving the concert. And this Brahms, being repertory piece, so requiring less preparation, was substitute for the announced Seventh of Sibelius—a symphony that cries for rehearsing; that more than a few have eagerly awaited; that should surely have place in concerts to come. . . . But Brahms "in D major" is no repertory piece when Dr. Koussevitzky and the orchestra play it in the

6 - 2% the singing, sunlit
08% - 3% a page—the swaying
27 - abundance, warm un-
5 - movement; through
2% + 5% se of a Brahms with-5 - 1 ade to meditate, with on his idyll until he is and-go of the scherzo.
ternation; the buoyant

27% - 1% sevitzy does not for-23% - 1% Brahms has also rug-
10 - 2% ingraind autumnal
5-16 - for a space, upon
1% - 1% ings; that shadows do
3 1/2 - 1% glinting finale, of a 30 - 1% it. He takes this 25 1/2 - 13% objectively enough;
7% + 7% rns the phrases, keeps 10 - ds revealing pace and 17 - 2 m. Subjectively, the 7% - 7% the clear color, the 11 - 2 ng course, touch him
59 - 1/2 ns smiles but will not 24% - 1% speaks out, then looks 84 - 1 omantic Brahms. The 9% - 7% -they are many nowa-
35 - H. T. P.
12 - 1 ur.
12 - 1

RESPIGHI WORK AT SYMPHONY CONCERT

"Metamorphoseon, Modi
XII," Written for Boston

Ingenious Set of Variations Tests
Virtuosity of Boston Orchestra

Week by week the importance of the announcement from Symphony Hall at the opening of the current 50th anniversary season of the Boston Symphony that a number of new works had been commissioned by the trustees becomes more manifest. Dr. Koussevitzky apparently intends to put one on each program.

Yesterday it was the turn of Respighi, whose contribution to the anniversary, an ingenious set of variations with the awe-inspiring title "Metamorphoseon, Modi XII," was played for the first time in public. Next week brings a new symphony by Prokofiev. Before the season ends, most of the chief living composers will have been represented on the program by works commissioned by the Boston Symphony.

Respighi, who conducted the Boston Symphony in a program of his works Feb 18 and 19, 1927, paid the orchestra an adroit and deserved compliment in writing the variations heard yesterday. He included showy and difficult cadenza passages for most of the principal players, which displayed their virtuosity effectively. The whole piece is written so that only a full modern orchestra of the first rank, under an eloquent leader, can do it anything like justice. Yesterday the Boston Symphony met Respighi's test triumphantly.

For Most Listeners

Sets of variations are anathema to some listeners. In the past half century few composers of note have attempted pieces in that form for orchestra, though such instances as d'Indy's "Istar" and Elgar's "Enigma Variations" come to mind as exceptions.

Respighi's title indicates his purpose. He metamorphoses his theme ingeniously, altering the pace, piling up embroidery on it. It is not obvious at a first hearing to what extent he uses the old scales known as "modes," which one might expect from the title. Some of the harmony is certainly based on them, but a true translation of "modi" would seem to be rather "forms" than "modes" in the technical sense of scales.

The real point about any new piece is not for most listeners its form, or its technique, or even the opportunities it may afford for virtuosity on the part of the players. What matters is whether the composer says anything in imaginative and emotional terms; whether the audience is held intent and absorbed by the power of the music without lapse of attention. One listener yesterday found Respighi's variations more intricate than enthralling, more ingenious than emotional.

The other numbers on the program, is it was finally rearranged, were Handel's concerto grosso in B minor, No. 12; and Brahms' Second Symphony. The strings in the Handel played less well than they often do these days in such pieces. No doubt an undue portion of rehearsal time was taken by the very exacting Respighi music.

Dr. Koussevitzky, as usual, interpreted "largo" as something slower than the pace of the proverbial snail. This comes of taking andantes and adagios too slowly. Largo must be slower still, according to modern ideas of tempi, though it is by no means clear that that it what "largo" meant to Handel. If your adagios have been as slow as possible, what is to be done with largos?

Brahm's Symphony

In the Brahms symphony one felt as on other occasions that Dr. Koussevitzky missed the lyric songlike quality of the first movement, with its very Germanic and very lovely melodies. He did the slow movement better than most other conductors have done it, and was appropriately eloquent in the finale.

But one has still to be convinced that any non-German can really do justice to this symphony, after hearing Toscanini as well as Koussevitzky interpret it. Perhaps, as often before, one's cherished memories of Dr. Muck prevent fairness to other interpreters. The program now announced for next week includes Mozart's "Magic Flute" overture, his clarinet concerto, Prokofiev's new Fourth Symphony and Rimsky-Korsakoff's "Caprice on Spanish Themes." P. R.

Longy Memorial Concert in Boston

GATHERED on the evening of Nov. 3 to do honor to the memory of Georges Longy, an audience which filled Jordan Hall, Boston, listened to a concert of unusual significance. From far and near came musicians, eager to give of their time and talent, that this tribute to friend and fellow artist might be of the finest.

To give individual mention to all those who in one manner or another lent distinction to the concert would be to list the large majority of those whose names are synonymous with musical prestige the world over. Tribute must be paid, however, to those musicians who actively assisted during the evening. The Burgin String Quartet gave a polished performance of the "Animé et près décidé" from the Debussy String Quartet. "La Cornemuse," the second of two rhapsodies for oboe, viola and piano, dedicated to M. Longy by its composer, Charles Martin Loeffler, was played with poignant understanding by Louis Speyer, Jean Lefranc and M. Longy's daughter, Renée Longy-Miquelle. In connection with this number it may be apropos to mention Philip Hale's beautiful translation of Maurice Rollinat's poem, "The Bagpipe," which adorned the printed program.

Now, a quarter of an hour of entertainment is amusing when virtuosi of Symphony Hall are excelling themselves, jointly and severally; Dr. Koussevitzky has honorably persuaded himself that Mr. Respighi's contains twice as much as is there and he must draw forth the quantity. Thirty-five minutes of interrupted instrumental gewgaws, cracks and miscellaneous confection another thing. The listening ears cloyed and wearied, which condition evident in the clapping hands when Respighi at last was done. They more than sufficed to bring the cor- uous jugglers of cadenzas, and the whole orchestra, to its feet. There as though it suspected tollsome rehe and repeated practice at home, the ence applauded loudly. . . . An addio to Signor Respighi. May he return in better form—say in his or- tral transcription of Bach's Passac at the spring festival.

To begin the concert, the string played five of the six divisions of del's Concerto Grosso in B minor, somely and justly restored to the active repertory by Dr. Koussevitzky after twenty years of neglect by his predeces- sors. Yet in the performance one read—or fancied one read—the nervous strain of that incessantly rehearsed "Metamorphoseon." The conductor took the slow movements at a dragging pace. Occasionally there, oftener in the quicker divisions, the strings sounded with a surprisingly edgy tone. Cassandra-like, the program-book quoted Monsieur Ro- main Rolland as saying that in perform- ance Handel's instrumental music should sound like "a constant improvisation." For the first time, from Dr. Kousse- vitzky's hand, one of these Concerti Grossi fell short of such impression. The dragging pace in the slow move- ments stiffened the curve of the Han- delian melody, cribbed its spaculousness, dried its beauty. Sharp tones do not suit the quick, smooth stride, the flowing counterpoint, the animated figures, of his Allegros. Throughout the Concerto it was the over-strained playing of over- tired men—as though Respighi haunted them.

Only in Brahms's Second Symphony were conductor and orchestra themselves, retrieving the concert. And this Brahms, being repertory piece, so requiring less preparation, was substitute for the an- nounced Seventh of Sibelius—a sym- phony that cries for rehearsing; that more than a few have eagerly awaited; that should surely have place in concerts to come. . . . But Brahms "in D major" is no repertory piece when Dr. Kousse- vitzky and the orchestra play it in the vein. He catches the singing, sunlit quality of many a page—the swaying rhythm, unlabored abundance, warm un- folding, of the first movement; through the second, the sense of a Brahms with- drawn into the shade to meditate, with the violoncellos, upon his idyll until he is content; the touch-and-go of the scherzo, grace and bite in alternation; the buoyant flood of the finale.

Withal, Dr. Koussevitzky does not for- get that his singing Brahms has also rug- ged tones; that the ingrained autumnal mood may descend, for a space, upon these summer musings; that shadows do steal across that glinting finale, of a sudden slackening it. He takes this Second Symphony objectively enough, the proportion; finds revealing pace and characterizing rhythm. Subjectively, the warmth of mood, the clear color, the changeful, streaming course, touch him nearly. His Brahms smiles but will not forego melancholy; speaks out, then looks within. In short a romantic Brahms. The perfect Brahmsite—they are many nowa- days—does not demur. H. T. P.

RESPIGHI WORK AT SYMPHONY CONCERT

"Metamorphoseon, Modi XII," Written for Boston

Ingenious Set of Variations Tests Virtuosity of Boston Orchestra

Week by week the importance of the announcement from Symphony Hall at the opening of the current 50th anniversary season of the Boston Sym- phony that a number of new works had been commissioned by the trustees becomes more manifest. Dr. Kousse- vitzky apparently intends to put one on each program.

Yesterday it was the turn of Respighi, whose contribution to the anniversary, an ingenious set of variations with the awe-inspiring title "Metamor- phoseon, Modi XII," was played for the first time in public. Next week brings a new symphony by Prokofiev. Before the season ends, most of the chief living composers will have been represented on the program by works commissioned by the Boston Sym- phony.

Respighi, who conducted the Bos- ton Symphony in a program of his works Feb 18 and 19, 1927, paid the orchestra an adroit and deserved com- pliment in writing the variations heard yesterday. He included showy and difficult cadenza passages for most of the principal players, which dis- played their virtuosity effectively. The whole piece is written so that only a full modern orchestra of the first rank, under an eloquent leader, can do it anything like justice. Yesterday the Boston Symphony met Respighi's test triumphantly.

For Most Listeners

Sets of variations are anathema to some listeners. In the past half cen- tury few composers of note have at- tempted pieces in that form for or- chestra, though such instances as d'Indy's "Istar" and Elgar's "Enigma Variations" come to mind as excep- tions.

Respighi's title indicates his purpose. He metamorphoses his theme ingeni- ously, altering the pace, piling up em- broidery on it. It is not obvious at a first hearing to what extent he uses the old scales known as "modes," which one might expect from the title. Some of the harmony is certainly based on them, but a true translation of "modi" would seem to be rather "forms" than "modes" in the techni- cal sense of scales.

The real point about any new piece is not for most listeners its form, or its technique, or even the opportunities it may afford for virtuosity on the part of the players. What matters is whether the composer says anything in imaginative and emotional terms; whether the audience is held intent and absorbed by the power of the mu- sic without lapse of attention. One listener yesterday found Respighi's variations more intricate than en- thralling, more ingenious than emo- tional.

The other numbers on the program, is it was finally rearranged, were Handel's concerto grosso in B minor, No. 12; and Brahms' Second Sym- phony. The strings in the Handel played less well than they often do these days in such pieces. No doubt an undue portion of rehearsal time was taken by the very exacting Respighi music.

Dr. Koussevitzky, as usual, inter- preted "largo" as something slower than the pace of the proverbial snail. This comes of taking andantes and adagios too slowly. Largo must be slower still, according to modern ideas of tempi, though it is by no means clear that that it what "largo" meant to Handel. If your adagios have been as slow as possible, what is to be done with largos?

Brahm's Symphony

In the Brahms symphony one felt as on other occasions that Dr. Koussevit- sky missed the lyric songlike quality of the first movement, with its very Germanic and very lovely melodies. He did the slow movement better than most other conductors have done it, and was appropriately eloquent in the finale.

But one has still to be convinced that any non-German can really do justice to this symphony, after hearing Toscanini as well as Koussevitzky in- terpret it. Perhaps, as often before, one's cherished memories of Dr. Muck prevent fairness to other interpreters.

The program now announced for next week includes Mozart's "Magic Flute" overture, his clarinet concerto, Prokofiev's new Fourth Symphony and Rimsky-Korsakoff's "Caprice on Span- ish Themes." P. R.

Longy Memorial Concert in Boston

GATHERED on the evening of Nov. 3 to do honor to the mem- ory of Georges Longy, an audi- ence which filled Jordan Hall, Bos- ton, listened to a concert of unusual significance. From far and near came musicians, eager to give of their time and talent, that this tribute to friend and fellow artist might be of the finest.

To give individual mention to all those who in one manner or another lent distinction to the concert would be to list the large majority of those whose names are synonymous with musical prestige the world over. Trib- ute must be paid, however, to those musicians who actively assisted dur- ing the evening. The Burgin String Quartet gave a polished performance of the "Animé et près décidé" from the Debussy String Quartet. "La Cornemuse," the second of two rhapsodies for oboe, viola and piano, dedicated to M. Longy by its com- poser, Charles Martin Loeffler, was played with poignant understanding by Louis Speyer, Jean Lefranc and M. Longy's daughter, Renée Longy- Miquelle. In connection with this number it may be apropos to mention Philip Hale's beautiful translation of Maurice Rollinat's poem, "The Bag- pipe," which adorned the printed pro- gram.

With Walter Piston conducting, some 40 members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, many of whom were intimately associated with M. Longy during his tenure of office as oboe soloist of the orchestra from 1898 to 1925, next proffered Respighi's "La Nascita di di Venere" from the "Trittico Botticelliano," dedicated to Mrs. Elizabeth Sprague Coolidge and given a first performance in Boston, after which Mme. and M. Miquelle charmed the audience with their performance of the "Stanco e triste" from the Cello and Piano Sonata by Ildebrando Pizzetti.

For a novel combination of instruments, one delighted in the "Introduction and Allegro" by Maurice Ravel, for harp, with accompaniment of flute, clarinet, string quartet and double-bass, excellently accomplished by Carlos Salzedo, harp; Georges Laurent, flute; Paul Mimart, clarinet; Max Kunze, double-bass, and the American String Quartet.

An outstanding performance of the evening was that of the Concerto for piano, violin and string quartet (first Movement—"Décidé"), played by Carmela Ippolito, violin; Jesús Mariá Sanroma, pianist, and the Durrell String Quartet, and as a climax to the program came the "Panis Angelicus" by César Franck, arranged by Walter Piston for two solo voices, cello solo, orchestra and organ, the singers being Marie Sundelius and Rulon Y. Robison, with Georges Miquelle playing the cello and Dr. Archibald Davison at the organ. Mr. Piston conducted. With these stately measures there ended this superb musical gesture to the memory of Georges Longy, a man whose achievements were many, whose helping hand and severe though kindly criticism proved invaluable to innumerable young musicians and who carried his honors with the simple dignity characteristic of those who find fame, as such, but an incident in the daily routine of a busy life.

G. M. S.

Boston Symphony

The weekly "First performance: composed for the fiftieth anniversary of the Boston Symphony Orchestra" was provided for the program of Nov. 7 and 8 at Symphony Hall, Boston, by Ottorino Respighi. He entitled his donation "Metamorphoseon, Modi XII." For a less momentous occasion he might have called it a Theme and 12 Variations, since that is what it is. The theme, announced by the strings, with the woodwinds joining in later, appears to be built on one of the ecclesiastical modes. It is stately and unimpressive. The variations consist to a considerable degree of bijouterie. In the seventh especially there is lavish provision for exercise of the talents of the soloists—an opportunity which was embraced to excellent effect by the Boston virtuosi. In the slower passages there is some writing of beauty, reminiscent of the composer's Roman trees and fountains and church windows. There is of course a clangorous finale, in which conductor and players struggled valiantly to bring out from the score an import which after all was not there.

Dr. Koussevitzky opened this fifth program of the season with Handel's Concerto Grosso for string orchestra in B minor, No. 12. In this he fell once more into that besetting conductorial weakness of his which reveals itself in slow movements and particularly in those written for strings alone—an overstraining for effect which leads him to break his melodic line and leave his attacks ragged for want of precision in his beat. When he let the orchestra have its head, in the livelier sections, the music was superbly played.

Honors of the day, however, must be awarded to the dependable Johannes Brahms, who was invited only at the tenth hour when a prospective visitor proved unready, and whose Symphony in D major seemed radiant indeed beside the musical garb of his fellow-guests. In this lyrical and playful and emotional score the orchestra was at home and the conductor in his element, and a superlative performance ensued.

L. A. S.

STRING CHOIR. BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

With Walter Piston conducting, some 40 members of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, many of whom were intimately associated with M. Longy during his tenure of office as oboe soloist of the orchestra from 1893 to 1925, next proffered Respighi's "La Nascita di di Venere" from the "Trittico Botticelliano," dedicated to Mrs. Elizabeth Sprague Coolidge and given a first performance in Boston, after which Mme. and M. Miquelle charmed the audience with their performance of the "Stanco e triste" from the Cello and Piano Sonata by Ildebrando Pizzetti.

For a novel combination of instruments, one delighted in the "Introduction and Allegro" by Maurice Ravel, for harp, with accompaniment of flute, clarinet, string quartet and double-bass, excellently accomplished by Carlos Salzedo, harp; Georges Laurent, flute; Paul Minart, clarinet; Max Kunze, double-bass, and the American String Quartet.

An outstanding performance of the evening was that of the Concerto for piano, violin and string quartet (first Movement—"Décidé"), played by Carmela Ippolito, violin; Jesús María Sanroma, pianist, and the Durrell String Quartet, and as a climax to the program came the "Panis Angelicus" by César Franck, arranged by Walter Piston for two solo voices, cello solo, orchestra and organ, the singers being Marie Sundelius and Rulon Y. Robison, with Georges Miquelle playing the cello and Dr. Archibald Davidson at the organ. Mr. Piston conducted. With these stately measures there ended this superb musical gesture to the memory of George Longy, a man whose achievements were many, whose helping hand and severe though kindly criticism proved invaluable to innumerable young musicians and who carried his honors with the simple dignity characteristic of those who find fame, as such, but an incident in the daily routine of a busy life.

G. M. S.

Boston Symphony

The weekly "First performance" composed for the fiftieth anniversary of the Boston Symphony Orchestra" was provided for the program of Nov. 7 and 8 at Symphony Hall, Boston, by Ottorino Respighi. He entitled his donation "Metamorphoseon, Modi XII." For a less momentous occasion he might have called it a Theme and 12 Variations, since that is what it is. The theme, announced by the strings, with the woodwinds joining in later, appears to be built on one of the ecclesiastical modes. It is stately and unimpressive. The variations consist to a considerable degree of bijouterie. In the seventh especially there is lavish provision for exercise of the talents of the soloists—an opportunity which was embraced to excellent effect by the Boston virtuosos. In the slower passages there is some writing of beauty, reminiscent of the composer's Roman trees and fountains and church windows. There is of course a clangorous finale, in which conductor and players struggled valiantly to bring out from the score an import which after all was not there.

Dr. Koussevitzky opened this fifth program of the season with Handel's Concerto Grosso for string orchestra, in B minor, No. 12. In this he fell once more into that besetting conductorial weakness of his which reveals itself in slow movements and particularly in those written for strings alone—an overstraining for effect which leads him to break his melodic line and leave his attack ragged for want of precision in his beat. When he let the orchestra have its head, in the livelier sections, the music was superbly played.

Honors of the day, however, must be awarded to the dependable Johannes Brahms, who was invited only at the tenth hour when a prospective visitor proved unready, and whose Symphony in D major seemed radiant indeed beside the musical garb of his fellow-guests. In this lyrical and playful and emotional score the orchestra was at home and the conductor in his element, and a superlative performance ensued.

L. A. S.

STRING CHOIR, BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

(Mr. Miquelle and Mme. Renee Longy, Loeffler

Two Rhapsodies (Mr. Loeffler, viola; Mr. Speyer, oboe; Mme. Renee Longy, piano)

Concerto for piano, violin and string quartet (2d movement) Chausson
(Mr. Sanroma, piano; Miss Ippolito, violin; the Durrell String quartet)

Trittico Botticelliano: No. 3. The Birth of Venus Respighi (Orchestra composed of Longy's colleagues in the Boston Symphony orchestra. Mr. Piston, conductor. First performance in Boston)

Third movement of String Quartet (First stands of the Boston Symphony orchestra) Debussy

Introduction and Allegro for harp and other instruments Ravel (Messrs. Salzedo, harp; Laurent, flute; Mimart, clarinet; the American String Quartet. Mr. Salzedo has arranged a double bass part)

"Panis Angelicus," arranged by Mr. Piston Franck
(Marie Sundelius, soprano; Mr. Robison, tenor; members of the Boston Symphony orchestra; Mr. Miquelle of the Detroit Symphony orchestra, violoncello solo passages)

FOR once the reviewer may lay aside the tools of his trade and become straightforward chronicler. For once there is no occasion to analyze this or that work, to point its history, or to weigh in the balance piece or performance. To write the story is more pertinent. For those who gathered in Jordan Hall last evening to "assist at" (as the French would render our English "attend") the concert in honor of Georges Longy did so less for the sake of hearing a concert than of doing honor to the memory of a notable and beloved musician and friend. The number of those present was limited only by the size of Jordan Hall. Boston's elect appeared one and all to have been friends of Georges Longy.

ables from Boston and ave place to a poem ritten and dedicated to autumn of 1919 by Dr.
rinted the notes of that om Beethoven's fifth
r. Longy played them
eld in $300 was given perform-n Nov. led Mr. Hale's translaear before of Maurice Rollinat's rt, Nov. 11. He also of the composi-ld testify er which found place act of ta Those who held this arked b their hands must have n Hancock were looking at no
" that they had been ouvenir" (in the best word) of their friend

annual Fair at the concert are movement out of De-P. M., the tect; Mr. Loeffler's Muel Church "emuse," for oboe, pighi's "La Nascita
e "Trittico Botticel-Mrs. Coolidge and tion by members of y Orchestra under evening; the third arge of Mr. "triste," from Pizwill be serve ro and piano; Ravel's
ub. ro for harp, flute,
; and double-bass;
ausson's concerto
ton string quartet, Hierarch "us" for two solo chestra.
ds of Mr. Longy yesterday f orformance is less ide at the fa ise friends were erarchy of th g Quartet, playe is dean an e gave sort of he trustees, C the orchestra.

Directed by the Durkin String Quartet, Frank's "Panis Angelicus," arranged for the occasion by Mr. Piston, assembled all the evening's forces, soloists, quartets, orchestral, into one large orchestra, brought Madame Marie Sundelius and Mr. Rulon Robinson as soloists, Mr. Piston again conducting. At the organ one observed Dr. Davison. On the program-page listing the artists one had seen the name of Mr. Adolfo Betti, leader of the Fionzaley String Quartet through its long course. One wondered where he would find place on this program. This last number gave answer. For the veteran violinist, in his desire to do honor to the memory of a musician-friend whom he had loved, was given the concert master's chair. A single word of comment will suffice. Through a program gathered from so many sources, with so varied a list of performers, there ran singular unity. The obviously feared heterogeneity one found not. A single formula must have been used in the assembling of the program: that it be suitable in every respect to the indefinable mood which is the mood of the memorial occasion. The selections were excellently made. The program underscored the desired, intangible mood.

Yes, there were words for Mr. Longy. Mr. Olin Downes, who had personal acquaintance with him, came from New York to deliver the address. He spoke briefly, simply, informally. He struck the note of eulogistic reminiscence. He spoke of the first orchestral concert he had ever attended, of the first note he then heard—the "A" from Mr. Longy's oboe, giving the pitch for the tuning of the instruments of the orchestra. He paid tribute to the fine qualities of musicianship of the Longy Club of wind instruments, to Mr. Longy's abilities as leader of the Boston Orchestral Club. That the audience was fully in harmony with Mr. Downes's statement that Mr. Longy probably influenced the musical life of Boston more than any one other man, was proved by the ripple of applause that broke in upon the memorial spirit of the evening.

A. H. M.

OUGH a quarter of a century rgerges Longy was remarkable tuoso of the oboe in the ny Orchestra. During that conductor of various orchestral he added to the musical knowl-d the musical pleasure of those quented them. Last spring he retirement on his farm in Nor-Next Monday evening his will honor his memory with a orative concert announced elsethis paper. There enough will of him as musician and of his n day. The moment may also r anecdotes of the musician in the man as colleagues and recall them. First, Heinrich
the pianist, may speak:

The program of the concert in memory of Georges Longy in Jordan hall tomorrow night (8:30 o'clock) will be as follows:

Sonata for 'cello and piano.....Pizzetti
(Mr. Miquelle and Mme. Renee Longy)

Two RhapsodiesLoeffler
(Mr. Loeffler, viola; Mr. Speyer, oboe; Mme. Renee Longy, piano)
Concerto for piano, violin and string quartet (2d movement).....Chausson
(Mr. Sanroma, piano; Miss Ippolito, violin; the Durrell String quartet)
Trittico Botticelliano: No. 3. The Birth of Venus.....Respighi
(Orchestra composed of Longy's colleagues in the Boston Symphony orchestra. Mr. Piston, conductor. First performance in Boston)
Third movement of String Quartet (First stands of the Boston Symphony orchestra)Debussy
Introduction and Allegro for harp and other instrumentsRavel
(Messrs. Salzedo, harp; Laurent, flute; Mimart, clarinet; the American String Quartet. Mr. Salzedo has arranged a double bass part)
"Panis Angelicus," arranged by Mr. PistonFranck
(Marie Sundelius, soprano; Mr. Robison, tenor; members of the Boston Symphony orchestra; Mr. Miquelle of the Detroit Symphony orchestra, violoncello solo passages)

Memory's Garland To Georges Longy

With Both Song and Speech Recall Him as Friend And Musician

FOR once the reviewer may lay down the program. Those who held this program-sheet in their hands must have realized that they were looking at no straightforward chronicle. They had been once there is no occasion to analyze ordinary "program," that they had been or that work, to point its history, presented with a "souvenir" (in the best weigh in the balance place or perfect French sense of the word) of their friend's life. To write the story is more than a mere list of the works played at the concert are ent. For those who gathered in Jordan Hall last evening to "assist at" (as quickly listed: a movement out of Debussy's string quartet; Mr. Loeffler's French would render our English rhapsody, "La Cornemuse," for oboe, tend") the concert in honor of Georges Longy did so less for the sake of hearing a concert than of doing honor to the memory of a notable and beloved musician and friend. The number of those present was limited only by the size of Jordan Hall. Boston's elect appeared one and all to have been friends of Georges Longy.

The program sheet itself bore witness to the care and love that had been showered upon the preparation of the concert. A sheet that folded into eight columns, it contained pictures (one of Mr. Longy with his dog and pipe), lined the events in Mr. Longy's life, listed the program—for the evening, printed names of the artists of the evening in a formidable list, including many players from the Boston Symphony Orchestra well as other notables from Boston and New York; it gave place to a poem entitled "Oboe," written and dedicated to Mr. Longy in the autumn of 1919 by Dr. Herbert Hall; it printed the notes of that short cadenza from Beethoven's fifth symphony which Mr. Longy played whenever that symphony was given performance; and it printed Mr. Hale's translation of the text of Maurice Rollinat's "The Bagpipe," title also of the composition of Mr. Loeffler which found place in the program. Those who held this program-sheet in their hands must have realized that they were looking at no straightforward chronicle. They had been once there is no occasion to analyze ordinary "program," that they had been or that work, to point its history, presented with a "souvenir" (in the best weigh in the balance place or perfect French sense of the word) of their friend's life. To write the story is more than a mere list of the works played at the concert are ent. For those who gathered in Jordan Hall last evening to "assist at" (as quickly listed: a movement out of Debussy's string quartet; Mr. Loeffler's French would render our English rhapsody, "La Cornemuse," for oboe, tend") the concert in honor of Georges Longy did so less for the sake of hearing a concert than of doing honor to the memory of a notable and beloved musician and friend. The number of those present was limited only by the size of Jordan Hall. Boston's elect appeared one and all to have been friends of Georges Longy.

The works played at the concert are ent. For those who gathered in Jordan Hall last evening to "assist at" (as quickly listed: a movement out of Debussy's string quartet; Mr. Loeffler's French would render our English rhapsody, "La Cornemuse," for oboe, tend") the concert in honor of Georges Longy did so less for the sake of hearing a concert than of doing honor to the memory of a notable and beloved musician and friend. The number of those present was limited only by the size of Jordan Hall. Boston's elect appeared one and all to have been friends of Georges Longy.

The list of those friends of Mr. Longy who took part in performance is less quickly recorded—for those friends were many. The Burgin String Quartet, playing Debussy's movement, gave sort of official representation of the orchestra.

Mr. Loeffler's "La Cornemuse," which was dedicated to Mr. Longy and must often have been played by him, was played by his associates, Mr. Speyer and Mr. Lefranc, and his daughter Renee Longy Miquelle. Such members of the Boston Symphony as had been associated with Mr. Longy formed the orchestra for Respighi's work; one noted Heinrich Gebhard at the piano and Carlos Salzedo playing the harp. Mr. Longy's daughter and her husband, Georges Miquelle, were the artists for the movement of Pizzetti's sonata. Ravel's septet brought Messrs. Salzedo, Laurent and Mimart, the ladies of the American String Quartet, and Mr. Max Kunze. In Chausson's concerto Miss Ippolito and Mr. Sanroma, as soloists were assisted by the Durrell String Quartet.

Franck's "Panis Angelicus," arranged for the occasion by Mr. Piston, assembled all the evening's forces, soloists, quartets, orchestral, into one large orchestra, brought Madame Marie Sundelius and Mr. Rulon Robinson as soloists, Mr. Piston again conducting. At the organ one observed Dr. Davison. On the program-page listing the artists one had seen the name of Mr. Adolfo Betti, leader of the Flonzaley String Quartet through its long course. One wondered where he would find place on this program. This last number gave answer. For the veteran violinist, in his desire to do honor to the memory of a musician-friend whom he had loved, was given the concert master's chair. A single word of comment will suffice. Through a program gathered from so many sources, with so varied a list of performers, there ran singular unity. The obviously feared heterogeneity one found not. A single formula must have been used in the assembling of the program: that it be suitable in every respect to the indefinable mood which is the mood of the memorial occasion. The selections were excellently made. The program underscored the desired, intangible mood.

Yes, there were words for Mr. Longy. Mr. Olin Downes, who had personal acquaintance with him, came from New York to deliver the address. He spoke briefly, simply, informally. He struck the note of eulogistic reminiscence. He spoke of the first orchestral concert he had ever attended, of the first note he then heard—the "A" from Mr. Longy's oboe, giving the pitch for the tuning of the instruments of the orchestra. He paid tribute to the fine qualities of musicianship of the Longy Club of wind instruments, to Mr. Longy's abilities as leader of the Boston Orchestral Club. That the audience was fully in harmony with Mr. Downes's statement that Mr. Longy probably influenced the musical life of Boston more than any one other man, was proved by the ripple of applause that broke in upon the memorial spirit of the evening.

A. H. M.

Longy in Oddments

the Honors of Monday Musicians' Wreath Of Anecdote

ALTHOUGH a quarter of a century ago Georges Longy was remarkable as a virtuoso of the oboe in the Boston Symphony Orchestra. During that time he added to the musical knowledge of the city, the musical pleasure of those who quented them. Last spring he retired on his farm in Norway. Next Monday evening his will honor his memory with a concert announced elsewhere in this paper. There enough will of him as musician and of his day. The moment may also be an occasion for anecdotes of the musician in the man as colleagues and recall them. First, Heinrich the pianist, may speak:

My return from a concert tour in my studies with Leschetizky, invited me to play with the club, which he had just founded. As a young concert-soloist, I had an inclination to play as if I were in the show, instead of giving the club a chance. Tactful and kindly, Longy reminded me of the first rehearsal of the woodwinds needed to be heard, as the piano. I tried to heed, sure my idea of holding myself isn't quite correct.

Following rehearsal, Mr. Longy said any more. He would say, 'Well, please.' Now, Leschetizky is pupils to use the pedal for effects besides mere loudness, so by could still make loudness, so by d. Next, Longy was saying, 't. Mr. Gebhard. Please watch. I was conscience-stricken, but would insist on acting every so spite of my good intentions. By rehearsal, Mr. Longy was saying, 'Less pedal,' but 'No pedal.'

He would mention now that these rehearsals in Longy's house in Roxbury ended by the family pet, a big, fat dog. He would simply come in, room, crouch down and remain when the fourth rehearsal came the dog disappeared under the soon as I sat down to it. At the comment was made about the deserting his usual post, but no further about the matter. I played along, I tried faithfully down the volume of the piano, before I knew it, my foot

The program of the concert in memory of Georges Longy in Jordan hall tomorrow night (8:30 o'clock) will be as follows:

Sonata for 'cello and piano.....Pizzetti
(Mr. Miquelle and Mme. Renee Longy)

Two RhapsodiesLoeffler
(Mr. Loeffler, viola; Mr. Speyer, oboe; Mme. Renee Longy, piano)
Concerto for piano, violin and string quartet (2d movement).....Chausson
(Mr. Sanroma, piano; Miss Ippolito, violin; the Durrell String quartet)
Trittico Botticelliano: No. 3. The Birth of Venus.....Respighi
(Orchestra composed of Longy's colleagues in the Boston Symphony orchestra. Mr. Piston, conductor. First performance in Boston)
Third movement of String Quartet (First stands of the Boston Symphony orchestra)Debussy
Introduction and Allegro for harp and other instrumentsRavel
(Messrs. Salzedo, harp; Laurent, flute; Mimart, clarinet; the American String Quartet. Mr. Salzedo has arranged a double bass part)
"Panis Angelicus," arranged by Mr. PistonFranck
(Marie Sundelius, soprano; Mr. Robison, tenor; members of the Boston Symphony orchestra; Mr. Miquelle of the Detroit Symphony orchestra, violoncello solo passages)

Memory's Garland To Georges Longy

With Both Song and Speech Recall Him as Friend And Musician

FOR once the reviewer may lay down the program. Those who held this the tools of his trade and became program-sheet in their hands must have straightforward chronicler. realized that they were looking at no or that work, to point its history, presented with a "souvenir" (in the best weigh in the balance piece or perfect French sense of the word) of their friend ance. To write the story is more pen Mr. Longy.

ent. For those who gathered in Jordan Hall last evening to "assist at" (as quickly listed: a movement out of Debussy's string quartet; Mr. Loeffler's French would render our English rhapsody, "La Cornemuse," for oboe, tend") the concert in honor of Georges Longy did so less for the sake of hearing a concert than of doing honor to a memory of a notable and beloved musician and friend. The number of those present was limited only by the size of Jordan Hall. Boston's elect appeared one and all to have been friends of Georges Longy.

The program sheet itself bore witness to the care and love that had been showered upon the preparation of the concert. A sheet that folded into eight columns, it contained pictures (one of Mr. Longy with his dog and pipe), lined the events in Mr. Longy's life, listed the program of the evening, printed names of the artists of the evening, a formidable list, including many players from the Boston Symphony Orchestra

well as other notables from Boston and New York; it gave place to a poem entitled "Oboe," written and dedicated to Mr. Longy in the autumn of 1919 by Dr. Herbert Hall; it printed the notes of that short cadenza from Beethoven's fifth symphony which Mr. Longy played whenever that symphony was given performance; and it printed Mr. Hale's translation of the text of Maurice Rollinat's "The Bagpipe," title also of the composition of Mr. Loeffler which found place in the program. Those who held this program-sheet in their hands must have realized that they were looking at no ordinary "program," that they had been presented with a "souvenir" (in the best French sense of the word) of their friend Mr. Longy.

The works played at the concert are quickly listed: a movement out of Debussy's string quartet; Mr. Loeffler's French would render our English rhapsody, "La Cornemuse," for oboe, tend") the concert in honor of Georges Longy did so less for the sake of hearing a concert than of doing honor to a memory of a notable and beloved musician and friend. The number of those present was limited only by the size of Jordan Hall. Boston's elect appeared one and all to have been friends of Georges Longy.

The program sheet itself bore witness to the care and love that had been showered upon the preparation of the concert. A sheet that folded into eight columns, it contained pictures (one of Mr. Longy with his dog and pipe), lined the events in Mr. Longy's life, listed the program of the evening, printed names of the artists of the evening, a formidable list, including many players from the Boston Symphony Orchestra

Mr. Loeffler was dedicated often have played by him. Mr. Loeffler, Longy Miquelle Boston Symphony orchestra for L. Heinrich Gebhard, Los Salzedo Longy's daughter, Georges Miquelle the movement, vel's septet at Laurent and American String Quartet. In Ch. polito and Mr. assisted by the Franck's "Panis Angelicus" for the occasion all the evening tets, orchestral, brought Madar Mr. Rulon R. Piston again observed L. gram-page listly seen the name of the Flonzale; its long course. would find place in last number of the era violinist, the memory of a had loved, was ter's chair. A will suffice. ered from so many a list of performance. The obituary one found must have been of the program every respect which is the mission. The self-made. The prescribed, intangible. Yes, there were Mr. Olin Down, quittance with York to deliver briefly, simply, the note of eulogy spoke of the first had ever attended then heard—the oboe, giving the the instrument paid tribute to the leadership of the instruments, to leader of the That the audience with Mr. Down Longy probably life of Boston man, was proved that broke in up the evening.

the Catholic a member. tinue late, over the w

Free Bap An

Lawrence anniversary of this Church, w Rev. E. C. Newton T. "I preach Floyd

On The Temple, the Soldier its regular ments for showing of per 100,00 rather than method of For instance the person very, etc., 1910. This in 1913, st been progr 188, a de crimes ag breaking 360 cases the high p time it has of almost "In crim ing drunk violations, begun: T in 1929. crease of 1910 to 48 accounted motor veh In 1910 t volving li

Longy in Oddments Before the Honors of Monday Musicians' Wreath Of Anecdote

THROUGH a quarter of a century Georges Longy was remarkable virtuoso of the oboe in the Symphony Orchestra. During that time as conductor of various orchestral societies, he added to the musical knowledge and the musical pleasure of those that frequented them. Last spring he died in retirement on his farm in Normandy. Next Monday evening his friends will honor his memory with a commemorative concert announced elsewhere in this paper. There enough will be said of him as musician and of his Bostonian day. The moment may also serve for anecdotes of the musician merged in the man as colleagues and friends recall them. First, Heinrich Gebhard, the pianist, may speak:

"After my return from a concert tour following my studies with Leschetizky, Longy invited me to play with the Longy Club, which he had just founded. Now, as a young concert-soloist, I had a natural inclination to play as if I were the whole show, instead of giving the woodwinds of the club a chance. Tactfully and kindly, Longy reminded me several times during the first rehearsal that the woodwinds needed to be heard, as well as the piano. I tried to heed, but I'm sure my idea of holding myself down wasn't quite correct.

"At the following rehearsal, Mr. Longy didn't hint any more. He would say, 'Less pedal, please.' Now, Leschetizky taught his pupils to use the pedal for other effects besides mere loudness, so by habit I would still make loudness, so by the pedal. Next, Longy was saying, 'That foot, Mr. Gebhard. Please watch that foot.' I was conscience-stricken, but my foot would insist on acting every so often in spite of my good intentions. By the third rehearsal, Mr. Longy was saying, not 'Less pedal,' but 'No pedal.'

"I should mention now that these rehearsals in Longy's house in Roxbury were attended by the family pet, a big but peaceful dog. He would simply come into the room, crouch down and remain quiet. When the fourth rehearsal came around, the dog disappeared under the piano as soon as I sat down to it. At the time, some comment was made about the animal's deserting his usual post, but no one thought any further about the matter.

"As I played along, I tried faithfully to keep down the volume of the piano-part. Then, before I knew it, my foot started for the pedal. But it never arrived. Naturally, I was startled, and the rehearsal broke off for everyone to see what was the matter. The huge paw of the dog was planted in such a position that I couldn't touch the pedal. Longy acted just as innocently surprised as any of the rest of us. But afterward, those who knew Longy better than I did told me they were sure that Longy had spent a week teaching the dog to keep anyone's foot off the pedal."

Next to Clément Lenom, now teacher at the Conservatory who, as second oboe, played beside Mr. Longy through his years with the Symphony Orchestra. "By degrees Longy acquired the ability to play for a minute and a half on one breath. Every summer he would spend his vacation mostly in farming and fishing. At first he wouldn't touch his oboe at all. Then, about a month before he had to return to the orchestra, he would begin to practice. After he got into swing he would practice three or four hours a day.

"He was a very serious musician," Mr. Lenom went on, "but very good-natured. I remember two funny things he did. Once the Longy Club was going to play a piece which needed some drum-taps. But the club had no drum. 'I'll take care of that,' Longy told us. When the time came for the drum, Longy tapped with his oboe on a silk hat beside him on the floor, where the audience couldn't see it.

"And speaking of hats. A good while ago, when jazz was new" (Mr. Lenom called it 'jahass,' which sounded very well) "Longy and I and some other fellow-musicians got into a discussion about it. Longy didn't say much, then he sat down at a table and began scribbling on a paper, then tearing a piece off, writing some more and tearing that off, and so on.

"'Mon Dieu, Longy, what is the matter with you?' we asked him.

"'You wait,' he said, and kept on writing on scraps of paper. Then he asked for a hat, and threw the papers in and mixed them up.

"'Everybody take one,' he said, holding the hat up high so that nobody could look inside. There was a little music on each paper.

"'What's this for?'

"'I have written a jahass,' Longy told us. 'You shall see. Now, everybody play.'

"Which we did. You should have heard it! It was so good we kept on playing it. Then someone banged on the door of the hotel and someone asked for Mr. Longy.

"'Mr. Longy,' he said, 'the manager says the people below you think someone here has gone crazy.'

"'Tell the manager it is all right,' Mr. Longy said. 'I have written a jahass, and we are playing it now.'

It was! I tell you

subjected to special the necessity of of breath and steady and slow. at pressure on the which can seri- nervous system. summer, would and through four as a gentleman until two weeks age—certainly not he would take up ar, he kept to this to high develop- "Cornemuse," at was lord of a cha- ere he dazzled the om miles around to American bathroom ok-stove. Here at herd of 200 cows. ge to poultry rais-

the summer, Arthur Longy from Paris. in up—he had no that matter; were ge. There was not ng system. (After merican mechanical ked that.) Longy. red up in wooden d reception. After d without a break. ledler to play bil- the village saloon. e village numbered with men to the six. Yes, the old cue, according to uts it with graphic answer to the gy play billiards?" yly, "I was sitting ne."

occas'on on which against playing the n was nearly over. f the human qual- a visit to Paris indabout way that aring with his or- give a concert, was cond oboe had be- it was difficult to in a hurry. Dam- ne call: "This is sorry to hear that out replacing your ust come to Paris, ay summer house. me one, I'll play And it was done. arrass the regular Damrosch tempo- second.

NING HUMPHREY

Sixth Programme

FRIDAY AFTERNOON, NOVEMBER 14, at 2.30 o'clock

SATURDAY EVENING, NOVEMBER 15, at 8.15 o'clock

Mozart Overture to "The Magic Flute"

Mozart Concerto for Clarinet

- I. Allegro.
- II. Adagio.
- III. Rondo: Allegro.

Prokofieff Symphony No. 4, Op. 47

(First performance; Composed for the Fiftieth Anniversary of the Boston Symphony Orchestra)

- I. Andante assai; Allegro eroico.
- II. Andante tranquillo.
- III. Moderato: Scherzoso.
- IV. Allegro risoluto.

Rimsky-Korsakov Caprice on Spanish Themes, Op. 34

- I. Alborada.
- II. Variations.
- III. Alborada.
- IV. Scene and Gypsy Song.
- V. Fandango of the Asturias.

(Played without pause)

SOLOIST
VICTOR POLATSCHEK

There will be an intermission after the concerto

The works to be played at these concerts may be seen in the Allen A. Brown Music Collection of the Boston Public Library one week before the concert

started for the pedal. But it never arrived. Naturally, I was startled, and the rehearsal broke off for everyone to see what was the matter. The huge paw of the dog was planted in such a position that I couldn't touch the pedal. Longy acted just as innocently surprised as any of the rest of us. But afterward, those who knew Longy better than I did told me they were sure that Longy had spent a week teaching the dog to keep anyone's foot off the pedal."

Next to Clément Lenom, now teacher at the Conservatory who, as second oboe, played beside Mr. Longy through his years with the Symphony Orchestra. "By degrees Longy acquired the ability to play for a minute and a half on one breath. Every summer he would spend his vacation mostly in farming and fishing. At first he wouldn't touch his oboe at all. Then, about a month before he had to return to the orchestra, he would begin to practice. After he got into swing he would practice three or four hours a day.

"He was a very serious musician," Mr. Lenom went on, "but very good-natured. I remember two funny things he did. Once the Longy Club was going to play a piece which needed some drum-taps. But the club had no drum. 'I'll take care of that,' Longy told us. When the time came for the drum, Longy tapped with his oboe on a silk hat beside him on the floor, where the audience couldn't see it. "And speaking of hats. A good while ago, when jazz was new" (Mr. Lenom called it 'jhahss,' which sounded very well) "Longy and I and some other fellow-musicians got into a discussion about it. Longy didn't say much, then he sat down at a table and began scribbling on a paper, then tearing a piece off, writing some more and tearing that off, and so on.

"'Mon Dieu, Longy, what is the matter with you?' we asked him.

"'You wait,' he said, and kept on writing on scraps of paper. Then he asked for a hat, and threw the papers in and mixed them up.

"'Everybody take one,' he said, holding the hat up high so that nobody could look inside. There was a little music on each paper.

"'What's this for?'

"'I have written a jhass,' Longy told us. 'You shall see. Now, everybody play.'

"Which we did. You should have heard it! It was so good we kept on playing it. Then someone banged on the door of the hotel and someone asked for Mr. Longy.

"'Mr. Longy,' he said, 'the manager says the people below you think someone here has gone crazy.'

"'Tell the manager it is all right,' Mr. Longy said. 'I have written a jhahss, and we are playing it now.'

L

It was! I tell you

objected to special the necessity of some of breath and steady and slow. at pressure on the which can seri- nervous system. summer, would and through four as a gentleman until two weeks age—certainly not he would take up ar, he kept to this to high develop- "Cornemuse," at was lord of a cha- ere he dazzled the om miles around to American bathroom ok-stove. Here at herd of 200 cows. ge to poultry rais-

he summer, Arthur Longy from Paris im up—he had no that matter, were ge. There was not ng system. (After merican mechanical lked that.) Longy, red up in wooden d reception. After d without a break. tedler to play bil- the village saloon. e village number'd —with men to the six. . Yes, the old cue, according to uts it with graphic answer to the gy play billiards?" yly, "I was sitting ne." occasion on which against playing the n was nearly over. f the human qual to a visit to Paris andabout way that ring with his or- give a concert, was cond oboe had be- it was difficult to in a hurry. Dam- ne call: "This is i sorry to hear that out replacing your ust come to Paris, ay summer house. me one, I'll play And it was done. arrass the regular Damrosch tempo- second. NING HUMPHREY

Sixth Programme

FRIDAY AFTERNOON, NOVEMBER 14, at 2.30 o'clock

SATURDAY EVENING, NOVEMBER 15, at 8.15 o'clock

Mozart Overture to "The Magic Flute"

Mozart Concerto for Clarinet
I. Allegro.
II. Adagio.
III. Rondo: Allegro.

Prokofieff Symphony No. 4, Op. 47
(First performance; Composed for the Fiftieth Anniversary of the Boston Symphony Orchestra)
I. Andante assai; Allegro eroico.
II. Andante tranquillo.
III. Moderato: Scherzoso.
IV. Allegro risoluto.

Rimsky-Korsakov Caprice on Spanish Themes, Op. 34
I. Alborada.
II. Variations.
III. Alborada.
IV. Scene and Gypsy Song.
V. Fandango of the Asturias.
(Played without pause)

SOLOIST
VICTOR POLATSCHEK

There will be an intermission after the concerto

The works to be played at these concerts may be seen in the Allen A. Brown Music Collection of the Boston Public Library one week before the concert

started for the pedal. But "Oh, with a jhahss it was! I tell you rived. Naturally, I was start that was 'jahss'." rehearsal broke off for ever. Now, an oboist is subjected to special what was the matter. The physical strains—from the necessity of the dog was planted in such storing up a great volume of breath and that I couldn't touch the pedal feeding it out exceeding steady and slow. acted just as innocently surpr He endures also a great pressure on the of the rest of us. But after nerves of the tongue, which can seri- who knew Longy better than ously affect the entire nervous system. me they were sure that Longy And so Longy, every summer, would a week teaching the dog to ke voyage to France, and through four foot off the pedal." months busy himself as a gentleman Next to Clément Lenom, a farmer. Perhaps not until two weeks at the Conservatory who, as before the return voyage—certainly not played beside Mr. Longy more than a month—he would take up years with the Symphony Or his oboe. Until the war, he kept to this degrees Longy acquired the cus om and brought to high develop- play for a minute and a h ment, his estate of "Cornemuse," at breath. Every summer he w Abbeville. Here he was lord of a cha- his vacation mostly in farmi teau in miniature. Here he dazzled the ing. At first he wouldn't tou peasant—who came from miles around to at all. Then, about a month be dazzled—with an American bathroom had to return to the orchestra and an American cook-stove. Here at begin to practice. After he one time he had a herd of 200 cows. swing he would practice thre Then he took a plunge to poultry rais- hours a day. ing.

"He was a very serious mus On a rainy day, one summer, Arthur Lenom went on, "but very good Fiedler dropped in on Longy from Paris. I remember two funny thing (You couldn't call him up—he had no Once the Longy Club was goi telephone, nor, for that matter, were a piece which needed some there any in the village. There was not But the club had no drum. 'I'll even a general lighting system. (After of that,' Longy told us. When being glugged with American mechanical came for the drum, Longy ta adjuncts to life, he liked that.) Longy, his oboe on a silk hat beside h pipe in hand, clattered up in wooden floor, where the audience could shoes to give a joyful reception. After

"And speaking of hats. A g all, solitude is not good without a break. ago, when jazz was new" (M Off Longy rushed Fiedler to play bil- called it 'jahss,' which sour liards with him in the village saloon. well) "Longy and I and some The population of the village numbere only thirty or forty—with men to the low-musicians got into a discus number of perhaps six. Yes, the old it. Longy didn't say much, th man wielded an able cue, according to down at a table and began Fiedler. Sanromá puts it with graphic on a paper, then tearing a piece picturesqueness. In answer to the ing some more and tearing tha query, "How did Longy play billiards?" so on. the pianist replied dryly, "I was sitting down most of the time."

"Mon Dieu, Longy, what is t There came one occasion on which with you?" we asked him. Longy broke his rule against playing the "You wait," he said, and kept oboe until his vacation was nearly over. ing on scraps of paper. Then It is a fine example of the human quall for a hat, and threw the pape mixed them up. ties of the man. On a visit to Paris

"Everybody take one," he sa Longy heard in a roundabout way that the hat up high so that nobody inside. There was a little mus Walter Damrosch, touring with his or- paper. chestra, and about to give a concert, was

"What's this for?" in a bad fix. His second oboe had be- "I have written a jhass," I come violently ill and it was difficult to us. "You shall see. Now, engage a good oboist in a hurry. Dam- play." rosch had a telephone call: "This is

"Which we did. You sh heard it! It was so good w Georges Longy. I am sorry to hear that playing it. Then someone ban you are in trouble about replacing your door of the hotel and someone second oboe. I have just come to Paris, Mr. Longy. leaving my oboe at my summer house.

"Mr. Longy," he said, "the Now, if you will get me one, I'll play says the people below you th second oboe for you." And it was done. one here has gone crazy. Longy would not embarrass the regular

"Tell the manager it is all first oboe by letting Damrosch tempo- Longy said. 'I have written rarily make him play second. and we are playing it now.' LANING HUMPHREY

Sixth Programme

FRIDAY AFTERNOON, NOVEMBER 14, at 2.30 o'clock

SATURDAY EVENING, NOVEMBER 15, at 8.15 o'clock

Mozart Overture to "The Magic Flute"

Mozart Concerto for Clarinet
I. Allegro.
II. Adagio.
III. Rondo: Allegro.

Prokofieff Symphony No. 4, Op. 47
(First performance; Composed for the Fiftieth Anniversary of the Boston Symphony Orchestra)

I. Andante assai; Allegro eroico.
II. Andante tranquillo.
III. Moderato: Scherzoso.
IV. Allegro risoluto.

Rimsky-Korsakov Caprice on Spanish Themes, Op. 34

I. Alborada.
II. Variations.
III. Alborada.
IV. Scene and Gypsy Song.
V. Fandango of the Asturias.
(Played without pause)

SOLOIST
VICTOR POLATSCHEK

There will be an intermission after the concerto

The works to be played at these concerts may be seen in the Allen A. Brown Music Collection of the Boston Public Library one week before the concert

The New Master

Victor Polatschek

(Hornor)

Clarinetist, from Vienna to the Symphony Orchestra, to Be Heard as Soloist at the Concerts of Tomorrow and Saturday

SYMPHONY CONCERT

By PHILIP HALE

The Boston Symphony orchestra, Dr. Koussevitzky, conductor, gave its sixth concert of the season yesterday afternoon in Symphony hall. Mozart, Overture to "The Magic Flute" and Clarinet concerto (Mr. Polatschek, clarinetist). Prokofieff, Symphony, No. 4 (first performance. Composed for the orchestra's Jubilee). Rimsky-Korsakov, Caprice on Spanish Themes.

It was said before the performance of Prokofieff's symphony that it was more in the line of his "Classical" symphony, than after the manner of his earlier works, splendid in savagery. The performance yesterday, one that would surely have pleased the composer, did not justify the statement. A note from Prokofieff states that in some passages of the symphony he used the same musical material which is introduced in his ballet, "The Prodigal Son." "This does not lead to the conclusion," he writes, "that the symphony is written on the material extracted from 'The Prodigal Son,' or the 'Prodigal Son' on the material from the symphony. Merely, in the symphony I had the possibility to develop symphonically what a ballet-form did not enable me to do." And he cites the example of Beethoven's ballet "Creatures of Prometheus" and his third symphony.

The ballet was produced at Paris in May, 1929; the symphony was composed in 1929-30. There are four movements. Here conventionality stops.

The "Classical" symphony was western in thought and expression. This fourth symphony is oriental as was to be expected after one knew that Prokofieff had used some of his ballet material. Hearing the music, one recognized a spirit that was not western in any way: Not in thematic invention, not in harmonic progressions; decidedly not in the orchestration. For his "Classical" symphony, the composer was quoted as saying that he had written after the manner of Mozart. No doubt he said this with his tongue in his cheek. In the fourth symphony he went back to the earlier Prokofieff. Nor is there in the later work the melodic inspiration that is desired. There are tunes that promise beauty; they are soon tortured. There are also patterns that are ingeniously used, for it would be foolish to question the technical skill of this composer; but one can not live on patterns.

One can easily think that this or that section, especially in the Scherzoso, was planned for dancers; that in the other movements there are pages for those on the stage telling the story in pantomime. A glance at the ballet score might easily show the folly of fancied identifications. The symphony as it stands is absolute music, and as music pure and simple it cannot be ranked with the best of Prokofieff's works. There is no objection to his being the wild man, as in the "Scythian Suite," and "They Are Seven," but in this symphony there is not the barbaric outpourings that have a beauty of their own and impress one by their strength. In former works the orchestration when clangorous was effective; more than a mere shock to the nervous system. In the symphony the orchestration in fortissimo is often only blatant; and when objective or subtle beauty is sought by the blending of instrumental timbres there is, as a rule, a disappointing experiment.

For many years at European symphony concerts there was no hesitation in the introduction of players of wind instruments as soloists. Even at the concerts of the Paris conservatory the flutist, oboist, clarinetist and the player of the horn or bassoon was welcomed and treated respectfully by audience and professional critics. At the concerts of the Boston Symphony orchestra soloists of a few wind instruments have made their appearance, but they were few in number and they appeared at long intervals. Mozart wrote a concerto for the oboe, one for the clarinet, one for the bassoon; for the flute, also for the flute and harp; several for the horn. The clarinet concerto performed yesterday had been played here at a Symphony concert in 1918.

It is characteristically Mozartian by its grace, suavity and the strange tinge of melancholy at times that entered into his music, especially in his latter years. (The concerto was composed only a few months before his death.) Mr. Polatschek, who was warmly welcomed and applauded, played as a musician as well as a virtuoso. His performance was distinguished by tasteful phrasing, and at no time was there an attempt to display the virtuoso at the expense of the composer. Dr. Koussevitzky, always happy in his accompaniment of soloists, brought out the fine details, the ravishing little harmonic and orchestral bits that too often escape the notice of conductors.

A spirited performance of the immortal overture and a brilliant performance of Rimsky-Korsakov's ideas about the nature of Spanish music were greatly enjoyed. The concert will be repeated tonight. The orchestra will be out of town next week. The program of Nov. 28, 29 will be as follows: Wagner Overture to "The Flying Dutchman"; Hanson, Symphony No. 2, "Romantic" (first performance; composed for the orchestra's jubilee). Beethoven, Piano Concerto No. 5 (Walter Gieseking, pianist). Ravel, Bolero.

CLARINET SOLO AT SYMPHONY CONCERT

Victor Polatschek Plays
Mozart Concerto

Prokofieff's Fourth Symphony Is Performed for the First Time

For the first time in many seasons a concerto for clarinet was heard at yesterday's Symphony concert. The soloist was Victor Polatschek, first clarinet of the Vienna Philharmonic Orchestra from 1912 to 1929, now first clarinet of the Boston Symphony. Mr. Polatschek in a Mozart concerto gave a performance that was wholly admirable, and deservedly much applauded. The program also included the first performance anywhere of Prokofieff's Fourth Symphony, opus 47, one of the works commissioned by the Boston Symphony for its current anniversary season.

Mozart's music is the severest of all possible tests of a performer's musicianship. Its melody and rhythm demand the utmost flexibility and subtlety of treatment. There is no possibility of covering up a defective technique or an imperfect sense of musical style by sheer volume of tone, or by any of the other well-worn artifices by which virtuoso players set audiences to clapping. One cannot hurry the climaxes, or exaggerate the pianissimi and fortissimi. One cannot be a "prima donna," on sensation bent, in Mozart's music.

Of First Rank

Mr. Polatschek, trained under such conductors as Weingartner, Nikisch, Muck, Walter, Fuertangler and Richard Strauss, in an orchestra still by repute unsurpassed in Europe or America, and admirably gifted by nature, is a musician of the first rank. The sheer perfection of his playing in the adagio of yesterday's concerto was something beyond praise. It went to one's heart to hear a Mozart melody sung once more as such melodies should invariably be sung. An audience, to prone of recent years owing, perhaps, to circumstances beyond its control, to think of Mozart as a writer of tinkling trifles, was obviously deeply stirred.

The clarinet concerto, written out in a single day to oblige a celebrated player and planned to permit ample technical display, is music with a spontaneity, a beauty, that is perhaps a greater proof of Mozart's genius than are his acknowledged masterpieces. The minor works of Beethoven and Wagner, and even Bach are often dull or tawdry. There are few dull pages in Mozart. All that he wrote has his personal stamp on it. Nearly all is beautiful.

Prokofieff's new symphony is a curiously pallid and dull work to come from the writer of the startling "Scythian Suite," and the deft and fluent "Classical Symphony," unless yesterday's performance failed to do it justice. There is a restless modulation from key to key, after the fashion that often grows annoying in the minor works of Cesar Franck. The scoring for the orchestra is gray and colorless, lacking in clarity and sonority. It was unkind of Dr. Koussevitzky to follow Prokofieff's symphony by Rimsky-Korsakov's "Spanish Caprice," one of the best-written works for orchestra yet produced by anyone. But Debussy, Ravel or Stravinsky would have shown up Prokofieff equally clearly if thus juxtaposed. Their woodwind, in particular, would eclipse his.

The only interesting thing about this symphony is the rhythmic groups and contrasting rhythms. One got very weary of 2-4 and 4-4, however, as the music progressed. Perhaps Prokofieff meant his music to win the parodied title "apotheosis of the march." But his rhythms lack the variety and the vitality of those in Beethoven's A major symphony, the "Apotheosis of the Dance."

Strong Point

Dr. Koussevitzky, whose Mozart has never been his strong point, had evidently made a special effort with the "Magic Flute" overture and the concerto yesterday. The overture went distinctly better than one anticipated. The so-called "Masonic chords" that interrupt it were twice taken too slowly, but otherwise there was the requisite fluency. Mozart here avoids writing melodic passages.

But in the concerto the orchestral accompaniment failed to measure up to Mr. Polatschek's solo playing. It is only fair to add that it was the best Mozart playing in melodic passages that Dr. Koussevitzky has yet achieved at these concerts.

The Rimsky-Korsakov, except that the "andante con moto" of the variations became a largo in pace, was brilliantly played and heartily applauded. It, too, showed off Mr. Polatschek's virtuosity in incidental clarinet solos.

There are no symphony concerts here next week, as the orchestra goes to New York. For Nov. 27 and 28 Beethoven's "Emperor" concerto, with Walter Gieseking as soloists, and a new symphony by Howard Hanson are the chief items on the program as now planned.

P. H.

The Clarinet, Two Russians, Mozart Twice

New Symphony by Prokofiev,
A Master-Musician Joins
The Orchestra

SO FAR as applause went, two pieces and two performances divided the interest and the admiration of yesterday's audience at Symphony Hall. One piece was Mozart's Concerto for Clarinet, with the solo-part played by Victor Polatschek, newcomer from Vienna to the woodwind choir of the Symphony Orchestra. The other was Rimsky-Korsakov's "Spanish Caprice," played by all concerned with kindling fire. Mozart wrote the Concerto in 1791 to set forth the technique, tone and musical sensibility of a master-clarinetist. A hundred and thirty-nine years later, it served on Friday the same purpose in Boston. Rimsky-Korsakov composed the "Spanish Caprice" in 1886-87 as show-piece for an orchestra in Petersburg. Nearly forty years after, Dr. Muck made it such for the Boston orchestra as well; played it often with mingled finesse and élan. Rather strangely, it appeals less to Dr. Koussevitzky, and not for six years, until yesterday, had it returned to the repertory.

Except in the solo-part, Mozart's Concerto is simple music. According to the program-book, he wrote it in a day. It follows orthodox form: quick movement, slow movement, rondo-finale. It is scored for small orchestra. Wisely, Dr. Koussevitzky assembled his in corresponding proportions. Thereby the Concerto kept easy, transparent flow; while against the background of accompaniment the clarinet-part ran in clear relief. The first division exhibits the range of the instrument—as Mozart's Vienna knew it—and the skill of the virtuoso, for the most part in figures and passage-work, relieved by brief singing measures. The slow division is unalloyed melody, upon which the clarinetist may lavish his tone and prove, as we should say, his musicality. The quick-paced finale of twists and turns again tests his agility.

Every day piece no doubt; but Mozart enough in limpid course and invention, wearing withal the grace of both the composer's and the Vienna. Ease, artifice and a elegance carry Mozart through quick movements. He is musical, banical; sympathetic, besides, to rument he would display. The movement is more. Mozart hears inet serene, sweet and warm; upon the felicities of the virtuoso; instrumental song as serene and in fine contours and sensitized ellow-Viennese took him at his The warm applause of Mr. Polatschek's colleagues was better testimony of his technical aptness, abundance of melody that we lay listeners could Our part was to appreciate the quality of all that he did in the movements, to discover a virtuoso old charm even in passage-work. slow movement, his tone was as body as it was adroit in producing control. It was no less sensitive music before him. He matched his felicities with his own; rarefied zartean serenity and sweetness duty. A master-virtuoso, a fine-musician, now sits in the first's chair. The ghost of Léon Pourcelom Gericke's day, need no longer ny-Korsakov's "Spanish Caprice" posite pole. It is scored for full orchestra, often at the top of its always at the top of its virtuoso. It generates keen excitement, may or may not be musical, among who hear. Every one knows the ns of "thoughtful people." The h Caprice," they say, is surface ect. It has no inner substance; s no musical idea, set forth, d, emotionalized. Instead, it ith rhythms and color; repeats than develops motifs; relies upon rather than continuity. At worst, holly exhibitional; at best it is "merely" orchestral imagination. no emotional quality except ner- simulation or occasional—and in- hint of the nostalgia of North ith. True enough; but "because t virtuous, shall there be no more nd ale?"

shall be when conductor and ra fling them out, as they did Fri- ling them upon listening ears rves. The introductory Alborada forward clanging loud, flashing live with rhythmic verve; yet with of all three qualities left to inten- e repetition. The Variations were f Rimsky's orchestral imagination.

CLARINET SOLO AT SYMPHONY CONCERT

Victor Polatschek Plays
Mozart Concerto

Prokofieff's Fourth Symphony Is Performed for the First Time

For the first time in many seasons a concerto for clarinet was heard at yesterday's Symphony concert. The soloist was Victor Polatschek, first clarinet of the Vienna Philharmonic Orchestra from 1912 to 1929, now first clarinet of the Boston Symphony. Mr. Polatschek in a Mozart concerto gave a performance that was wholly admirable, and deservedly much applauded. The program also included the first performance anywhere of Prokofieff's Fourth Symphony, opus 47, one of the works commissioned by the Boston Symphony for its current anniversary season.

Mozart's music is the severest of all possible tests of a performer's musicianship. Its melody and rhythm demand the utmost flexibility and subtlety of treatment. There is no possibility of covering up a defective technique or an imperfect sense of musical style by sheer volume of tone, or by any of the other well-worn artifices by which virtuoso players set audiences to clapping. One cannot hurry the climaxes, or exaggerate the pianissimi and fortissimi. One cannot be a "prima donna," on sensation bent, in Mozart's music.

Of First Rank

Mr. Polatschek, trained under such conductors as Weingartner, Nikisch, Muck, Walter, Fuertangler and Richard Strauss, in an orchestra still by repute unsurpassed in Europe or America, and admirably gifted by nature, is a musician of the first rank. The sheer perfection of his playing in the adagio of yesterday's concerto was something beyond praise. It went to one's heart to hear a Mozart melody sung once more as such melodies should invariably be sung. An audience, to prone of recent years owing, perhaps, to circumstances beyond its control, to think of Mozart as a writer of tinkling trifles, was obviously deeply stirred.

The clarinet concerto, written out in a single day to oblige a celebrated player and planned to permit ample technical display, is music with a spontaneity, a beauty, that is perhaps a greater proof of Mozart's genius than are his acknowledged masterpieces. The minor works of Beethoven and Wagner, and even Bach are often dull or tawdry. There are few dull pages in Mozart. All that he wrote has his personal stamp on it. Nearly all is beautiful.

Prokofieff's new symphony is a curiously pallid and dull work to come from the writer of the startling "Scythian Suite," and the deft and fluent "Classical Symphony," unless yesterday's performance failed to do it justice. There is a restless modulation from key to key, after the fashion that often grows annoying in the minor works of Cesar Franck. The scoring for the orchestra is gray and colorless, lacking in clarity and sonority. It was unkind of Dr. Koussevitzky to follow Prokofieff's symphony by Rimsky-Korsakov's "Spanish Caprice," one of the best-written works for orchestra yet produced by anyone. But Debussy, Ravel or Stravinsky would have shown up Prokofieff equally clearly if thus juxtaposed. Their woodwind, in particular, would eclipse his.

The only interesting thing about this symphony is the rhythmic groups and contrasting rhythms. One got very weary of 2-4 and 4-4, however, as the music progressed. Perhaps Prokofieff meant his music to win the parodied title "apotheosis of the march." But his rhythms lack the variety and the vitality of those in Beethoven's A major symphony, the "Apotheosis of the Dance."

Strong Point

Dr. Koussevitzky, whose Mozart has never been his strong point, had evidently made a special effort with the "Magic Flute" overture and the concerto yesterday. The overture went distinctly better than one anticipated. The so-called "Masonic chords" that interrupt it were twice taken too slowly, but otherwise there was the requisite fluency. Mozart here avoids writing melodic passages.

But in the concerto the orchestral accompaniment failed to measure up to Mr. Polatschek's solo playing. It is only fair to add that it was the best Mozart playing in melodic passages that Dr. Koussevitzky has yet achieved at these concerts.

The Rimsky-Korsakov, except that the "andante con moto" of the variations became a largo in pace, was brilliantly played and heartily applauded. It, too, showed off Mr. Polatschek's virtuosity in incidental clarinet solos.

There are no symphony concerts here next week, as the orchestra goes to New York. For Nov. 27 and 28 Beethoven's "Emperor" concerto, with Walter Gieseking as soloists, and a new symphony by Howard Hanson are the chief items on the program as now planned.

The Clarinet 930, Two Rus Mozart

New Symphony by A Master-Music
The Orche

SO FAR as applause, and two performances, interest and the audience, Hall. One piece was for Clarinet, with the soloist, Victor Polatschek, new to the woodwind of the Symphony Orchestra. The Rimsky-Korsakov's "Spanish Caprice" was all concerned with Mozart wrote the Concerto, the technique, the sensibility of a master, hundred and thirty-ninth, served on Friday the Boston. Rimsky-Korsakov's "Spanish Caprice" in a piece for an orchestra. Nearly forty years after it such for the Boston played it often with me. Rather strange to Dr. Koussevitzky, years, until yesterday, the repertory.

Except in the solo-part, is simple music. Program-book, he wrote follows orthodox form: slow movement, rondo for small orchestra. v. vitzky assembled his proportions. Thereby easy, transparent flow; background of accompaniment ran in clear division exhibits the rhythm—as Mozart's Viennese skill of the virtuoso part in figures and passages by brief singing melody division is unalloyed in the clarinetist may prove, as we should again tests his agility.

Sale

400 4200 7600 3500 2100
2500 500 400 500 10 10 100
2700 5300 1700 1800 800 1800 2600 2700 100 500

4900 400 2000 700 1400 1100 800 17500
2200
900 600 88800 101400
15800
1000 77900 200 6800
400 100 5000 100 400 1700 2400 2400 7400 500 4300 14500 400 300 3500 1700
575

A workaday piece no doubt; but Mozartean enough in limpid course and ready invention, wearing withal the gracious air of both the composer's and the player's Vienna. Ease, artifice and a touch of elegance carry Mozart through the quick movements. He is musical, not mechanical; sympathetic, besides, to the instrument he would display. The slow movement is more. Mozart hears the clarinet serene, sweet and warm; counts upon the felicities of the virtuoso; writes instrumental song as serene and sweet, in fine contours and sensitized flow.

His fellow-Viennese took him at his word. The warm applause of Mr. Polatschek's colleagues was better testimony to his technical aptness, abundance and certainty that we lay listeners could render. Our part was to appreciate the musical quality of all that he did in the quick movements, to discover a virtuoso who could charm even in passage-work. In the slow movement, his tone was as rich in body as it was adroit in production and control. It was no less sensitive to the music before him. He matched Mozart's felicities with his own; rarefied the Mozartean serenity and sweetness into beauty. A master-virtuoso, a fine-strung musician, now sits in the first clarinet's chair. The ghost of Léon Pourtau, from Gericke's day, need no longer haunt it.

Rimsky-Korsakov's "Spanish Caprice" is at opposite pole. It is scored for full modern orchestra, often at the top of its voice, always at the top of its virtuosity. It generates keen excitement, which may or may not be musical, among those who hear. Every one knows the objections of "thoughtful people." The "Spanish Caprice," they say, is surface and effect. It has no inner substance; contains no musical idea, set forth, amplified, emotionalized. Instead, it plays with rhythms and color; repeats rather than develops motifs; relies upon change rather than continuity. At worst, it is wholly exhibitional; at best it is work of "merely" orchestral imagination. In it is no emotional quality except nervous stimulation or occasional—and incidental—hint of the nostalgia of North for South. True enough; but "because thou art virtuous, shall there be no more cakes and ale?"

There shall be when conductor and orchestra fling them out, as they did Friday, piling them upon listening ears and nerves. The introductory Alborada drove forward clanging loud, flashing light, alive with rhythmic verve; yet with enough of all three qualities left to intensify the repetition. The Variations were proof of Rimsky's orchestral imagination.

He designs with his colors. The cadenzas for solo instruments sounded rhapsodic, like an irrepressible impulse of the players themselves; whereas a week before Mr. Respighi's had been composer's calculation. From the fierce rhythm of the Gypsy Song into the tumults of the Fandango. (Yes; Rimsky had something to teach a young pupil, Igor Stravinsky by name.) At the end, for final tour de force, the leap back into the first Alborada. An orchestral spree if the hearer likes, but with more imagination in it than six plodding symphonies or twelve mediocre tone-poems may contain. Conductor and orchestra had prepared "The Spanish Caprice" so that every subtlety and shading might shine through. They did; while the whole sounded like a five-fold sweep of improvisation. Rimsky, like Strauss, composes direct for orchestra. Many another begins in black and white; then adds the colors.

The contrast to Mozart's Concerto was his Overture to "The Magic Flute"—the puissant Mozart sounding deep and thrilling chords, as one about to make drama in tones; outspringing into a magical fugue as one who is preparing the way for a magic opera; remembering the chords; again sounding them; so on to the end. There is no hint of the "sunlit," the "sportive," the "heavenly" Mozart in this overture to his final opera. Instead the Mozart of genius at the threshold of heights and depths. Of course, Dr. Koussevitzky dramatized; but Mozart, writing those chords and that fugue, had given him leave and bidding. Again the conductor used a relatively small orchestra. The clearer, finer-proportioned, more sonorous and in character went the music.

In turn, the contrast to Rimsky's "Spanish Caprice" was Prokofiev's new Symphony—his fourth—composed for the Boston Orchestra at its fiftieth anniversary bearing no other discoverable relation to that occasion. Rimsky, writing in Petersburg, looked westward. Prokofiev, composing in Paris, turned eastward; utilized musical ideas from his ballet, "The Prodigal Son"; worked them anew to oriental suggestion. (Why not? Diaghilev is dead. Most of the ballets that he produced in his later years have vanished with him from the theater.) Rimsky's show-piece depends upon rhythm and timbres. Prokofiev's Symphony relies no less upon rhythm; but prefers line to color. Rimsky in the "Spanish Caprice" is instantly change-ful; whereas Prokofiev in this new piece too often reiterated. They do carry along and the music itself—me too frequent and for the first time within Prokofiev shows the cloven composers—the tendency her than variation.

Fourth Symphony seems in a middle way. Prokofiev's savage vigors and the colors by which American knew him and still craves writes no companion-piece flowing, adept and fecund phony." Now he stretches it, fills it with sharp-lined matter. Once clear of a production, the first "Allegro" proceeds in dynamic motion, theater-quality. The music in itself may not be re- as always with Prokofiev animated, propulsive. It is not sorry for the con- gentler, more reposeful comes the moment to re- music he has heard, and again at the resumption o eroico," is angular and so far as it has definite instrumental color. Os- fiev is writing a self-con- it there is more than sus- ecting program. deepens through a slow dering restlessly from key- stently dissonant, broken by strangely deep and ures. If the "Allegro" ere, this "Andante tran- e, even grim. A "Scher- the prescribed form but, erately avoiding the light- er scherzo-vein—a sober- colored music, made chief- 2; against a background. 1tered, of strings. The rhythmic energy, keeps y, of the beginning eater-quality and a pro- measures sounded, the eculation. How much "Son" has gone into this ? Was there a pro- if the composer's head? eg mood of energy and to Prokofiev, at mo- us-like? . . . A second rect and enlarge first H. T. P.

OLD MUSIC DOMINATES SYMPHONY

Rimsky's Caprice Puts Prokofieff's Work in Shade

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

For a time the rich-toned and inspiring performance of Rimsky-Korsakov's Spanish Caprice that ended the Symphony Concert of yesterday afternoon effaced all recollection of what had gone before, of Mozart's Overture to "The Magic Flute," neatly handled by a diminished orchestra; of that same composers' Clarinet Concerto, with the accomplished Mr. Polatschek as the soloist, and of the New Fourth Symphony of Prokofieff, composed, it now goes almost without saying, for the 50th anniversary of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

MOZART FOR BEGINNINGS

When the excitements engendered by this gorgeous and compelling version of Rimsky's orchestral show-piece had sufficiently cooled, the listener did recall that Mozart's overture had been given a performance more than usually felicitous, thanks not a little to Dr. Koussevitzky's happy expedient of reducing the number of strings. He recalled, too, that Mr. Polatschek, the orchestra's new first clarinetist, had played with true Mozartian grace and finish, with sensitive phrasing and a tone beautifully controlled, his portion in the Concerto that Mozart in a single day wrote for a contemporary virtuoso, and also that the piece itself, unheard here for many years, is possessed of no small charm, that its Adagio, indeed, is Mozart in one of his rarer moods.

Yes, these things did come back to mind; but although Dr. Koussevitzky undoubtedly never intended it, the music of the elder Russian caused that of the younger to fade quite completely out of the mental picture. This Spanish Caprice was written two years before Prokofieff was born. The listener, wending his way homeward, wondered whether it would not be played and enjoyed long after not only Prokofieff himself, but his compositions too, have gone the way of all the world.

Made to Order Music

We listen as appreciatively as we may to the music of our own day. We have our enthusiasm for this or that school, for this or that composer. But ever and anon there arises a doubt as to whether anything written by the men whom we of 1930 call modernists is endowed with the vitality that defies the years.

At any rate it takes no great courage to declare that Prokofieff's symphony of yesterday has not that quality. Here is a piece made, in a sense, to order, and bearing plainly the earmarks of an appointed task competently performed rather than those of music written out of some inner necessity.

Labor All Around

There are agreeable moments in the new symphony's slow division and again in the Scherzo, and the Finale ends with a vigor and bustle that yesterday elicited a round or two of applause. But the piece is, for Prokofieff, strangely lacking in physiognomy. The musical ideas are not salient; the treatment of them is seldom striking. To speak plainly, the net impression was one of labor; labor for the composer, labor for the players, and labor for the conductor. And then came Rimsky with his frank tunes and rhythms, his glowing orchestration to set that labor quite at naught.

Boston Symphony

Serge Prokofieff was the purveyor of the jubilee piece to the program of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's concerts of Nov. 14 and 15: his Fourth Symphony, op. 47. Although "composed for the orchestra's anniversary," this work does not bear the earmarks of the "occasional" piece, and one is not surprised to read that though finished only in June, 1930, it was begun in 1929. It seems probable that it was conceived before Dr. Koussevitzky's invitation was extended. The symphony, if not calculated to rouse the public to frenzies of delight, is individual, and musically interesting. Writing "absolute" music, its composer has not found it necessary to indulge in such tonal orgies as mark the descriptive music of his

He designs with his colors. The zas for solo instruments sound, sodic, like an irrepressible impulse players themselves; whereas a while before Mr. Respighi's had been common calculation. From the fierce rhythm the Gypsy Song into the tumults of the Pandango. (Yes; Rimsky had son to teach a young pupil, Igor Stravinsky by name.) At the end, for final force, the leap back into the first rade. An orchestral spree if the likes, but with more imagination than six plodding symphonies or mediocre tone-poems may contain. The conductor and orchestra had prepared "Spanish Caprice" so that every sound and shading might shine through. It did; while the whole sounded like a fold sweep of improvisation. Rimsky Strauss, composes direct for orchestra. Many another begins in black and then adds the colors. The cultivates rather too often reiterated rhythymical figures. They do carry along players, hearers and the music itself—until they become too frequent and monotonous. For the first time within recollection Prokofiev shows the cloven foot of Russian composers—the tendency to repetition rather than variation.

Otherwise this Fourth Symphony seems of the composer in a middle way. Prokofiev eschews the savage vigors and the barbaric splendors by which American audiences first knew him and still crave him. Yet he writes no companion-piece to the light, flowing, adept and fecund "Classical Symphony." Now he stretches a larger frame, fills it with sharp-lined, lean-bodied matter. Once clear of this brief slow introduction, the first "Allegro eroico" proceeds in dynamic motion, with frequent theater-quality. The musical invention in itself may not be remarkable; but, as always with Prokofiev,

The contrast to Mozart's Concerto for Piano and Violin, which catches the hearer into incessant movement until he is not sorry for the contrast of a few gentler, more reposeful chords, as one about to rest after a drama in tones; outspringing from the way for a magic opera; and then the "Allegro eroico," is angular and austere; gray, so far as it has definite harmonic and instrumental color. On the "sunny," the "sportive," the "harmonious" Mozart in this overture to his opera. Instead of the threshold of heights and depths of a directing program. course, Dr. Koussevitzky's drama: The suspicion deepens through a slow but Mozart, writing those chord movement, wandering restlessly from key to key; persistently dissonant, broken that fugue, had given him leave to use once and twice by strangely deep and tiny small orchestra. The continuous measures. If the "Allegro eroico" was austere, this "Andante tranquillo" is sombre, even grim. A "Scherzo" follows, in the prescribed form but as it seems, deliberately avoiding the light. Symphony — his fourth — composer or the rougher scherzo-vein—a sober, the Boston Orchestra at its marching, sober-colored music, made chief anniversary bearing no other by woodwinds against a background. coverable relation to that occasion, none too characterized, of strings. The sky, writing in Petersburg, looks like a renewal of the rhythmic energy, keeps ward. Prokofiev, composing in the austerity, of the beginning; turned eastward; utilized musical hints again at theater-quality and a program from his ballet, "The Prodigal Son." The last measures sounded, the worked them anew to oriental listener falls to speculation. How much of the ballets that he produced in his Fourth Symphony? Was there a program at the back of the composer's head? years have vanished with him from theater.) Rimsky's show-piece of energy and Why this pervading mood of energy and austerity, strange to Prokofiev, at moments rather Sibellus-like? . . . A second hearing should correct and enlarge first impressions.

H. T. P.

OLD MUSIC DOMINATES SYMPHONY

Rimsky's Caprice Puts Prokofieff's Work in Shade

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

For a time the rich-toned and inspiring performance of Rimsky-Korsakov's Spanish Caprice that ended the Symphony Concert of yesterday afternoon effaced all recollection of what had gone before, of Mozart's Overture to "The Magic Flute," neatly handled by a diminished orchestra; of that same composer's Clarinet Concerto, with the accomplished Mr. Polatschek as the soloist, and of the New Fourth Symphony of Prokofieff, composed, it now goes almost without saying, for the 50th anniversary of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

MOZART FOR BEGINNINGS

When the excitements engendered by this gorgeous and compelling version of Rimsky's orchestral show-piece had sufficiently cooled, the listener did recall that Mozart's overture had been given a performance more than usually felicitous, thanks not a little to Dr. Koussevitzky's happy expedient of reducing the number of strings. He recalled, too, that Mr. Polatschek, the orchestra's new first clarinetist, had played with true Mozartian grace and finish, with sensitive phrasing and a tone beautifully controlled, his portion in the Concerto that Mozart in a single day wrote for a contemporary virtuoso, and also that the piece itself, unheard here for many years, is possessed of no small charm, that its Adagio, indeed, is Mozart in one of his rarer moods.

Yes, these things did come back to mind; but although Dr. Koussevitzky, undoubtedly never intended it, the music of the elder Russian caused that of the younger to fade quite completely out of the mental picture. This Spanish Caprice was written two years before Prokofieff was born. The listener, wending his way homeward, wondered whether it would not be played and enjoyed long after not only Prokofieff himself, but his compositions too, have gone the way of all the world.

Made to Order Music

We listen as appreciatively as we may to the music of our own day. We have our enthusiasm for this or that school, for this or that composer. But ever and anon there arises a doubt as to whether anything written by the men whom we of 1930 call modernists is endowed with the vitality that defies the years.

At any rate it takes no great courage to declare that Prokofiev's symphony of yesterday has not that quality. Here is a piece made, in a sense, to order, and bearing plainly the earmarks of an appointed task competently performed rather than those of music written out of some inner necessity.

Labor All Around

There are agreeable moments in the new symphony's slow division and again in the Scherzo, and the Finale ends with a vigor and bustle that yesterday elicited a round or two of applause. But the piece is, for Prokofieff, strangely lacking in physiognomy. The musical ideas are not salient; the treatment of them is seldom striking. To speak plainly, the net impression was one of labor; labor for the composer, labor for the players, and labor for the conductor. And then came Rimsky with his frank tunes and rhythms, his glowing orchestration to set that labor quite at naught.

Boston Symphony

Serge Prokofieff was the purveyor of the jubilee piece to the program of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's concerts of Nov. 14 and 15: his Fourth Symphony, op. 47. Although "composed for the orchestra's anniversary," this work does not bear the earmarks of the "occasional" piece, and one is not surprised to read that though finished only in June, 1930, it was begun in 1929. It seems probable that it was conceived before Dr. Koussevitzky's invitation was extended. The symphony, if not calculated to rouse the public to frenzies of delight, is individual, and musically interesting. Writing "absolute" music, its composer has not found it necessary to indulge in such tonal orgies as mark the descriptive music of his

"Scythian" Suite or his choral piece, "Sept, Ils Sont Sept." On the other hand, the score is not so decorous as the "Classical" Symphony; it lies between these extremes. There are the usual four movements. The thematic material is characteristic and striking. Much use is made throughout of the soloists of the woodwind group, and in the slow movement there is a duet of bass tuba and double-bassoon. This innovation, however, is not employed for sensational purposes; indeed, it is noticeable that nowhere in the symphony is there room for suspicion of a search for effect. With all his harmonic and contrapuntal resources and his command of orchestration, Mr. Prokofiev has evidently set himself to a purely musical task.

The Prokofiev Symphony introduced the second half of the program. It had a good reception, which, however, was immediately eclipsed by the excitement over the brilliant performance of Rimsky-Korsakoff's meretricious "Spanish Caprice," with which Dr. Koussevitzky closed the proceedings. But for some of us the high point of the concert came with Mozart's Clarinet Concerto, which presented to the subscribers Victor Polatschek, the new first clarinetist of the orchestra, captured by Dr. Koussevitzky from the Vienna Philharmonic. Mr. Polatschek, in electing the music of his great fellow-townsmen, subjected himself to a severe test, in which he achieved with utmost nonchalance an artistic triumph. Americans must now revise their belief that woodwind players are to be obtained only from among those graduates of the Paris Conservatoire who carry off the Prix de Rome. For Mr. Polatschek not only proved that he possesses a tone of great beauty through the vast range of the instrument, and a technique which enables him to perform with ease the tasks set by Mozart in this display piece; but he made it manifest, through his sensitive phrasing and his aristocratic style, that he is a musician of fine quality, whose acquisition is without doubt a gain for the orchestra.

Although Dr. Koussevitzky had shown a tendency to overdramatize the Overture to "The Magic Flute," which opened the concert, he made up for this transgression by the suavity of his accompaniment to the Concerto. He wisely employed a much reduced orchestra for both these numbers.

L. A. S.

City Tomorrow and Yesterday at Symphony Hall

Prokofiev's Jubilee Number, as Well as Ears at Children's Matinee

Contribution from the Russian composer, Serge Prokofiev for the anniversary of the Boston Symphony Orchestra is a symphony which will be played at the concert on Saturday. It is the composer's 11th symphony and stands in C major. Within belief, it is a work written merely to fulfill a "commission"; not entirely of occasion; for the manuscript at Symphony Hall bears the number, "Op. 47, 1929." It owes its inception entirely to our mission from Boston, that was given many months ago. The composer must have set to work to write it, and he must have written with ease to believe that he was writing for the orchestra in its festival already projected and completed. The new symphony has no departures from orthodoxy, but few departures from the conventional orchestration of orchestration, however, it does discover that Prokofiev follows those moderns who with the bogey of transcriptions: all his instruments are "C"—clarinets and horns are not the first time, how- ever, Prokofiev has so written. The harmonies, in the new symphony, are paths already trodden, but of the composer. It is a precedent of the barbaric of "Sept, ils sont sept," of the first symphony, or better of "Love for Three Cyprians." The look for the composer's dissonances there are, in quantity as to dominate the symphony, and then only to be in accents—as a Whistler's canvas of grays of red. There is a characteristic device of the composer, a series of related keys, or of passing through a series of unrelated common chords are slight reminiscences of the major or minor chords, always emerging, movement. A recapitulation is much in either case, in the key prevailing at the time. The first theme sings in strings the time.

His melodies are either surprisingly active and virile, or soothingly lyric—often child-like, almost naive. In either case they have a tendency of leaping into an unrelated key in the midst of a phrase, only to return with equal suddenness in the answer. The texture of the music is in part highly contrapuntal (no dissonance is too sharp for the composer if it can serve in the natural conduct of a contrapuntal line), or goes to extremes of homophonic style. Accompaniment figures of the simple type sometimes called "Mozartean" are much in evidence. Often it assumes a slowness, a sparseness akin to chamber-orchestra style. The rhythms are of the strong, aggressive type characteristic of both the composer and of the day in which he lives.

Prokofiev's Symphony IV, in C major, Opus 47, begins with a slow introduction, Andante Assai, proceeds through a sonata-formed Allegro Eroica, for first movement; the second is the usual slow movement, Andante tranquillo; a third movement, Moderato, subtitled "Scherzo," is in the un-scherzo-like meter of two-four, and the key of B minor; the fourth movement, Allegro risoluto, returns to C major.

The introduction is quiet and tranquil in mood. Flutes and clarinets sing the theme. The bass has a rhythmic motif from which the main theme of the symphony germinates. This highly energetic theme enters with the Allegro Eroica. The "bridge" is full of staccato-rhythmed passages, accented by sharp dissonances. As it draws near a close it diminishes to the exceedingly simple Mozartean accompaniment figures. These in turn serve as perfect introduction to the clear, fluid melody which is the second theme. It is sung by flute to simple string accompaniment, is followed at once by duet between clarinet and bass clarinet. The development is very energetic, full of active skips, highly accented, works chiefly the main theme. The recapitulation is regular. The Coda once more brings final working of the main theme.

In the second movement after four measures of a sort of misty introduction a flute sings a long sustained melody of eleven measures. Then comes the chief curiosity of the symphony. Bass tuba and contrabassoon sing an expressive melody by way of transition passage. The second theme enters expressively for clarinet solo, B major, three-two. Much of this material is then worked as in a development section. Both the first theme and the tuba theme receive attention. There are ominous chords in low trombones with kettle-drums. At the week-end concerts list also a semi-week out of time, all but forgotten. The orchestra this year has a new clarinetist, Mr. V. Polatschek. At the concert he will play Mozart's concerto for his chosen instrument. Only this concerto has been heard at the symphony concerts—on March 29 and 18, when Mr. Sand was soloist and Schmitt conducted. Once previous-ly the history of the orchestra has been a clarinet solo, when a Mr. work bears the date Sept. 23, 1791. It was therefore written very before the death of Mozart. Biographers affirm that it was written in a day for a convivial friend of the composer who was a great clarinetist.

Mozart

The concerto moves through the usual movements: Allegro, Adagio, Ron- do, and a long sustained melody of al, pleasant course. There is the conventional form, the conventional tut- tle has sufficient opportunities to show dexterity as well as the tone of four symphonies—Roussel's and Na- ms's Second on one program; Na- and Chalkovsky's Fourth on the . . . At the next pair of con- at home, on Nov. 28 and 29, Mr. on's new "Romantic Symphony" be heard and Mr. Gieseking, the

"Scythian" Suite or his choral piece "Sept, Ils Sont Sept." On the other hand, the score is not so decorous as the "Classical" Symphony; it lies between these extremes. There are the usual four movements. The thematic material is characteristic and striking. Much use is made throughout the soloists of the woodwind group and in the slow movement there is a duet of bass tuba and double-bassoon. This innovation, however, is not employed for sensational purposes; indeed, it is noticeable that nowhere in the symphony is there room for suspicion of a search for effect. With all his harmonic and contrapuntal resources and his command of orchestration, Mr. Prokofiev has evidently set himself to a purely musical task.

The Prokofiev Symphony introduced the second half of the program. It had a good reception, which, however, was immediately eclipsed by the excitement over the brilliant performance of Rimsky-Korsakoff's melancolic "Spanish Caprice," with which Dr. Koussevitzky closed the proceedings. But for some of us the high point of the concert came with Mozart's Clarinet Concerto, which was presented to the subscribers Victor Polatschek, the new first clarinet of the orchestra, captured by Dr. Koussevitzky from the Vienna Philharmonic. Mr. Polatschek, in electing the music of his great fellow-townsmen, subjected himself to a severe test, in which he achieved with most nonchalance an artistic triumph. Americans must now revise their belief that woodwind players are to be obtained only from among the graduates of the Paris Conservatoire who carry off the Prix de Rome. For Mr. Polatschek not only proved that he possesses a tone of great beauty through the vast range of the instrument, and a technique which enables him to perform with ease the tasks set by Mozart in this display piece; but he made it manifest through his sensitive phrasing and his aristocratic style, that he is a musician of fine quality, whose acquisition is without doubt a gain for the orchestra.

Although Dr. Koussevitzky has shown a tendency to overdramatize the Overture to "The Magic Flute" which opened the concert, he made up for this transgression by the suavity of his accompaniment to the Concerto. He wisely employed a reduced orchestra for both the numbers.

Tomorrow and Yesterday at Symphony Hall

Prokofiev's Jubilee Number, Eyes as Well as Ears at A Children's Matinee

THE contribution from the Russian composer, Serge Prokofiev for the anniversary of the Boston Symphony Orchestra is a symphony that will be played at the concert of Friday and Saturday. It is the composer's fourth symphony and stands in the key of C major. Within belief, it is not a work written merely to fulfill the demands of a "commission"; not entirely a "pièce d'occasion"; for the manuscript score at Symphony Hall bears the date and opus number, "Op. 47, 1929." If the work owes its inception entirely to the commission from Boston, that commission was given many months ago, and the composer must have set to work quickly and must have written with dispatch. It is easier to believe that he dedicated to the orchestra in its festival year a work already projected and perhaps partly completed. The new symphony shows no departures from orthodox form and but few departures from the practices of conventional orchestration. Students of orchestration, however, will be interested to discover that Prokofiev's score follows those moderns who would do away with the bogey of transposing instruments: all his instruments are written in "C"—clarinets and horns included. It is not the first time, however, that Prokofiev has so written. Prokofiev's harmonies, in the new symphony, follow paths already trodden, and characteristic of the composer. It is not to the precedent of the barbaric Scythian Suite or of "Sept, Ils sont sept," that Prokofiev here returns. Rather in the Classical Symphony, or better still, in portions of "Love for Three Oranges" may we look for the composer of this symphony. Dissonances there are, but not in such quantity as to dominate the style. The sharpest dissonances are used very sparingly, and then only to point vividly certain accents—as a Whistler might illuminate a canvas of grays by a single touch of red. There is considerable use of the characteristic device of modulating quickly through a series of comparatively unrelated keys, or of passing through a series of unrelated common major or minor chords, always emerging in either case, in the key prevailing at the time.

His melodies are either surprisingly active and virile, or soothingly lyric—often childlike, almost naive. In either case they have a tendency of leaping into an unrelated key in the midst of a phrase, only to return with equal suddenness in the answering phrase. The texture of the music is in part highly contrapuntal (no dissonance is too sharp for the composer if it can serve in the natural conduct of a contrapuntal line), or goes to extremes of homophonic style. Accompaniment figures of the simple type sometimes called "Mozartian" are much in evidence. Often it assumes a slightness, a sparseness akin to chamber-orchestra style. The rhythms are of the strong, aggressive type characteristic of both the composer and of the day in which he lives.

Prokofiev's Symphony IV, in C major, Opus 47, begins with a slow introduction, Andante Assai, proceeds through a sonata-formed Allegro Eroica, for first movement; the second is the usual slow movement, Andante tranquillo; a third movement, Moderato, sub-titled "Scherzoso," is in the un-scherzo-like meter of two-four, and the key of B minor; the fourth movement, Allegro risoluto, returns to C major.

The introduction is quiet and tranquil in mood. Flutes and clarinets sing the theme. The bass has a rhythmic motif from which the main theme of the symphony germinates. This highly energetic theme enters with the Allegro Eroica. The "bridge" is full of staccato-rhythmed passages, accented by sharp dissonances. As it draws near a close it diminishes to the exceedingly simple Mozartean accompaniment figures. These in turn serve as perfect introduction to the clear, fluid melody which is the second theme. It is sung by flute to simple string accompaniment, is followed at once by duet between clarinet and bass clarinet. The development is very energetic, full of active skips, highly accented, works chiefly the main theme. The recapitulation is regular. The Coda once more brings final working of the main theme.

In the second movement after four measures of a sort of misty introduction a flute sings a long sustained melody of eleven measures. Then comes the chief curiosity of the symphony. Bass tuba and contrabassoon sing an expressive melody by way of transition passage. The second theme enters expressively for four measures, B major, three-two. Much of this material is then worked as in the development section. Both the first theme and the tuba theme receive attention. There are ominous chords in low trombones with kettle-drums. At the ere are slight reminiscences of the movement. A recapitulation is much anticipated. The first theme sings in strings at the second theme.

A Larghetto merely hints, in the oboe at once the "Scherzoso" movement. After contrasting material it is repeated in the main contrast, however, given to the oboe. "Meno Mosso," is songful in character, and vacillates in D major and F major. These divisions alternate with each other after the manner of a rondo.

last movement, Allegro Risoluto, is the most extended of the four. A very rapid and rapidly moving passage in notes, taken in unison by strings and woodwinds, forms the chief theme, which is much repeated, is subsidiary. The movement is most energetic of the four, forming the climax to the symphony. Harmon-

it is also the most daring, reminding more than the other three movements of the harmonic excesses of the decade began during the World War. Occasional slow movements, its abandon, suggestion of an earlier period, the "Scythian Suite." Now and then it rises to fury such as only this century has been able to bring to music.

Mozart

week-end concerts list also a semi-weekly out of time, all but forgotten. orchestra this year has a new clarinetist, Mr. V. Polatschek. At the concerts he will play Mozart's concerto for his chosen instrument. Only has this concerto been heard at the symphony concerts—on March 29 and 18, when Mr. Sand was soloist and Schmitt conducted. Once previously the history of the orchestra has been a clarinet solo, when a Mr. was soloist in 1884. The score bears the date Sept. 28, 1791, before the death of Mozart. Biographers affirm that it was written in a day for a convivial friend of the composer who was a great clarinetist.

concerto moves through the usual movements: Allegro, Adagio, Ron- dante, and a final, pleasant course. There is the conventional form, the conventional tut-tle has sufficient solo passages. The dexterity as well as the tone of four symphonies—Roussel's and Naumann's Second on one program; Naumann's Fourth on the next pair of concerts. At the next pair of concerts, on Nov. 28 and 29, Mr. will be heard and Mr. Gieseking, the

"Scythian" Suite or his choral piece, "Sept, Ils Sont Sept." On the other hand, the score is not so decorous as the "Classical" Symphony; it lies between these extremes. There are the usual four movements. The thematic material is characteristic and striking. Much use is made throughout the soloists of the woodwind group and in the slow movement there is a duet of bass tuba and double-bassoon. This innovation, however, is not employed for sensational purposes; indeed, it is noticeable that nowhere in the symphony is there room for suspicion of a search for effect. With all his harmonic and contrapuntal resources and his command of orchestration, Mr. Prokofiev has evidently set himself to a purely musical task.

The Prokofiev Symphony introduced the second half of the program. It had a good reception, which, however, was immediately eclipsed by the excitement over the brilliant performance of Rimsky-Korsakoff's mercurious "Spanish Caprice," with which Dr. Koussevitzky closed the proceedings. But for some of us the high point of the concert came with Mozart's Clarinet Concerto, which was presented to the subscribers Victor Polatschek, the new first clarinet of the orchestra, captured by Dr. Koussevitzky from the Vienna Philharmonic. Mr. Polatschek, in electing the music of his great fellow-townsmen, subjected himself to a severe test, in which he achieved with the most nonchalance an artistic triumph. Americans must now revise their belief that woodwind players are to be obtained only from among the graduates of the Paris Conservatoire who carry off the Prix de Rome. For Mr. Polatschek not only proved that he possesses a tone of great beauty through the vast range of the instrument, and a technique which enables him to perform with ease the tasks set by Mozart in this display piece; but he made it manifest through his sensitive phrasing and his aristocratic style, that he is a musician of fine quality, whose acquisition is without doubt a gain for the orchestra.

Although Dr. Koussevitzky has shown a tendency to overdramatize the Overture to "The Magic Flute" which opened the concert, he made up for this transgression by the suavity of his accompaniment to the Concerto. He wisely employed a reduced orchestra for both the numbers.

Tomorrow and Yesterday at Symphony Hall

Prokofiev's Jubilee Number, Eyes as Well as Ears at A Children's Matinee

THE contribution from the Russian composer, Serge Prokofiev for the anniversary of the Boston Symphony Orchestra is a symphony that will be played at the concert of Friday and Saturday. It is the composer's fourth symphony and stands in the key of C major. Within belief, it is not a work written merely to fulfill the demands of a "commission"; not entirely a "pièce d'occasion"; for the manuscript score at Symphony Hall bears the date and opus number, "Op. 47, 1929." If the work owes its inception entirely to the commission from Boston, that commission was given many months ago, and the composer must have set to work quickly and must have written with dispatch. It is easier to believe that he dedicated to the orchestra in its festival year a work already projected and perhaps partly completed. The new symphony shows no departures from orthodox form and but few departures from the practices of conventional orchestration. Students of orchestration, however, will be interested to discover that Prokofiev's score follows those moderns who would do away with the bogey of transposing instruments: all his instruments are written in "C"—clarinets and horns included. It is not the first time, however, that Prokofiev has so written. Prokofiev's harmonies, in the new symphony, follow paths already trodden and characteristic of the composer. It is not to the precedent of the barbaric Scythian Suite or of "Sept, ils sont sept," that Prokofiev here returns. Rather in the Classical Symphony, or better still, in portions of "Love for Three Oranges" may we look for the composer of this symphony. Dissonances there are, but not in such quantity as to dominate the style. The sharpest dissonances are used very sparingly, and then only to point vividly certain accents—as a Whittier might illuminate a canvas of grays by a single touch of red. There is considerable use of the characteristic device of modulating quickly through a series of L. A. S. comparatively unrelated keys, or of passing ing through a series of major or minor chords in either case, in the time.

His melodies are either and virile, or soothing like, almost naïve. In a tendency of leaping a key in the midst of a turn with equal suddenness. The texture in part highly contrapuntal is too sharp for the ear in the natural contrapuntal line), or goes to phonic style. Accompanying the simple type sometimes are much in evidence, a slightness, a chamber-orchestra style are of the strong, aggressive of both the day in which he lives.

Prokofiev's Symphony Opus 47, begins with a slow Andante Assai, proceeds sonata-form, Allegro movement; the second is movement, Andante movement, Moderato, scherzoso, is in the un-scherz two-four, and the key of fourth movement, Allegro turns to C major.

The introduction is quiet in mood. Flutes and clarinets. The bass has a theme from which the main theme germinates. This theme enters with the A. The "bridge" is full of staccato passages, accented by sharp. As it draws near a close it the exceedingly simple Mozartian figures. These are as perfect introduction to the melody which is the second sung by flute to simple string movement, is followed at once between clarinet and bass clarinet development is very energetic skips, highly accented chiefly the main theme. The motion is regular. The Coda brings final working of the melody.

In the second movement measures of a sort of misty a flute sings a long sustained eleven measures. Then comes curiosity of the symphony, and contrabassoon sing a melody by way of transition second theme enters expanded clarinet solo, B major, the of this material is then in development section. B theme and the tuba theme. There are ominous trombones with kettle-drums.

and there are slight reminiscences of the first movement. A recapitulation is much abridged. The first theme sings in strings briefly. A Larghetto merely hints, in clarinet, at the second theme.

A piquant theme in the oboe at once begins the "Scherzoso" movement. After some contrasting material it is repeated in strings. The main contrast, however, is also given to the oboe, "Meno Mosso," more songful in character, and vacillates between D major and F major. These two divisions alternate with each other much after the manner of a rondo.

The last movement, Allegro Risoluto, is the most extended of the four. A very vigorous and rapidly moving passage in eighth notes, taken in unison by strings and woodwinds, forms the chief theme. To that theme, which is much repeated, all else is subsidiary. The movement is the most energetic of the four, forming real climax to the symphony. Harmonically it is also the most daring, reminding more than the other three movements of the harmonic excesses of the decade which began during the World War. Occasionally its wildness, its abandon, suggest the Prokofiev of an earlier period, say of the "Scythian Suite." Now and again it rises to fury such as only this twentieth century has been able to bring in music.

Rare Mozart

The week-end concerts list also a semi-novelty out of time, all but forgotten. The orchestra this year has a new clarinet soloist, Mr. V. Polatschek. At the coming concerts he will play Mozart's concerto for his chosen instrument. Only once has this concerto been heard at Symphony concerts—on March 29 and 30, 1918, when Mr. Sand was soloist and Mr. Schmitt conducted. Once previously in the history of the orchestra has there been a clarinet solo, when a Mr. Strasser was soloist in 1884. The score of the work bears the date Sept. 28, 1791, at Vienna. It was therefore written very shortly before the death of Mozart. Biographers affirm that it was written in a single day for a convivial friend of the composer who was a great clarinetist.

The concerto moves through the usual three movements: Allegro, Adagio, Rondo. It is Mozartean technique running its normal, pleasant course. There is the conventional form, the conventional tuttis, the conventional solo passages. The clarinet has sufficient opportunities to display dexterity as well as the tone than four symphonies—Roussel's and Brahms's Second on one program; Nabokov's and Chaikovsky's Fourth on the other. . . . At the next pair of concerts at home, on Nov. 28 and 29, Mr. Hanson's new "Romantic Symphony" will be heard and Mr. Gieseeking, the pianist, will join the orchestra in Beethoven's "Emperor" Concerto. "Bolero," too, will be played once more.

102

There is one defender of Mr. Respighi's berated "Metamorphoseon"—the librarian of the orchestra, who spent hours in the correction of the manuscript parts. He cannot say too much for the musicianly scholarship, the command of orchestral resource and instrumental invention that such scrutiny disclosed. He admits that he is a solitary champion. And what if these paper-virtues failed to sound out of public performance? First of all music is written to be heard.

Two Russians Come Fresh to Symphony Hall

Tempting Guess-Work Around An Unsigned Overture for The Jubilee Year

AT Symphony Hall on Friday and Saturday half the program goes to novel music. First there is the overture of the composer who wishes to remain unnamed, but who is evidently a well-wisher of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. It is one more of the series of works for the Golden Anniversary. Next there is the new symphony by the new composer, Nabokov, produced by Pierre Monteux last February at the concerts of the Paris Symphony Orchestra; as yet unheard on this side of the Atlantic.

No doubt many frequenters of the Symphony Concerts are indulging in a guessing-game as to the identity of the unnamed composer. At present there is no authorized solution of the puzzle. The analyst can only submit certain meager evidence from which all who choose may draw conclusions. First, Dr. Koussevitzky said in so many words a few weeks ago that the composer is a Russian. Next, the instrumentation of the overture may be significant. For it is exactly the instrumentation of the Boston Symphony Orchestra as it was constituted last season—down to the eight horns and five trombones. It is hardly a far-fetched deduction that this Russian composer, setting to his work a few months ago, had an exact and familiar knowledge of the orchestral resources at his disposal. There, for the while, conjecture stops—say at a secret of Polichinelle.

which is not lengthy, three main divisions: an Adagio, a main portion, "Energico," and a conclusion. All three are based on a theme, frankly borrowed from the Russian Hymn of Triumph, composed by Glinka and used by Tchaikovsky in his opera "A Life for the Tsar." Concerning the origin of the theme an unidentified informant in front of one of the opera at the Public gave the following significant information. The article is the coronation of Alexander III (1882). Certain place in the Red Square and included a periphrastic epilogue. The epilogue "represents the entry into Moscow of the tsar, first of the Poles, the Russian capital, and it by a general rising of the people." The article suggests this scene for the coronation will be only a re-enactment of the scene which the opera celebrates. In the music, it contributed to the program to a concert late for the late Prince George, the authority on the subject years ago [i. e. twenty years ago] about the origin of the Fin-land to Prince Galitzin, Nicholas determined one that the must no longer employ more than the 'God Save the Tsar' which is also the English which is also the late last of the Prussian center the 'America' of the of the that she must have a declared of her own.

of the Russian composers to read Acts of national and patriotic never from the various hymns, under the them sent in, selected Club of, one by Glinka, the insisted on performance in presence of Volstead, assembly of courtiers and is can extol and march produced a press and the fact of its being the Russian was not calculated in those days, when to with most persons, and of the court, equivalent

But Lvov, in the or- niment to his (God Save the Tsar) introduced such a num- ber of drums that Nicholas military instincts by authority, was quite carried moment of enthusiasm to Lvov. . . . did not please the Em-

Rally

—Will the "Lost" and for Attorney

peror, above all other hymns, for the Slavophiles and the malcontents generally to attach the highest importance to it; which, however, they were justified in doing on Slavic and national grounds. Glinka's "Hymn of Triumph," with its thoroughly popular character, came in any case to be looked upon as the national anthem of Russia in opposition to the State Anthem. It is hardly to be wondered at that this piece of music, esteemed as it is by Russians, used by them for joyous and festive occasions, should be taken as a theme for a work celebrating an equally festive occasion in the life of the orchestra to whom the composer dedicated it.

In the Adagio of the new overture the organ alone, in notes of even rhythm and neutral color, with utmost simplicity, gives out this theme. Other instruments take it up. The introduction completes the ascent which is preparation for the overture proper, and the theme is launched in full martial energy by the whole orchestra. A single contrast (conventional "second theme") ensues, taken by strings lyrically. There is much development of the principal theme, with episodes "fugato." It returns in even greater force, but the second theme does not recur; instead there is further development, leading up to the climactic Maestoso, which gives final utterance to the theme at broadest and most sonorous—an apotheosis.

A Singing Symphony

With attention divided between two scores, and the time limited in which those scores could be seen, it was impossible to give more than a hasty glance at Nabokov's symphony. Nicolas Nabokov is one of the expatriate Russians residing in Paris. He comes of a high-placed Russian family and was hardly more than a lad when he was taken from his native land. Probably his Parisian environment more than his Russian birth enters into his work as composer, though he is reported as having a fondness for archaic Russian melody. The foreign press records one work of large proportion from the pen of Nabokov, written previous to the symphony. It was an "Ode," performed variously in 1928, set for orchestra, chorus, ballet and cinematograph—the latter to provide forms in motion in addition to those of the ballet. "Ode" won favorable comment, though certain immaturities in style were noted.

The new symphony is in E minor and runs through three movements—Allegro, Largo, and final Allegro, which is also scherzo. It is perhaps significant that when Mr. Monteux played the symphony in Paris, Parisian papers referred to it as a "Symphonie Lyrique," though the title-page of the score does not give it any designation beyond the single word "Symphonie." The most hasty glance at the score bears witness to its essentially lyrical character. As in Mr. Roussel's sym-

103
 the chief theme of the first movement a melody of considerable sweep and a reiteration of crisp rhythmic motives suitable for rhythmic definition. The second theme is marked "Andante" and is played by singing. A closing theme alone shows peculiarly rhythmic characteristics. In a slow and long-drawn-out duet of high and low strings furnishes the principal theme and sets the character of the movement. Lyricism redoubled. An independent scherzo is all break this spell; for Nabokov experiment of combining in a movement scherzo and finale. The rhythm beats now and again, but is often to sterner and also to useful stuff. To conclude, the symphony is an epilogue. "Andante Moderato" which the composer uses a version of the third theme of movement.

Moral

is emphasis upon lyric, that is upon melodious, quality, is cause of the symphony's success. Nabokov's symphony is lyrical even he did not call it so. The symphony was laden with though underlying them were rhythms. The morning of the which this article was written. The conductor, rehearsing the symphony, said repeatedly, "It must be a new music of only two years old." "every note" singing then? The question is to answer it. In the past every new thing was with rhythm. We had "scherzos," and a variety of forms. Can it be that the rhythmic lived its short-lived course, a new dispensation is upon us? A. H. M.

pianist, will join the orchestra in Beethoven's "Emperor" Concerto. "Bole" too, will be played once more.

There is one defender of Mr. Respighi's "Metamorphoseon"—the librarian of the orchestra, who spent hours in correction of the manuscript parts. He cannot say too much for the musician's scholarship, the command of orchestral resource and instrumental invention such scrutiny disclosed. He admits he is a solitary champion. And what of these paper-virtues failed to sound of public performance? First of all it is written to be heard.

Two Russians Come Fresh to Symphony Hall

Tempting Guess-Work Aroun
An Unsigned Overture for
The Jubilee Year

At Symphony Hall on Friday-Saturday half the program is to novel music. First then the overture of the composer who wishes to remain unnamed, but is evidently a well-wisher of the London Symphony Orchestra. It is one of the series of works for the Golden Anniversary. Next there is the new symphony by the new composer, Nabokov, produced by Pierre Monteux last Friday at the concerts of the Paris Symphony Orchestra; as yet unheard or side of the Atlantic.

No doubt many frequenters of Symphony Concerts are indulging in guessing-game as to the identity of the unnamed composer. At present there is no authorized solution of the puzzle. The analyst can only submit certain motives and evidence from which all who choose to draw conclusions. First, Dr. Koence of a chosen assembly of courtiers said in so many words a few weeks ago that the composer is a Russian. Next, the instrumentation of the overture may be significant. For exactly the instrumentation of the London Symphony Orchestra as it was constituted last season—down to the horns and five trombones. It is hardly a far-fetched deduction that this Russian composer, setting to his work at the months ago, had an exact and farber of trumpets and drums that Nicholas knew of the orchestral resources at his disposal. There, for the while, this excess of sonority, was quite carried away, and in a moment of enthusiasm awarded the palm to Lvov. . . .

"Glinka's hymn did not please the Emperor, above all other hymns, for the Slavophiles and the malcontents generally to attach the highest importance to it; which, however, they were justified in doing on Slavic and national grounds. Glinka's 'Hymn of Triumph,' with its thoroughly popular character, came in any case to be looked upon as the national anthem of Russia in opposition to the State Anthem." It is hardly to be wondered at that this piece of music, esteemed as it is by Russians, used by them for joyous and festive occasions, should be taken as a theme for a work celebrating an equally festive occasion in the life of the orchestra to whom the composer dedicated it.

Back to Glinka

The overture, which is not lengthy, proceeds through three main divisions: an introductory Adagio, a main portion, "Molto Allegro Energico," and a concluding Maestoso. All three are based upon a single theme, frankly borrowed by the composer—from the Russian "Slavysya" or "Hymn of Triumph," composed as such by Glinka and used by him in the epilogue to his opera "A Life for the Tsar." Concerning the origin and use of this theme an unidentified clipping pasted in front of one of the scores of Glinka's opera at the Public Library, gives significant information. The occasion of the article is the coronation of Tsar Alexander III (1882). Certain festivities took place in the Red Square before the Kremlin and included a performance of the operatic epilogue. The article says that the epilogue "represents the triumphal entry into Moscow of the Tsar Michael Fedorovitch, first of the Romanovs, after the defeat of the Poles, who having occupied the Russian capital, were driven from it by a general rising of the inhabitants." The article suggests that the use of this scene for the coronation festivities will be only a re-enactment of the events which the opera celebrates. Discussing the music, it continues:

"In notes to the program to a concert of Russian music, the late Prince George Galitzin, a good authority on the subject, some twenty years ago [i. e. twenty years before the crowning of Alexander III] had this to say about the origin of the hymn. According to Prince Galitzin, the Emperor Nicholas determined one day that Russia must no longer employ on State occasions the 'God Save the Queen' of the English which is also the 'Heil dir im Siegerkrantz' of the Prussians [yes, and the 'America' of the United States], but that she must have a National Anthem of her own.

He called upon Russian composers to furnish specimens of national and patriotic music; and from the various hymns, marches and anthems sent in, selected two compositions, one by Glinka, the other by Lvov, for performance in presence of a chosen assembly of courtiers and dilettanti.

"Glinka's hymn and march produced a good effect, though the fact of its being characteristically Russian was not calculated to help it in those days, when the Russian was with most persons, and especially those of the court, equivalent to being vulgar. But Lvov, in the orchestral accompaniment to his (God Save the Emperor), introduced such a number of trumpets and drums that Nicholas, touched in his military instincts by his disposal, this excess of sonority, was quite carried away, and in a moment of enthusiasm awarded the palm to Lvov. . . .

"Glinka's hymn did not please the Emperor, above all other hymns, for the Slavophiles and the malcontents generally to attach the highest importance to it; which, however, they were justified in doing on Slavic and national grounds. Glinka's 'Hymn of Triumph,' with its thoroughly popular character, came in any case to be looked upon as the national anthem of Russia in opposition to the State Anthem." It is hardly to be wondered at that this piece of music, esteemed as it is by Russians, used by them for joyous and festive occasions, should be taken as a theme for a work celebrating an equally festive occasion in the life of the orchestra to whom the composer dedicated it.

In the Adagio of the new overture the organ alone, in notes of even rhythm and neutral color, with utmost simplicity, gives out this theme. Other instruments take it up. The introduction completes the ascent which is preparation for the overture proper, and the theme is launched in full martial energy by the whole orchestra. A single contrast (conventional "second theme") ensues, taken by strings lyrically. There is much development of the principal theme, with episodes "fugato." It returns in even greater force, but the second theme does not recur; instead there is further development, leading up to the climactic Maestoso, which gives final utterance to the theme at broadest and most sonorous—an apotheosis.

A Singing Symphony

With attention divided between two scores, and the time limited in which those scores could be seen, it was impossible to give more than a hasty glance at Nabokov's symphony. Nicolas Nabokov is one of the expatriate Russians residing in Paris. He comes of a high-placed Russian family and was hardly more than a lad when he was taken from his native land. Probably his Parisian environment more than his Russian birth enters into his work as composer, though he is reported as having a fondness for archaic Russian melody. The foreign press records one work of large proportion from the pen of Nabokov, written previous to the symphony. It was an "Ode," performed variously in 1928, set for orchestra, chorus, ballet and cinematograph—the latter to provide forms in motion in addition to those of the ballet. "Ode" won favorable comment, though certain immaturities in style were noted.

The new symphony is in E minor and runs through three movements—Allegro, Largo, and final Allegro, which is also scherzo. It is perhaps significant that when Mr. Monteux played the symphony in Paris, Parisian papers referred to it as a "Symphonie Lyrique," though the title-page of the score does not give it any designation beyond the single word "Symphonie." The most hasty glance at the score bears witness to its essentially lyrical character. As in Mr. Roussel's sym-

the chief theme of the first movement is a melody of considerable sweep and a reiteration of crisp rhythmic motives suitable for rhythmic development. The second theme is marked "Andante" and is played by singing voices. A closing theme alone shows precisely rhythmic characteristics. In the third movement, a slow and long-drawn-out duet of high and low strings furnishes the principal theme and sets the character of the movement. Lyricism redoubled. An independent scherzo is also included. To conclude, the symphony is an epilogue, "Andante Moderato," in which the composer uses a version of the third theme of the first movement.

Moral

The emphasis upon lyric, that is upon melodious, quality, is cause for surprise. Nabokov's symphony is 'lyrique' even he did not call it so. The symphony was laden with rhythms. The morning of the day on which this article was written, the conductor, rehearsing the symphony, said repeatedly, "It must be a new music of only two years old. Every note must sing." The question is to answer it. In the past every new thing was done with rhythm. We had "scherzos" and a variety of forms. Can it be that the rhythmic life of music has lived its short-lived course, and a new dispensation is upon us?

A. H. M.

planist, will join the orchestra in Beethoven's "Emperor" Concerto. "Bole too, will be played once more.

There is one defender of Mr. Respighi's "Metamorphoseon"—the librettist of the orchestra, who spent hours in correction of the manuscript parts. cannot say too much for the musical scholarship, the command of orchestral resource and instrumental invention such scrutiny disclosed. He admits he is a solitary champion. And what of these paper-virtues failed to sound of public performance? First of all it is written to be heard.

Two Russians Come Fresh to Symphony Hall

Tempting Guess-Work Around
An Unsigned Overture for
The Jubilee Year

AT Symphony Hall on Friday Saturday half the program is to novel music. First then the overture of the composer who wishes to remain unnamed, but is evidently a well-wisher of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. It is one of the series of works for the Golden Anniversary. Next there is the new symphony by the new composer, Nabokov, produced by Pierre Monteux last Friday at the concerts of the Paris Symphony Orchestra; as yet unheard on this side of the Atlantic.

No doubt many frequenters of Symphony Concerts are indulging in guessing-game as to the identity of the unnamed composer. At present the no authorized solution of the puzzle. The analyst can only submit certain meager evidence from which all who choose to draw conclusions. First, Dr. Koenig, who said in so many words a few weeks ago that the composer is a Russian. Next, the instrumentation of the overture may be significant. For exactly the instrumentation of the late Boston Symphony Orchestra as it was constituted last season—down to the horns and five trombones. It is hardly a far-fetched deduction that this Russian composer, setting to his work at the months ago, had an exact and farber of trumpets and drums that Nicholas knowledge of the orchestral resources, touched in his military instincts by his disposal. There, for the while, this excess of sonority, was quite carried to the point of a secret of Ptarmigan, and in a moment of enthusiasm awarded the palm to Lvov. . . . "Glinka's hymn did not please the Em-

Back to Glinka

The overture, which is not lengthy, proceeds through three main divisions: an introductory Adagio, a main portion, "Molto Allegro Energico," and a concluding Maestoso. All three are based upon a single theme, frankly borrowed by the composer—from the Russian "Slavysya" or "Hymn of Triumph," composed as such by Glinka and used by him in the epilogue to his opera "A Life for the Tsar." Concerning the origin and use of this theme an unidentified clipping pasted in front of one of the scores of Glinka's opera at the Public Library, gives significant information. The occasion of the article is the coronation of Tsar Alexander III (1882). Certain festivities took place in the Red Square before the Kremlin and included a performance of the operatic epilogue. The article says that the epilogue "represents the triumphal entry into Moscow of the Tsar Michael Fedorovitch, first of the Romanovs, after the defeat of the Poles, who having occupied the Russian capital, were driven from it by a general rising of the inhabitants." The article suggests that the use of this scene for the coronation festivities will be only a re-enactment of the events which the opera celebrates. Discussing the music, it continues:

"In notes to the program to a concert of Russian music, the late Prince George Galitzin, a good authority on the subject, some twenty years ago [i. e. twenty years before the crowning of Alexander III] had this to say about the origin of the hymn. According to Prince Galitzin, the Emperor Nicholas determined one day that Russia must no longer employ on State occasions the 'God Save the Queen' of the English which is also the 'Heil dir im Siegerkranz' of the Prussians [yes, and the 'America' of the United States], but that she must have a National Anthem of her own. . . . He called upon Russian composers to furnish specimens of national and patriotic music; and from the various hymns, marches and anthems sent in, selected two compositions, one by Glinka, the other by Lvov, for performance in presence of a chosen assembly of courtiers and dilettanti.

"Glinka's hymn and march produced a good effect, though the fact of its being characteristically Russian was not calculated to help it in those days, when to be Russian was with most persons, and especially those of the court, equivalent to being vulgar. But Lvov, in the orchestral accompaniment to his (God Save the Emperor), introduced such a number of trumpets and drums that Nicholas, touched in his military instincts by this excess of sonority, was quite carried away, and in a moment of enthusiasm awarded the palm to Lvov. . . . "Glinka's hymn did not please the Emperor, above a Slavophiles and ally to attach it; which, however, in doing on Slav Glinka's 'Hymn' thoroughly popular any case to be national anthem of the State Anthem wondered at the esteemed as it is them for joyous should be taken a celebrating an epoch the life of the composer dedicate

In the Adagio the organ even rhythm and utmost simplicity. Other instruments introduction complete preparation for the theme is launched by the whole contrast (conventional ensues, taken by string is much development theme, with episodic turns in even grand and theme does not is further development climactic Maestoso, v tolerance to the then most sonorous—an a

A Singing Symphony

With attention directed to scores, and the time limit scores could be seen, I give more than a has Kov's symphony. Nice of the expatriate Russian. He comes of a Russian family and was his land when he was taken. Probably his Paris more than his Russian his work as composer reported as having a for Russian melody. The words one work of large the pen of Nabokov, the symphony. It formed variously in 192 chorus, ballet and c latter to provide formation to those of the favorable comment, the turities in style were

The new symphony runs through three in Largo, and final Allegro scherzo. It is perhaps when Mr. Monteux plays Paris, Parisian papers "Symphonie Lyrique," page of the score do designation beyond the phonic." The most h score bears witness to and character. As in General—w dress at the Temple ton by the Rep Governor publican of Senate, Lie Youngman will speak 8 to 11 P. Jr., presid A program mental, w tween add American cert, and sing.

For his onel Done Medal of tion give ernment services. men wh the Com Service tions hav soldier, w ditionar York Na graduate Universi law in l twenty

New Ch

Eugen has been Board o cago to will reti

ES B SC HOI RESSE N BOST

:: :: :: ::

phony, the chief theme of the first movement is a melody of considerable sweep rather than a reiteration of crisp rhythmic motives suitable for rhythmic development. The second theme is marked "cantando," and is played by singing strings. A closing theme alone shows predominantly rhythmic characteristics. In the Largo a slow and long-drawn-out duet between high and low strings furnishes the principal theme and sets the character of the movement. Lyricism redoubled. Not even an independent scherzo is allowed to break this spell; for Nabokov tries the experiment of combining in a single movement scherzo and finale. The scherzo-rhythm beats now and again, but gives way, often to sterner and also to more songful stuff. To conclude, the symphony has an epilogue, "Andante Moderato," in which the composer uses a broadened version of the third theme of the first movement.

With a Moral

All this emphasis upon lyric, that is to say upon melodious, quality, is cause for thought. Nabokov's symphony is dubbed "lyrique" even he did not call it so. Roussel's symphony was laden with melodies, though underlying them were buoyant rhythms. The morning of the day on which this article was written, the conductor, rehearsing the anonymous overture, said repeatedly, "It must sing; every note in every part must sing." Recall the new music of only two years ago. Was "every note" singing then? To ask the question is to answer it. In that recent past every new thing was peppered with rhythm. We had "scherzos mécaniques," and a variety of forms that glorified the god of vigorous accentuation. Can it be that the rhythmic period has lived its short-lived course, and that a new dispensation is upon us?

A. H. M.

Serge Prokofiev—From The Drawing by Stravinsky's Son
The Composer's New Symphony, Written for the Jubilee of the Boston Orchestra, Will Be Played at the Symphony Concerts Tomorrow and Saturday

FIFTIETH SEASON, NINETEEN HUNDRED THIRTY AND THIRTY-ONE

Seventh Programme

FRIDAY AFTERNOON, NOVEMBER 28, at 2.30 o'clock

SATURDAY EVENING, NOVEMBER 29, at 8.15 o'clock

Wagner Overture to "Der Fliegende Holländer"

Hanson Symphony No. 2, "Romantic"

(First performance: Composed for the fiftieth anniversary of the Boston Symphony Orchestra)

- I. Adagio; Allegro moderato.
- II. Andante con tenerezza.
- III. Allegro con brio.

Beethoven Concerto for Pianoforte No. 5 in E-flat major, Op. 73

- I. Allegro.
- II. Adagio un poco mosso.
- III. Rondo: Allegro ma non tanto.

Ravel "Bolero"

SOLOIST
WALTER GIESEKING

BALDWIN PIANO USED

There will be an intermission after Hanson's Symphony

The works to be played at these concerts may be seen in the Allen A. Brown Music Collection of the Boston Public Library one week before the concert

Serge Prokofiev—From The Drawing by Stravinsky's Son
The Composer's New Symphony, Written for the Jubilee of the Boston Orchestra, Will Be Played at the Symphony Concerts Tomorrow and Saturday

Seventh Programme

FRIDAY AFTERNOON, NOVEMBER 28, at 2.30 o'clock

SATURDAY EVENING, NOVEMBER 29, at 8.15 o'clock

Wagner Overture to "Der Fliegende Holländer"

Hanson Symphony No. 2, "Romantic"

(First performance: Composed for the fiftieth anniversary of the Boston Symphony Orchestra)

- I. Adagio; Allegro moderato.
- II. Andante con tenerezza.
- III. Allegro con brio.

Beethoven Concerto for Pianoforte No. 5 in E-flat major, Op. 73

- I. Allegro.
- II. Adagio un poco mosso.
- III. Rondo: Allegro ma non tanto.

Ravel "Bolero"

SOLOIST
WALTER GIESEKING

BALDWIN PIANO USED

There will be an intermission after Hanson's Symphony

The works to be played at these concerts may be seen in the Allen A. Brown Music Collection of the Boston Public Library one week before the concert

WALTER GIESEKING

SYMPHONY CONCERT

Herald By PHILIP HALE Nov. 24/30

The Boston Symphony orchestra, Dr. Koussevitzky, conductor, gave its seventh concert of the season yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. Wagner, overture to "The Flying Dutchman," Hanson, Symphony No. 2 Romantic (first performance, composed for the 60th anniversary of the Boston Symphony orchestra), Beethoven, Concerto for piano, No. 5 (Walter Giesecking, pianist), Ravel, Bolero.

As the overture Leonore No. 3 is to "Fidelio," so is the overture to "The Flying Dutchman" to the opera. The two overtures give the condensed and essential drama. Beethoven spares us the tiresome secondary love affair and the quartet in which four persons, each with an individual emotion, express them by singing the same tune. In Wagner we are relieved of the avaricious father and is delighted at the thought of handing over his daughter to the mysterious stranger; nor does one have to hear the bleatings of the saphead lover. No wonder Senta preferred the Dutchman.

Wagner's overture is a stormy seascape. The Dutchman knew no calm seas. The music that typifies him is one of Wagner's happiest inventions. Poor Vanderdecken sings nothing so compelling, not even in his monologue. One hears enough of Senta's ballad in the overture. One is not tempted to laugh at the operatic spinning wheels that stick when they should revolve; one does not find Wagner trying to write with Italian melodiousness. The performance yesterday deserved heartier applause than that awarded it.

Dr. Hanson, director of the Eastman school of Music at Rochester, New York, is not so burdened by official duties, that he cannot indulge in the luxury of composing. His Nordic symphony was performed here in April last year, and we believe that chamber music by him has been heard here. As director of the school, he has aided young composers by bringing out their works in concerts, so that they can hear them and revise them if necessary. His Romantic Symphony has interesting pages, especially those that are purely lyrical. It is a pity that he is so enamored of one or two figures, not important in themselves, that he cannot bear to leave them. The abrupt contrasts between measures that border on the sentimental and those that are chiefly noticeable for their terrific outbursts do not gain dramatically what they lose in logical continuity. It is when Dr. Hanson is gently romantic that he is effective. The "storm and drang" measures seldom impress nor in them is his instrumental-

tion so rich a garment for the ideas. He has ideas of value, which is more than can be said of Respighi's Theme and Variations also composed for the orchestra's jubilee. Dr. Koussevitzky and the players did everything in their power to put the symphony in a favorable light.

Mr. Giesecking and the orchestra gave a memorable performance of the concerto. That the pianist's technical proficiency was fully displayed goes without saying; yet one cannot help alluding to his treatment of octave passages in the first movement, the crescendo and diminuendo here as in many runs; the quiet, unostentatious brilliance of it all; the delicate dynamic gradations. More than all this was the grasp of the aesthetic, emotional contents. If the concerto was grandly planned by the composer, it was grandly understood by the pianist, by his adjustment of the piano to the part given to the orchestra, by the prevailing spirit of the interpretation. At no time did the piano assert itself impudently; it did not refuse to furnish a beautiful accompaniment; when it was called on to have its own say, what Beethoven gave it was said eloquently. Seldom does one hear so perfect and engrossing ensembles, for Mr. Giesecking does not play, whoever the composer may be, for self glorification. No merchant traffics in his soul.

With the concerto and the impression of pure music the concert might well have ended. As it was, it was too long. Ravel's clever and amusing trick does not excite surprise and wonder by repetition, no matter how deftly the trick is performed. The judge which feared not God neither regarded man finally allowed a widow seeking vengeance to see him, saying within himself, "Lest by her continual coming she weary me." The judicial audience—we speak out of courtesy—is apparently not wearied by the continual coming of Ravel's theme which is said to be of Arabian origin, chiefly because those who hear it for the first time are agog to know what is coming next.

The concert will be repeated tonight. The orchestra will be in Washington, D. C., from Tuesday evening to Saturday afternoon, inclusive. The program of the concerts Dec. 12, 13 will be as follows: Mozart, Symphony in G minor, Stravinsky, Symphony of Psalms for orchestra with chorus (the Cecilia)—verses from Psalm 38 (in the Vulgate) not 28 as Stravinsky has it on his title page—verses from Psalm 39—and the whole of Psalm 150. This symphony was composed for the jubilee; Stravinsky's Capriccio for orchestra with piano solo (Mr. Sanroma), and a repetition of Stravinsky's symphony.

WALTER GIESEKING

SYMPHONY CONCERT

Herald By PHILIP HALE Nov. 24/30

The Boston Symphony orchestra, Dr. Koussevitzky's conductor, gave its seventh concert of the season yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. Wagner, overture to "The Flying Dutchman," Hanson, Symphony No. 2, Romantic, first performance composed for the 50th anniversary of the Boston Symphony orchestra, Beethoven, Concerto for piano No. 5 (Walter Giesecking, pianist), Haydn, Rondo.

As the overture features No. 5 is so familiar, so is the overture to "The Flying Dutchman" to the opera. The two overtures give the condensed and condensed drama. Beethoven spares us the vicarious sympathy, love affair and the part of which four persons each with an individual emotion express them in during the same time. In Wagner, we are relieved of the atrocious nature, but a delighted at the thought of landing over his daughter in the air, "vicious stranger" and does one have to fear the thought of the captured over, as wonder some perfected the Dutchman.

Wagner's "Dutchman" is a stormy sea. The Dutchman knew his calm sea. The music that typifies him is one of Wagner's happiest intentions. From Vandyck's eyes nothing so convincing as even in his monologue. One hears a whisper of Mendelssohn's ballad in the overture, but he is tempted to laugh at the overture, plucking wheels that stick when they bump together. One does not find Wagner trying to write with Italian ostentatiousness. His performance yesterday showed neither splendour than that of the Dutchman.

The Hanson, director of the Eastman School of Music at Rochester, New York, and an enthusiast by official duties that he since holds in the history of composing. His "Dutchman" symphony was performed here in April last year, and he before that, number music by him and recorded here. As director of the school he has aided young composers by bringing out their works in concerts, so that they can hear them and revise them if necessary. The Romantic Symphony has interesting pages especially those that are purely lyrical. It is a pity that it is so cluttered of one or two moments not important in themselves, but he cannot bear to leave them. The abrupt contrasts between measures that differ on the sentimental and those that are chiefly noticeable for their technical contrasts do not pain drama, and they are in logical contrast. It is when Dr. Hanson's gently reminds that he is effective. The "storm and drang" measures seldom impress him in them is his instrumentation so rich a garment for the ideas. He has ideas of value, which is more than can be said of Respighi's Theme and Variations also composed for the orchestra's jubilee. Dr. Koussevitzky and the players did everything in their power to put the symphony in a favorable light.

Mr. Giesecking and the orchestra gave a memorable performance of the concerto. That the pianist's technical proficiency was fully displayed goes without saying, yet one cannot help alluding to his treatment of octave passages in the first movement, the crescendo and diminuendo here as in many parts, the quiet, unobtrusive brilliance of it all, the delicate dynamic gradations. More than all this was the grasp of the aesthetic emotional content. If the concerto was grandly planned by the composer, it was grandly understood by the pianist, by his adjustment of the piano to the part given to the orchestra, by the pleasing spirit of the interpretation. At no time did the piano assert itself impudently. It did not refuse to furnish a beautiful accompaniment when it was called on to have its own say, what Beethoven gave it was said eloquently. Seldom does one hear so perfect and engrossing ensembles for Mr. Giesecking does not play whoever the composer may be for self glorification. No merchant traffics in his soul.

With the concerto and the impression of pure music the concert might well have ended. As it was, it was too long. Travers's clever and amusing trick does not excite surprise and wonder by repetition, no matter how deftly the trick is performed. The judge which feared not from neither regarded man finally allowed a widow seeking vengeance to see him saving skin himself. Best by her continual coming she weary me. The judicial audience, we speak out of courtesy, is apparently not weary by the continual coming of Travers's theme which is said to be of Arabian origin, chiefly because those who hear it for the first time are agog to know what is coming next.

The concert will be repeated tonight. The orchestra will be in Washington, D. C., from Tuesday evening to Saturday afternoon, inclusive. The program of the concert Dec. 12-13 will be as follows: Mozart, Symphony in G minor; Stravinsky, Symphony of Psalms for orchestra with chorus (the Cecilia); verses from Psalm 38 (in the Vulgate), not 28 as Stravinsky has it on his title page; verses from Psalm 39, and the whole of Psalm 150. This symphony was composed for the jubilee, Stravinsky's Capriccio for orchestra with piano solo (Mr. Sanroma), and a repetition of Stravinsky's symphony.

GIESEKING PLAYS WITH SYMPHONY

Pianist Does Wonders With Beethoven's Concerto

Post Nov. 29, 1930
BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

With an overture of Wagner, that to "The Flying Dutchman," a new "Romantic" Symphony from the facile and agreeable pen of Dr. Howard Hanson, a piano soloist, Walter Gieseeking, doing wonders with Beethoven's "Emperor" Concerto, and finally Ravel's "Bolero," the most popular piece of last season's pop concerts, all on one programme, the subscriber to the Symphony concerts of this week have a cup that is running over.

GIESEKING'S ARTISTRY

There are those, to be sure, who regard "Bolero," with its studied monotony of rhythm, its ingenious long crescendo, its surprise modulation at the close, as a piece to be heard once and once only; but the concert-going public

as a whole has by no means had its fill of it. Some among yesterday's audience may have felt that Dr. Koussevitzky's dramatic reading of the "Dutchman" overture was marred by the exuberant vigor of trumpets and trombones, now and then blown not wisely but too well. And those who are inconsiderate enough to scrutinize too closely a gift symphony may complain that Dr. Hanson's orotund and tuneful composition, written for the 50th anniversary of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, is undistinguished, unduly reminiscent, and lacking in that indefinable yet precious and essential quality known as style.

But if any there were yesterday who found fault with Mr. Gieseeking's and Dr. Koussevitzky's Beethoven, they were hard to suit indeed. Granted that there have been performances which lent this music greater breadth, a more heroic, more imperial quality, to make reference to the title which someone has foisted on this Concerto No. 5, in E-flat major. Yet finely chiseled, subtly proportioned as was Mr. Gieseeking's version of this music, it was never anaemic, never lacking in vitality. And what a wealth of beauty was yesterday revealed in a work played within the last two decades at no less than nine pairs at Symphony concerts.

By common consent Beethoven nodded when he wrote the finale of the "Emperor." This movement has not the greatness, the lofty utterance, of the other two. But yesterday, thanks to the art of Mr. Gieseeking and no less to that of Dr. Koussevitzky, this discrepancy was for once not marked. A rhythm firm yet flexible, a marvelous command of nuance, a rare delicacy, fineness and precision; these things yesterday made this finale engrossing. Mr. Gieseeking has always seemed an admirable pianist. Yesterday he had gained a new stature. From him had come, and again conductor and orchestra must be given their share of the credit, a performance to be treasured in the recollection, one to serve as a standard by which future performances may be gauged.

Needless to say, the audience of yesterday rewarded Mr. Gieseeking with warm and long-continued applause, as it had already bestowed its favor upon Dr. Hanson, called to the stage by Dr. Koussevitzky when the performance of his Symphony had come to an end.

New York Tribute to Boston Jubilee

The Herald Tribune Salutes The Fiftieth Year of the Symphony Orchestra

10 ans. Nov. 24, 1930

THESE are festival days (wrote Mr. Lawrence Gilman on Friday last) for the Boston Symphony, which came to town Thursday evening for its first New York concert of the season. As all the world of music knows, the orchestra which has helped to make the East Wind and the Watch and Ward Society bearable is celebrating its fiftieth season of significantly fruitful life. For half a century the name of the Boston Symphony Orchestra has stood for those aesthetic virtues which contribute to the glory of musical art. Other orchestras have sometimes lowered their standards, compromised with expediency; merchants have occasionally trafficked in their souls. We recall no instances of such lapses or perversions in the history of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

With a singularly constant ideal of rectitude and dignity this great organization combines a liberality of attitude toward the unorthodox and the experimental which has immensely enriched our musical life and stimulated our receptiveness. Great is the orchestra's reward. It is recognized today as a tongue of music unsurpassed for eloquence. It is honored as an institution which justifies the civilization that nurtured and perpetuated it. We drink a somewhat inky toast to the Boston Symphony Orchestra. May it live forever to make glad the hearts of those for whom such triumphs of the spirit outlast the drums and trampings of a half-century of material conquests.

Naturally, the B. S. O. has been celebrated, and in a characteristic way. In olden times composers were commissioned by Princes to supply for this or that occasion such works as inspiration or industry could produce. Today great orchestras have taken over that amiable and often rewarding function, leaving the imperial Mrs. P. S. Coolidge almost alone among those sovereigns of a democratic time who still seek to poke the fires of genius wherever they may be suspected of existence.

The B. S. O.'s addresses to music makers here and abroad have been of the lordliest kind. The most distinguished contemporary masters have been commissioned or encouraged to write works for its jubilee. Prokofiev's symphony; Respighi proffered a and Variations; the Parisian composer Albert Roussel, dispatched a symphony; an anonymous writer, widely suspected of being no less a personage than the present conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra—who can play all fiddle and compose music as he leads—contributed, with promises, a "Festival Overture." Pro Edward Burlingame Hill, of Harvard, speaking up for Massachusetts, a music for an Ode by Robert Hillyer (also of Harvard). As the orchestra's favorite child, the illustrious Igor Stravinsky, it is an honor that the composer of "Le Sacre du printemps" has completed for performance in Boston on December 19 and 20 a "Symphony of Psalms," which Stravinsky has dedicated "to the God and to the Boston Symphony Orchestra." Let us hope that both be worthy of the honor.

First of these musical tributes to the orchestra in New York was set before us last evening by Mr. Koussevitzky. The new symphony by the Parisian Albert Roussel, which had its première in Boston on Oct. 24, Roussel, a mellow juvenile of sixty-one, child of his time. He can still be, he chooses, acerb and delicately. But he drinks out of his own mental which has immensely enriched our musical life and stimulated our receptiveness. Great is the orchestra's reward. It is recognized today as a tongue of music unsurpassed for eloquence. It is honored as an institution which justifies the civilization that nurtured and perpetuated it. We drink a somewhat inky toast to the Boston Symphony Orchestra. May it live forever to make glad the hearts of those for whom such triumphs of the spirit outlast the drums and trampings of a half-century of material conquests.

One is aware of a clear and distinguished mind at work in the tones—a mind urbane, critical, tinged with a French mind, lucid and one that rewards acquaintance. Koussevitzky played the new work with superlative finesse and the most comprehensive comprehension. The performance will remain among the outstanding demonstrations of his visits to New York as a dig of sympathetic identification and objective skill. For the rest of his program the conductor bore us thrice-familiar matter—the the vacuous "Roman Carnival" and the unparagoned Johannes second best—but still Johannes.

GIESEKING PLAYS WITH SYMPHONY

Pianist Does Wonders With Beethoven's Concerto

Post Nov. 29, 1930
BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

With an overture of Wagner, that to "The Flying Dutchman," a new "Romantic" Symphony from the facile and agreeable pen of Dr. Howard Hanson, a piano soloist, Walter Gieseeking, doing wonders with Beethoven's "Emperor" Concerto, and finally Ravel's "Bolero," the most popular piece of last season's pop concerts, all on one programme, the subscribers to the Symphony concerts of this week have a cup that is running over.

GIESEKING'S ARTISTRY

There are those, to be sure, who regard "Bolero," with its studied monotony of rhythm, its ingenious long crescendo, its surprise modulation at the close, as a piece to be heard once and once only; but the concert-going public

as a whole has by no means had its fill of it. Some among yesterday's audience may have felt that Dr. Koussevitzky's dramatic reading of the "Dutchman" overture was marred by the exuberant vigor of trumpets and trombones, now and then blown not wisely but too well. And those who are inconsiderate enough to scrutinize too closely a gift symphony may complain that Dr. Hanson's orotund and tuneful composition, written for the 50th anniversary of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, is undistinguished, unduly reminiscent, and lacking in that indefinable yet precious and essential quality known as style.

But if any there were yesterday who found fault with Mr. Gieseeking's and Dr. Koussevitzky's Beethoven, they were hard to suit indeed. Granted that there have been performances which lent this music greater breadth, a more heroic, more imperial quality, to make reference to the title which someone has foisted on this Concerto No. 5, in E-flat major. Yet finely chiseled, subtly proportioned as was Mr. Gieseeking's version of this music, it was never anaemic, never lacking in vitality. And what a wealth of beauty was yesterday revealed in a work played within the last two decades at no less than nine pairs at Symphony concerts.

By common consent Beethoven nodded when he wrote the finale of the "Emperor." This movement has not the greatness, the lofty utterance, of the other two. But yesterday, thanks to the art of Mr. Gieseeking and no less to that of Dr. Koussevitzky, this discrepancy was for once not marked. A rhythm firm yet flexible, a marvelous command of nuance, a rare delicacy, fineness and precision; these things yesterday made this finale engrossing. Mr. Gieseeking has always seemed an admirable pianist. Yesterday he had gained a new stature. From him had come, and again conductor and orchestra must be given their share of the credit, a performance to be treasured in the recollection, one to serve as a standard by which future performances may be gauged.

Needless to say, the audience of yesterday rewarded Mr. Gieseeking with warm and long-continued applause, as it had already bestowed its favor upon Dr. Hanson, called to the stage by Dr. Koussevitzky when the performance of his Symphony had come to an end.

New York to Boston

The Herald Tribune The Fiftieth Symphony

THESE are festive Lawrence Gilman, the Boston Symphony town Thursday evening New York concert of the world of music known which has helped to make and the Watch and News is celebrating its fiftieth centennially fruitful life. The name of the Boston Symphony Orchestra has stood for tunes which contribute musical art. Other sometimes lowered the promised with experience have occasionally trafficked. We recall no instance of perversions in the his Symphony Orchestra.

With a singularly rectitude and dignity toward the unorthodox mental which has in our musical life and inceptiveness. Great is ward. It is recognized of music unsurpassed is honored as an institution the civilization that infected it. We drink toast to the Boston Symphony May it live forever hearts of those for whom of the spirit outlast trappings of a half-century conquests.

Naturally, the B. S. Orchestra, and in a charade times composers by Princes to supply occasion such works as dusty could produce.

Orchestras have taken and often rewarding the imperial Mrs. F. alone among those sovereign time who still fires of genius where suspected of existence.

The B. S. O.'s makers here and the lordliest kind. guished contemporary commissioned or ended

ATTRACTIVE ard Sq. and rooms. A rigration.
pacious clo and cafe; al SUITES other suites and Lexington
Apply THO
St. Tel. 3-1

SMW

Ox
C

14 Min
A 2 baths keeping Furnish hotel ser apply at Mass. A

(@)tc

CA Strat

Four room living room room, all 992

(@)tc

Modern Excellent
$55. A Beacon
(@)24

OVER Four ou
Sept. 1
(@)tc

Sunny, equipped parking (@)tc

B
Three room (@)WS

BROO suite; priv plied $10
(@)2t

new works for its jubilee. Prokofiev sent a symphony; Respighi proffered a Theme and Variations; the Parisian composer, Albert Roussel, dispatched a symphony; an anonymous writer, widely suspected of being no less a personage than the eminent present conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra—who can play the bull fiddle and compose music as ably as he leads—contributed, with profuse blushes, a "Festival Overture." Professor Edward Burlingame Hill, of Harvard, speaking up for Massachusetts, supplied music for an Ode by Robert Silliman Hillyer (also of Harvard). As for the orchestra's favorite child, the illustrious Igor Stravinsky, it is announced that the composer of "Le Sacre du Printemps" has completed for performance in Boston on December 19 and 20 a choral "Symphony of Psalms," which Mr. Stravinsky has dedicated "to the glory of God and to the Boston Symphony Orchestra." Let us hope that both will prove worthy of the honor.

The first of these musical tributes to be heard in New York was set before us Thursday evening by Mr. Koussevitzky. It was the new symphony by the Parisian master, Albert Roussel, which had its world premiere in Boston on Oct. 24. Roussel, now a mellow juvenile of sixty-one, is still a child of his time. He can still be, when he chooses, acerb and delicately drastic. But he drinks out of his own glass. Stravinsky may have dropped in an olive or two (in whose glass has he not done so?); there are several maraschino cherries from the Rimskyan jars—even a tiny drop from Brangaene's inescapable philtre; and the whole is (need one say?) discreetly tintured with jazz.

But one takes these things for granted. The point is that Roussel, in this music, adds something to the common store—something definitely individualized, a personal way of fusing and arranging elements, an unmistakable particularity of flavor and of pattern. This score has wit, craft, beauty. One is aware of a civilized and distinguished mind at work behind the tones—a mind urbane, critical, challenging; a French mind, lucid and adult, one that rewards acquaintance.

Dr. Koussevitzky played the new work with superlative finesse and the most intimate comprehension. The performance will remain among the outstanding achievements of his visits to New York—a prodigy of sympathetic identification and projective skill. For the remainder of his program the conductor set before us thrice-familiar matter—the brilliantly vacuous "Roman Carnival" of Berlioz and the unparagoned Johannes at his second best—but still Johannes.

Pendant

With a pseudo-Teutonic facetiousness the Evening Post also undertook to celebrate the occasion, saying: "From that still fabulous city where tis said the Lowells speak only to the Cabots and the Cabots speak only to Serge, the Boston Symphony returned to dilate the fervors of its Manhattan thurifers with the first of its Carnegie Hall series of the new season. The current roster of officers as discoverable in the program-books may be taken to indicate, however, that the ancient witticism must be broadened to include the Warrens, the Lodges, the Danas, the Howes, the Hallowells, the Lymans, the Pickmans, the Sawyers, and perhaps even some others, so persuasively has the ameliorating and leveling art of symphony reconciled even Boston to an international speech.

"Berlioz, with his 'Roman Carnival' Overture; Brahms, with his Second Symphony, and Roussel, with a new work composed especially for the fiftieth anniversary of the Boston orchestra, conspired with Dr Koussevitzky to bring Gotham and Gomorrah within its redemptive pale. For the occasion there was a reassembling of clans antedating the Koussevitzky theocracy, and we were again tempted to conclude that it is the Boston Symphony that is rooted most strongly in the older musical aristocracy here, as at home. This was a forty-fifth beginning in New York, only five fewer than in Boston."

Concert-Chronicle

Masterpiece Mark. See.

HOW much securer in perception and judgment is the audience at the Symphony Concert of Saturday over that of Friday! On both occasions Mr. Gieseeking, Dr. Koussevitzky and the orchestra played Beethoven's piano-concerto in E-flat as it has not been played hereabouts within easy recollection. At the matinée, the house was warily responsive. It suspected that something had happened; yet was not sure enough to let itself go in admiration. "Wait and see what the paper say." (For such innocent faith in reviews is said to survive in this town.) As it was, Mr. Gieseeking was recalled no oftener and no more warmly than any pianist of the first rank might have been.

Cynics may hint that by Saturday evening the word had been passed, as news is said to travel through the jungle. Yet with many a piece this second audience has given proof of a mind of its own, reviewers to the contrary notwithstanding. That mind perceived quickly that a signal performance of the "Em-elop the kind to the echo. ive country." seeking return on of G. Coelmes; but once tor of Phila-Koussevitzky. he was withrable quality the "prefer-s, twenty-eight the port of piece from the join forces likeness of the in in view of nst, a conduc- hestra, are but g the Brook-nd themselves precipitated by be less in hen he under-erable reason-- of the mayor, ece on the fol- ledge of the th natural am- by the rail-rformance, they vor said that over-tension, in nmon knowl. such untoward it was the etition of Beet- r heard the nst, conductor performed in a whit less re- and to the com-know who again to marvel r remarked. ieseking's touch. uestion, the; but equally at knew there chestra and the nt years in ld voice. e lighterage, pianist and con- n, ear to ear.

examination leaved—and there- bur. Boston c grace, marched rrupted his hat note of ecsta- ok the wit- nd, whether pian- ved the melody! and steam- rchestra matched of the port nst, and of zest. maps and time to remember impact, no more y which he vitzky has restored violin, to musical Intersta- citement unknown Mayor Ce ncerts since Dr. nlners. "v arlier in the even- ation as a Symphony came- on wi an thout the presence r 1931 eady en route to othor performance there is more than that it will be long ard at Symphony H. T. P.

"Stabi-gure

At a pair of Symphony Con- certs in December, Dr. Kousse- vitzky, the orchestra and two as- sisting singers will repeat Mah- ler's "Song of the Earth," first heard at Symphony Hall two seasons ago, generally counted the composer's masterpiece.

WALTER GIESEKING, pianist and composer, was born at Lyons, France, on November 5, 1895. His father was a German physician who moved to the French-Italian Riviera, and there the boy grew up. In 1911 he began to study piano-playing seriously, taking lessons of Karl Leimer at the City Conservatory of Music at Hanover, where the parents were then living. He soon became known as a concert pianist distinguished by catholicity of taste in his programs, his interest in the music of the younger composers, and his interpretation of "impressionistic and expressionistic music." Among his compositions are a quintet for piano and wind instruments, piano pieces, and songs.

Mr. Gieseeking's first recital in the United States was at New York on January 10, 1926. On the 17th of that month he played there, with orchestra, Hindemith's concerto. He gave a recital in Boston on February 6, 1926, when his program comprised music by Bach, Scarlatti, Schumann, Busoni, Debussy. On January 14, 1927, he played at a concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, in Boston, Mozart's Concerto, C major (K. 467), and Casella's Partita for piano and orchestra—Mr. Casella, guest conductor.

Since then Mr. Gieseeking has given recitals in Boston and played with orchestra and in recitals throughout the United States and in Europe.

SYMPHONY PROGRAM

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will journey to Washington this week to give a Beethoven festival in the nation's capital. The next regular pair of concerts in Symphony hall will be given on Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, Dec. 12 and 13. The "Symphonie de Psaumes," which Stravinsky has written for the anniversary of the orchestra, will then have its first public performance. This symphony is based on verses from the 28th and 39th Psalms and the entire 150th Psalm. The texts in Latin will be sung by the Cecilia Society chorus. For the clearer comprehension of this work, Dr. Koussevitzky will repeat the symphony in the latter part of this program.

Another new Stravinsky score, Capriccio for Orchestra with piano solo, will have its first American performance. Mr. Sanroma will be the pianist.

The concerts will open with Mozart's Symphony in G minor, and close with Bach's Fugue in E-flat, arranged for orchestra by Schoenberg.

Pendant

With a pseudo-Teutonic face the Evening Post also undecorated the occasion, saying that still fabulous city v said the Lowells speak only to and the Cabots speak only to Boston Symphony returned to the fervors of its Manhattan thur the first of its Carnegie Hall the new season. The current officers as discoverable in the books may be taken to indicate, that the ancient witticism must ened to include the Warrens, th the Danas, the Howes, the E the Lymanas, the Pickmans, the and perhaps even some others suavely has the ameliorating ing art of symphony reconci Boston to an international spe "Berlioz, with his 'Roman Overture; Brahms, with his Sec phony, and Roussel, with a n composed especially for the fifti versary of the Boston orches spired with Dr Koussevitzky Gotham and Gomorrah within demptive pale. For the occasi was a reassembling of clans a the Koussevitzky theocracy, and fore again tempted to conclude that Boston Symphony that is root sey strongly in the older musical arlist here, as at home. This was a f beginning in New York, only fi than in Boston."

Concert-Chroni

Masterpiece Mart. Sec.

HOW much securer in pe and judgment is the aud the Symphony Concert of over that of Friday! On both Mr. Giesecking, Dr. Koussevitzky orchestra played Beethoven's concerto in E-flat as it has r played hereabouts within easy tion. At the matinée, the ho warly responsive. It suspect something had happened; yet was sure enough to let itself go in admira tion. "Wait and see what the paper say." (For such innocent faith in re views is said to survive in thi town.) As it was, Mr. Giesecking was re called no oftener and no more warmly than any pianist of the first rank migh have been.

Cynics may hint that by Saturday eve ning the word had been passed, as news is said to travel through the jungle. Yet with many a piece this second audi ence has given proof of a mind of its own, reviewers to the contrary notwith standing. That mind perceived quickly that a signal performance of the "Emperor Concerto" was in progress; as soon as it was ended applauded to the echo. Not only must Mr. Giesecking return thanks, thrice and four times; but once he must bring with him Dr. Koussevitzky.

Possibly the most remarkable quality in these two performances, twenty-eight hours apart, of the same piece from the same hands, was the exact likeness of the one to the other. A pianist, a conduc tor, the players in an orchestra, are but men. Having distinguished themselves on a Friday, they may be less in the vein—for no discoverable reason—when they repeat the piece on the fol lowing Saturday. Or, with natural am bition to excel the first performance, they actually fall short, from over-tension, in the second. For once, no such untoward chance marred the repetition of Beet hoven's Concerto. Pianist, conductor and orchestra were not a whit less re sponsive to each other, and to the com poser. There was cause again to marvel at the felicities of Mr. Giesecking's touch, at the range of his tone; but equally at the euphonies of the orchestra and the gradations of its manifold voice.

Throughout, moreover, pianist and con ductor heard Beethoven, ear to ear. With what superbity, relieved—and there fore heightened—by lyric grace, marched the first movement! What note of ecsta sy sang out of the second, whether pian or orchestra received the melody! Through the finale the orchestra matched the fingers of the pianist, and of zest, swiftiness and instant impact, no more need be said. It was time to remember again that Dr. Koussevitzky has restored concertos, for piano or violin, to musical worth, interest and excitement unknown to the Symphony Concerts since Dr. Muck's day. . . . Earlier in the even ing Mr. Hanson's new Symphony came—and went, this time without the presence of the composer, already en route to Rome to "sit in" at another performance of his masterworks. There is more than one reason to suspect that it will be long before another is heard at Symphony Hall.

At a pair of Symphony Con certs in December, Dr. Kousse vitzky, the orchestra and two as sisting singers will repeat Mah ler's "Song of the Earth," first heard at Symphony Hall two seasons ago, generally counted the composer's masterpiece.

WALTER GIESECKING, pianist and composer, was born at Lyons, France, on November 5, 1895. His father was a German physician who moved to the French-Italian Riviera, and there the boy grew up. In 1911 he began to study piano-playing seriously, taking lessons of Karl Leimer at the City Conservatory of Music at Hanover, where the parents were then living. He soon became known as a concert pianist distinguished by catholicity of taste in his programs, his interest in the music of the younger composers, and his interpreta tion of "impressionistic and expressionistic music." Among his com positions are a quintet for piano and wind instruments, piano pieces, and songs.

Mr. Giesecking's first recital in the United States was at New York on January 10, 1926. On the 17th of that month he played there, with orchestra, Hindemith's concerto. He gave a recital in Boston on February 6, 1926, when his program comprised music by Bach, Scarlatti, Schumann, Busoni, Debussy. On January 14, 1927, he played at a concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, in Bos ton, Mozart's Concerto, C major (K. 467), and Casella's Partita for piano and orchestra—Mr. Casella, guest conductor.

Since then Mr. Giesecking has given recitals in Boston and played with orchestra and in recitals throughout the United States and in Europe.

SYMPHONY PROGRAM

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will journey to Washington this week to give a Beethoven festival in the nation's capital. The next regular pair of con certs in Symphony hall will be given on Friday afternoon and Saturday eve ning, Dec. 12 and 13. The "Symphonie de Psaumes," which Stravinsky has written for the anniversary of the or chestra, will then have its first public performance. This symphony is based on verses from the 28th and 39th Psalms and the entire 150th Psalm. The texts in Latin will be sung by the Ce cilia Society chorus. For the clearer comprehension of this work, Dr. Kous sevitzky will repeat the symphony in the latter part of this program.

Another new Stravinsky score, Cap riccio for Orchestra with piano solo, will have its first American perform ance. Mr. Sanroma will be the pianist.

The concerts will open with Mozart's Symphony in G minor, and close with Bach's Fugue in E-flat, arranged for orchestra by Schoenberg.

Beethoven

Symphonic Afternoon, Brim-Full

Dr. Hanson's New Symphony, From Wagner to "Bolero," Memorable Concerto

Nov. 19, 1930

THE THIRD of the symphonies with which commissioned composers have responded to the jubilee of the Boston Orchestra was played for the first time, yesterday, at Symphony Hall. It happened to be work of an American composer, Dr. Howard Hanson, director of the Eastman School of Music at Rochester. The circumstance does not signify, since it is the just and catholic policy of Dr. Koussevitzky to make no distinctions of nationality (Americans included), whether he is distributing commissions or choosing a program. Of the symphonies preceding Dr. Hanson's, one was Roussel's; the other Prokofiev's. Both were short; while Dr. Hanson's kept to that same benignant measure. Undoubtedly, symphonic lengths, like those of Bruckner and Mahler—to say nothing of Strauss's later tone-poems—are out of fashion. There are even young image-breakers who prefer the Brahmsian four to the Beethovenian nine, because Johannes is usually more compact than Ludwig.

Thanks to the modernists, brevity is now the symphonic word, as Stravinsky, Honegger and Hill—also of the commissioned—will subsequently testify.

Roussel and Prokofiev followed another happy modernistic fashion. The matter and manner of both their symphonies was relatively light. Now, there is not a reason why a symphony should be necessarily weighty of content and portentous of speech, except that much German example and more German dogma affirm that so must it be. The eighteenth century, to which most musicians are harking back, held to the tolerant view. Let a symphony be what the composer chose for substance and surface, so long as it was musically unified and musically interesting. Roussel, last month, added lightness of design and content to many another merit. With Prokofiev, not long ago, a kindred lightness, soothed irritating repetitions. Lightness, is again the symphonic fashion.

ingly Dr. Hanson would also be movement." In a program-note of his new symphony: "My to create a work young in spirit, in temperament, simple and in expression"—all of which music light in conception and ex- But the hallowed leaven of Teutonic strength, breadth and thickness has worked within him. From it rose the manner of "Pan and the Forest" and the Nordic Symphony, pieces of large dimensions hitherto in Boston. In the Romantic symphony, played on Friday, he has discarded length; but can only by breadth and thickness. tone, of which a modern orchestra is capable, sorely tempts him. To he cannot resist it through some measures in full harmony. and there Dr. Hanson's music in pounds," but it also runs thickly. re pages in this new symphony, the composer is straining toward and depths, that might have been by some German of the second or third rank, soured in the theories and of 1910. Yet the American and, on occasion, utilizes a way—the cleanly cut, sharply edged, "open-work" play of timbres monies that is one of the modernisms to music. By so much there is in the present and promise for the future. It is high time that Dr. Hanson should have pronounced the outmoded symphonic of the Germans; accepted the modernist procedures, toward certain pages of the Romantic Symphony. To some of us his most valuable piece is still the String Quartet, not little of which was frankly wise this new symphony suffers the shortcoming that pursues us equally as composers or exponents of music—the lack of individuality, therefore distinctive, quality. The commissioned symphony of Roussel is master at sixty-three," as Mr. Hanson aptly phrased it—is his and not Prokofiev's Fourth Symphony, it is secondary, not to say Prokofiev, bears many of his earmarks. The lay ear found Respighi's "Fountains of Rome" over-written and but to the professional listener, it is emmed with his characteristics, included. Among us Americans, Roussel, last month, added lightness of design and content to many another merit. With Prokofiev, not long ago, a kindred lightness, soothed irritating repetitions. Lightness, executants, who of us, following

Beethoven

Symphony After

B

Dr. Hanson's New From Wagner Memorable

THE THIRD with which posers have jubilee of the was played for the first at Symphony Hall. work of an American and Hanson, director, School of Music at I cumstance does not the just and catholic sevitzky to make no tionality (Americans he is distributing co ing a program. Of ceding Dr. Hanson's, the other Prokofiev while Dr. Hanson's benignant measure, phonic lengths, like and Mahler—to say later tone-poems — There are even you who prefer the Bra Beethovenian nine, usually more comp Thanks to the mod the symphonic Honegger and Hil sioned—will subseq Roussel and Pro happy modernistic and manner of i was relatively ligl a reason why a necessarily weight tentous of speech, man example and affirm that so mu eenth century, to are harking back view. Let a symp poser chose for : so long as it was musically intere month, added ligh tent to many and koffiev, not long : soothed irritating

one V th season, gone out been ma ruffed gr ridge, ar numbers entertain the poss game big hunters ridge in than the season f The a this year sportsme ing over from the called fo contenti scarcity by those former to a rett bags of means t officials the dw hunters ing the- conscien unable t least on game bi [Manche

HONO

[From

Newto in 1917 t successf machine

- 1 N'n T
- 9 N'n T
- 3 N'w'n
- 115 Ohio
- 23 Ohio
- 10 Ohio
- 10 Okla
- 24 Okla
- 18 Ont P
- 2 Oswee
- 7 Oswes
- 30 Pac
- 27 Pac C
- 25 Pac C
- 5 Pac I
- 90 Pac F
- 15 Pac W
- 40 Pen-O
- 8 Pen-O
- 30 Pen C
- 6 Penn
- 9 Penn
- 5 Peo

breavity, is again the symphonic fash-

Seemingly Dr. Hanson would also be "in the movement." In a program-note he writes of his new symphony: "My aim was to create a work young in spirit, romantic in temperament, simple and direct in expression"—all of which implies a music light in conception and execution. But the hallowed leaven of Teutonic length, breadth and thickness has long worked within him. From it rose the matter and the manner of "Pan and The Priest" and the Nordic Symphony, is two pieces of large dimensions hitherto heard in Boston. In the Romantic Symphony, played on Friday, he has creditably discarded length; but cannot put by breadth and thickness. The big tone, of which a modern orchestra is capable, sorely tempts him. To this day he cannot resist it through sonorous measures in full harmony.

Then and there Dr. Hanson's music indeed "sounds," but it also runs thickly. There are pages in this new symphony, when the composer is straining toward heights and depths, that might have been written by some German of the second or third rank, soused in the theories and practice of 1910. Yet the American knows and, on occasion, utilizes a better way—the cleanly cut, sharply characterized, "open-work" play of timbres and harmonies that is one of the modernist gains to music. By so much there is progress in the present and promise for the future. It is high time that Dr. Hanson renounced the outmoded symphonic tradition of the Germans; accepted frankly the modernist procedures, toward which certain pages of the Romantic Symphony incline. To some of us his most individual piece is still the String Quartet of 1923, not little of which was frankly modernist.

Otherwise this new symphony suffers under the shortcoming that pursues Americans equally as composers or executants of music—the lack of individual, and therefore distinctive, quality. The commissioned symphony of Roussel—"young master at sixty-three," as Mr. Gilman aptly phrased it—is his and no other's. Prokofiev's Fourth Symphony, though it is secondary, not to say minor Prokofiev, bears many of his earmarks. The lay ear found Respighi's commissioned Variations over-written and tedious; but to the professional listener they teemed with his characteristics, faults included. Among us Americans, Mr. Loeffler of the elder generation; Mr. Carpenter and Mr. Hill of the middle; Mr. Copland and Mr. Sessions of the younger, have individualized themselves. Among executants, who of us, following

Mr. Spalding's career, has forgotten how long he worked to achieve an individual style as violinist?

Now, in the light of these examples, recall Dr. Hanson's symphony of yesterday. The basic musical thoughts—that is to say the germinating and principal motif that pervades the whole music, the subordinate motifs outspringing from it or contrasting with it—are clear-spoken and engaging. The composer develops them with skill and a measure of interest to hearers. But do they, or the development, bear any stamp by which ear, mind and imagination recognize the thoughts, processes, moods and emotions of Howard Hanson composing and of no other music-maker? Rather, they are too close to the regular thing in the regular way—not imitative, to be sure, but none the less conventional; out, so to say, of the general—and not the particular—stock of music in our plentiful time.

Note again the implications of the title—a Romantic Symphony. Possibly the essence of romance is personal intensity of vision, imagination, emotion and creation; therewith an impinging strangeness, as of new worlds discovered, upon the intensified hearer. Of such are the impassioned first movements of Beethoven's greater symphonies; the finer or ampler tempered songs of Schubert; or, to descend to lesser men, the symphonies of Berlioz where they are not yet withered, or the tone-poems of Liszt, when something still remains under sound and fury. Does the listener feel this essence suffusing Dr. Hanson's Romantic Symphony, penetrating and illuding? More than half persuaded by the label, he believes he detects it; listens the more intently only to discover that it smacks of formula; that it lacks intensity and individuality. Better he says to himself the discordant whirl of Mr. Copland's forgotten and now discarded piano-concerto than this tame replica of a half-emotional, half-musical convention. All of which is not to discourage Dr. Hanson; but to bid him find himself as an individually imaginative and accomplishing composer. At thirty-four, there is still bonne chance.

Needless to say, Dr. Koussevitzky spared no pains in the performance of Dr. Hanson's symphony; while by this time from sheer instinct the orchestra answers to his will as to no conducting composer. As it seemed, he drew forth all that the music contained; clarified, animated, and would characterize it along the way. Dr. Hanson, indeed, might have repeated Monsieur Roussel's concise word—"parfait"—at the final hearing of his Symphony. . . . The conductor was less fortunate with his version of ship in millions of shares of this country's industries and of stock involved a sale of the Federal Government markets of the past summer halved the government's tax the quarter ended Sept. 30 as the stock sales tax collected balancing the national budget thus be seen that the Federal government would stand to gain from a more confident tone in the market and a consequent wide

pf	38	38	38
OH	3 1/2	3 1/2	3 1/2
& Co	29	28 7/8	29
ot	33 1/2	31 1/2	31 1/2 - 1 1/2
E pf ww	87 1/2	87 1/2	87 1/2 - 2 1/2
Wash Ma.	5 1/2	5 1/2	5 1/2 - 1 1/2
T
Corp	13	11	12 - 2
El	56	55	56 + 1
olor Inc.	12	10 1/2	22 - 1
ushes	5 1/2	5 1/2	5 1/2 - 1 1/2
Pr 1st pf.107	107	107	- 2 1/2
u Pr pf 70	70	70
Oil&Land.	12 1/2	10 1/2	12 1/2 + 2 1/2
r Sec	2 1/2	2 1/2	2 1/2 + 1 1/2
Axle pf.102	102	102	- 1 1/2
illed Stks	21	20	21 + 1
ux Pic S	7	6 1/2	7 - 1/2
A Trans	5 1/2	5 1/2	5 1/2 - 1 1/2
Corp w.	3	2 1/2	2 1/2 - 1 1/2
ties	28 1/2	27	28 1/2 - 1 1/2
that B.	7	4 1/2	7 + 2 1/2
Lamp	7 1/2	7 1/2	7 1/2 + 1 1/2

HEARD AT CONCERT
Nov. 29, 1930
Triumphs in Concerto of Hanson's New Symphony" Given

again proved his of the greatest by a remarkably Beethoven's "Em- Dr Koussevitzsky surpassed them- ber, making the remembered. Too classic given so Symphony," dedi- Symphony Or- d Hanson, direc- School of Music as played for the A program king in imagina- might assume with Wagner's overture and Bolero."

taste as well as a remarkable pianist, gave so compelling an interpretation of the Beethoven concerto that even those to whom this piece has not in the past seemed the masterpiece it actually is, must have been impressed. Dr Koussevitzky and the orchestra provided Gieseking with the best accompaniment they have given any soloist. For a parallel one would have to go back to the memorable day in 1915 when the Boston Symphony under Dr Muck aided Kreisler in a performance of the Beethoven violin concerto that still seems to us who was lucky enough to hear it to have realized an ideal. This performance yesterday was renewed evidence that Dr Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony are not resting their laurels, but attaining greater heights each season. It is to be hoped that they will some day do for the most classics what yesterday did for the "Emperor Concerto."

Romantic Symphony

Dr Hanson, in a program note, explains that his "Romantic Symphony" represents for him "a definite and acknowledged embracing of the romantic phase."

"I recognize, of course," writes the composer, "that romanticism is at present the poor stepchild, without the social standing of her elder sister, neo-classicism. Nevertheless, I embrace her all the more fervently, believing, as I do, that romanticism will find in this country rich soil for a new, young, and vigorous growth."

This is a courageous and honest stand to take. The composer's aim in the symphony heard yesterday was, he further tells us, "to create a work young in spirit, romantic in temperament, and simple and direct in expression."

Although one cannot honestly feel that Dr Hanson succeeded in achieving his aim, one cannot but respect him for attempting, not what current Parisian musical fashion would dictate, but what he himself desired to do.

One thought yesterday, listening to Dr Hanson's symphony, of Dvorak's "New World" symphony, and of Charpentier's opera "Louise." There was no direct imitation or reminiscence of either work, though reminiscences of other familiar music occasionally obtruded themselves on the listening ear. But a Dvorak who had heard Stravinsky's rhythms and the dissonant harmonies now common property might, in his less inspired moments, have written such a work as this Romantic Symphony.

It was probably the cloying sweetness of much of Dr Hanson's dissonance that recalled Charpentier, as well as his manifesting at a rather late date romantic intentions. The audience seemed less pleased with the new work than one would have expected in view of its relatively tuneful and simple character. The composer was present, but did not conduct his work. Dr Koussevitzky's reading of it was notably eloquent and sympathetic.

Eloquent Reading

When Ravel's Bolero was first played here last season the audience made a demonstration hitherto unheard of at these concerts. Yesterday's applause for this tour de force, now grown stale through familiarity, was mildly cordial. More interesting was the fact that a number of persons were impelled to leave the hall during the music, driven no doubt by its monotony, which to some listeners

Mr. Spalding's career long he worked style as violinist. Now, in the recall Dr. Hanson terday. The be that is to say th cipal motiv tha music, the subor ing from it or clear-spoken an poser develops a measure of ir do they, or the stamp by which tion recognize t moods and emot composing and o Rather, they are thing in the reg tive, to be sure, ventional; out, so and not the par in our plenteous Note again th title—a Romant the essence of tensity of vision and creation; t strangeness, as ered, upon the such are the in ments of Beeth nies; the finer of of Schubert; or, the symphonies o not yet withered Liszt, when sol under sound and feel this essence Romantic Symph luding? More the label, he listens the mor cover that it sm lacks intensity a he says to him of Mr. Copland's carded piano-cor plica of a half convention. All courage Dr. Han himself as an and accomplish four, there is st

Needless to spared no pains Hanson's symph from sheer inst swers to his will poser. As it se that the music mated, and wou way. Dr. Hanso peated Monsieur —"parfait"—at Symphony. less fortunate

Wagner's overture to "The Flying Dutchman" with which the concert began. He overdid it, almost exactly as he overdid Beethoven's third "Leonora" overture, when he first laid it before Bostonian ears. Then, Dr. Koussevitzky would dramatize every curve, every contrast, every transition, almost each phrase and every modulation. Inevitably the listener heard the overture as so many intensified "bits" laid side by side, not in flow, sweep and ascendant climax. Soon Dr. Koussevitzky lessened this over-zeal; remembered that a dramatic overture is also a piece of unfolding, close-knit music; then attained the two-fold performance of the "Leonora" overture that we now hear, marvellous at the musical and the dramatic eloquence fused.

Gradually, no doubt, the conductor's version of the overture to "The Flying Dutchman" will undergo like transformation. There is no need to exhaust the art of conducting upon the Hollander's storm-tossed music at beginning and at return. Wagner, foreshadowing his mature self, gave it sufficient force. The hush, until there is scarcely audible sound, as it dwindle toward the first hint of Senta's delirious and redeeming presence, exceeds the musico-dramatic contrast. So onward through the overture, with more than enough "theater" and rather less than enough music. Until the final idealizing of Senta's theme, proclaiming release and salvation to the cursed and haunted Hollander. Then Dr. Koussevitzky, stilling the tempest and opening the heavens, goes hand in hand with Wagner himself.

There were amends in the conductor's repetition of Ravel's "Bolero." At his hands, more than ever before, the piece seemed the tour de force that it actually is rather than an exercise in instrumental technique, through willed repetitions, to rack the nerves of hearers. Faithfully, Dr. Koussevitzky accepted the composer's deliberate pace. More than usual he stilled the beginnings. Like an insidious force the motif, the rhythm, the tune, spread from wind instrument to wind instrument, until group after group, choir upon choir, seized, enhanced, enriched. As hardly before, the listener heard that endless and changeless plucking of the lighter strings until it is their turn to take over and sharpen that ceaseless tune. As hardly before, conductor and orchestra drove crescendo over crescendo, each drawing tauter the suspense, until the flashing modulation into E major and the final outburst of cumulated musical sound. Call "Bolero" a feat, as it undoubtedly is; but there are feats that come close to genius. In this instance the genius of orchestral manipulation—instruments, groups, choirs, tonal detail and tonal mass. Nor does the

Sol L ev pf	26%	26%	26%	+	1/2
S N Gas A	3%	3%	3%	-	1/2
U
erleider F Cp	24%	23%	24	-	1 1/2
on Am Invest	18%	18%	18%	-	1 1/2
on Nat G Can	18	17%	17%	-	1 1/2
on Tobacco...	1/4	1/4	1/4
Carr Fast...	4%	4%	4%	+	1 1/2
Chem pt pf...	19%	20%	19%	-	7 1/2
Corp ow ...	9%	8%	8%	-	1 1/2
Dry Docks...	3	2%	2%	-	1 1/2
Founders...	9%	9%	9%	-	1 1/2
Gas Corp...	9%	8%	9	-	1 1/2
Gas Corp w...	3%	3%	3%	-	1 1/2
Gas Corp pf	90	88%	88%	-	2
LA&Pr A...	28%	26%	26%	-	1 1/2
LA&Pr B...	69%	69	69	+	1 1/2
LA&Pr ev pf	99	97%	99
Milk Prod...	2%	2	2
Profit Shar...	2%	2%	2%
Pub Ser...	6	6	6
& Int Ser...	1%	1%	1%	+	1 1/2
& Int S 1pf	45%	42%	43	-	8
& Overs's ct	14	13%	13%	+	1 1/2
El Pr ww...	7%	6%	6%	-	1 1/2
El Pr war...	2	2	2	-	1 1/2
Finishing...	8%	7%	7%	-	1 1/2
Finish pf...	58	58	58	-	2
Fell B...	6%	5	5	-	1 1/2
Gypsum...	41%	41%	41%	-	1 1/2
Lime pf...	7%	6%	7	-	1 1/2
Play Card...	53	53	53
Plu Held...	1%	1%	1%	-	1 1/2

runner Ma	5%	5%	5%
Sh Ter Sec	15%	15%	15%

finest taste as well as a remarkable pianist, gave so compelling an interpretation of the Beethoven concerto that even those to whom this piece has not in the past seemed the masterpiece it actually is, must have been impressed. Dr. Koussevitzky and the orchestra provided Gieseeking with the best accompaniment they have given any soloist. For a parallel one would have to go back to the memorable day in 1915 when the Boston Symphony under Dr. Muck aided Kreisler in a performance of the Beethoven violin concerto that still seems to one who was lucky enough to hear it to have realized an ideal. This performance yesterday was renewed evidence that Dr. Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony are not resting upon their laurels, but attaining greater heights each season. It is to be hoped that they will some day do for most classics what yesterday they did for the "Emperor Concerto."

HEARD AT CONCERT Nov. 29, 1930 Triumphs in Concerto of Hanson's New Symphony" Given

again proved his of the greatest by a remarkably Beethoven's "Em- Dr Koussevitzsky surpassed them- ber, making the remembered. Too classic given so ymphony," dedi- Symphony Or- Hanson, direc- School of Music played for the A program ing in imagina- might assume with Wagner's overture and oleró."

Romantic Symphony

Dr. Hanson, in a program note, explains that his "Romantic Symphony" represents for him "a definite and acknowledged embracing of the romantic phase."

"I recognize, of course," writes the composer, "that romanticism is at present the poor stepchild, without the social standing of her elder sister, neo-classicism. Nevertheless, I embrace her all the more fervently, believing, as I do, that romanticism will find in this country rich soil for a new, young, and vigorous growth."

This is a courageous and honest stand to take. The composer's aim in the symphony heard yesterday was, he further tells us, "to create a work young in spirit, romantic in temperament, and simple and direct in expression."

Although one cannot honestly feel that Dr. Hanson succeeded in achieving his aim, one cannot but respect him for attempting, not what current Parisian musical fashion would dictate, but what he himself desired to do.

One thought yesterday, listening to Dr. Hanson's symphony, of Dvorak's "New World" symphony, and of Charpentier's opera "Louise." There was no direct imitation or reminiscence of either work, though reminiscences of other familiar music occasionally obtruded themselves on the listening ear. But a Dvorak who had heard Stravinsky's rhythms and the dissonant harmonies now common property might, in his less inspired moments, have written such a work as this Romantic Symphony.

It was probably the cloying sweetness of much of Dr. Hanson's dissonance that recalled Charpentier, as well as his manifesting at a rather late date romantic intentions. The audience seemed less pleased with the new work than one would have expected in view of its relatively tuneful and simple character. The composer was present, but did not conduct his work. Dr. Koussevitzky's reading of it was notably eloquent and sympathetic.

Eloquent Reading

When Ravel's Bolero was first played here last season the audience made a demonstration hitherto unheard of at these concerts. Yesterday's applause for this tour de force, now grown stale through familiarity, was mildly cordial. More interesting was the fact that a number of persons were impelled to leave the hall during the music, driven no doubt by its monotony, which to some listeners

Mr. Spalding's career has been long he worked Wagner's overture to "The Flying Dutchman" with which effect upon hearers diminish. "Bolero" style as violinist man" with which ended a long concert. To the end a overdid it, almost "Friday audience" stayed.

Now, in the recall Dr. Hans terday. The be that is to say th ciple motif tha music, the subor ing from it or clear-spoken an poser develops a measure of in do they, or the stamp by which tion recognize t moods and emot composing and o Rather, they are thing in the reat ive, to be sure, ventional: out, so and not the par in our plenteous

Beethoven's thin when he first l ears. Then, D dramatize every every transition, each modulation. heard the overtu fied "bits" laid s sweep and ascen Koussevitzky less membered that also a piece of un then attained the the "Leonora" hear, marvelling dramatic eloquent Gradually, no version of the o Dutchman" will u tion. There is no of conducting upon

Already, the climax had come in the performance of Beethoven's Concerto in E-flat with Mr. Giesecking as pianist, with conductor and orchestra no less than he in the vein. Together they played the piece symphonically. Now and again the piano was the predominant, outspeaking voice; yet from the frame and body of the whole; while constant was the interchange between it and the orchestra as mated or contrasted media for the musical thought, suggestion, emotion. From the beginning, as though it would gather and fuse the sources of the music, to the end in rhythmic brilliance and tonal power, the first movement swept forward loftily, superbly, as though for one this "Emperor Concerto" should deserve its name. Various as Beethoven was as pianist and conductor, yet firmly the

Note again the title—a Romantic! the essence of intensity of vision and creation; the strangeness, as it were, upon the such are the elements of Beethoven's; the finer of Schubert; or, the symphonies are not yet withered Liszt, when sound under sound and feel this essence feel this essence. There were also traces of the Romantic Symphonic repetition of Rave has been no Beethoven in concert including? More hands, more than to match yesterday's—not even when the label, he seemed the tour de tetz was "astringent artist." H. T. listens the more is rather than ar cover that it sm mental technique, through willed repeti lacks intensity a tions, to rack the nerves of hearers. he says to him Faithfully, Dr. Koussevitzky accepted of Mr. Copland's the composer's deliberate pace. More than carded piano-cor usual he stilled the beginnings. Like an plica of a half insidious force the motif, the rhythm, convention. All the tune, spread from wind instrument courage Dr. Har to wind instrument, until group after himself as an group, choir upon choir, seized, enhanced, and accomplished enriched. As hardly before, the listener four, there is st heard that endless and changeless pluck- ing the strings until it is their

Needless to say, he spared no pains in Hanson's symphony from sheer instinct to his will poser. As it seems that the music mated, and would way. Dr. Hanson repeated Monsieur—"parfait"—at Symphony. . . . less fortunate turn to take over and sharpen that less tune. As hardly before, conductor and orchestra drove crescendo over crescendo, each drawing tauter the suspense, until the flashing modulation into E major and the final outburst of cumulated musical sound. Call "Bolero" a feat, as it undoubtedly is; but there are feats that come close to genius. In this instance the genius of orchestral manipulation—instruments, groups, choirs, tonal detail and tonal mass. Nor does the Already, the climax had come in the performance of Beethoven's Concerto in E-flat with Mr. Gieseking as pianist, with conductor and orchestra no less than he in the vein. Together they played the piece symphonically. Now and again the piano was the predominant, outspeaking voice; yet from the frame and body of the whole; while constant was the interchange between it and the orchestra, mated or contrasted media for the musical thought, suggestion, emotion. From the beginning, as though it would gather and fuse the sources of the music, to the end in rhythmic brilliance and tonal power, the first movement swept forward loftily, superbly, as though for one this "Emperor Concerto" should deserve its name. Various as Beethoven was as pianist and conductor, yet firmly the concentrated and cumulated the advance movement, the Gieseking

In the slow movement, who had been all for vigor began as all for finesse; while the orchestra answered him with its suavest emphasis. Together they enlarged the melody to serene and deeper-toned beauty that complement to the first Allegro of power. Mr. Gieseeking made the transition to the finale with conjuring fingers. The rest was the give-and-take of a virtuoso pianist and a virtuoso orchestra—musicians both—through Beethoven's gay of motives and motion. Since name Muck's afternoon with Kreisler. Rave has been no Beethoven in concert—than to match yesterday's—not even when our de fetz was "assisting artist." H. T.

...ar
...que, through willed repeti-
...k the nerves of bearers.
...r. Koussevitzky accepted
...deliberate pace. More than
...d the beginnings. Like an
...e the motiv, the rhythm,
...ead from wind instrument
...rument, until group after
...pon choir, seized, enhanced,
...hardly before, the listener
...ndless and changeless pluck-
...ghter strings until it is their
...over and sharpen that cease-
...As hardly before, conductor
...ra drove crescendo 'over
...ach drawing tauter the sus-
...the flashing modulation into
...d the final outburst of cumu-
...l sound. Call "Bolero" a ...undoubtedly is; but there are
...ome close to genius. In this ...genius of orchestral manipu-
...ments, groups, choirs, tonal
...tonal mass. Nor does the

GIESEKING HEARD AT SYMPHONY CONCERT

Great Pianist Triumphs in Beethoven Concerto

First Performance of Hanson's New "Romantic Symphony" Given

Walter Gieseking again proved his right to rank as one of the greatest of concert pianists by a remarkably fine performance in Beethoven's "Emperor" Concerto. Dr Koussevitzsky and the orchestra surpassed themselves in this number, making the occasion one to be remembered. Too seldom is a great classic given so notable a performance.

A new "Romantic Symphony," dedicated to the Boston Symphony Orchestra by Dr. Howard Hanson, director of the Eastman School of Music at Rochester, N. Y., was played for the first time anywhere. A program which proved less lacking in imaginative unity than one might assume from reading it, began with Wagner's "Flying Dutchman" overture and ended with Ravel's "Bolero."

Mr Gieseeking, a musician of the finest taste as well as a remarkable pianist, gave so compelling an interpretation of the Beethoven concerto that even those to whom this piece has not in the past seemed the masterpiece it actually is, must have been impressed. Dr Koussevitzky and the orchestra provided Gieseeking with the best accompaniment they have given any soloist. For a parallel one would have to go back to the memorable day in 1915 when the Boston Symphony under Dr Muck aided Kreisler in a performance of the Beethoven violin concerto that still seems to one who was lucky enough to hear it to have realized an ideal. This performance yesterday was renewed evidence that Dr Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony are not resting upon their laurels, but attaining greater heights each season. It is to be hoped that they will some day do for most classics what yesterday they did for the "Emperor Concerto."

Romantic Symphony

Dr Hanson, in a program note, explains that his "Romantic Symphony" represents for him "a definite and acknowledged embracing of the romantic phase."

"I recognize, of course," writes the composer, "that romanticism is at present the poor stepchild, without the social standing of her elder sister, neo-classicism. Nevertheless, I embrace her all the more fervently, believing, as I do, that romanticism will find in this country rich soil for a new, young, and vigorous growth."

This is a courageous and honest stand to take. The composer's aim in the symphony heard yesterday was, he further tells us, "to create a work young in spirit, romantic in temperament, and simple and direct in expression."

Although one cannot honestly feel that Dr Hanson succeeded in achieving his aim, one cannot but respect him for attempting, not what current Parisian musical fashion would dictate, but what he himself desired to do.

One thought yesterday, listening to Dr. Hanson's symphony, of Dvorak's "New World" symphony, and of Charpentier's opera "Louise." There was no direct imitation or reminiscence of either work, though reminiscences of other familiar music occasionally obtruded themselves on the listening ear. But a Dvorak who had heard Stravinsky's rhythms and the dissonant harmonies now common in property might, in his less inspired moments, have written such a work as this Romantic Symphony.

It was probably the cloying sweetness of much of Dr Hanson's dissonance that recalled Charpentier, as well as his manifesting at a rather late date romantic intentions. The audience seemed less pleased with the new work than one would have expected in view of its relatively tuneful and simple character. The composer was present, but did not conduct his work. Dr Koussevitzky's reading of it was notably eloquent and sympathetic.

Eloquent Reading

When Ravel's Bolero was first played here last season the audience made a demonstration hitherto unheard of at these concerts. Yesterday's applause for this tour de force, now grown stale through familiarity, was mildly cordial. More interesting was the fact that a number of persons were impelled to leave the hall during the music, driven no doubt by its monotony, which to some listeners is now almost intolerable. The present reviewer, having now listened to this Bolero six times, would never willingly listen to it again.

The reading of Wagner's early and, on the whole, rather empty and trivial overture was eloquent, but the orchestra played it less accurately than they did the other numbers.

There are no Symphony concerts here next week, as the orchestra will give a Beethoven Festival in Washington, D. C. For Dec 12 and 13 the announced program includes the first public performance of Stravinsky's new "Symphonies de Psaumes," the most eagerly awaited of the several novelties commissioned for the 50th anniversary. P. R.

Monday Boston Symphony Orchestra

Walter Gieseking, virtuoso and musician, was the ornament of the program prepared for the seventh pair of subscription concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, in Symphony Hall, Boston, Nov. 28 and 29. He played Beethoven's E flat major Piano Concerto with that power, delicacy, fluency and musical taste which distinguish him. Dr. Koussevitzky gave him an accompaniment worthy of his interpretation, and the audience delighted in paying him honor.

The novelty of the program was the Symphony No. 2 ("Romantic") by Dr. Howard Hanson, director of the Eastman School of Music of the University of Rochester, N. Y. The composer, writing in honor of the fiftieth anniversary of the orchestra, employed, as in his "Nordic" Symphony, the cyclic form of César Franck. Mottoes set forth in the first movement are developed with erudition. Even more remote is the style of the work. When the composer called it "Romantic," he understated the case. Neither Byron nor Goethe nor Schumann nor Tchaikovsky was ever quite so romantic as this. Dr. Hanson has felt mildly the influence of modern harmonic idiom, but he has not been touched by the detachment which is alleged to be the mark of his generation. There is nothing in this symphony to offend the most tender ear, nothing which might not have been written at any time in the last 90 years. But was it necessary that it should be written? Dr. Hanson is as sentimental as Tchaikovsky. So are many other persons who have not Tchaikovsky's melodic gift, and who therefore cannot hope to equal his expressiveness.

The symphony was well received, but it seemed less contemporary than the "Flying Dutchman" Overture, which preceded it. Dr. Koussevitzky, however, tried a little too hard to point up the overture, which after all need not sound like the "Tristan" Prelude. The concert closed with Ravel's "Bolero," which no longer belongs on the programs of a major symphony orchestra. L. A. S.

They Shall Not Creak

Footnote to the Chronicles of Symphony Hall

WITHIN recollection a mystery play, acted in Boston, was named "The Creaking Chair." In it, at proper moments, a chair creaked ominously. On the stage of Symphony Hall, through more years than the weeks over which the play ran, chairs have also creaked—annoyingly. They creaked because they were made of wood, with joiner-work that stirred unsympathetically under the movements of sitting orchestral players. The regular conductor and all but the most sensitive players gradually accustomed themselves to this minute obligato. But when a guest-conductor led, or a composer put the orchestra through his own piece, the creaking often rasped his nerves and irritated his temper.

Hence the change to the chairs on view for the first time last Tuesday, discovered yesterday by the subscription audience of Friday afternoons. In shape and color they are more seemly to the observing eye; but that is a minor merit. The more essential virtues are two: First, at the small of their backs the players fit neatly into the new chairs. Second, for that reason and inasmuch as the chairs are made of jointless metal, there is not, and there cannot be, any creaking. With this amelioration of orchestral conditions—as the solemn historians may write, fifty years on—this slight footnote to the chronicle of Symphony Hall may end.

Eighth Programme

FRIDAY AFTERNOON, DECEMBER 12, at 2.30 o'clock

SATURDAY EVENING, DECEMBER 13, at 8.15 o'clock

RICHARD BURGIN will conduct these concerts

Křenek Little Symphony, Op. 58
I. Andante sostenuto; Allegro energico, ma non troppo.
II. Andantino, poco lento.
III. Allegretto, poco grave.

(First time in Boston)

Mozart Concerto in A major for Pianoforte and Orchestra (K. 488)
I. Allegro.
II. Andante.
III. Presto.

Sibelius Symphony No. 1 in E minor, Op. 39
I. Andante ma non troppo; Allegro energico.
II. Andante ma non troppo lento.
III. Allegro.
IV. Finale (Quasi una Fantasia): Andante; Allegro molto.

SOLOIST
BRUCE SIMONDS

STEINWAY PIANO

There will be an intermission after the Concerto

The works to be played at these concerts may be seen in the Allen A. Brown Music Collection of the Boston Public Library one week before the concert is now almost intolerable. The present reviewer, having now listened to this Bolero six times, would never willingly listen to it again.

The reading of Wagner's early and, on the whole, rather empty and trivial overture was eloquent, but the orchestra played it less accurately than they did the other numbers.

There are no Symphony concerts here next week, as the orchestra will give a Beethoven Festival in Washington, D. C. For Dec 12 and 13 the announced program includes the first public performance of Stravinsky's new "Symphonies de Psalms," the most eagerly awaited of the several novelties commissioned for the 50th anniversary. P. R.

Walter Boston Symphony Orchestra

Walter Gieseking, virtuoso and musician, was the ornament of the program prepared for the seventh pair of subscription concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, in Symphony Hall, Boston, Nov. 28 and 29. He played Beethoven's E flat major Piano Concerto with that power, delicacy, fluency and musical taste which distinguish him. Dr. Koussevitzky gave him an accompaniment worthy of his interpretation, and the audience delighted in paying him honor.

The novelty of the program was the Symphony No. 2 ("Romantic") by Dr. Howard Hanson, director of the Eastman School of Music of the University of Rochester, N. Y. The composer, writing in honor of the fiftieth anniversary of the orchestra, employed, as in his "Nordic" Symphony, the cyclic form of César Franck. Mottoes set forth in the first movement are developed with erudition. Even more remote is the style of the work. When the composer called it "Romantic," he understated the case. Neither Byron nor Goethe nor Schumann nor Tchaikovsky was ever quite so romantic as this. Dr. Hanson has felt mildly the influence of modern harmonic idiom, but he has not been touched by the detachment which is alleged to be the mark of his generation. There is nothing in this symphony to offend the most tender ear, nothing which might not have been written at any time in the last 90 years. But was it necessary that it should be written? Dr. Hanson is as sentimental as Tchaikovsky. So are many other persons who have not Tchaikovsky's melodic gift, and who therefore cannot hope to equal his expressiveness.

The symphony was well received, but it seemed less contemporary than the "Flying Dutchman" Overture, which preceded it. Dr. Koussevitzky, however, tried a little too hard to point up the overture, which after all need not sound like the "Tristan" Prelude. The concert closed with Ravel's "Bolero," which no longer belongs on the programs of a major symphony orchestra. L. A. S.

They Shall Not Creak

Footnote to the Chronicles of
Symphony Hall

WITHIN recollection a mystery play, acted in Boston, was named "The Creaking Chair." In it, at proper moments, a chair creaked ominously. On the stage of Symphony Hall, through more years than the weeks over which the play ran, chairs have also creaked—annoyingly. They creaked because they were made of wood, with joiner-work that stirred unsympathetically under the movements of sitting orchestral players. The regular conductor and all but the most sensitive players gradually accustomed themselves to this minute obligato. But when a guest-conductor led, or a composer put the orchestra through his own piece, the creaking often rasped his nerves and irritated his temper.

Hence the change to the chairs on view for the first time last Tuesday, discovered yesterday by the subscription audience of Friday afternoons. In shape and color they are more seemly to the observing eye; but that is a minor merit. The more essential virtues are two: First, at the small of their backs the players fit neatly into the new chairs. Second, for that reason and inasmuch as the chairs are made of jointless metal, there is not, and there cannot be, any creaking. With this amelioration of orchestral conditions—as the solemn historians may write, fifty years on—this slight footnote to the chronicle of Symphony Hall may end.

Eighth Programme

FRIDAY AFTERNOON, DECEMBER 12, at 2.30 o'clock

SATURDAY EVENING, DECEMBER 13, at 8.15 o'clock

RICHARD BURGIN will conduct these concerts

Křenek Little Symphony, Op. 58

- I. Andante sostenuto; Allegro energico, ma non troppo.
- II. Andantino, poco lento.
- III. Allegretto, poco grave.

(First time in Boston)

Mozart Concerto in A major for Pianoforte and Orchestra (K. 488)

- I. Allegro.
- II. Andante.
- III. Presto.

Sibelius Symphony No. 1 in E minor, Op. 39

- I. Andante ma non troppo; Allegro energico.
- II. Andante ma non troppo lento.
- III. Allegro.
- IV. Finale (Quasi una Fantasia): Andante; Allegro molto.

SOLOIST

BRUCE SIMONDS

STEINWAY PIANO

There will be an intermission after the Concerto

The works to be played at these concerts may be seen in the Allen A. Brown Music Collection of the Boston Public Library one week before the concert

Ernst Krenek

The Lad With an Innocent Air

SYMPHONY CONCERT

BY PHILIP HALE

The eighth concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony Hall. Dr. Koussevitzky was still suffering from a cold, but he will be able to conduct the Monday night, Saturday night and Friday afternoon concerts of next week. Yesterday Richard Burgin, the concert-master of the orchestra reigned in his stead. The program was as follows: Krenek, Little Symphony (first time in Boston), Mozart, concerto in A major for piano (Bruce Simonds, pianist) and orchestra, Sibelius, Symphony No. 1, E minor.

Krenek, of Czechoslovakian origin, born in Vienna, a pupil of Schoenberg, and now living in Berlin is in his 31st year. A fertile composer, he is probably best known in this country by his opera "Jonny Spielt Auf," which has been performed at the Metropolitan in New York, by his "Symphonische Musik," and by chamber music. The symphony played yesterday, composed in 1928, was performed on Nov. 6th of this year at a concert in New York of the Philharmonic Symphony Society, led by Erich Kleiber, a guest.

This composer must be a humorist of the first water, for he wrote an analysis of the symphony with a gravity becoming any Herr Mueller whose pedestrian work was to be played in Eisleben or Plauen. Krenek speaks of his following the traditional sonata form, of basic tonalities, reprise, coda, song form, etc., so that any one not knowing him would expect what is eulogized by reactionaries as a "solid work," "well written," "sincere," "wholly worthy"—and prepare himself therefore for a boresome half-hour. Krenek surely slapped his thighs and beat his sides with laughter as he wrote these conventional lines about a most unconventional and delightful little work, composed much of it in the spirit of jazz, but at the same time displaying the technical equipment of a thoroughly grounded musician who has an unusual gift of invention, and true fancy that runs occasionally into the fantastic. Krenek also has a pleasing melodic streak in his musical nature; a feeling for beauty, shown not only in the slow movement. The composition of his orchestra is as uncommon as the music itself; but his choice of instruments is not alone for dance rhythms. His score calls for banjos, mandolins, guitar and harp for the suggestion of the dance; also for a "vibrating, rattling, metallic sound" that he desires; but with customary orchestral instruments, curiously grouped and used, he gains surprising, fascinating effects. Rossini in his latter years wrote a Mass that has many admirable pages, among them a double fugue constructed in a masterly manner. With characteristic irony he put on the title page "Petite Messe." Krenek speaks of his "little" symphony. The three movements are short, but the pleasure given by them is great. The audience yesterday felt with Athenaeus that music is not purposely, necessarily "educative"; that it should on occasion "dissipate sadness, produce affability and a sort of gentleman-like joy. Krenek's little work answers the definition of Athenaeus. The ladies and gentlemen of the congregation who sat in the pews of Symphony hall yesterday accepted the symphony and rejoiced in it; rejoiced and were not ashamed.

Mr. Burgin might have been a little more audacious in his interpretation of Krenek's work; even a little more reckless, for he could safely rely on the virtuosos on the stage; but the performance was exciting, and inspired the desire to hear the Symphony again and soon. His presentation of the great Symphony by Sibelius was most effective. He knows Sibelius, the man and the composer; he was for a time concert-master of the Helsingfors Symphony orchestra. It is not surprising, that yesterday he was charged with the spirit of Sibelius; the Sibelius of the earlier symphonic years. So great is Mr. Burgin's musical enthusiasm for this wild eloquence—the symphony is more than a "human document"; it is a bardic rhapsody on Finland's landscapes and sea-scapes, people and tragic history—that he communicated the intensity of his feeling to players who responded with gusto; to an audience that was moved deeply by the emotional outbursts of the composer.

Mr. Simonds played accurately and glibly Mozart's notes; he played with undeviating tonal monotony. For this performance without nuances in tempo or color, he was warmly applauded.

The concert will be repeated tonight. The program of next week is thus announced: Mozart, Symphony, G minor. Stravinsky "Symphonie de Psaumes" for orchestra with chorus (the Cecilia trained by its conductor, Arthur Fiedler); Capriccio for piano (Mr. Sanroma), and orchestra. Repetition of the "Symphonie de Psaumes." Bach, Organ Fugue in E flat major, orchestrated by Schoenberg. Stravinsky's "Symphonie de Psaumes," written for the 50th anniversary of the orchestra, also his Capriccio will be performed for the first time in the United States. The former work will be performed in Brussels today.

BURGIN CONDUCTS SYMPHONY CONCERT

Bruce Simonds Soloist in Mozart Concerto

First Performance in Boston of Krenek's "Little Symphony"

Dr Koussevitzky has a cold, and after the fatigue of the Beethoven Festival in Washington last week, felt obliged to turn over the conducting of this week's Symphony concerts in Cambridge and Boston to Richard Burgin, concert master of the orchestra. The two new works by Stravinsky, announced for yesterday, have been postponed till next week. Mr Burgin's program began with Ernest Krenek's "Little Symphony," and included a Mozart piano concerto, in A major and Sibelius' First Symphony.

The program books yesterday included a slip announcing that an exhibition of pictures, music, programs, and other relics of the 50 years of the Boston Symphony is on display in Huntington-av foyer off the first balcony. This exhibition includes a number of interesting photographs, letters of many celebrated musicians, and the portrait of Maj Higginson by Sargent which ordinarily hangs in the Harvard Union. It was thronged yesterday.

Krenek is chiefly known in America by his opera "Jonny spleit auf," produced by the Metropolitan Opera in New York two seasons ago. He was born in 1900 and was a pupil of Schreker. The "Little Symphony" played yesterday is his opus 58.

For Small Orchestra

Like so many of the younger generation of composers, Krenek has definitely broken with the 19th century, and gone back to a style recalling music of the 18th century. This symphony is for small orchestra, ingeniously scored to emphasize percussive and rhythmic effects rather than either sonority or volume of tone. Its form is consciously orthodox. Its mood has none of the sentiment, none of the moral earnestness, none of the striving for epic breadth of 19th century German music. Krenek recalls neither Beethoven nor Wagner, but rather the lighter, more cynical, more impudent writers of the 18th century in Italy. His one aim is to make his music sprightly and entertaining. With all his ingenuity he fails to achieve it except at moments, unless yesterday's performance belied him. Of other composers known here, this symphony can most obviously be compared with some of the work of Hindemith and of Prokofeff. It is more correctly written, according to text book standards, but that is probably because Krenek cannot quite forget all that he undoubtedly learned in his student days about counterpoint in the manner of Reger.

Mr Burgin was warmly applauded by orchestra and audience. In Sibelius' symphony he gave a performance which was not merely intelligent and sympathetic, but full of the dramatic quality the eloquence of which famous orchestral conductors have no monopoly. His reading of this familiar work, and the orchestra's eager cooperation, brought about a performance that deserves to be described as memorable. Mr Burgin's conducting has steadily improved as opportunities have offered. He is now much more than a mere substitute filling an unexpectedly vacant place, as he was when he first conducted the Boston Symphony some years ago.

Bruce Simonds Plays

Bruce Simonds, a young American pianist known to Jordan Hall audiences from several recitals there, repeated the Mozart concerto he had given Thursday night in Cambridge. His performance, though competent enough, lacked distinction of musical style. Mozart is, of course, the most difficult of all composers to play really well. Celebrities far greater than Mr Simonds have failed, as he failed yesterday, to do more than play the notes about as written. The requisite nuances of melody and rhythm eluded him. Mr Burgin, obviously nervous about the difficult task of leading an orchestral accompaniment, was also not at his best in this concerto.

Next week Dr Koussevitzky plans to conduct the first public performances of Stravinsky's new "Symphony of Psalms," Stravinsky Capriccio for piano, and Mozart's G minor symphony and Bach's fugue in E flat, orchestrated by Schoenberg. The Cecilia Society chorus will assist the orchestra.

P. R.

New Krenek, Old Sibelius, Novel Burgin

The Deputy-Conductor Excels Himself with Two Composers

UNTIL yesterday, self-consciousness was Mr. Burgin's bane as solo-violinist or deputy-conductor at Symphony Hall. Seated in his usual place at the head of the strings, he escaped it. There these ten years he has been spirited, sensitive, steady, concert-master. From time to time he has taken the solo-part in a violin-concerto—and never done himself full justice. (Probably he came nearest it when he played Sibelius's Concerto last spring.) Violinist all his life, now ripened into a fine-fibered musician, uneasiness—not with the music in hand or with the orchestra behind him, but with his inner self—seemingly oppressed him. He was as one who did not like to be left alone on the edge of a great platform with something to play and an audience waiting to hear. . . . Similarly with his conducting as substitute for Dr. Koussevitzky on holiday or, as this week in Cambridge and Boston, indisposed. Then again sight and thought of the audience seemed to constrain him. There he was, by himself, on a conspicuous stand, with a difficult job and no one near to help, though he and everyone else knew that a friendly orchestra sat ready to his askings. Self-confidence plainly forsook him; while the listener thought to himself what an admirable conductor Mr. Burgin must be—in his own rooms. Only on one or two occasions at the Young People's Concerts has he thrown off these constraints and conducted confidently, spiritedly, as one unoppressed.

There is not a reason why the adult assemblage of Friday afternoon or, for that matter, Saturday evening, should turn Mr. Burgin uneasy. It is as full of good will toward him as the orchestra itself, year in and year out saying as much in applause of welcome and approval. At last he has made that discovery for himself; regained confidence, becoming confidence. Yesterday conducted as never before at any Hall, even with those young-pieces for boys and girls. Mr. is no fanatical modernist; but he stands intelligently and sympathetically that such composers are trying to do the orchestra is excelled by no with a bow toward Philadelphia—ert and characterizing performance this music. He led it through s "Little Symphony" with a light, hand; opened out intricate counterpoint; spared not with insistences; made adept and vivacious play strings of scrappy motifs; turned notes as though they were the most of musical means, as indeed they the composer's generation; gave sole place its true air of modish entertainment.

Mozart's Piano-concerto in A major. Burgin was not so fortunate, the assisting pianist, Bruce of Yale, was by no means blameless. The deputy-conductor had thrust the oppression of an audience, the of a pianist to be accompanied him uneasy. His hand stiff, the flowing, variable, luminous. He exaggerated contrasts, a fleet finale at the expense of a slow-paced middle movement; let a dull orchestral tone dull Mozartean. Nor did the pianist come to the . . . Intermission and a rest. Burgin outdoing himself, beyond expectation, through Sibelius's First Symphony. The deputy-conductor has worked in the North; known contacts with the composer. Pole Mr. Burgin is by birth, Sibelius's speech stimulates him. He master of form and content in the symphony; missed no characteristic trait; a resolute moment; found and entered the tone that is voice to the deepened or heightened measure of measure. Orchestra and audience impetus of remarkable performance from both at the end there was applause.

Chemists of music play their We others, if we liked, could find and more—of Chalkovsky, Grieg, German here, Scandinavian this Symphony of Sibelius written years ago. We prefer, however, regard them as residue from the stock of music in that particular, which no young composer, in and assimilating, could escape turn of the century any than nowadays he could cut in Ravel or Stravinsky. As well youthful poet for shaping a or purpling a line after the man.

BURGIN CONDUCTS SYMPHONY CONCERT

Bruce Simonds Soloist in Mozart Concerto

First Performance in Boston of Krenek's "Little Symphony"

Dr Koussevitzky has a cold, and after the fatigue of the Beethoven Festival in Washington last week, felt obliged to turn over the conducting of this week's Symphony concerts in Cambridge and Boston to Richard Burgin, concert master of the orchestra. The two new works by Stravinsky, announced for yesterday, have been postponed till next week. Mr Burgin's program began with Ernest Krenek's "Little Symphony," and included a Mozart piano concerto, in A major and Sibelius' First Symphony.

The program books yesterday included a slip announcing that an exhibition of pictures, music, programs, and other relics of the 50 years of the Boston Symphony is on display in Huntington-av foyer off the first balcony. This exhibition includes a number of interesting photographs, letters of many celebrated musicians, and the portrait of Maj Higginson by Sargent which ordinarily hangs in the Harvard Union. It was thronged yesterday.

Krenek is chiefly known in America by his opera "Jonny spielt auf," produced by the Metropolitan Opera in New York two seasons ago. He was born in 1900 and was a pupil of Schreker. The "Little Symphony" played yesterday is his opus 58.

For Small Orchestra

Like so many of the younger generation of composers, Krenek has definitely broken with the 19th century, and gone back to a style recalling music of the 18th century. This symphony is for small orchestra, ingeniously scored to emphasize percussive and rhythmic effects rather than either sonority or volume of tone. Its form is consciously orthodox. Its mood has none of the sentiment, none of the moral earnestness, none of the striving for epic breadth of 19th century German music. Krenek recalls neither Beethoven nor Wagner, but rather the lighter, more cynical, more impudent writers of the 18th century in Italy. His one aim is to make his music sprightly and entertaining. With all his ingenuity he fails to achieve it except at moments, unless yesterday's performance belied him. Of other composers known here, this symphony can most obviously be compared with some of the work of Hindemith and of Prokofieff. It is more correctly written, according to text book standards, but that is probably because Krenek cannot quite forget all that he undoubtedly learned in his student days about counterpoint in the manner of Reger.

Mr Burgin was warmly applauded by orchestra and audience. In Sibelius' symphony he gave a performance which was not merely intelligent and sympathetic, but full of the dramatic quality the eloquence of which famous orchestral conductors have no monopoly. His reading of this familiar work, and the orchestra's eager co-operation, brought about a performance that deserves to be described as memorable. Mr Burgin's conducting has steadily improved as opportunities have offered. He is now much more than a mere substitute filling an unexpectedly vacant place, as he was when he first conducted the Boston Symphony some years ago.

Bruce Simonds Plays

Bruce Simonds, a young American pianist known to Jordan Hall audiences from several recitals there, repeated the Mozart concerto he had given Thursday night in Cambridge. His performance, though competent enough, lacked distinction of musical style. Mozart is, of course, the most difficult of all composers to play really well. Celebrities far greater than Mr Simonds have failed, as he failed yesterday, to do more than play the notes about as written. The requisite nuances of melody and rhythm eluded him. Mr Burgin, obviously nervous about the difficult task of leading an orchestral accompaniment, was also not at his best in this concerto.

Next week Dr Koussevitzky plans to conduct the first public performances of Stravinsky's new "Symphony of Psalms," Stravinsky Capriccio for piano, and Mozart's G minor symphony and Bach's fugue in E flat, orchestrated by Schoenberg. The Cecilia Society chorus will assist the orchestra.

P. R.

New Kr Old S Nov

The Deputy-C Himself
Com

UNTIL yesterday's solo-violinist at Symphony his usual place at the edge of a great thing to play and to hear. . . . Simonds, as substitute Koussevitzky on holiday in Cambridge and Boston, again sight and thought seemed to constrain by himself, on a concerto a difficult job and though he and ever a friendly orchestral askings. Self-confident; while the listener what an admirer Burgin must be—in on one or two occasions People's Concerts I these constraints and, spiritedly, as

There is not a reassemblage of Frida that matter. Saturday Mr. Burgin undoubtedly will toward himself, year in and much in applause of approval. At last he recovery for himself

FIL

A co 6x12 Round piece and fully

Repl work

$4

The
as th Cloth
Acco

DIN
The offer mot gift

72x

72x

$6.

Fin
Har
MA
box

gathered becoming confidence. Yesterday he conducted as never before at Symphony Hall, even with those youngsters' pieces for boys and girls. Mr. Burgin is no fanatical modernist; but he understands intelligently and sympathetically what such composers are trying to do; while the orchestra is excelled by no other—with a bow toward Philadelphia—in expert and characterizing performance of this music. He led it through Krenek's "Little Symphony" with a light, flexible hand; opened out intricate counterpoint; spared not with insistent rhythms; made adept and vivacious play with strings of scrappy motifs; turned dissonances as though they were the most natural of musical means, as indeed they are to the composer's generation; gave the whole piece its true air of modish tonal entertainment.

With Mozart's Piano-concerto in A major, Mr. Burgin was not so fortunate, though the assisting pianist, Bruce Simonds of Yale, was by no means blameless. If the deputy-conductor had thrust away the oppression of an audience, the thought of a pianist to be accompanied made him uneasy. His hand stiffened the flowing, variable, luminous Mozart. He exaggerated contrasts, gaining a fleet finale at the expense of a slow-paced middle movement; let a thickened orchestral tone dull Mozartean sparkle. Nor did the pianist come to the rescue. . . . Intermission and a recovered Burgin outdoing himself, beyond all expectation, through Sibelius' First Symphony. The deputy-conductor has dwelt and worked in the North; known close contacts with the composer. Pole though Mr. Burgin is by birth, Sibelius' northern speech stimulates him. He was master of form and content in the Symphony; missed no characteristic trait or impressive moment; found and enjoined the tone that is voice to the music; deepened or heightened measure after measure. Orchestra and audience felt the impetus of remarkable performance. From both at the end there was no small applause.

Let the chemists of music play their game. We others, if we liked, could find traces—and more—of Chaikovsky, Grieg, Wagner, German here, Scandinavian there, in this Symphony of Sibelius written thirty years ago. We prefer, however, to regard them as residue from the common stock of music in that particular time, which no young composer, inquiring and assimilating, could escape at the turn of the century any more than nowadays he could cut free from Ravel or Stravinsky. As well blame a youthful poet for shaping a cadence or purpling a line after the manner of the good, the great and the fashionable around him.

Nor need we others dally, as superior persons, with the alleged neglect of Sibelius's symphonies, from this first to the last and possibly the final eighth. From the days of Gericke who introduced the second in 1904, to the days of Koussevitzky with the third, fifth, and thence onward, the Finn has been no overlooked composer at Symphony Hall. If Rabaud through seven months ignored him, Muck played him through seven years. London, Manchester, German cities hear him more than occasionally. He is household word in Stockholm, Copenhagen and Helsingfors; each a musically intelligent city. True, he is no Latin and "maestros"—the fashionable word for conductors in New York—may not be drawn to him. The Manhattanese, who annually lament the disregard of Sibelius, may be mistaking their own city of light for an appreciably larger and different world.

What we others would hear, and to hear more than once, in this First Symphony is the unmistakable voice of Sibelius himself. It sounds in masculine strength and urge out of the first movement and the finale. It may be heard, stark and rough, from the scherzo. It sings the song of the slow movement, remembering, haunted, in gray tones of wan sweetness. For it forgives an occasional and ultimately alien lushness from Chaikovsky over the Russian border. We would also find the hand we have come to know upon Sibelius's later music. We feel it in measures that even thus early are written in bare line; or colored in black and gray; or so wrought that substance and sound are as one, with no superfluity between. For these individualities pass over an occasional Wagnerian fullness. The voice, the hand and also the spirit. It beats and surges, clanging, through the second half of the first movement. After the storm, the silence—and the Andante transmutes it into sound. Native wildness pierces out of the Scherzo. Darksome brooding descends upon the beginning of the finale. Time and again in the retrospect of 1930, we recognize qualities of which this Symphony of 1900 was more than token.

Unless we are younger and less accustomed than many in Symphony Hall on a Friday or a Saturday, the old prepossessions persist and mislead when we would listen sympathetically to modernist music. Having heard quite as much as is good for us about the "majestic" Handel or the "heavenly" Mozart, we instinctively bid composers, born into this twentieth century, go and do likewise, if, and ad, one thou because Beethoven will be co no virtue in those usetts Wel unless they also of the mab depths? "Hark,

Schubert's song Because he left st the sons of an- ight his marvels, nconsciously deny would have other oportionately vasty. nherited from the rbid us a music de- shed "merely" to

The le else, seemed yes- d plan of Krenck's French reviewer, hearing a Mr. Kleiber last thing of special im- ettes lto stir interest and the listener is one ed souls who affect service towers into the the od lofty intellect car- fin qv plentiful, in or out that it may not be few be when Krenck pro- venty-odd minutes?

or Garde ses amusement—no as Night os; instead guitar, alimar... scellaneous drums. d have at will a..... ucked rhythms. He t-breathed motifs. Origan— them about, in his e game is diverting mposer has so quick n, plies rhythm so

W m the game to flow nple, quite unsenti- antic mood new fla- M idice, there is not a the song begun by onest tune—a tune. le Place its simplicity as it rmonic fat or instru- The finale is dance- ling, with a tango- By all odds a reflec- the younger genera- urope sees, hears, Food prod ives. It makes an choly streaks it. It the farmer is restless and less In short, a tifle of nt and dis ale and by no means ity and linear coun- a part of our young- her we like them or n the auto v accepting them, as great many ssyan harmonies or Converse ms. The error of k up it in hibited for the first ent in the technical skill for its own sake and the connoisseurs'. It is familiar pitfall for German modern- ists, Schönberg prompting. Krenck's quick hand and changeful impulses do not always mask it. . . . Fortunately, the youngsters in the house gave him warm welcome.

To the Piano-Concerto of Mozart, which was middle item in the program, it is hardly necessary to return. Most of it is workaday Mozart, needing a transmuting touch and spirit that evaded both Dr. Burgin and Mr. Simonds. Of the deputy-conductor enough has been said. The pianist lacked for the time the d scriminating hand, shading here, measuring there, that he has often plied in Boston; let his tone run opaque, left fuzz on his phrases, so spared his periods that light barely shone through. Nor, had his usual sen ibility served him, would he have taken the Andante so slowly—an eight-enth-century Andante to boot, quicker by report than ours. A stodgy Mozart is not easy to bear. Both Mr. Burgin and Mr. Simonds tried too hard. H. T. P.

Boston Symphony Orchestra

Returning from the Beethoven Festival of the Boston Symphony Orchestra held at Washington Dec. 2-6, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky felt that he was entitled to a respite; and not unreasonably, since his labors are seldom interrupted, and since, by report, he devoted special efforts to making successful the celebration at the national capital. Richard Burgin, the concertmaster, took the baton, therefore, for the eighth pair of concerts in Symphony Hall, Boston, the first of which was held on the afternoon of Dec. 12. Mr. Burgin opened his program with a first Boston performance of Ernst Krenck's "Little Symphony," op. 58, continued it with Mozart's A major Piano Concerto (Bruce Simonds, soloist) and closed it with the First Symphony of Sibelius. It is pleasant to record that as vicar he acquitted himself with distinction.

Krenck's "Little Symphony" is to the concert hall what "Jonny Spielt Auf" is to the opera house. Although the music is clothed in symphonic form, it is, like its big brother, a potpourri, with jazz and romance alternating. The composer's program note says: "The dance character of the music was suggested by my use in the score of plucked instruments; two banjos, two mandolins, guitar and harp. These instruments were not employed, however, because of their association with jazz, but because of their appropriateness to the vibrating, rattling, metallic sound which I had conceived for the expression of my music." Which recalls Stravinsky insisting that the music of the "Sacre" came to him first, the "program" afterward.

But we are concerned not with the composer's words, but with his music. There can be no doubt that he knows his way about. His play with tonalities and with free counterpoint is sufficient evidence of that, even if he had not deliberately discarded in this symphony the violas and the cellos, and added to the orchestral family some distant relations from the dance hall—this clinches the argument that he is a man of mark. We must add, however, that he has proved again that jazz does not grow at its most luxurious in European soil, and that a want of significant thematic material is not to be compensated by compositional and orchestral legerdemain. But as the present listener commented nearly two years ago, after hearing "Jonny," "let us not take the matter too seriously. We are dealing merely with a diverting entertainment."

Mr. Simonds, an excellent pianist and a scholarly musician, found himself at home in the classic style of the concerto. If one wished at moments for a more limpid tone or for more exquisite phrasing, one admired at the same time the chaste musicality of this artist. Mr. Simonds' performance was received by the audience with marked cordiality.

Some years ago we gave deep offense to a reader by referring to the Sibelius First as the "Finnish Pathetic." We hope that reader was present at the concert under review. Hearing this performance, brilliant in tone and surcharged with emotion, surely he would withdraw his protest.

L. A. S.

ner of the good, the great and the fable around him.

Nor need we others dally, as so persons, with the alleged neglect of Sibelius's symphonies, from this the last and possibly the final. From the days of Gerike who produced the second in 1904, to the Koussevitzky with the third, fifth thence onward, the Finn has been overlooked composer at Symphony. If Rabaud through seven months of him, Muck played him through years. London, Manchester, cities hear him more than once. He is household word in Stockholm and Helsingfors; each sically intelligent city. True, he Latin and "maestros"—the fashion word for conductors in New York not be drawn to him. The Man ese, who annually lament the of Sibelius, may be mistaking the city of light for an appreciably and different world.

What we others would hear, hear more than once, in this First phony is the unmistakable voice of Sibelius himself. It sounds in strength and urge out of the first ment and the finale. It may be stark and rough, from the scherz, sings the song of the slow movement, remembering, haunted, in gray wan sweetness. For it forgives sional and ultimately alien lushness. Chaikovsky over the Russian border would also find the hand we have to know upon Sibelius's later music feel it in measures that even they are written in bare line; or cold black and gray; or so wrought the stance and sound are as one, with superfluity between. For these qualities pass over an occasional nerian fullness. The voice, the ha also the spirit. It beats and clanging, through the second half first movement. After the stor silence—and the Andante trans into sound. Native wildness pier of the Scherzo. Darksome b descends upon the beginning of the Time and again in the ret of 1930, we recognize qualities of this Symphony of 1900 was more token.

Unless we are younger and less tomed than many in Symphony Hall Friday or a Saturday, the old pre sions persist and mislead when we listen sympathetically to mo music. Having heard quite as much good for us about the "majestic" or the "heavenly" Mozart, we inst ly bid composers, born into this twentieth century, go and do likewise, so far, as they can. Because Beethoven was "cosmic," is there no virtue in those a century after him, unless they also scale heights and plumb depths? "Hark, hark, the lark" and Schubert's song mounts to the skies. Because he left such an heritage, must the sons of an dipped? Wagner wrought his marvels, all-embracing. We unconsciously deny his genius, when he would have other music-making souls proportionately vast. Our prepossessions, inherited from the nineteenth century, forbid us a music designed and accomplished "merely" to please and entertain.

To do both, and little else, seemed yesterday the purpose and plan of Krenek's "Little Symphony." A reviewer, hearing it in New York from Mr. Kleiber last November, found "nothing of special import." Need there be to stir interest and give pleasure, unless the listener is one of those too spiritualized souls who affect to descend from ivory towers into the concert-hall? Another lofty intellect cried away "no ideas." Is light and civilized entertainment so plentiful, in or out of the concert-room, that it may not be agreeably remembered when Krenek provides it through twenty-odd minutes? His orchestra promises amusement—no strings, but would have at will metallic tones and plucked rhythms. He juggles with short-breathed motifs, switches and tosses them about, in his first movement. The game is diverting to follow—when a composer has so quick a hand at modulation, piles rhythm so insistently.

Hindemith-like, from the game to flow of feeling, light, simple, quite unsentimental—the old romantic mood new flavored. Except prejudice, there is not a reason to doubt that the song begun by the clarinet is an honest tune—a tune, moreover, keeping to its simplicity as it expands, without harmonic fat or instrumental cosmetics. The finale is dance-like, metallic sounding, with a tango-like, rhythmic haunting it. By all odds a reflection of our time, as the younger generation in Central Europe sees, hears, thinks, feels and lives. It makes an adept din, but melancholy streaks it. It plays about, but it is restless and less than happy. In short, a title of a piece, but agreeable and by no means empty. And atonality and linear counterpoint? They are a part of our youngsters' idiom. Whether we like them or not, we are gradually accepting them, as we agreed to Debussyan harmonies or Stravinskian rhythms. The error of Krenek, as here exhibited for the first time in Boston, is technical skill for it own sake and the connoisseurs'. It is familiar pitfall for German modernists, Schönberg prompting. Krenek's quick hand and changeable impulses do not always mask it. Fortunately, the youngsters in the house gave him warm welcome.

To the Piano-Concerto of Mozart, which was middle item in the program, it is hardly necessary to return. Most of it is workaday Mozart, needing a transmuting touch and spirit that evaded both Dr. Burgin and Mr. Simonds. Of the deputy-conductor enough has been said. The pianist lacked for the time the discriminating hand, shading here, measuring there, that he has often plied in Boston; let his tone run opaque, left fuzz on his phrases, so spaced his periods that light barely shone through. Nor, had his usual sensibility served him, would he have taken the Andante so slowly—an eighteenth-century Andante to boot, quicker by report than ours. A stodgy Mozart is not easy to bear. Both Mr. Burgin and Mr. Simonds tried too hard. H. T. P.

Boston Symphony Orchestra

Returning from the Beethoven Festival of the Boston Symphony Orchestra held at Washington Dec. 2-6, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky felt that he was entitled to a respite; and not unreasonably, since his labors are seldom interrupted, and since, by report, he devoted special efforts to making successful the celebration at the national capital. Richard Burgin, the concertmaster, took the baton, therefore, for the eighth pair of concerts in Symphony Hall, Boston, the first of which was held on the afternoon of Dec. 12. Mr. Burgin opened his program with a first Boston performance of Ernst Krenek's "Little Symphony," op. 58, continued it with Mozart's A major Piano Concerto (Bruce Simonds, soloist) and closed it with the First Symphony of Sibelius. It is pleasant to record that as vicar he acquitted himself with distinction.

Krenek's "Little Symphony" is to the concert hall what "Jonny Spielt Auf" is to the opera house. Although the music is clothed in symphonic form, it is, like its big brother, a potpourri, with jazz and romance alternating. The composer's program note says: "The dance character of the music was suggested by my use in the score of plucked instruments; two banjos, two mandolins, guitar and harp. These instruments were not employed, however, because of their association with jazz, but because of their appropriateness to the vibrating, rattling, metallic sound which I had conceived for the expression of my music." Which recalls Stravinsky insisting that the music of the "Sacre" came to him first, the "program" afterward.

But we are concerned not with the composer's words, but with his music. There can be no doubt that he knows his way about. His play with tonalities and with free counterpoint is sufficient evidence of that, even if he had not deliberately discarded in this symphony the violas and the cellos, and added to the orchestral family some distant relations from the dance hall—this clinches the argument that he is a man of mark. We must add, however, that he has proved again that jazz does not grow at its most luxurious in European soil, and that a want of significant thematic material is not to be compensated by compositional and orchestral legerdemain. But as the present listener commented nearly two years ago, after hearing "Jonny," "let us not take the matter too seriously. We are dealing merely with a diverting entertainment."

Mr. Simonds, an excellent pianist and a scholarly musician, found himself at home in the classic style of the concerto. If one wished at moments for a more limpid tone or for more exquisite phrasing, one admired at the same time the chaste musicality of this artist. Mr. Simonds' performance was received by the audience with marked cordiality.

Some years ago we gave deep offense to a reader by referring to the Sibelius First as the "Finnish Pathetic." We hope that reader was present at the concert under review. Hearing this performance, brilliant in tone and surcharged with emotion, surely he would withdraw his protest.

L. A. S.

LITTLE AND BIG WORK BY SYMPHONY

Krenek's Banjo Piece and Sibelius' First Played

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

For Dr. Koussevitzky, indisposed, so it is said, as the result of his struggles with an ill-trained chorus at the recent Beethoven Festival in Washington, there can be only sympathy and hope for a speedy recovery. Yet the Symphony concert, led by Richard Burgin, yesterday, was one that for the moment amply satisfied, one indeed that could ill have been spared.

SIBELIUS' FIRST

There was yesterday the Little Symphony of Ernest Krenek of "Jonny Spielt Auf" fame, that as a representative work of a much-talked-of composer deserved a hearing in Symphony Hall. There was the second of Mozart's two piano concertos in A major, delightfully played by Bruce Simmonds and delightfully accompanied by Mr. Burgin and the orchestra. And there was, for fitting climax to an enjoyable afternoon and in a performance that did full justice to the music, a masterpiece from the hand of one of the few truly vital figures among living composers, the First Symphony of Sibelius.

Krenek's Little Symphony, written in May and June of 1928 when the prolific composer of the most celebrated of jazz operas, was still in his 29th year, is symptomatic of the tendency on the part of many of the Central European music-makers to treat their art not seriously but flippantly and perhaps a shade contemptuously.

Banjos and Mandolins

Krenek writes for a small orchestra from which violas and cellos are absent, their places filled by two mandolins, two banjos and a guitar. The first of the three movements is clever, ingenious, original in ideas and in treatment, although the jazz at the end of it seems impertinent and obtrusive, distracting if diverting, amusing yet annoying. The second movement is one of conscious simplicity, not without charm and a personal flavor and distinguished by curious effects in instrumentation.

The Finale, in Tango rhythm, with its liberal use of plucked and pulsatile instruments, aims merely to entertain, and if one be not too highbrow, too jealous of the traditional dignity of symphony concerts, fulfills its mission.

Power and Beauty

But what a rebuke to the fooleries and superficialities of Krenek were the burning sincerities, the passionate utterance, the might and power, the beauty and pathos, of Sibelius' Symphony, written before young men were world-weary and disillusioned. It would be interesting to come back in 50 years and see how the first two symphonies of the Finn have fared in comparison with the more individual but for most of us less forcefully appealing Sixth and Seventh. Incidentally, is it not high time that the Fourth was heard again in Symphony Hall?

Yesterday's audience welcomed this puissant First Symphony gladly and heartily, and applauded until Mr. Burgin bade the players, who throughout the afternoon had given him notable co-operation, rise and bow.

FIFTIETH SEASON, NINETEEN HUNDRED THIRTY AND THIRTY-ONE

Ninth Programme

FRIDAY AFTERNOON, DECEMBER 19, at 2.30 o'clock

SATURDAY EVENING, DECEMBER 20, at 8.15 o'clock

Mozart Symphony in G minor (Koechel No. 550)

- I. Allegro molto.
- II. Andante.
- III. Menuetto; Trio.
- IV. Finale: Allegro assai.

Stravinsky "Symphonie de Psalms," for Orchestra with Chorus

- I. Psalm XXXVIII (Verses 13 and 14).
- II. Psalm XXXIX (Verses 2, 3 and 4).
- III. Psalm CL (Entire).

(Played without pause)

(First performance in America; Composed for the Fiftieth Anniversary of the Boston Symphony Orchestra)

Stravinsky "Symphonie de Psalms" (repeated)

Stravinsky Capriccio for Piano and Orchestra

- I. Presto.
- II. Andante rapsodico.
- III. Allegro capriccioso, ma tempo giusto.

(Played without pause)

Piano Solo: JESÚS MARÍA SANROMÁ

(First Time in America)

Bach Prelude and Fugue in E-flat for Organ
(Arranged for Orchestra by Schönberg)

CECILIA SOCIETY CHORUS (Arthur Fiedler, Conductor)

STEINWAY PIANOS

There will be an intermission after Stravinsky's "Symphonie de Psalms"

A fiftieth anniversary exhibition is now on view in the Huntington Avenue foyer
(first balcony)

LITTLE AND BIG WORK BY SYMPHONY

Krenek's Banjo Piece and Sibelius' First Played

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

For Dr. Koussevitzky, indisposed, so it is said, as the result of his struggles with an ill-trained chorus at the recent Beethoven Festival in Washington, there can be only sympathy and hope for a speedy recovery. Yet the Symphony concert, led by Richard Burgin, yesterday, was one that for the moment amply satisfied, one indeed that could ill have been spared.

SIBELIUS' FIRST

There was yesterday the Little Symphony of Ernest Krenek of "Jonny Spielt Auf" fame, that as a representative work of a much-talked-of composer deserved a hearing in Symphony Hall. There was the second of Mozart's two piano concertos in A major, delightfully played by Bruce Simonds and delightfully accompanied by Mr. Burgin and the orchestra. And there was, for fitting climax to an enjoyable afternoon and in a performance that did full justice to the music, a masterpiece from the hand of one of the few truly vital figures among living composers, the First Symphony of Sibelius.

Krenek's Little Symphony, written in May and June of 1928 when the prolific composer of the most celebrated of jazz operas, was still in his 29th year, is symptomatic of the tendency on the part of many of the Central European music-makers to treat their art not seriously but flippantly and perhaps a shade contemptuously.

Banjos and Mandolins

Krenek writes for a small orchestra from which violas and cellos are absent, their places filled by two mandolins, two banjos and a guitar. The first of the three movements is clever, ingenious, original in ideas and in treatment, although the jazz at the end of it seems impertinent and obtrusive, distracting if diverting, amusing yet annoying. The second movement is one of conscious simplicity, not without charm and a personal flavor and distinguished by curious effects in instrumentation.

The Finale, in Tango rhythm, with its liberal use of plucked and pulsatile instruments, aims merely to entertain, and if one be not too highbrow, too jealous of the traditional dignity of symphony concerts, fulfills its mission.

Power and Beauty

But what a rebuke to the fooleries and superficialities of Krenek were the burning sincerities, the passionate utterance, the might and power, the beauty and pathos, of Sibelius' Symphony, written before young men were world-weary and disillusioned. It would be interesting to come back in 50 years and see how the first two symphonies of the Finn have fared in comparison with the more individual but for most of us less forcefully appealing Sixth and Seventh. Incidentally, is it not high time that the Fourth was heard again in Symphony Hall?

Yesterday's audience welcomed this puissant First Symphony gladly and heartily, and applauded until Mr. Burgin bade the players, who throughout the afternoon had given him notable co-operation, rise and bow.

FIFTIETH SEASON, NINETEEN HUNDRED THIRTY AND THIRTY-ONE

Ninth Programme

FRIDAY AFTERNOON, DECEMBER 19, at 2.30 o'clock

SATURDAY EVENING, DECEMBER 20, at 8.15 o'clock

Mozart Symphony in G minor (Koechel No. 550)
I. Allegro molto.
II. Andante.
III. Menuetto; Trio.
IV. Finale: Allegro assai.

Stravinsky "Symphonie de Psalms," for Orchestra with Chorus
I. Psalm XXXVIII (Verses 13 and 14).
II. Psalm XXXIX (Verses 2, 3 and 4).
III. Psalm CL (Entire).
(Played without pause)
(First performance in America; Composed for the Fiftieth Anniversary of the Boston Symphony Orchestra)

Stravinsky "Symphonie de Psalms" (repeated)

Stravinsky Capriccio for Piano and Orchestra
I. Presto.
II. Andante rapsodico.
III. Allegro capriccioso, ma tempo giusto.
(Played without pause)
Piano Solo: JESÚS MARÍA SANROMÁ
(First Time in America)

Bach Prelude and Fugue in E-flat for Organ
(Arranged for Orchestra by Schönberg)

CECILIA SOCIETY CHORUS (Arthur Fiedler, Conductor)

STEINWAY PIANOS

There will be an intermission after Stravinsky's "Symphonie de Psalms"

A fiftieth anniversary exhibition is now on view in the Huntington Avenue foyer (first balcony)

Stravinsky (Summer, 1930)

Snapshot Taken at Plombières-les-Bains in the Vosges

SYMPHONY CONCERT

Handed By PHILIP HALE 1764 29

The ninth concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra, Dr. Koussevitzky conductor, took place in Symphony hall yesterday afternoon. The program was as follows: Mozart symphony in G minor. Stravinsky, "Symphonie de Psaumes" for orchestra and chorus, composed for the jubilee of the orchestra; Capriccio for piano and orchestra (first time in this country); Bach, prelude and Fugue in E flat major for organ, orchestrated by Arnold Schoenberg. The orchestra was assisted by the Cecilia Society, which had been trained by its conductor, Arthur Fiedler. The pianist was Mr. Sanroma.

It has been said that Stravinsky of late is deeply religious; that he may devote himself to the glorification of God in music. This rumor possibly arose from the fact that he dedicated his "Symphonie de Psaumes" to the orchestra, but composed it, as he states on the title page, "to the glory of God." And so Bruckner intended to dedicate his unfinished ninth symphony to the Lord God Omnipotent. But is this new symphony of Stravinsky the devout, more musical, more poetic, more imaginative than the compositions written in his supposedly pagan state? It surely is a less engrossing work, less interesting musically than the wordly Capriccio played yesterday and produced at Paris last December. Stravinsky should remember that he can show religious devotion in a ballet—even if Apollo is his hero—or in music that fascinates by jazz rhythms or by the suggestion of them. He might say with Sir Thomas Browne: "For even that vulgar and tavern music, which makes one man merry, another mad, strikes in me a deep fit of devotion, and a profound contemplation of the first composer."

Stravinsky went to the Psalms for inspiration, choosing the sonorous text of the Vulgate Verses of the 39th (the number in the King James version). Verses that are a prayer, an entreaty; from the 40th in which the Psalmist rejoices that his cry was heard, that he was taken from the horrible pit and the miry clay; and the 150th in which the people are urged, and all things that have breath, to praise the Lord with the sound of all manner of instruments. His choice of instruments for these psalms is peculiar: no violins, no violas; but five flutes, many other wind instruments, a harp. He called for two pianos. Although the psalmist wished organs and high sounding cymbals to give praise, Stravinsky would not be the man to be so literal in his orchestration.

It is to be regretted that the repetition of this symphony did not take place as first announced, for much that was strange, almost foreign to the text might then have seemed pertinently eloquent. Schoenberg's arrangement of Bach's organ prelude and figure might better have been omitted. Without the repetition the concert was too long as it was. The orchestral interludes are the most baffling portions of the symphony at the first hearing. They seem to be purposeless; hardly designed to put one in the mood for the following text; not a musical commentary on what has preceded. Was it the composer's endeavor to be Hebraic in his music? Hebraic in spirit, after the manner of Ernest Bloch—but not too reminiscent of the synagogue? The ending of the first psalm is indeed beautiful, originally beautiful; so is the treatment of the Alleluia later. And Stravinsky escaped the temptation of making the Psalm of Jubilation one prolonged shout; there is a most effective passage in it to be sung in a subdued manner, as by worshippers in awe of the majesty of the Lord. The symphony is of such importance that it demands a second hearing, one not too long deferred.

The Capriccio is rightly named; the capriciousness is enchanting. Here is an answer, if one were needed, to the charge that Stravinsky is not a melodist when he wishes; that he can write only patterns and rhythmic experiments; that his music is only cerebral. In this Capriccio he may at times entertain the spirit of the music hall, but there is no vulgarity; his tunes are not over-ripe. They incite spiritual gaiety, not a tapping of heels on the floor. His gaiety flags a little for a moment in the second section, but even then the diabolically clever use of orchestral instruments while the piano maintains a pleasingly monotonous figure is in itself a joy. Mr. Sanroma played the piano with a brilliance that was musical, never metallic; with the appropriate capriciousness of mood. Dr. Koussevitzky and the orchestra played as if inspired. And so yesterday the worldly Stravinsky triumphed as far as the audience was concerned over Stravinsky the devout.

There was an exquisite performance of Mozart's symphony, music and a performance of pure beauty. No detail was neglected; no one was unduly emphasized. Never have we heard, for example, so charming an interpretation of the Trio in the Minuet.

Mr. Leopold Stokowski, who has tinkered some of Bach's compositions for orchestral use, explained his reasons a few days ago: "Bach was just a sleepy old man, but a wonderful musician, of course. The music appeals to me for what can be done with it. What matters is the result." No doubt Mr. Stokowski is pleased with the result of his tinkering. Herr Schoenberg has not commented on Bach's sleepiness; he looked on the organ piece as affording a study in orchestration. When Mr. Toscanini conducted Respighi's transcription of Bach's Passacaglia last week in New York Mr. William J. Henderson remarked: "Maybe it is commendable to dress Bach's organ music for orchestration lest it remain unheard by the multitude, but when listening to these metamorphoses this music lover cannot help remembering the line: 'I sometimes think 'twere better had I left the Lord alone.'"

The concert will be repeated tonight. Next week Lourie's "Sonate Liturgique" (with alto voices) and Mahler's "Song of the Earth," symphony for tenor (Mr. Crooks), contralto (Mme. Matzenauer) and orchestra.

SYMPHONY HAS DAY OF STRAVINSKY

'Symphony of Psalms' and "Capriccio" Performed

Post — Dec. 20, 1930

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

Dr. Koussevitzky has recovered from his recent indisposition and, to judge by his conducting of yesterday afternoon, is none the worse and is, perhaps, even the fresher for his enforced vacation. Yesterday's was, indeed, in many ways a most diverting Symphony concert, thanks not a little to Mr. Igor Stravinsky's new and engaging custom of reminding us of composers more engrossing or entertaining than himself.

TWO STRAVINSKY NOVELTIES

There were two novelties by the Gallicized Russian, who is still the best "copy" among living composers: a "Symphony of Psalms" for orchestra and chorus, in which the Cecilia Society assisted, and a capriccio for piano and orchestra, the solo part of which fell to the exceedingly capable hands of Jesus Maria Sanroma.

The symphony is one of the many scores composed in honor of the 50th anniversary of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and had it been played last week, as originally planned, the performance in Symphony Hall would have been a world premiere. Instead the first performance took place at Brussels last Saturday; but at least yesterday's was the first performance in this country, as was that of the capriccio.

Reseats the Players

As texts for the choral portion of his symphony Stravinsky chose two verses from the 38th psalm, three from the 39th and the whole of the 40th. He scored his orchestral parts for wind and percussion instruments, two pianos, harp, cellos and basses. This made necessary a reseating of the orchestra and Dr. Koussevitzky bade flutes, oboes and bassoons occupy the first chairs of the violins and placed the four horns where violas usually sit. Accordingly some in the audience had their first good look at a bassoon and must needs inquire of their musically more erudite neighbors just what those funny instruments were.

At the outset Stravinsky's so-called symphony arrested and gripped the listener, creating the impression that the composer had regained his old power of incisive utterance. There was a semi-barbaric wildness in the opening measures that recalled the psalms of Bloch and Honegger's "King David," although Stravinsky here speaks with his own voice.

Exactly Like "Tosca"

After that the music languished; the choral writing proved ungrateful and ineffective; there was little of the fervor, the elevation of mood that the words so plainly suggested.

Only when there was a definite and decided rhythm—and rhythm is one thing of which the present-day Stravinsky is still master—did the music regain its hold upon the hearer, until the end of the third psalm was reached and here Stravinsky has either recalled the finale of the first act of "Tosca" or miraculously hit upon the same idea. Whichever it was, it was a case of Puccini to the rescue. Like the beginning, the end of the symphony proved effective.

Seemingly the Cecilia chorus performed well its difficult and generally unrewarding task and there was much of applause when Dr. Koussevitzky brought forward Arthur Fiedler, who had trained the singers in this exacting music.

Bound to Be Popular

The new Capriccio, and in this it would seem to differ from the symphony, is bound to be popular with audiences. Although somewhat spotty and disjointed, perhaps in deference to its title, it is effectively written for the solo instrument and it is full of engaging if undistinguished and reminiscent and at times somewhat inexpensive tunes. There is suggestion in the first movement of the rhetorical and showy style of Weber and Chopin, though the second hark back to the early 18th century. There is more that is Weberish and Chopinesque in the finale, together with a good deal that misses neither vulgarity nor triviality, that recalls the type of music associated with cafe orchestras. The audience liked the Capriccio; and that one cynic could dub the piece "Ten Minutes with Old Friends" merely suggested a reason for its popularity. Again there was applause that was redoubled when Dr. Koussevitzky escorted the young pianist to the podium and affectionately patted him on the shoulder.

Mozart's Symphony in G minor, in exquisite performance, began the concert and Schoenberg's elaborate orchestration of Bach's E-flat major organ Prelude and Fugue brought it to a sonorous close.

NEW STRAVINSKY AT SYMPHONY CONCERT

Two new works by Stravinsky were performed for the first time in America at yesterday's Symphony concert. One of them, entitled "Symphonie de Psalms," for orchestra and chorus, is dedicated "To the Glory of God, and to the Boston Symphony Orchestra, on the occasion of its 50th anniversary."

The postponement of the first performances here, caused by Dr. Koussevitzky's illness, unexpectedly gave the "world premiere" to Brussels, where a performance was scheduled for Dec. 13. The other is a Capriccio for piano and orchestra, first performed at Paris Dec. 6, 1929.

A chorus from the Cecilia Society, trained by Arthur Fiedler, assisted in the "Symphonie de Psalms." The pianist in the Capriccio was Jesus M. Sanroma. The concert began with Mozart's G-minor Symphony and ended with Bach's organ prelude and fugue in E flat arranged by Schoenberg.

Dr. Koussevitzky at the last moment decided not to repeat the "Symphonie de Psalms" on this week's programs. It will be performed again later in the season instead of twice at each of the same pair of concerts, as first planned.

The "Symphonie de Psalms" is a setting for chorus and orchestra of verses from the 38th, 39th and the entire 150th Psalm, in the Latin text of the Vulgate. There are three movements. "Hear my prayer, O Lord, and give ear unto my cry" is the first line of the first of the three texts. "I waited patiently for the Lord, and He inclined unto me, and heard my cry," begins the second. "Praise ye the Lord, praise God in His sanctuary," exults the last.

Stravinsky has scored his music for an original grouping of instruments. He does not use violins or violas or clarinets. There are five flutes, four oboes, other wind and brass instruments, harp, two pianos, cellos and double basses.

This work is not a symphony in the sense of the term current since the time of Haydn. Stravinsky has remembered that in the 18th century "Symphonie," or more commonly "Sinfonia," was used for almost any work in one or more connected movements, regardless of formal structure.

One's impression at a first hearing is that the "Symphonie de Psalms" is a masterpiece, and a masterpiece in a style somewhat different from anything Stravinsky has hitherto given us. Here he conceals rather than obtrudes the rhythmic complexities and subtleties that pervade so much of his work. Here, more markedly than ever before, he is able to express restrained emotion by musical means within the reach only of a master technician who makes his own rules.

One feared, looking over the text beforehand, that the setting of the 150th psalm, to which the rest of the work leads up, would prove a vulgar shout of triumph like some of the choruses in Gounod's oratorios, and the perorations of minor 19th century symphonic poems. On the contrary, the joy is mystical exultation, not pompous triumph, and there is no single big climax, but a wave-like succession of small climaxes. The end is quiet, but with no sensational pianissimo effect.

The real test of a new work is whether it stirs one's emotions. The "Symphonie de Psaumes" made a profound impression. Its originality is too great for it to have instant popular appeal. But one looks forward to a day when audiences will give it applause more unanimous than yesterday's applause was.

The Capriccio is a brilliantly written and thoroughly ingratiating piece of light music, also very ingeniously scored for orchestra. Its themes, rather surprisingly, are in the vein of Tchaikovsky's "Nutcracker" suite, or of the ballet music of Delibes. But the vivacity, the rhythmic ingenuities, the harmonic and contrapuntal effects display the fertility and the modernity of Stravinsky's talent.

One felt that the music ought to be banal, yet, somehow, it wasn't. The audience was enthusiastic over the Capriccio, recalling Mr. Sanroma and Dr. Koussevitzky again and again. Mr. Sanroma had given a remarkably brilliant performance of the very exacting solo part, and quite deserved to be patted on the head for it publicly, as he was by the conductor.

Dr. Koussevitzky and the performers acquitted themselves well in the Stravinsky. The Bach was eloquently played. In the Mozart symphony the tempo of the first movement was not, as it so often is, unduly rapid. On the whole, this was as good a reading of Mozart as Dr. Koussevitzky has yet offered here, and an improvement over some he has given.

For next week Mahler's "Lied von der Erde" and a new "Sonate Liturgique" by Lourie fill the announced program. Globe Dec. 20, 1920 P. R.

Symphonic Day Of Stravinsky Doubly Tested

The "Symphony of Psalms" and the Caprice in First American Hearings

PARIS would have called yesterday's Symphony Concert a "Grand Gala Stravinsky." . . . Two pieces by the illustrious composer, each played for the first time in America; one, a "Symphony of Psalms," written for the Boston Orchestra to mark other, a "Caprice piano-Solo," of no less standing. A Cecelia, schooled in exacting music, was that paragon Mr. Sanroma. Only one. But why exclaim? The armth of Nice for Boston at mid-December made amends. Dr. Koussevitzky for the first time in a orchestra rose to greet the recipient was the end of the Capriccio. Pianist were twice Mr. Sanroma upon patting his head patted the house clapped. Half an hour before, "Psalms" had received Mozart could win for minor. Fifteen minutes Organ Prelude and Schöenberg, also behind. . . . Decided.

entertain the matins like incidental passey, a variation of of "Musical Chairs" conspicuously and tate of Symphony only employs a single the "Symphony of flutes or violas, ask-boes and such-like have it seated in beside the conductor arrayed flutes—Mr. in's chair; to the with Mr. Boettcher. The violoncellos y; while between two pianos—one the other by Mr. the Cecilian choir. at off with rather confusion. Even full orchestra ere were a few this time Stravinsky in sensi- d, and assiduity. . . . Decided.

pervasively and "Symphony of has achieved which most creafold, the emotion now contains atmost clarity, e containing plete and per- the feeling.

The conveying means and procedures fully accomplish the purpose. To neither mind nor ear do they interpose or overcloud. They do not hinder or dilute. In other words, Stravinsky has won a goal of the expressive arts—the exact correspondence of conception and conveyance. Throughout the "Symphony of Psalms," there is the thought, the mood, the emotion, in instant, exact, entire impact upon the audience. The thing has become the sound.

Second, this "Symphony of Psalms" is the work of a truly religious man, receiving the faith to the saints delivered, believing himself a child of God, contrite before his Maker; yea, smitten; yet up-standing to praise Him. Composers have been drawn to the offices and the hymns of the church, receiving from them impulses to music and to music dramatized. The high Roman mass, the mass of Requiem, with its visions of the Judgment and of Paradise, have been especial temptation. Pages of Scripture and pious poetries, so long as they be sufficiently graphic or mystical, have lured others.

Stravinsky is not of these. His "Symphony of Psalms" is born of a religious faith, deep-seated, devoutly held, honestly proclaimed. It is not the faith of Beethoven, the mystic faith of Franck, the dogmatic and hateful faith of d' Indy; still less the simple and devoted faith that possessed Bach in his churchly music and made him poet. Stravinsky's faith is grave, sombre, austere; it is spare and sinewy; by the evidence of the "Symphony of Psalms," fatalism tinges it, quasi-Russian or quasi-oriental, as the hearer chooses. But beyond doubting, it is the faith of a religious man.

In the "Rite of Spring," one of the Stravinskian summits, the composer wrought music of a primitive, pagan world. That world was embedded in darkness and haunted by dreads. It pushed away the darkness with the rites of tribal ceremony, shining before the high gods. The gods drew near and sacrifice abated fear. The folk looked around and sounded themselves. And it was spring over the land and the waters; in their hearts as well. "Edipus Rex" is another Stravinskian summit. It matters little or nothing whether in it the composer harked back to Handel or would cultivate a neo-classicism. From himself, with the promptings of fate and desolation, he engendered a music of rare economy and precision, austerity and power. The "Symphony of Psalms" may or may not prove a third Stravinskian summit. Time the measurer does not ply his rule at a reviewer's writing table a few hours after the birth of a music. Yet it is within belief that in the er, first the idiom and the face of the "Symphony of Psalms." The is persistently spare, sinewy, With equal persistence, it is cal and precise. Nothing seems to the ear, even at first hearing, evades the eye as it traverses es. One may not add or subtract set in or strike out an inflection, timbre in the orchestra, one perceiving the faith to the saints delivered, for the chorus, without distorting himself a child of God, contrite before his Maker; yea, smitten; yet up-standing to praise Him. Composers have been drawn to the offices and the hymns of the church, receiving from them impulses to music and to music dramatized. Out of polytonality the dissonant fugue development in the second It is strict. Archaisms, especially the choral parts, occur and recur chaismis of primitive directness terity rather than of historical or imagination. If the motifs, religious faith, deep-seated, devoutly held, of the liturgy of the Greek honestly proclaimed. It is not the faith of Beethoven, the mystic faith of Franck, the dogmatic and hateful faith of d' Indy; still less the simple and devoted faith that possessed Bach in his churchly music and made him poet. Stravinsky's faith is grave, sombre, austere; it is spare and sinewy; by the evidence of the "Symphony of Psalms," fatalism tinges it, quasi-Russian or quasi-oriental, as the hearer chooses. But beyond doubting, it is the faith of a religious man.

women—the tribe, if the hearer by the archaisms and oriental-ence the extent and importance choral part. Being massed ex-Stravinsky would have it as im-as may be. Therefore the sug-on the title page of children's in impossible notion with so ex-music.

first division entreats the Lord ys in submission; rises in sup-waters; in their hearts as well. The music is persistently som-when it sharpens in pang cr

The listener thinks back to the whether in it the composer harked back to Handel or would cultivate a neo-classicism. From himself, with the prompting of fate and desolation, he engendered a music of rare economy and precision, austerity and power. The "Symphony of Psalms" may or may not prove a third Stravinskian summit. Time the measurer does not ply his rule at a reviewer's writing table a few hours after the birth of a music. Yet it is within belief that in the

The real test of a new work whether it stirs one's emotions. "Symphonie de Psaumes" made a profound impression. Its origin is too great for it to have in popular appeal. But one looks forward to a day when audiences give it applause more unanimous than yesterday's applause was.

The Capriccio is a brilliantly written and thoroughly ingratiating piece of light music, also very ingeniously scored for orchestra. Its themes, rather surprisingly, are in the style of Tchaikovsky's "Nutcracker" or of the ballet music of Delibes. The vivacity, the rhythmic ingenuity, the harmonic and contrapuntal display the fertility and the modicum of Stravinsky's talent.

One felt that the music ought to be banal, yet, somehow, it wasn't. The audience was enthusiastic over the Capriccio, recalling Mr. Sanromá, Dr. Koussevitzky again and again. Sanromá had given a remarkably brilliant performance of the very interesting solo part, and quite deservedly patted on the head for it public he was by the conductor.

Dr. Koussevitzky and the performers acquitted themselves well in the symphony. The Bach was eloquently played. In the Mozart symphony tempo of the first movement was as it so often is, unduly rapid. The whole, this was as good a rendering of Mozart as Dr. Koussevitzky has ever offered here, and an improvement on some he has given.

For next week Mahler's "Lied der Erde" and a new "Sonata gigue" by Lourié fill the announced program. Globe Dec. 20, 1920

Symphonic Da Of Stravinsk Doubly Tes

The "Symphony of Psalms" and the Caprice in Fire
American Hearings

PARIS would have called today's Symphony Concert a Gala Stravinsky. . . . Pieces by the illustrious composer, each played for the first time in America; one, a "Symphony of Psalms" written for the Boston Orchestra its fiftieth year; the other, a "Caprice for Orchestra, with Piano-Solo," of no more than twelve months' standing. A mixed choir from The Cecilia, schooled by Arthur Fiedler in an exacting music, assisted. The pianist was that paragon of young modernists, Mr. Sanromá. Only Igor himself was lacking. But why exchange the winter warmth of Nice for the winter cold of Boston at mid-December? Circumstance made amends. Recovered from illness, Dr. Koussevitzky conducted publicly for the first time in a fortnight. The orchestra rose to greet him; the audience prolonged the usual welcome. Plainly the recipient was touched. When, at the end of the Capriccio, conductor and pianist were twice recalled and he led Mr. Sanromá upon his own platform, patting his head paternally the while, the house clapped them to the roof. Half an hour before, the "Symphony of Psalms" had received more plaudits than Mozart could win for his Symphony in G minor. Fifteen minutes later, Bach's Organ Prelude and Fugue in E-flat, via Schönberg, also lagged appreciably behind. . . . Decidedly a Stravinskian day.

Nor was this all to entertain the matinee audience, which likes incidental pastimes. Within memory, a variation of the old parlor game of "Musical Chairs" has not been played so conspicuously and amusingly on the stage of Symphony Hall. Stravinsky not only employs a singular orchestra in the "Symphony of Psalms," using no violins or violas, asking five flutes, four oboes and such-like luxuries; he would also have it seated in prescribed fashion. Beside the conductor to the left were the arrayed flutes—Mr. Laurent in Mr. Burgin's chair; to the right the four horns, with Mr. Boettcher in the seat of honor. The violoncellos faced Dr. Koussevitzky; while between were squeezed the two pianos—one played by Mr. Sanromá, the other by Mr. Fiedler. At the back the Cecilian choir. All came on and all went off with rather less than the expected confusion. Even for the Capriccio, with full orchestra around the pianist, there were a few changes of position. By this time Stravinsky equals Strauss or Ravel in sensibility to orchestral sound, and assiduity with orchestral details. . . . Decidedly an entertaining afternoon.

Two impressions rose pervasively and unmistakably from the "Symphony of Psalms." In it Stravinsky has achieved that final mastery for which most creative artists strive and to which few attain. The idea he would unfold, the emotion he would release, he can now convey to hearers with the utmost clarity, precision, intensity. The containing form seems the mold, complete and perfect, for the thought and the feeling.

The conveying means and procedures fully accomplish the purpose. To neither mind nor ear do they interpose or overcloud. They do not hinder or dilute. In other words, Stravinsky has won a goal of the expressive arts—the exact correspondence of conception and conveyance. Throughout the "Symphony of Psalms," there is the thought, the mood, the emotion, in instant, exact, entire impact upon the audience. The thing has become the sound.

Second, this "Symphony of Psalms" is the work of a truly religious man, receiving the faith to the saints delivered, believing himself a child of God, contrite before his Maker; yea, smitten; yet up-standing to praise Him. Composers have been drawn to the offices and the hymns of the church, receiving from them impulses to music and to music dramatized. The high Roman mass, the mass of Requiem, with its visions of the Judgment and of Paradise, have been especially tempting. Pages of Scripture and pious poetries, so long as they be sufficiently graphic or mystical, have lured others. Stravinsky is not of these. His "Symphony of Psalms" is born of a religious faith, deep-seated, devoutly held, honestly proclaimed. It is not the music of Beethoven, the mystic faith of Franck, the dogmatic and hateful faith of d'Indy; still less the simple and devoted faith that possessed Bach in his churchly music and made him poet. Stravinsky's faith is grave, sombre, austere; it is spare and sinewy; by the evidence of the "Symphony of Psalms," fatalism tinges it, quasi-Russian or quasi-oriental, as the hearer chooses. But beyond of a single religious spirit. Yet doubting, it is the faith of a religious man.

In the "Rite of Spring," one of the Stravinskian summits, the composer wrought music of a primitive, pagan world. That world was embedded in darkness and haunted by dreads. It was pushed away the darkness with the rites of tribal ceremony, shining before the high gods. The gods drew near and sacrifice abated fear. The folk looked around and sounded themselves. And lo, it was spring over the land and the waters; in their hearts as well. . . . "Edipus Rex" is another Stravinskian summit. It matters little or nothing whether in it the composer harked back to Handel or would cultivate a neo-classicism. From himself, with the ancient tragedy of fate and desolation prompting, he engendered a music of rare economy and precision, austerity and power. The "Symphony of Psalms" may or may not prove a third Stravinskian summit. Time the measurer does not ply his rule at a reviewer's writing table a few hours after the birth of a music. Yet it is within belief that in the

by, the Stravinsky of "The Rite" Stravinsky of "Edipus" are to climbing the ridge.

er, first the idiom and the face of the "Symphony of Psalms." The is persistently spare, sinewy, With equal persistence, it is cal and precise. Nothing seems to the ear, even at first hearing, evades the eye as it traverses es. One may not add or subtract set in or strike out an inflection, timbre in the orchestra, one probing the faith to the saints delivered, for the chorus, without distortion, both close-knit and The idiom is unchangeably intal, yet incessantly fluid. There been drawn to the offices and the hymns hythm—in the persistent play of of the church, receiving from them im-in motion; but little harmonic pulses to music and to music dramatized. Out of polytonality the dissonant, sharp-edged or hollow. The high Roman mass, the mass of Requiem, with its visions of the Judgment and of Paradise, have been especially tempting. Pages of Scripture and pious the choral parts, occur and recur poetries, so long as they be sufficiently graphic or mystical, have lured others. Stravinsky is not of these. His "Symphony of Psalms" is born of a religious faith, deep-seated, devoutly held, honestly proclaimed. It is not the music of Beethoven, the mystic faith of Franck, the dogmatic and hateful faith of d'Indy; still less the simple and devoted faith that possessed Bach in his churchly music and made him poet. Stravinsky's faith is grave, sombre, austere; it is spare and sinewy; by the evidence of the "Symphony of Psalms," fatalism tinges it, quasi-Russian or quasi-oriental, as the hearer chooses. But beyond of a single religious spirit. Yet doubting, it is the faith of a religious man.

the thought conceived, ion released. They are the exas the hearer chooses. But beyond of a single religious spirit. Yet doubting, it is the faith of a religious man.

the minds and hearts of massed women—the tribe, if the hearer by the archaisms and orientalismence the extent and importance of the liturgy of the Greek choral part. Being massed ex-Stravinsky would have it as im- as may be. Therefore the suggestion on the title page of children's in impossible notion with so ex-music.

first division entreats the Lord vs in submission; rises in sup- The music is persistently som- when it sharpens in pang or The listener thinks back to the Second Part of the "Edipus Rex"; finds here in degree, twenty and expressed in another idiom, an-ian counterpart. . . . Through- the second division waits tion—a fugue penetrated with a spirit. There is suspensive or- interlude; then gathering, up-sonorities. The Lord God hath ew song" into the minds and men. . . . The third division The orchestra begins in lum-

The real test of a new work whether it stirs one's emotions. "Symphonie de Psaumes" made a profound impression. Its originality is too great for it to have in popular appeal. But one looks forward to a day when audiences give it applause more unanimous yesterday's applause was.

The Capriccio is a brilliantly written and thoroughly ingratiating piece of light music, also very ingeniously scored for orchestra. Its rather surprisingly, are in the style of Tchaikovsky's "Nutteracker" or of the ballet music of Debussy, the vivacity, the rhythmic ingenuity, the harmonic and contrapuntal display the fertility and the mod of Stravinsky's talent.

One felt that the music ought to be banal, yet, somehow, it wasn't. The audience was enthusiastic over Capriccio, recalling Mr. Sanroma Dr. Koussevitzky again and again. Sanroma had given a remarkably brilliant performance of the very interesting solo part, and quite deservedly patted on the head for it public he was by the conductor.

Dr. Koussevitzky and the performance acquitted themselves well in the Stravinsky. The Bach was eloquently played. In the Mozart symphony tempo of the first movement was as it so often is, unduly rapid. The whole, this was as good a rendering of Mozart as Dr. Koussevitzky has offered here, and an improvement on some he has given.

For next week Mahler's "Liebes Erde" and a new "Sonate gigue" by Lourié fill the announced program. Gloucester Dec. 20, 1930

Symphonic Da Of Stravinsk Doubly Tes

The "Symphony of Psalms" and the Caprice in Fire
American Hearings

PARIS would have called today's Symphony Concert a Gala Stravinsky. . . . Pieces by the illustrious composer, each played for the first time in America; one, a "Symphony of Psalms" written for the Boston Orchestra

its fiftieth year; the other, a "Caprice for Orchestra, with Piano-Solo," of no more than twelve months' standing. A mixed choir from The Cecilia, schooled by Arthur Fiedler in an exacting music, assisted. The pianist was that paragon of young modernists, Mr. Sanroma. Only Igor himself was lacking. But why exchange the winter warmth of Nice for the winter cold of Boston at mid-December? Circumstance made amends. Recovered from illness, Dr. Koussevitzky conducted publicly for the first time in a fortnight. The orchestra rose to greet him; the audience prolonged the usual welcome. Plainly the recipient was touched. When, at the end of the Capriccio, conductor and pianist were twice recalled and he led Mr. Sanroma upon his own platform, patting his head paternally the while, the house clapped them to the roof. Half an hour before, the "Symphony of Psalms" had received more plaudits than Mozart could win for his Symphony in G minor. Fifteen minutes later, Bach's Organ Prelude and Fugue in E-flat, via Schönberg, also lagged appreciably behind. . . . Decidedly a Stravinskian day.

Nor was this all to entertain the matinee audience, which likes incidental pastimes. Within memory, a variation of the old parlor game of "Musical Chairs" has not been played so conspicuously and amusingly on the stage of Symphony Hall. Stravinsky not only employs a singular orchestra in the "Symphony of Psalms," using no violins or violas, asking five flutes, four oboes and such-like luxuries; he would also have it seated in prescribed fashion. Beside the conductor to the left were the arrayed flutes—Mr. Laurent in Mr. Burgin's chair; to the right the four horns, with Mr. Boettcher in the seat of honor. The violoncellos faced Dr. Koussevitzky; while between were squeezed the two pianos—one played by Mr. Sanroma, the other by Mr. Fiedler. At the back the Cecilian choir. All came on and all went off with rather less than the expected confusion. Even for the Capriccio, with full orchestra around the pianist, there were a few changes of position. By this time Stravinsky equals Strauss or Ravel in sensibility to orchestral sound, and assiduity with orchestral details. . . . Decidedly an entertaining afternoon.

Two impressions rose pervasively and unmistakably from the "Symphony of Psalms." In it Stravinsky has achieved that final mastery for which most creative artists strive and to which few attain. The idea he would unfold, the emotion he would release, he can now convey to hearers with the utmost clarity, precision, intensity. The containing form seems the mold, complete and perfect, for the thought and the feeling.

The conveying meant fully accomplish the purpose of the mind nor ear do they cloud. They do not lose other words, Stravinsky of the expressive and response of concision. Throughout "Psalms," there is the impact upon the audience has become the sound. Second, this "Symphony" the work of a truly believing himself a before his Maker; yet standing to praise Him been drawn to the of the church, receiving pulses to music and The high Roman Requiem, with its violent and of Paradise temptation. Pages of poetries, so long as graphic or mystical Stravinsky is religious faith, deeply honestly proclaimed faith of Beethoven of Franck, the faith of d'Indy; devoted faith that churchly music and vinsky's faith is it is spare and of the "Symphony" tinges it, quasi-religious as the hearer doubting, it is a man.

In the "Rite of Spring" Stravinskian wrought music world. That darkness and pushed away the of tribal ceremony high gods. The rifice abated around and sou it was spring waters; in the "Oedipus Rex" summit. It whether in it to Handel or classicism. F. cient tragedy prompting, rare economy and power.

may or may vinskian sur does not play ing table a music. Yet 142100

96200 Un
8300 Un
3100 Un
56700 Un
400 Un
1500 Un
600 Un
100 Un
400 Un
2700 Un
1600 Un
8400 US
5300 US
400 US
3000 US
1600 US
1000 US
14700 US
1200 US
4300 US
1600 US
9000 US
4600 US
200 US
100 US
400 US
100 US
400 Un
100 Un
9700 Un
300 Un
1200 Utah
500 Utah
100 Utah
100 Utah
300 Utah
3500 Utah
17400 Utah
4400 Utah
2000 Utah
6900 Utah

Symphony, the Stravinsky of "The Rite" and the Stravinsky of "Oedipus" are together climbing the ridge.

Consider, first the idiom and the nature of the "Symphony of Psalms." The music is persistently spare, sinewy, stripped. With equal persistence, it is economical and precise. Nothing seems obscure to the ear, even at first hearing. Nothing evades the eye as it traverses the staves. One may not add or subtract a note, set in or strike out an inflection, alter one timbre in the orchestra, one progression for the chorus, without distorting a musical texture, both close-knit and clear-knit. The idiom is unchangeably contrapuntal, yet incessantly fluid. There is line, rhythm—in the persistent play of figures in motion; but little harmonic color. Out of polytonality the dissonances are born, sharp-edged or hollow. There is fugal development in the second division. It is strict. Archaisms, especially in the choral parts, occur and recur—the archaisms of primitive directness and austerity rather than of historical or atavistic imagination. If the motifs, concise and bare almost to curtness, are suggestive of the liturgy of the Greek Church, then has that ritual been touched by the orientalisms to which early Russia was near and absorbent. Throughout there is full resource and complete mastery of orchestral and choral sonorities. Stravinsky composes as directly for an orchestra individualized, for a chorus massed, as did Strauss in prime.

Consider now the thought conceived, the emotion released. They are the expression of a single religious spirit. Yet it is fain to imagine and to compass them, as from the minds and hearts of massed men and women—the tribe, if the hearer sets store by the archaisms and orientalisms. Hence the extent and importance of the choral part. Being massed expression, Stravinsky would have it as impersonal as may be. Therefore the suggestion on the title page of children's voices—an impossible notion with so exacting a music.

The first division entreats the Lord God; bows in submission; rises in supplication. The music is persistently sombre, save when it sharpens in pang or petition. The listener thinks back to the Introduction to the Second Part of the pagan "Rite"; finds here in degree, twenty years on and expressed in another idiom, its Christian counterpart. . . . Through the beginning, the second division waits in contrition—a fugue penetrated with a state of spirit. There is suspensive orchestral interlude; then gathering, upswelling sonorities. The Lord God hath put "a new song" into the minds and hearts of men. . . . The third division sings it. The orchestra begins in luminous and quasi-mystical evocation. Stravinsky touches beauty. The choral sonorities enter and upswell—"Praise ye the Lord in his sanctuary." Stravinsky releases power. "Praise Him with the psalter and the harp . . . with the timbrel and the dance." The pulse of the music quickens; the timbres of orchestra and voices brighten; but the austerity does not much or long relax. The sequence of praise mounts, clanging deeper and higher; hushes itself with awe; poises at climax, the flight completed; sinks and stills.

Dec. 13,

The stark and sinewy musical texture has not altered; nor the directness, gravity, austerity, of thought, emotion and speech. Here sounds religious faith, stripped of upholsteries and gauds, of sentiment, almost of mystery. Yet of stark strength and darksome splendor when its voice, in contrition, in entreaty or in praise, ascends to the Lord who is God. Stravinsky reads in the Old Testament, not the New. Proclaiming an individual faith, the old tribal instinct seizes and possesses him. In this "Symphony of Psalms," hearers may suspect another height, possibly another summit. At the least, Stravinsky is again his intrinsic self.

Upon the Caprice, commentators, like the composer, have loosed the reins of fancy. One Parisian reviewer, quoted recently in these columns, imagined into it a fantastic, many-sided tale of Harlequin, life, nature. Another, reprinted in the program-book, finds it "touched with mystery," swarming "with phantoms and ghosts." Not to be behindhand, Stravinsky himself intimates that his cherished Chaikovsky was "the point of departure," apparent in "melodic material" and "certain orchestral effects." It is a pity that he did not mark them in the score. At first test, they are not apparent to the hearing ear. If there must be "a point of departure," some might suspect it to lie in a Lisztian neighborhood, with Chopin—for moments in the piano-part—not too far away. Believably, by the evidence of yesterday's performance, the Caprice is self-contained, self-sufficient, essentially Stravinskian.

Concerto-like, in the displayful day before the graver German masters would have the form symphonic, it consists of a piano and an orchestral part, as often interlaced as contrasted. (Thereby, the Caprice leans upon the Russian, even the Chaikovskian, model.) The piano-part—presumably the "piano-solo" of one more

1% - virtuoso stuff, exact.
4 - immediate impres-
35% - 5% or the conviction,
3% + Stravinsky counts the 1% - of percussion. It
4 - ornament. It may
3 - lay about in scales,
19 - 1% sort of arabesque.
1% - 1% But it shall not sing
1% - 1% the passing moment.
1% - change witty dialogue
8% + thrum at a listless
2% - hestra bids it be still;
3% - 1% zz and then forget it;
1% - 1% any, any vagary that 1% - 1% aposer prompting.
1% - 1% orchestral part runs a 8 - 1% ard in good Stravin-
3% - 1% an prefer line rather 23 - 1% s Stravinskian mode.
13 + 1% stently contrapuntal;
16 - 1% ss moments in which 9% - 1% to harmonic color.
1% - 1% adept and tirelessly
2% - 1% ined in a Caprice, it
3 - 1% nitting the strings to 34% - 5% n the ancient "con-
5 - 1% using the wind choir
2 - 1% flavors. The mood's angeful as the styles ng melancholy, petu-97% - 1% . dashes of cynicism;
1% - 1% always an immense
1-16 - 1% ise exhilaration. It 12% - 1% work of many days.
1% - 1% as'ic, masterful, irre-
5% - 1% n—Stravinsky at his 4 - 3 - seldom shadowed.
65 - 5 - of both Symphony
7% + 5% contrasted tours de 18 - 1% and conductor. The 1 - 1% he difficult idiom of 6% - 1% it sound lean and 3% - 1% istere; passed readily
1 - 1% azzle of the Caprice;
2 - 3 - on each several man
3% - 1% fortunes depended.
17 - 2 - this review has at-32% - 1 - y emanated no less 5% - 1% ky. He worked in 5 - 1% mpathy. He accom-
9% - 1% on, ardor and devo-
2% + 1% horus was weak in 42% - 4% depth and surge of 46 - 3% usual it served.
1% - 1% r is teaching it the 1% + 1% ne will sing out.
6% - 2% ination as well as 3 - 1% with every mod-45 - 9 - he concert of this 4 - 1 - iphony and Schön-
30% - 2% e their turn.
58 - 1% H. T. P.
1% - 1%

Stravinsky Returns to Himself

By L. A. SLOPER

WE HAVE complained so often of the unsatisfactory musical behavior of Igor Stravinsky that it was pleasant on the afternoon of Dec. 19 to find him showing signs of grace. The Boston Symphony Orchestra then performed in Symphony Hall, Boston, for the first time in America, two of the two latest compositions by the most conspicuous of the musical modernists: the Capriccio for piano and orchestra, which was heard in Paris a year ago, and the "Symphonie de Psalms," for orchestra and chorus. This latter work, says the title page of the score, was "composed to the glory of God and dedicated to the Boston Symphony Orchestra on the occasion of the fiftieth anniversary of its existence." It was to have had its first performance anywhere at the concerts of the Boston orchestra a week earlier. Dr. Koussevitzky, however, was then resting from the labors of the Washington Festival, and the honor of the first performance went to the Brussels Philharmonic Society, which played the "Symphonie" on Dec. 13.

Neither the Capriccio nor — we should say after a single hearing — the "Symphonie" is destined to occupy a pedestal beside that of the "Sacre," but the gratifying thing about them both is that they seem to indicate a renewal of the composer's individuality. Since the "Sacre" Stravinsky had seemed to be concerned mainly — except in the "Noces" — with "returning" to one or another classic composer: Bach or Handel, or even Tchaikovsky. With each of these side-trips he produced an impressive piece of propaganda accompanied by an inconsiderable piece of music. The only one of these excursions which yielded much booty was that to Handel, which resulted in "Edipus Rex." That too, except for an aria, which was sung in Boston by Margaret Matzenauer, seemed more reminiscence than invention. Now Stravinsky appears to have doubled back out of — we hope — the last of these musical culs-de-sac.

It is possible to believe that one hears in the Capriccio echoes of Rimsky-Korsakoff and even of Rameau—but also of "Pétroushka." It has charm and wit, achieved by simplicity and economy of means. It was played dazzlingly by J. M. Sanromá and the orchestra.

This simplicity and economy are carried over into the "Symphonie," which is so-called because the composer so decrees. It consists of a setting of verses from the Psalms in three uninterrupted movements, opening with a supplication, proceeding to a climax of glorification and closing on a note of peace. The text is taken from the Vulgate and is sung in Latin; the verses are to be found in the King James Version in Psalms XXXIX, XL and CL. The musical scheme is elaborately contrapuntal and polytonal; but if there is no indication of concession to conservative ears, neither is there any sense of striving after effect. The music seems on a first hearing to have been written in the composer's own musical language, as the best musical expression he could contrive of the meaning of the text. The orchestration is unusual, with violins and violas discarded and great emphasis upon woodwinds: five flutes, four oboes, English horn, three bassoons and double-bassoon, four horns, and so on. The rhythmic pattern is apparently less complicated than that of the "Sacre" or of the "Noces," but it is vigorous and appropriate. There is involved contrapuntal writing in the woodwind at the beginning of the second movement which recalls the opening of the second part of the "Sacre;" indeed, the composition bears the mark of the individual Stravinsky, working on a devotional theme. It was well performed by the orchestra and the Cecilia Society chorus trained by Arthur Fiedler.

The concert opened with a superb performance of Mozart's G minor Symphony and closed with a translucent exposition of Schönberg's transcription of Bach's Organ Prelude and Fugue in E flat.

inous and quasi-mystical evocation. Stravinsky touches beauty. The sonorities enter and upswell—"Praise the Lord in his sanctuary." Stravinsky releases power. "Praise Him with psalter and the harp . . . with the quakers; the timbres of orchestral voices brighten; but the austerity is not much or long relaxed. The score of praise mounts, clanging deeper; hushes itself with awe; the climax, the flight completed; stills.

The stark and sinewy musical has not altered; nor the direction, gravity, austerity, of thought, and speech. Here sounds religious stripped of upholsteries and gaseous sentiment, almost of mystery. stark strength and darkness; when its voice, in contrition, in or in praise, ascends to the Lord God. Stravinsky reads in the Old Testament, not the New. Proclaiming individual faith, the old tribal seizes and possesses him. In the phony of Psalms, hearers may find another height, possibly another. At the least, Stravinsky is again intrinsic self.

Upon the Caprice, commentators the composer, have loosed the fancy. One Parisian reviewer, recently in these columns, imagined a fantastic, many-sided tale of love, life, nature. Another, repeating the program-book, finds it "touching mystery," swarming "with phantoms." Not to be behindhand, Stravinsky himself intimates that the finished Chaikovskian was "the point of departure," apparent in "melodic and certain orchestral effects." pity that he did not mark the score. At first test, they are parent to the hearing ear. must be "a point of departure" might suspect it to lie in a neighborhood, with Chopin—for in the piano-part—not too far believably, by the evidence of yesterday's performance, the Caprice is tained, self-sufficient, essentially vlnskian.

Concerto-like, in the display before the graver German master have the form symphonic, it is a piano and an orchestral part, interlaced as contrasted. The Caprice leans upon the Russian, Chaikovskian, model. The piano presumably the "piano-solo" of the fancy, the title—is virtuoso stuff, exacting, brilliant, making immediate impression. In the fashion, or the conviction, of his generation, Stravinsky counts the piano an instrument of percussion. It shall rhythm and ornament. It may juggle figures and play about in scales, arpeggios and every sort of arabesque. It may even color. But it shall not sing—for more than the passing moment. It may and does exchange witty dialogue with the orchestra; thrum at a listless figure when that orchestra bids it be still; toss out a hint of jazz and then forget it; run away into any fancy, any vagary that occurs to it—the composer prompting.

At moments, the orchestral part runs a little spare and hard in good Stravinskian fashion. It can prefer line rather than color, which is Stravinskian mode. Yet it is not insistently contrapuntal; while it has shameless moments in which it returns frankly to harmonic color. Withal it is astutely adept and tirelessly agile. Being contained in a Caprice, it can mix styles, permitting the strings to divert themselves in the ancient "concertino" groups; yet using the wind choir in full modernistic flavors. The moods are as mixed and changeable as the styles—wit, gaiety, passing melancholy, petulance and brusquerie, dashes of cynicism; but everywhere and always an immense skill and an immense exhilaration. It may have been the work of many days. It sounds like a fantastic, masterful, irresistible, improvisation—Stravinsky at his play in a sunshine seldom shadowed.

The performances of both Symphony and Caprice were contrasted tours de force by orchestra and conductor. The orchestra achieved the difficult idiom of the Psalms; made it sound lean and linear, sombre and austere; passed readily to the fluidity and dazzle of the Caprice; played as though upon each several man the Stravinskian fortunes depended. Whatever qualities this review has attributed to Stravinsky emanated no less from Dr. Koussevitzky. He worked in understanding and sympathy. He accomplished by imagination, ardor and devotion. The Cecilian chorus was weak in men's voices; lacked depth and surge of tone; but better than usual it served. Seemingly Mr. Fiedler is teaching it the confidence that in time will sing out. Mr. Sanromá, by inclination as well as practice, was virtuoso with every modernism. . . . After the concert of this evening, Mozart's Symphony and Schönbergian Bach may have their turn.

H. T. P.

Stravinsky Returns to Himself

By L. A. SLOPER

WE HAVE complained so often of the unsatisfactory musical behavior of Igor Stravinsky that it was pleasant on the afternoon of Dec. 19 to find him showing signs of grace. The Boston Symphony Orchestra then performed in Symphony Hall, Boston, for the first time in America, two of the two latest compositions by the most conspicuous of the musical modernists: the Capriccio for piano and orchestra, which was heard in Paris a year ago, and the "Symphonie de Psalms," for orchestra and chorus. This latter work, says the title page of the score, was "composed to the glory of God and dedicated to the Boston Symphony Orchestra on the occasion of the fiftieth anniversary of its existence." It was to have had its first performance anywhere at the concerts of the Boston orchestra a week earlier. Dr. Koussevitzky, however, was then resting from the labors of the Washington Festival, and the honor of the first performance went to the Brussels Philharmonic Society, which played the "Symphonie" on Dec. 13.

Neither the Capriccio nor — we should say after a single hearing — the "Symphonie" is destined to occupy a pedestal beside that of the "Sacre," but the gratifying thing about them both is that they seem to indicate a renewal of the composer's individuality. Since the "Sacre" Stravinsky had seemed to be concerned mainly — except in the "Noces" — with "returning" to one or another classic composer: Bach or Handel, or even Tchaikovsky. With each of these side-trips he produced an impressive piece of propaganda accompanied by an inconsiderable piece of music. The only one of these excursions which yielded much booty was that to Handel, which resulted in "Edipus Rex." That too, except for an aria, which was sung in Boston by Margaret Matzenauer, seemed more reminiscence than invention. Now Stravinsky appears to have doubled back out of — we hope — the last of these musical culs-de-sac.

It is possible to believe that one hears in the Capriccio echoes of Rimsky-Korsakoff and even of Rameau—but also of "Pétroushka." It has charm and wit, achieved by simplicity and economy of means. It was played dazzlingly by J. M. Sanromá and the orchestra.

This simplicity and economy are carried over into the "Symphonie," which is so-called because the composer so decrees. It consists of a setting of verses from the Psalms in three uninterrupted movements, opening with a supplication, proceeding to a climax of glorification and closing on a note of peace. The text is taken from the Vulgate and is sung in Latin; the verses are to be found in the King James Version in Psalms XXXIX, XL and CL. The musical scheme is elaborately contrapuntal and polytonal; but if there is no indication of concession to conservative ears, neither is there any sense of striving after effect. The music seems on a first hearing to have been written in the composer's own musical language, as the best musical expression he could contrive of the meaning of the text. The orchestration is unusual, with violins and violas discarded and great emphasis upon woodwinds: five flutes, four oboes, English horn, three bassoons and double-bassoon, four horns, and so on. The rhythmic pattern is apparently less complicated than that of the "Sacre" or of the "Noces," but it is vigorous and appropriate. There is involved contrapuntal writing in the woodwind at the beginning of the second movement which recalls the opening of the second part of the "Sacre;" indeed, the composition bears the mark of the individual Stravinsky, working on a devotional theme. It was well performed by the orchestra and the Cecilia Society chorus trained by Arthur Fiedler.

The concert opened with a superb performance of Mozart's G minor Symphony and closed with a translucent exposition of Schönberg's transcription of Bach's Organ Prelude and Fugue in E flat.

JESUS MARIA SANROMA,

Second With

A Stirred New Str Bach

Trans.

A

ning, in the first sound sky" Stravinsky begins picot that in the third served with w join in, is blood-bro for the "Sym not in matter, to t chairs usually of The Blackamoor horns, trumpe ing, with cornet, in displacing the cellos, as old s

And Mozart

and sat down "Singularly enot hugged the good, and demurring, ladies remarked on So do modern Friday, Mozart began these Stravinskian
the full string rites with the Symphony in G minor, music. In th played in rare insight and felicity, the assembled, p strings, as usual, diminished. In the first according to movement the lightness of tone, motion, ture of the p phrasing and accent, enticed the ear.
seems sound Here was the Mozart who is all grace tradition. Th of invention, fancy, workmanship; but, Symphony, es growing older, tinged them with pensive was more con melancholy. Out of the slow movement interest of the sounded the graver Mozart who takes the applause thought of fates and destinies; feels the
There was n daimon (as he called it) within him;
alter the imp soothes himself with half-shadowed, half-place last Sat serene music-making. With the minuet they overlook Dr. Koussevitzky renewed light vigors; which Stravi took the Trio so that each group of in-ments and gro struments sounded transparent and in-Part One, and dividualized—Mozart the modernist. To Symphony; th end, a finale that rounded each phrase introduction t and blurred no beat, even as it sped tensifies a far them. Recall the conductor's Mozart in driving rhyth his first years in Boston; set beside it chorus of p this performance of the Symphony in phrases into v G minor. The new insight and sympa-
In turn, the thy, the new finesse and felicity, speak
cles of Frida for themselves.

volleyed plaud
Koussevitzky until pianist and conductor stood side by side and arm in arm upon the latter's platform; redoubled them

Also Bach

"Singularly enough" again—though the good ladies failed to remark it—Bach ended the Stravinskian day and night.
The organists, however, active and retired, were on the spot, lifting pious hands distressed. For the impious Schön-berg had opened Johan... Sebastian's "great" Prelude and Fugue in E-flat and transcribed it from organ to orchestra.
Now, it is to be noted (1) that Bach has become a much sought and highly honored composer at orchestral concerts; (2) that the Suites and the Brandenburg Concertos are insufficient to supply the demand; (3) that transcriptions from Bach's organ-pieces and from other sources fill the need; (4) that able and sympathetic pens have made them of late, Schönberg's, Respighi's, Stokowski's; (5) that to most ears the resulting music is not only orchestral but also of Bach enlarged and renewed. Few can hear this particular transcription without discovering and feeling the organ-voice through the instrumental sonorities; know the measures of the sl "lift" of the successive periods, the sheer est to distinction. magnificence of the contrapuntal progress, without deep sense of Bach, the creator. The listening of the audience is proof enough, whenever Dr. Koussevitzky plays. May he play more—and at the approaching Bach Festival!
What a musical world this would be, if the purists ruled over it! A human desire for more and richer Bach may sometimes "have the call." H. T. P.

"Singularly enot good, and demurring, ladies remarked on Friday, Mozart began these Stravinskian rites with the Symphony in G minor, played in rare insight and felicity, the strings, as usual, diminished. In the first movement the lightness of tone, motion, phrasing and accent, enticed the ear.
Here was the Mozart who is all grace of invention, fancy, workmanship; but, growing older, tinged them with pensive melancholy. Out of the slow movement sounded the graver Mozart who takes thought of fates and destinies; feels the daimon (as he called it) within him;
soothes himself with half-shadowed, half-serene music-making. With the minuet
Dr. Koussevitzky renewed light vigors; took the Trio so that each group of instruments sounded transparent and individualized—Mozart the modernist. To end, a finale that rounded each phrase and blurred no beat, even as it sped them. Recall the conductor's Mozart in his first years in Boston; set beside it this performance of the Symphony in G minor. The new insight and sympathy, the new finesse and felicity, speak for themselves.

Koussevitzky until pianist and conductor
stood side by side and arm in arm upon
the latter's platform; redoubled them

Tenth Programme

FRIDAY AFTERNOON, DECEMBER 26, at 2.30 o'clock

SATURDAY EVENING, DECEMBER 27, at 8.15 o'clock

Arensky . . . Variations on a Theme of Tchaikovsky, Op. 35a

- Thema—Moderato
- Variation I. Un poco piu mosso
- Variation II. Allegro non troppo
- Variation III. Andantino tranquillo
- Variation IV. Vivace
- Variation V. Andante
- Variation VI. Allegro con spirito
- Variation VII. Andante con moto; coda

Mahler . . . "Das Lied von der Erde" ("Song of the Earth"),
Symphony for Tenor, Contralto and Orchestra

- I. Das Trinklied vom Jammer der Erde (Tenor).
(The Drinking Song of Earthly Woe).
Poem of Li-Tai-Po (702-763).
- II. Der Einsame im Herbst (Autumn Solitude) (Contralto).
Poem of Tschang-Tsi (800).
- III. Von der Jugend (Of Youth) (Tenor).
Poem of Li-Tai-Po (702-763).
- IV. Von der Schönheit (Of Beauty) (Contralto).
Poem of Li-Tai-Po (702-763).
- V. Der Trunkene im Fruhling (Tenor).
(The Drunkard in Spring-time).
Poem of Li-Tai-Po (702-763).
- VI. (a) In Erwartung des Freundes (Contralto).
(Awaiting a Friend).
Poem of Mong-Kao-Jen (Eighth Century)
- (b) Der Abschied des Freundes (Contralto).
(The Farewell of a Friend).
Poem of Wang-Wei (Eighth Century).

Tenor: RICHARD CROOKS
Contralto: MARGARET MATZENAUER

There will be an intermission after Arensky's "Variations"

A fiftieth anniversary exhibition is now on view in the Huntington Avenue foyer
(first balcony)

Second Round With Psalms And Caprice

A Stirred Audience Hears the New Stravinskian Scores, Bach and Mozart Also

AT Symphony Hall on Saturday evening, the "Grand Gala Stravinsky" continued and ended auspiciously. A second houseful observed with wonder the woodwinds seated for the "Symphony of Psalms," in the chairs usually occupied by the violins; the horns, trumpets and trombones similarly displacing the violas; while the violoncellos, as old slang ran, "went 'way back and sat down," and the double-basses hugged the forward left-hand corner. So do modernist composers testify that the full string choir is no sacred fount of music. In their practice, it should be assembled, parted or even dismissed, according to the character and the texture of the piece in hand—all of which seems sound reasoning, unperturbed by tradition. The performance of the new Symphony, especially in the choral parts, was more confident than on Friday; the interest of the audience more stimulating; the applause more general and hearty. There was no discoverable occasion to alter the impressions set down in this place last Saturday. Only to note that they overlooked the divining skill with which Stravinsky individualizes instruments and groups of instruments through Part One, and, indeed, through the whole Symphony; the penetrating quality of the introduction to Part Two, in which he intensifies a familiar ability; his return to driving rhythms in parts of the final chorus of praise; the beauty of the phrases into which it finally hushes.

In turn, the Caprice renewed the ecstasies of Friday afternoon. The house volleyed plaudits at Mr. Sanromá and Dr. Koussevitzky until pianist and conductor stood side by side and arm in arm upon the latter's platform; redoubled them and resumes activities on Monday night. Dartmouth collected the new record of 31-27 at Burlington, it left im- of Friday for New York and watched 31-27 at score its fourth straight vic-1. At the year Friday night withams were a loser. It causes one to won was whether the ease with which covered's team conquered the Crim-The Har- ad any bearing on the worker of the n in the first half. Fifteen the floor, sed before Ben Burch scored they all first basket of the game. inutes of n was off ig Farrell d to spur comeback

d Defeat

night's game will provide, for the Green for although, the sec- rs no longer have Charley, w game ore points there are several, ep ahead om last year's team which in a lead o of twenty-five games. Thus, liam Hol- gh has played five games, personal middle western opponents, Holland n three. It lost the opening n, which, eastern Reserve, 32-14, and Wachte- ed Ohio State 25-17, Mar- the poor 8, and Nebraska 32-22, but Dick Spo- night Creighton won 22-18, n in the East-rn team was able to played, use last season and that was to play the Orange has a double, tion two winning tomorrow's contest, place at s to gain revenge for last Maturse- ng and the other to regain prestige the veteran Orange when Dartmouth beat it a Saturday night. Last year's played at New York, but to- acuse will have the benefit and of supporters. It was year ago that the Orange an end the long string of victories, winning by a mar- n points.

s from Syracuse report that at Dartmouth did the Orange than harm. The fact the that lost only two games a as intact, had brought about ident attitude, but that was out of the team at Hanover. evident Saturday night that as in form for it defeated reserve, which downed Pitts- a 46-28 score. The fact it lost one game will give it ge over Columbia of not try- an unbeaten record intact. who very shortly will start of their intercollegiate title, the five New York colleges not been beaten yet

Tenth Programme

DAY AFTERNOON, DECEMBER 26, at 2.30 o'clock

SATURDAY EVENING, DECEMBER 27, at 8.15 o'clock

Variations on a Theme of Tchaikovsky, Op. 35a

Thema—Moderato

- Variation I. Un poco piu mosso
- Variation II. Allegro non troppo
- Variation III. Andantino tranquillo
- Variation IV. Vivace
- Variation V. Andante
- Variation VI. Allegro con spirito
- Variation VII. Andante con moto; coda

"Das Lied von der Erde" ("Song of the Earth"),
Symphony for Tenor, Contralto and Orchestra

- I. Das Trinklied vom Jammer der Erde (Tenor).
(The Drinking Song of Earthly Woe).
Poem of Li-Tai-Po (702-763).
- II. Der Einsame im Herbst (Autumn Solitude) (Contralto).
Poem of Tschang-Tsi (800).
- III. Von der Jugend (Of Youth) (Tenor).
Poem of Li-Tai-Po (702-763).
- IV. Von der Schönheit (Of Beauty) (Contralto).
Poem of Li-Tai-Po (702-763).
- V. Der Trunkene im Fruhling (Tenor).
(The Drunkard in Spring-time).
Poem of Li-Tai-Po (702-763).
- VI. (a) In Erwartung des Freundes (Contralto).
(Awaiting a Friend).
Poem of Mong-Kao-Jen (Eighth Century)
- (b) Der Abschied des Freundes (Contralto).
(The Farewell of a Friend).
Poem of Wang-Wei (Eighth Century).

Tenor: RICHARD CROOKS

Contralto: MARGARET MATZENAUER

There will be an intermission after Arensky's "Variations"

A fiftieth anniversary exhibition is now on view in the Huntington Avenue foyer
(first balcony)

Second

Will

A Stirred

New Str

Bach

A

when a standing orchestra crowned the general delight. Perish the cynic who found the Caprice less exhilarating at second performance than first; who suspected the need of a considerable interval between effective repetitions to the same audience, as, say, with Ravel's "Bolero." Even so, there was enough to engage eye, ear and mind—the singularly placed group of strings in half-circle close around the conductor, to be what the ancients called the "concertino"—Stravinsky throwing "back" once more; the vertiginous pace of the finale with Mr. Sanromá's hands flying like light flails; the feeling throughout that Stravinsky's melodies are intrinsically for wind instruments; while the piano "points up" and the strings set in background or interpose dialogue. Certainly there is melody enough in the Caprice, easily recognizable, though scarcely of distinguished quality. The short-breathed, short-lived, songful measures of the slow division come nearest to distinction. The conspicuous tuning, in the first sounds common enough till Stravinsky begins to conjure with it; while that in the third, when the trumpets join in, is blood-brother in quality, though not in matter, to the celebrated measures of The Blackamoor in "Petrushka" entering, with cornet, into The Ballerina's cell, displacing the cellos, as old s

And Mozart

"Singularly enough," as some of the good, and demurring, ladies remarked on Friday, Mozart began these Stravinskian rites with the Symphony in G minor, played in rare insight and felicity, the strings, as usual, diminished. In the first movement the lightness of tone, motion, phrasing and accent, enticed the ear. Here was the Mozart who is all grace of invention, fancy, workmanship; but, growing older, tinged them with pensive melancholy. Out of the slow movement sounded the graver Mozart who takes thought of fates and destinies; feels the daimon (as he called it) within him; soothes himself with half-shadowed, half-serene music-making. With the minuet Dr. Koussevitzky renewed light vigors; took the Trio so that each group of instruments sounded transparent and individualized—Mozart the modernist. To end, a finale that rounded each phrase and blurred no beat, even as it sped them. Recall the conductor's Mozart in his first years in Boston; set beside it this performance of the Symphony in G minor. The new insight and sympathy, the new finesse and felicity, speak for themselves.

until pianist and conductor stood side by side and arm in arm upon the latter's platform; redoubled them and resumes activities on Vermont at the new will be with a record of two defeats. Following N. Y. defeat of Friday was beaten 31-27 at Saturday afternoon. At the half the two teams were and that Army won was Tom Farrell was covered were resumed. The Harvard the high scorer of the baskets from the floor, part of it is they all first twenty minutes of the Crimson was off it is a good thing Farrell certainly tried to spur his own actions. took the lead as the second and a see-saw game managed to keep ahead to have Army gain a lead shed after William Hol out on four personal indicate that Holland for the Crimson, which hat Coach Ed Wachter am following the poor C. C. N. Y. Dick Spoke pivot position in the the Crimson played w for Holland to play ayed that position two reshman. His place at n by Alphonse Maturse-

Defeat

FIFTIETH SEASON, NINETEEN HUNDRED THIRTY AND THIRTY-ONE

Tenth Programme

FRIDAY AFTERNOON, DECEMBER 26, at 2.30 o'clock

SATURDAY EVENING, DECEMBER 27, at 8.15 o'clock

Variations on a Theme of Tchaikovsky, Op. 35a

- Thema—Moderato
- Variation I. Un poco piu mosso
 - Variation II. Allegro non troppo
 - Variation III. Andantino tranquillo
 - Variation IV. Vivace
 - Variation V. Andante
 - Variation VI. Allegro con spirito
 - Variation VII. Andante con moto; coda

"Das Lied von der Erde" ("Song of the Earth"),
Symphony for Tenor, Contralto and Orchestra

- I. Das Trinklied vom Jammer der Erde (Tenor).
(The Drinking Song of Earthly Woe).
Poem of Li-Tai-Po (702-763).
- II. Der Einsame im Herbst (Autumn Solitude) (Contralto).
Poem of Tschang-Tsi (800).
- III. Von der Jugend (Of Youth) (Tenor).
Poem of Li-Tai-Po (702-763).
- IV. Von der Schönheit (Of Beauty) (Contralto).
Poem of Li-Tai-Po (702-763).
- V. Der Trunkene im Fruhling (Tenor).
(The Drunkard in Spring-time).
Poem of Li-Tai-Po (702-763).
- VI. (a) In Erwartung des Freundes (Contralto).
(Awaiting a Friend).
Poem of Mong-Kao-Jen (Eighth Century)
- (b) Der Abschied des Freundes (Contralto).
(The Farewell of a Friend).
Poem of Wang-Wei (Eighth Century).

Tenor: RICHARD CROOKS

Contralto: MARGARET MATZENAUER

There will be an intermission after Arensky's "Variations"

A fiftieth anniversary exhibition is now on view in the Huntington Avenue foyer
(first balcony)

Second Will

A Stirred New Str Bach

AT Symphony in the first sound sky" Stravinsky begins to join in, is blood-brother not in matter, to the chairs usually of The Blackamoors, horns, trumpet, and cellos, as old and sat down huddled the good, and demurring, ladies remarked on Friday, Mozart began these Stravinskian rites with the Symphony in G minor, played in rare insight and felicity, the strings, as usual, diminished. In the first movement the lightness of tone, motion, phrasing and accent, enticed the ear. Here was the Mozart who is all grace of invention, fancy, workmanship; but, growing older, tinged them with pensive melancholy. Out of the slow movement sounded the graver Mozart who takes thought of fates and destinies; feels the daimon (as he called it) within him; soothes himself with half-shadowed, half-serene music-making. With the minuet Dr. Koussevitzky renewed light vigors; took the Trio so that each group of instruments sounded transparent and individualized—Mozart the modernist. To end, a finale that rounded each phrase and blurred no beat, even as it sped them. Recall the conductor's Mozart in his first years in Boston; set beside it this performance of the Symphony in G minor. The new insight and sympathy, the new finesse and felicity, speak for themselves.

In turn, the cles of Friday volleyed plaud Koussevitzky until pianist and conductor stood side by side and arm in arm upon the latter's platform; redoubled them

Also Bach

"Singularly enough" again—though the good ladies failed to remark it—Bach ended the Stravinskian day and night. The organists, however, active and retired, were on the spot, lifting pious hands distressed. For the impious Schönberg had opened Johann Sebastian's "great" Prelude and Fugue in E-flat and transcribed it from organ to orchestra. Now, it is to be noted (1) that Bach has become a much sought and highly honored composer at orchestral concerts; (2) that the Suites and the Brandenburg Concertos are insufficient to supply the demand; (3) that transcriptions from Bach's organ-pieces and from other sources fill the need; (4) that able and sympathetic pens have made them of late. Schönberg's, Respighi's, Stokowski's (6) that to most ears the resulting music is not only orchestral but also of Bach enlarged and renewed. Few can hear this particular transcription without discovering and feeling the organ-voice through the instrumental sonorities; know the "lift" of the successive periods, the sheer magnificence of the contrapuntal progress, without deep sense of Bach, the creator. The listening of the audience is proof enough, whenever Dr. Koussevitzky plays. May he play more and at the approaching Bach Festival! What a musical world this would be, if the purists ruled over it! A human desire for more and richer Bach may sometimes "have the call."

And Mozart

"Singularly enough, and demurring, ladies remarked on Friday, Mozart began these Stravinskian rites with the Symphony in G minor, played in rare insight and felicity, the strings, as usual, diminished. In the first movement the lightness of tone, motion, phrasing and accent, enticed the ear. Here was the Mozart who is all grace of invention, fancy, workmanship; but, growing older, tinged them with pensive melancholy. Out of the slow movement sounded the graver Mozart who takes thought of fates and destinies; feels the daimon (as he called it) within him; soothes himself with half-shadowed, half-serene music-making. With the minuet Dr. Koussevitzky renewed light vigors; took the Trio so that each group of instruments sounded transparent and individualized—Mozart the modernist. To end, a finale that rounded each phrase and blurred no beat, even as it sped them. Recall the conductor's Mozart in his first years in Boston; set beside it this performance of the Symphony in G minor. The new insight and sympathy, the new finesse and felicity, speak for themselves.

Tenth Programme

FRIDAY AFTERNOON, DECEMBER 26, at 2.30 o'clock

SATURDAY EVENING, DECEMBER 27, at 8.15 o'clock

Arensky . . . Variations on a Theme of Tchaikovsky, Op. 35a

Thema—Moderato

- Variation I. Un poco piu mosso
- Variation II. Allegro non troppo
- Variation III. Andantino tranquillo
- Variation IV. Vivace
- Variation V. Andante
- Variation VI. Allegro con spirito
- Variation VII. Andante con moto; coda

Mahler . . . "Das Lied von der Erde" ("Song of the Earth"),
Symphony for Tenor, Contralto and Orchestra

- I. Das Trinklied vom Jammer der Erde (Tenor).
(The Drinking Song of Earthly Woe).
Poem of Li-Tai-Po (702-763).
- II. Der Einsame im Herbst (Autumn Solitude) (Contralto).
Poem of Tschang-Tsi (800).
- III. Von der Jugend (Of Youth) (Tenor).
Poem of Li-Tai-Po (702-763).
- IV. Von der Schönheit (Of Beauty) (Contralto).
Poem of Li-Tai-Po (702-763).
- V. Der Trunkene im Fruhling (Tenor).
(The Drunkard in Spring-time).
Poem of Li-Tai-Po (702-763).
- VI. (a) In Erwartung des Freundes (Contralto).
(Awaiting a Friend).
Poem of Mong-Kao-Jen (Eighth Century)
- (b) Der Abschied des Freundes (Contralto).
(The Farewell of a Friend).
Poem of Wang-Wei (Eighth Century).

Tenor: RICHARD CROOKS

Contralto: MARGARET MATZENAUER

There will be an intermission after Arensky's "Variations"

A fiftieth anniversary exhibition is now on view in the Huntington Avenue foyer
(first balcony)

From a sketch by Arnold Schrenk

GUSTAV MAHLER

SYMPHONY CONCERT

By PHILIP HALE

The program of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's concert yesterday afternoon in Symphony hall, Dr. Koussevitzky, conductor, comprised Arensky's Variations for string orchestra on a theme of Tchaikovsky's and Mahler's "Song of the Earth," which was performed here for the first time on Dec. 7, 1928. The singers in the latter composition were Madame Matzenauer, contralto, and Richard Crooks, tenor. Their predecessors in Boston were Madame Charles Cabier and George Maeder.

Tchaikovsky was fond of Arensky. Perhaps for this reason he scolded him for choosing "La Dame aux Camelias" as the subject of a Fantasia. He asked Arensky how an educated musician—when there were Homer, Shakespeare, Gogol, Pushkin, Dante, Tolstoi and others—could feel any interest in the history of a demi-mondaine adventuress, "which even if written with French cleverness, is in truth false, sentimental and vulgar." He wrote him a long letter. Did Arensky repay his friend's interest by writing these Variations? He had an example, for Tchaikovsky after Nicolas Rubinstein's death, wrote a Piano Trio in memory of the man who at first could see nothing in Tchaikovsky's piano concerto in B flat minor, and was so scornful that he wounded the sensitive Peter to the quick.

Arensky took for his theme the familiar legend of the Christ child, which as a claim has been sung here more than once. In its original form it is one of the 16 children's songs composed by Tchaikovsky in 1883. The variations are for the most part amiably melancholy, as befits the content of the verses. There are sets of variations in which the chief interest of the hearer lies in detecting the theme itself. Then he smiles, and says to himself: "Ha, ha! now I've got you!" Such variations are to be avoided, no matter whose name is signed to them. Either Arensky's inventive faculty was not strong enough, or he had a heart and allowed the hearer the pleasure of being able to hum the tune even to the end. These variations were beautifully played, so charmingly that they had a significance which otherwise might have been wanting.

The singers in Mahler's symphony sang in German. It would be interesting to know whether Hans Bethge, who selected and translated these Chinese poems did with them as Fitzgerald treated Omar Khayyam, amplified, relected, introduced lines of his own. Some of the lines seem to be more German in their sentiment and sentimentality than Chinese.

The cycle is frankly pessimistic. Life as well as death is gloomy. As the old song by Thomas Jordan has it, speaking of the "beautiful Bit":

"Whose lightness and brightness doth cast such a splendor
That none but the stars
Are thought to be fit to attend her,
Though now she seems pleasant and sweet to the sense,
Will be damnably mouldy a hundred years hence."

But, brethren, there's the wine cup to console one, says Chinese Bethge, and the poets he calls on felt as the Third Kalandar in the wild Arabian tale: "And the bowl went merrily round. Hereupon such gladness possessed me that I forgot the sorrows of the world one and all and said, 'This is indeed life; Oh, sad that 'tis fleeting!'"

Mahler in the music for the drinking songs is boisterous, perhaps appropriately, and has given the tenor a muscular task, for he must sing against a raging orchestra which no conductor can subdue and, at the same time, do justice to Mahler's intention. Mr. Crooks strove courageously and for the most part successfully in making himself heard. When the composer was compassionate, the vocal art and the intelligence of the singer were more clearly revealed. When Mahler, like John Ford, wrote in deliberately doleful dumps to convey the message of the poets—and he himself in his later years was something of a Dismal Jemmy—he found out music that has genuine emotion, music that while it is charged with sadness, yet is so full of beauty, even serenity that it breathes resignation not despair. Man goes to his long home—but the distant skies are blue; the heart is at peace while it is waiting. Mme. Matzenauer was an eloquent interpreter, and to the contralto Mahler gave his more inspired, also his more personal music.

As for the work as a whole, it shows Mahler at his best and at his worst; now with great ideas, now with trivialities in thought and expression; now almost childlike, now super-sophisticated; now startlingly original, now remembering in orchestral measures the manner of illustrious contemporaries. The orchestral performance, no matter how eccentric, how extravagant at times is the instrumentation, was of the highest order. Mahler, who was himself a great conductor, would have applauded Dr. Koussevitzky. The audience was deeply impressed.

The performance will be repeated tonight. Next week Beethoven's overture to "Coriolanus," Lourie's "Sonate Liturgique" (first time here), Walton's viola concerto (Mr. Lefranc, solo viola, first time in the United States), Strauss's "Ein Heldenleben."

SYMPHONY PERFORMS A MAHLER

"Song of the Earth" Fills Greater Part of Concert

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

It was not exactly the conventional holiday programme that Dr. Koussevitzky offered at the Symphony concert of yesterday afternoon: Mahler's "Song of the Earth," that filled the greater part of it, is, for all its occasional lightness of mood, a solemn music, although Dr. Koussevitzky did, on second thought, defer till next week Lourie's "Liturgical Sonata," that has to do with Good Friday, and substitute for it Arensky's Variations on a Theme of Tchaikovsky.

WITH TWO VOICES

But if there was little yesterday that was gay or festive, the audience seemed not to mind. Arensky's music, slight but graceful, marked by an unobtrusive scholarship and at times as Tchaikowskian as though the elder composer had written variations as well as theme, quite obviously pleased. And whether the applause after the intermission was

for Mahler's music or for Margaret Matzenauer and Richard Crooks who sang it, and for conductor and orchestra, it was unmistakably fervent, especially at the end when there were many recalls and players as well as singers and leaders must needs bow their acknowledgments.

In the face of Dr. Koussevitzky's eloquence with Mahler's score it is almost ungrateful to complain of his cavalier treatment of Mr. Crooks in the first of the six songs that make this so-called symphony, "The Drinking Song of Earthly Woe." Granted that the composer with his large orchestral apparatus and his indication "Allegro Pesante" is through most of this movement inconsiderate of the singer, Dr. Koussevitzky by his zeal made matters worse. At least Mr. Crooks, unlike Mr. Meader who sang in the first Boston performance of Mahler's monumental work two years ago, was not completely overpowered and obliterated in the stormier passages; but it was a pity that he must so force and strain his beautiful voice in order to make his presence felt. And even then, though the voice was heard, the words of the text were often lost.

His Song "Of Youth"

In Mr. Crooks two remaining opportunities, the third song, "Of Youth," and the fifth, "The Drunkard in Spring-Time," both composer and conductor were kinder to him; and of his singing of them nothing but praise may be written. The gaiety of the one, the abandon and the occasional poetry of the other he both sensed and transmitted. Nothing that Mr. Crooks has done here has so redounded to his credit.

In that she must step into the shoes of Mme. Cahier, who sang this music of Mahler so memorably in the performances of December, 1928, Mme. Matzenauer was faced yesterday with a difficult task of which she acquitted herself with the artistry and the intelligence, not to mention the sheer beauty of vocal tone, that were but to be expected from her. That she could sing her long and taxing part without the aid of notes proved of itself that her acquaintance with the music was by no means a superficial one. Furthermore, like Mme. Cahier before her, Mme. Matzenauer entered into the performance of this "Lied von der Erde" in the manner of one taking part in a play.

Again Mahler And His "Song Of the Earth"

With Mme. Matzenauer and Richard Crooks to Give It Voice

Dec. 27, 1930
IT was in December—two years ago—that Dr. Koussevitzky introduced Mahler's "Das Lied von der Erde" to Boston. In accordance with his wise custom, a work once introduced, remains not on the shelves to gather dust, but is brought forth for repeated hearings. And again at the close of 1930 a December audience was the gainer. Neither of the soloists of that first Bostonian performance returned yesterday. This time one heard Madame Matzenauer and Mr. Crooks. To precede Mahler, itself almost a novel piece, Dr. Koussevitzky brought a set of variations—as yet unplayed at these concerts—from Arensky, upon a song of Chalkovsky, "A Legend," of the childhood of Christ.

Gustav Mahler, having completed his tremendous eighth symphony, and, as some think, with premonition that he would not have long to live, set to work upon "Das Lied von der Erde." With the ninth and the incomplete tenth it has often been called Mahler's swan song. For "The Song of the Earth" he found a collection of old and new Chinese poems which Hans Bethge had put into German verse. From this collection Mahler selected seven poems that he thought beautiful, that expressed the melancholy, the pessimism, the brooding, the cynicism, finally the attained peace of the state of mind in which he found himself. Like the Biblical writer of "All is Vanity," Mahler through Chinese poets and the German Bethge, finds life a mockery, his "soul's gardens desolate"; bitterly contrasts the less than a hundred years of man's life with the endlessness of eternity; laments that those short years are but filled with sorrow.

Better the goblet of wine, better the fullness in pleasure, for, "Dark is life, is death." He continues through a plaint of loneliness, of the weariness of his life, for he now views that life in its autumn season. He reviews life, he youth, playful, happy youth; heauty, beauty that calls youths lens to each other. From the of the springtide of life he turns has had its disappointments, itght disillusion. Again to be-pleasure. The "Drunkard in lves only to drink and to sleep. drink till he can drink no more; m only for more of his one And finally, a soul that has ts way through disappointments g peace: "My heart is at rest its its hour." He peers into All space about him seems of zure. He would open the veil future. "Eternally . . ."

single mood thus many-sidedly the music is fit vehicle. Mahler dly giving of himself. For all ore than artist at play (or work) materials. It is the artist baring revealing the inmost recesses of going down more deeply than go, delving into the things the erishes—that hearers may ex- a rarely touched emotion—if one s at all, in this resulting sea of t is whether this difficult mood choly, and of passion tinged with ly, may with wisdom be asked e for an almost uninterrupted minutes. Only once, in the Youth, does the composer give m this single mood. For the ksome elegiac brooding. Yet, y cavil, when sustained beauty uch as the beauty of "The Song arth?"

s now the music which Mahler en for this symphony of brood- the vanities of life, of peace and ined at the last. Mahler is no t, though he wrote when the in- of Debussy had all been made, t composer had written most of of his works; though he wrote re Stravinsky burst upon the become a world-figure. He is not novating movement. He is not ner" in musical style and musi- uage. The musical problems rest him are problems of form an of style—but that is another hough not of the innovators he ess eschews the rhetoric of the —in his day all the world other t part which had gone into the camp. Economical, clear and a whistle, his style is strangely of the stripped and spare man- ne later modernists. Now and approaches the tenuous outlines per music. Of the trappings of anisms only one item remains: motif runs through the entire and that motif is more in

SYMPHONY PERFORMS A MAHLER

"Song of the Earth" Fills Greater Part of Concert

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

It was not exactly the conventional holiday programme that Dr. Koussevitzky offered at the Symphony concert of yesterday afternoon: Mahler's "Song of the Earth," that filled the greater part of it, is, for all its occasional lightness of mood, a solemn music, although Dr. Koussevitzky did, on second thought, defer till next week Lourie's "Liturgical Sonata," that has to do with Good Friday, and substitute for it Arensky's Variations on a Theme of Tchaikovsky.

WITH TWO VOICES

But if there was little yesterday that was gay or festive, the audience seemed not to mind. Arensky's music, slight but graceful, marked by an unobtrusive scholarship and at times as Tchaikowskian as though the elder composer had written variations as well as theme, quite obviously pleased. And whether the applause after the intermission was

for Mahler's music or for Margaret Matzenauer and Richard Crooks who sang it, and for conductor and orchestra, it was unmistakably fervent, especially at the end when there were many recalls and players as well as singers and leaders must needs bow their acknowledgments.

In the face of Dr. Koussevitzky's eloquence with Mahler's score it is almost ungrateful to complain of his cavalier treatment of Mr. Crooks in the first of the six songs that make this so-called symphony, "The Drinking Song of Earthly Woe." Granted that the composer with his large orchestral apparatus and his indication "Allegro Pesante" is through most of this movement inconsiderate of the singer, Dr. Koussevitzky by his zeal made matters worse. At least Mr. Crooks, unlike Mr. Meader who sang in the first Boston performance of Mahler's monumental work two years ago, was not completely overpowered and obliterated in the stormier passages; but it was a pity that he must so force and strain his beautiful voice in order to make his presence felt. And even then, though the voice was heard, the words of the text were often lost.

His Song "Of Youth"

In Mr. Crooks two remaining opportunities, the third song, "Of Youth," and the fifth, "The Drunkard in Spring-Time," both composer and conductor were kinder to him; and of his singing of them nothing but praise may be written. The gaiety of the one, the abandon and the occasional poetry of the other he both sensed and transmitted. Nothing that Mr. Crooks has done here has so redounded to his credit.

In that she must step into the shoes of Mme. Cahler, who sang this music of Mahler so memorably in the performances of December, 1928, Mme. Matzenauer was faced yesterday with a difficult task of which she acquitted herself with the artistry and the intelligence, not to mention the sheer beauty of vocal tone, that were but to be expected from her. That she could sing her long and taxing part without the aid of and taxing part without the aid of notes proved of itself that her acquaintance with the music was by no means a superficial one. Furthermore, like Mme. Cahler before her, Mme. Matzenauer entered into the performance of this "Lied von der Erde" in the manner of one taking part in a rite.

Again
And
O.

One of Great

DINETTE at

1 Room...
2 Room...
3 Room...

SINGLE and inner

Also furnished application

With Mm Grill
Richard

Spacio

Form

(@)3t

Ca
Rentals

Brattle
nished, $3
Farrar $125.
Foster
$80.
Gray G
furnished.
Grozier
nished, $8
Raymon
nished, $1

R. M Harvard

Charn six spa rooms, fireplace frigerator & Albat fort of Rents premises line (Tel Company Boston

(@)S6t

C UNIVE

17

We of people on in this Harvard every electrical Superinte
(@)SWt

thinks of youth, playful, happy youth; he recalls beauty, beauty that calls youths and maidens to each other. From the promises of the springtide of life he turns away. It has had its disappointments, it has brought disillusion. Again to be numbing pleasure. The "Drunkard in Spring" lives only to drink and to sleep. Let him drink till he can drink no more; waken him only for more of his one solace. And finally, a soul that has worked its way through disappointments to lasting peace: "My heart is at rest and awaits its hour." He peers into eternity. All space about him seems of endless azure. He would open the veil of the future. "Eternally . . . Eternally. . . ."

For a single mood thus many-sidedly developed the music is fit vehicle. Mahler is assuredly giving of himself. For all this is more than artist at play (or work) with his materials. It is the artist baring his soul, revealing the inmost recesses of the self, going down more deeply than mind can go, delving into the things the heart cherishes—that hearers may experience a rarely touched emotion—if one questions at all, in this resulting sea of beauty, it is whether this difficult mood of melancholy, and of passion tinged with melancholy, may with wisdom be asked to endure for an almost uninterrupted sixty-five minutes. Only once, in the poem of Youth, does the composer give relief from this single mood. For the rest, darksome elegiac brooding. Yet, who may cavil, when sustained beauty results, such as the beauty of "The Song of the Earth?"

Witness now the music which Mahler has written for this symphony of brooding upon the vanities of life, of peace and rest attained at the last. Mahler is no modernist, though he wrote when the innovations of Debussy had all been made, when that composer had written most of the best of his works; though he wrote just before Stravinsky burst upon the scene to become a world-figure. He is not of this innovating movement. He is not a "reformer" in musical style and musical language. The musical problems that interest him are problems of form rather than of style—but that is another story. Though not of the innovators he nevertheless eschews the rhetoric of the romantics—in his day all the world other than that part which had gone into the Debussy camp. Economical, clear and clean as a whistle, his style is strangely prophetic of the stripped and spare manner of the later modernists. Now and again it approaches the tenuous outlines of chamber music. Of the trappings of Wagnerianisms only one item remains: a single motif runs through the entire six pieces; and that motif is more in evidence to the eye of the studious analyst than to the ear of the hearer—say on a Friday afternoon or a Saturday evening. Otherwise, in the scheme of the Mahlerian symphony, with weightiest movement at the end rather than at the beginning, "Das Lied von der Erde" follows and unites with the text of the seven poems cast into six pieces.

Like a challenge horns fling out the motif that introduce the ardors and the ambitions of the verses of the "Drinking Song of Earthly Woe." In defeat all sinks back in each verse with the refrain "Dark Is Life, is death." If horns were a challenge in the poem, they were also a challenge yesterday to the abilities of Mr. Crooks. Dr. Koussevitzky laid on and spared not. Into the symphonic tutti the voice of Mr. Crooks plunged, daring to pit itself against the mass of sound. Mr. Meader, two years ago was utterly unable to cope with it. Mr. Crooks yesterday answered it in kind. Standing with feet wide apart, singing with all the might his by no means spare body found itself able to project into his tones, he conquered in this most grueling test. His voice retained its just place in the ensemble, lost not in quality, was the voice of the music of Gustav Mahler as well as of the person of Richard Crooks.

Wistfulness, the matter that impressionism is made of, is the substance (if that is not too solid a word) of which the second poem is compounded. Jade-dust and lotus flowers are the background for the loneliness of the poet's spirit. The mood Mahler—and with him Madame Matzenauer (singing, as is her wont at symphony concerts, from memory), renders exquisitely. Witness the greyness of the music as these artists express the infinite weariness of the poet; the peace as they sing and play of restful abiding place; the warmth of voice and orchestra when the words bring them to the "sun of love."

Again: Mr. Crooks sings of youth. Playful is the music, picturing an Oriental scene (for these poems are Chinese, after all). Koussevitzkian orchestra and tenor are as one in these playfully jolly measures. . . . "Beauty" falls to the lot of Madame Matzenauer. The one departure from the prevailing mood of the piece has been accomplished. The exquisiteness of the previous song is resumed. Yes, beauty is picturing beauty.

Comes the "Drunkard in Spring." The music grows heavier. The pessimism and the tragedy continue through the recklessness born of despair. Mahler has of course resisted the obvious temptation to become openly realistic. A certain abandon he allows himself, no more. In

FLOOR
e, garage yth Road.
d 27

ellent lo-St. Paul (@o): n adults,
s. bath.
CEN ter
(@o):

ts. Call (@o):
d Square,
om suite,
NI versity
d 27

APART-YAY and for win-5075. d 27

APART-YAY and is theme 5075. d 20

ight

work as a whole this Mahler wills so Dr. Mr. Crooks play and the music of farewell, Matzenauer again singing, outcome of ineffable Mahler might have shears to advantage. r forget the final meas- bath not seen nor ear approaches more nearly to mortals usually to ewig . . . " the d reviewing stammer- s to do more than sug- as the listener finds ink of the other world. those final words and applause came. Not in volume. Of bowing ments there seemed no the platform were on little preluding variations d to go into detail. The is theme is charm- Through half a dozen is modestly and pleas- Never is the simple ly lost sight of. Arensky composer to vary Chal- ings of the Boston Sym- were perfect voice for A. H. M.

MUSIC AT NY CONCERT

Concerts of this week
Arensky's "Variations Tchaikovsky," and Erie 1 pr (ed, von der Erde."
Equitable auer, contralto, and Eureka Va enor, are the assist-Evans Aut-announced first per-rie's "Sonata Litur-

Fairbanks postponed until the Fairbanks week.
Fashion Pa of the Earth," a Fashion Pa six movements for Fed Lt & Land orchestra, was Federa: M're in its entirety by Federa W:ony, Dr Koussevitz-Federated Dec 7, 1928. Chinese Fidelity Ph eighth century, se-Flone's Soted into German by Firestone In the poetic content Firestone The vocal parts of the First Nat s
Fisk Rubbeas been greatly at-Fisk Rubbeo pronounce it pon-Fisk Rubbeacking in imagina-Fisk Rubbeot this criticism is Florsheim the "Song of the Follansbee to be so judged.
Foster Whi

This work is anything but ponderous; most certainly not unimaginative. Some of the instrumentation, to be sure, is overladen and garish, but this is the exception and not the rule.

The warm emotion of the work is unmistakably sincere; however hyper-sensitive some of this emotion may be, it is not whining and does not deserve to be swept aside contemptuously.

The last movement seems the best to the writer, although the first, fourth and fifth are almost equally good. In the third movement is to be found a curious incongruity: the instrumental part is more or less Oriental in character, but the vocal part to Western ears is anything but that. Under these circumstances, naturally, the movement is bereft of artistic force and conviction.

Mme Matzenauer, an artist who is greatly—and deservedly—admired here, sang the arduous contralto solos splendidly, except in a portion of the first movement, where she had apparent difficulty in subduing her large voice to the proportions requisite to the music. The intensity of emotion and the beauty of tone she displayed in the last movement will be remembered.

Mr Crooks' work in the tenor parts was done admirably. Much of the tenor music, with its great dynamic force, lies just on the border line of bombast; Mr Crooks, however, dissipated none of its force, yet made it ring true and sincere.

One wished that the instrumental accompaniment in the first and fourth movements had not been so loud, for at times Mr Crooks could not be heard above the orchestra. It is to be hoped, now that the work has been brought forth once again, that Dr Koussevitzky will cause the "Song of the Earth" to appear on future Symphony programs.

The Arensky variations made but little impression on the writer. Regardless of the austere variations form, the Arensky piece seems commonplace and uninteresting. Some of the technical devices recognized are, unless utilized by a master craftsman and an extraordinary artist, musical bromides. And the variations are neither ingratiating nor appealing to the heart.

As it was, the work was done smoothly, brilliantly, by the virtuosi, orchestrally speaking, of the string sections of the orchestra. The performance provided a fine example of what redeeming power there is in virtuosity applied to inferior musical material.

The concerts next week will include in addition to the Lourie "Sonata Liturgique," Beethoven's "Coriolanus" overture; Richard Strauss' "Ein Heldenleben" and Walton's new Concerto for Viola and Orchestra. Jean Le-franc will be the soloist.

Orchestra Inconsistency

Mahler's "Song of the Earth," repeated in notable performance at the Symphony Concert Saturday, is still sounding in the ears, it is worth the space to the Manchester Guardian. The paragraph about his propering of the orchestral voices. It is a fortnight ago, by Neville, principal reviewer for The States after the first performance, in of "The Song of the Earth." in his ripest works, seems to have patented the orchestral writers day by his insistence not on tone, but on significant in- and dbrs and contrasts. "The Song of the Earth" and his Ninth Symphony third d'r no texture in the ordinary apt; as term. Most of the instru- will allotted music which thrives in individuality. Mahler is ck in tide spacing of his parts, and the same at is not a rich canvas a sort of orchestral silver- me befo thick scoring of the nine- ry romantic writers does not perpetual sense of responsi- chrestal players. They can states ain insensibilities of style a. neral mass of tone. Mahler, he was, expected each of bankrupt to possess the subtle and o. 47.40 nique of a soloist and the of an artist. Music for him of Chelse rendered full of meaning rict afoi skilful and pointed expres- is an art of nuance.

only to study Mahler's direc- and th scores to understand how ll be trusted the professional in- 6, Young's ability as a class to dis- ay of Ja forenoon notes and music. He ditore Mrs bar by bar what they are a trust he distrusted, also, the such oth own art to say all that he ind to say. He certainly occasional doubts about his ss knows. But if he was a ted State great was his fall! He went setts. ven, we can be sure, and is the Elysian fields—with Bankrupt rhaps he will find his ideal o. 47827 a. Dec. 29. 1930 evidence to the eye of the analyst than to the ear of the say on a Friday afternoon or a evening. Otherwise, in the sch the Mahlerian symphony, with movement at the end rather than beginning, "Das Lied von der Erd lows and unites with the text seven poems cast into six pieces.

Like a challenge horns fling motif that introduce the ardors ambitions of the verses of the "Dr Song of Earthly Woe." In defe sinks back in each verse with the "Dark Is Life, is death." If horns a challenge in the poem, they were challenge yesterday to the ability Mr. Crooks. Dr. Koussevitzky la and spared not. Into the sym tutti the voice of Mr. Crooks pl daring to pit itself against the ma sound. Mr. Meader, two years ago utterly unable to cope with it. Crooks yesterday answered it in Standing with feet wide apart, sh with all the might his by no means body found itself able to project int tones, he conquered in this most ling test. His voice retained its place in the ensemble, lost not in qu was the voice of the music of G Mahler as well as of the person Richard Crooks.

Wistfulness, the matter that impressionism is made of, is the substance (that is not too solid a word) of which the second poem is compounded. Jade-dus and lotus flowers are the background for the loneliness of the poet's spirit. The mood Mahler—and with him Madame Matzenauer (singing, as is her wont a symphony concerts, from memory), renders exquisitely. Witness the greyness of the music as these artists express the infinite weariness of the poet; the peace as they sing and play of restful abiding place; the warmth of voice and orchestra when the words bring them to the "sun of love."

Again: Mr. Crooks sings of youth Playful is the music, picturing an Oriental scene (for these poems are Chinese after all). Koussevitzkian orchestra and tenor are as one in these playfully jolly measures. . . . "Beauty" falls to the lot of Madame Matzenauer. The one departure from the prevailing mood of the piece has been accomplished. The exquisiteness of the previous song is resumed. Yes, beauty is picturing beauty.

Comes the "Drunkard in Spring." The music grows heavier. The pessimism and the tragedy continue through the recklessness born of despair. Mahler has of course resisted the obvious temptation to become openly realistic. A certain abandon he allows himself, no more. In the frame of the work as a whole this song is cast. As Mahler wills so Dr. Koussevitzky and Mr. Crooks play and sing. Finally the music of farewell, with Madame Matzenauer again singing. Fitting conclusion, outcome of ineffable peace — though Mahler might have used the pruning shears to advantage. But one will never forget the final measures. What "eye hath not seen nor ear heard," Mahler approaches more nearly than it is given to mortals usually to attain. "Ewig. . . ewig. . ." the words linger, and reviewing stammerings are powerless to do more than suggest the emotion as the listener finds himself on the brink of the other world. The tension of those final words and sounds over, applause came. Not tentatively, but in volume. Of bowing and acknowledgements there seemed no end, until all on the platform were on their feet.

Of Arensky's little preluding variations there is little need to go into detail. The melody which is theme is charmingly expressive. Through half a dozen of variations it is modestly and pleasingly decorated. Never is the simple tune even partially lost sight of. Arensky is exactly the composer to vary Chalkovsky. The strings of the Boston Symphony yesterday were perfect voice for both. A. H. M.

MAHLER'S MUSIC AT SYMPHONY CONCERT

The Symphony concerts of this week are devoted to Arensky's "Variations on a Theme of Tchaikovsky," and Mahler's "Das Lied, von der Erde." Margaret Matzenauer, contralto, and Richard Crooks, tenor, are the assisting soloists. The announced first performance of Lourie's "Sonate Liturgique" has been postponed until the concerts of next week.

Mahler's "Song of the Earth," a "symphony" in six movements for tenor, contralto and orchestra, was first performed here in its entirety by the Boston Symphony, Dr. Koussevitzky conducting, on Dec 7, 1925. Chinese love lyrics of the eighth century, selected and translated into German by Hans Bethge, form the poetic content and the text for the vocal parts of the work.

Mahler's music has been greatly attacked by some who pronounce it ponderous, labored, lacking in imagination. Whether or not this criticism is generally justified, the "Song of the Earth" ought not to be so judged.

This work is anything but ponderous; most certainly not unimaginative. Some of the instrumentation, to be sure, is overlaid and garish, but this is the exception and not the rule.

The warm emotion of the work is unmistakably sincere; however hypersensitive some of this emotion may be, it is not whining and does not deserve to be swept aside contemptuously.

The last movement seems the best to the writer, although the first, fourth and fifth are almost equally good. In the third movement is to be found a curious incongruity: the instrumental part is more or less Oriental in character, but the vocal part to Western ears is anything but that. Under these circumstances, naturally, the movement is bereft of artistic force and conviction.

Mme Matzenauer, an artist who is greatly—and deservedly—admired here, sang the arduous contralto solos splendidly, except in a portion of the first movement, where she had apparent difficulty in subduing her large voice to the proportions requisite to the music. The intensity of emotion and the beauty of tone she displayed in the last movement will be remembered.

Mr Crooks' work in the tenor parts was done admirably. Much of the tenor music, with its great dynamic force, lies just on the border line of bombast; Mr Crooks, however, dissipated none of its force, yet made it ring true and sincere.

One wished that the instrumental accompaniment in the first and fourth movements had not been so loud, for at times Mr Crooks could not be heard above the orchestra. It is to be hoped, now that the work has been brought forth once again, that Dr Koussevitzky will cause the "Song of the Earth" to appear on future Symphony programs.

The Arensky variations made but little impression on the writer. Regardless of the austere variations form, the Arensky piece seems commonplace and uninteresting. Some of the technical devices recognized are, unless utilized by a master craftsman and an extraordinary artist, musical bromides. And the variations are neither ingratiating nor appealing to the heart.

As it was, the work was done smoothly, brilliantly, by the virtuosi, orchestrally speaking, of the string sections of the orchestra. The performance provided a fine example of what redeeming power there is in virtuosity applied to inferior musical material.

The concerts next week will include in addition to the Lourie "Sonate Liturgique," Beethoven's "Coriolanus" overture; Richard Strauss' "Ein Heldenleben" and Walton's new Concerto for Viola and Orchestra. Jean LeFranc will be the soloist.

urth day orchestra Lyons
Mahler's "Song of the Earth" repeated in notable performance at the Symphony Concert Saturday, is still sounding in the sal it is worth the space to tms, at propering paragraph about his ACK, a fortnight ago, by Neville rruptcy, incipal reviewer for The tates tetter the first performance, in of "The Song of the Earth." in his ripest works, seems to nkrupte, dated the orchestral writers 47,370 day by his insistence not on atine, tone, but on significant in- and dhrs and contrasts. "The Song third da h' and his Ninth Symphony Frank r no texture in the ordinary upt; as term. Most of the instru s will allotted music which thrives oom 21 n individuality. Mahler is ck in tide spacing of his parts, and the sa med at is not a rich canvas s, appol a sort of orchestral silver- transa a thick scoring of the nine- me befo ry romantic writers does not rruptcy, perpetual sense of responsi- chedral players. They can states fain insensibilities of style s. neral mass of tone. Mahler, he was, expected each of ankrupt to possess the subtle and n. 47,40 nique of a soloist and the of an artist. Music for him f Chelsea rendered full of meaning rict afor skilful and pointed expres- eighth d is an art of nuance. ob Gers only to study Mahler's direc- and th scores to understand how ll be trusted the professional in- 6, Young's ability as a class to dis- ay of Ja forenoon notes and music. He ditors mrs bar by bar what they are a trust- he distrusted, also, the such oth efore sown art to say all that he ind to say. He certainly rruptcy, occasional doubts about his ss knows. But if he was a ted stareat was his fall! He went etts. ven, we can be sure, and is the Elysian fields—with ankrupte rhaps he will find his ideal No. 47327 a." Dec. 29, 1930 evidence to the eye of the analyst than to the ear of the h say on a Friday afternoon or a evening. Otherwise, in the sch the Mahlerian symphony, with wel movement at the end rather than beginning, "Das Lied von der Erd lows and unites with the text seven poems cast into six pieces.

Like a challenge horns fling on motif that introduce the ardors ambitions of the verses of the "Dr Song of Earthly Woe." In defe sinks back in each verse with the "Dark Is Life, is death." If horns a challenge in the poem, they were challenge yesterday to the ability Mr. Crooks. Dr. Koussevitzky la and spared not. Into the symph tutti the voice of Mr. Crooks pl daring to pit itself against the ma sound. Mr. Meader, two years ago utterly unable to cope with it. Crooks yesterday answered it in Standing with feet wide apart, sh with all the might his by no means body found itself able to project int tones, he conquered in this most ling test. His voice retained its place in the ensemble, lost not in qu was the voice of the music of G Mahler as well as of the person both Richard Crooks.

Wistfulness, the matter that impresionism is made of, is the substance (that is not too solid a word) of which the second poem is compounded. Jade-dus and lotus flowers are the background for the loneliness of the poet's spirit. The mood Mahler—and with him Madame Matzenauer (singing, as is her wont a symphony concerts, from memory), renders exquisitely. Witness the greyness of the music as these artists express the infinite weariness of the poet; the peace as they sing and play of restful abiding place; the warmth of voice and orchestra when the words bring them to the "sun of love."

Again: Mr. Crooks sings of youth Playful is the music, picturing an Oriental scene (for these poems are Chinese after all). Koussevitzkian orchestra and tenor are as one in these playfully jolly measures. . . . "Beauty" falls to the lot of Madame Matzenauer. The one departure from the prevailing mood of the piece has been accomplished. The exquisiteness of the previous song is resumed. Yes, beauty is picturing beauty.

Comes the "Drunkard in Spring." The music grows heavier. The pessimism and the tragedy continue through the recklessness born of despair. Mahler has of course resisted the obvious temptation to become openly realistic. A certain abandon he allows himself, no more. In the frame of the work as a whole this song is cast. As Mahler wills so Dr. Koussevitzky and Mr. Crooks play and sing. Finally the music of farewell, with Madame Matzenauer again singing. Fitting conclusion, outcome of ineffable peace — though Mahler might have used the pruning shears to advantage. But one will never forget the final measures. What "eye hath not seen nor ear heard," Mahler approaches more nearly than it is given to mortals usually to attain. "Ewig. . . ewig . . ." the words linger, and reviewing stammerings are powerless to do more than suggest the emotion as the listener finds himself on the brink of the other world. The tension of those final words and sounds over, applause came. Not tentatively, but in volume. Of bowing and acknowledgements there seemed no end, until all on the platform were on their feet.

Of Arensky's little preluding variations there is little need to go into detail. The theme is charming melody which is charmingly expressive. Through half a dozen of variations it is modestly and pleasingly decorated. Never is the simple tune even partially lost sight of. Arensky is exactly the composer to vary Chalkovsky. The strings of the Boston Symphony yesterday were perfect voice for both. A. H. M.

MAHLER'S MUSIC AT SYMPHONY CONCERT

The Symphony concerts of this week are devoted to Arensky's "Variations on a Theme of Tchaikovsky," and Mahler's "Das Lied, von der Erde." Margaret Matzenauer, contralto, and Richard Crooks, tenor, are the assisting soloists. The announced first performance of Lourié's "Sonate Liturgique" has been postponed until the concerts of next week.

Mahler's "Song of the Earth," a "symphony" in six movements for tenor, contralto and orchestra, was first performed here in its entirety by the Boston Symphony, Dr. Koussevitzky conducting, on Dec. 7, 1923. Chinese love lyrics of the eighth century, selected and translated into German by Hans Bethge, form the poetic content and the text for the vocal parts of the work.

Mahler's music has been greatly attacked by some who pronounce it ponderous, labored, lacking in imagination. Whether or not this criticism is generally justified, the "Song of the Earth" ought not to be so judged.

This work is anything but ponderous most certainly not unimaginative. Some of the instrumentation, to be sure, is overlaid and garish, but this is the exception and not the rule.

The warm emotion of the work is unmistakably sincere; however hypersensitive some of this emotion may be it is not whining and does not deserve to be swept aside contemptuously.

The last movement seems the best to the writer, although the first, fourth and fifth are almost equally good. The third movement is to be found curious incongruity: the instrumental part is more or less Oriental in character, but the vocal part to Western ears is anything but that. Under these circumstances, naturally, the movement is bereft of artistic force and conviction.

Mme Matzenauer, an artist who is greatly—and deservedly—admired here, sang the arduous contralto solo splendidly, except in a portion of the first movement, where she had apparent difficulty in subduing her large voice to the proportions requisite to the music. The intensity of emotion and the beauty of tone she displayed in the last movement will be remembered.

Mr Crooks' work in the tenor part was done admirably. Much of the tenor music, with its great dynamism, lies just on the border line of bombast; Mr Crooks, however, dispensed none of its force, yet made ring true and sincere.

One wished that the instrumental accompaniment in the first and fourth movements had not been so loud, for at times Mr Crooks could not be heard above the orchestra. It is to be hoped now that the work has been brought forth once again, that Dr Koussevitzky will cause the "Song of the Earth" to appear on future Symphony programs.

The Arensky variations made but little impression on the writer. Regardless of the austere variation form, the Arensky piece seems commonplace and uninteresting. Some of the technical devices recognized are unless utilized by a master craftsman and an extraordinary artist, musical bromides. And the variations are neither ingratiating nor appealing to the heart.

As it was, the work was done smoothly, brilliantly, by the virtuosi, orchestrally speaking, of the string sections of the orchestra. The performance provided a fine example of what redeeming power there is in virtuosity applied to inferior musical material.

The concerts next week will include in addition to the Lourié "Sonate Liturgique," Beethoven's "Coriolanus" overture; Richard Strauss' "Ein Heldenleben" and Walton's new Concerto for Viola and Orchestra. Jean LeFranc will be the soloist.

Mahler's Orchestra Speaks

WHILE Mahler's "Song of the Earth," repeated in notable performance at the Symphony Concert of Saturday, is still sounding in many ears, it is worth the space to reprint from the Manchester Guardian a discerning paragraph about his handling of the orchestral voices. It was written a fortnight ago, by Neville Cardus, principal reviewer for The Guardian, after the first performance, in Manchester, of "The Song of the Earth."

"Mahler, in his ripest works, seems to have anticipated the orchestral writers of our own day by his insistence not on a mass of tone, but on significant individual colors and contrasts. 'The Song of the Earth' and his Ninth Symphony have little or no texture in the ordinary sense of the term. Most of the instruments are allotted music which thrives on their own individuality. Mahler is fond of a wide spacing of his parts, and the effect aimed at is not a rich canvas but rather a sort of orchestral silver-point. The thick scoring of the nineteenth century romantic writers does not call for a perpetual sense of responsibility in orchestral players. They can conceal certain insensibilities of style under the general mass of tone. Mahler, idealist that he was, expected each of his players to possess the subtle and flexible technique of a soloist and the imagination of an artist. Music for him had to be rendered full of meaning by the most skilful and pointed expression; his art is an art of nuance.

"You have only to study Mahler's directions in his scores to understand how much he distrusted the professional instrumentalists' ability as a class to distinguish between notes and music. He tells his players bar by bar what they are to do. Maybe he distrusted, also, the power of his own art to say all that he had in his mind to say. He certainly had reason for occasional doubts about his music, goodness knows. But if he was a failure, how great was his fall! He went straight to heaven, we can be sure, and is now walking the Elysian fields—with Bruckner. Perhaps he will find his ideal orchestra there." Dec. 29, 1930

Boston Symphony

Two numbers constituted the program for the tenth pair of concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, in Symphony Hall, Boston, Dec. 26 and 27. They were Arensky's Variations on a Theme of Tchaikovsky and Mahler's "Song of the Earth."

The Arensky item presumably was Dr. Koussevitzky's seasonal gesture, since the Tchaikovskyan song which provides the theme is a setting of verses by Pletscheev on a legend of the childhood of Jesus. Unfortunately, the program book did not contain this information, probably because the decision to include this number was made too late to permit of changing the analytical notes. This work for string orchestra is familiar, we believe, to many audiences, but we do not recall its having been played before in Symphony Hall. One carried away the impression that the theme—which is lovely, very Russian, quite Tchaikovskyan and rather liturgical—is superior to the variations, which are workmanlike but also workaday. The piece served nevertheless to display superb tone and flexibility of string choirs.

The Mahler opus had two years ago at these the first time in Boston

hearing renewed the feeling that the composer is entitled to our respectful admiration for his work, even while it again reminded us forcibly of his debt to his predecessors. Unquestionably there are passages of great beauty in this work, both for voices and for instruments—as in Part II and elsewhere. There are also periods of great tediousness—as notably in the orchestral interlude between the last two songs. Mahler surely allowed himself more time than was strictly necessary for the conveyance of his ideas.

Richard Crooks permitted us to appreciate the qualities of the tenor solo parts as we had not been able to enjoy them at the previous Boston hearing. Besides possessing an excellent voice, well trained, Mr. Crooks has musical intelligence. And from a fine lyric tenor he has developed into a quite heroic singer. His rendition of Parts III and V won enthusiastic applause. That splendid artist, Margaret Matzenauer, was the contralto soloist. Like Mme. Charles Cahier (the original singer in this part) she sang notes or words, thereby emphasizing the dramatic quality of her voice. We have heard Mme. Matzenauer with a better voice, but with the same achievement a splendor. L. A. S.

Richard Crooks

Eleventh Programme

FRIDAY AFTERNOON, JANUARY 2, at 2.30 o'clock

SATURDAY EVENING, JANUARY 3, at 8.15 o'clock

Beethoven Symphony No. 1 in C major, Op. 21

- I. Adagio molto; Allegro con brio.
- II. Andante cantabile con moto.
- III. Menuetto: Allegro Molto e vivace; Trio.
- IV. Finale: Adagio; Allegro molto e vivace.

Lourié "Sonate Liturgique," in the form of Four Chorales
(With Alto Voices)

- I. Sequentia.
- II. Cantus Passionis.
- III. Prosa.
- IV. Horae Passionis.

Altos: Nellie Rich Hottel; Ida C. Keay; Elsa Limbach; Mildred Merrill; Marie Murray; Mary Osborne; Isabelle Ray; Alice Reese; Elizabeth Stoddard; Claramond Thompson; Marion Aubens Wise; Louisa Burt Wood. Trained by ARTHUR FIEDLER

(First time in the United States)

Strauss "Ein Heldenleben," Tone Poem, Op. 40

STEINWAY PIANO

There will be an intermission after Lourié's "Sonate Liturgique"

A fiftieth anniversary exhibition is now on view in the Huntington Avenue foyer
(first balcony)

Boston Symphony

Two numbers constituted the program for the tenth pair of concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, in Symphony Hall, Boston, Dec. 26 and 27. They were Arensky's Variations on a Theme of Tchaikovsky and Mahler's "Song of the Earth."

The Arensky item presumably was Dr. Koussevitzky's seasonal gesture, since the Tchaikovskyan song which provides the theme is a setting of verses by Pletscheev on a legend of the childhood of Jesus. Unfortunately, the program book did not contain this information, probably because the decision to include this number was made too late to permit of changing the analytical notes. This work for string orchestra is familiar, we believe, to many audiences, but we do not recall its having been played before in Symphony Hall. One carried away the impression that the theme—which is lovely, very Russian, quite Tchaikovskyan and rather liturgical—is superior to the variations, which are workmanlike but also workaday. The piece served nevertheless to display superb tone and flexibility of the string choirs.

The Mahler opus had two years ago at these the first time in Boston.

Richard Crooks

hearing renewed the feeling that the composer is entitled to our respectful admiration for his work, even while it again reminded us forcibly of his debt to his predecessors. Unquestionably there are passages of great beauty in this work, both for voices and for instruments—as in Part II and elsewhere. There are also periods of great tediousness—as notably in the orchestral interlude between the last two songs. Mahler surely allowed himself more time than was strictly necessary for the conveyance of his ideas.

Richard Crooks permitted us to appreciate the qualities of the tenor solo parts as we had not been able to enjoy them at the previous Boston hearing. Besides possessing an excellent voice, well trained, Mr. Crooks has musical intelligence. And from a lyric tenor he has developed into a quite heroic singer. His rendition of Parts III and V won enthusiastic applause. That splendid artist, Margaret Matzenauer, was the contralto soloist. Like Mme. Charles Cahier (the original singer in this part) she sang notes or words, thereby emphasizing the dramatic quality of her part. We have heard Mme. Matzenauer achieve a splen-

L. A. G.

FIFTIETH SEASON, NINETEEN HUNDRED THIRTY AND THIRTY-ONE

Eleventh Programme

FRIDAY AFTERNOON, JANUARY 2, at 2.30 o'clock

SATURDAY EVENING, JANUARY 3, at 8.15 o'clock

Beethoven Symphony No. 1 in C major, Op. 21

- I. Adagio molto; Allegro con brio.
- II. Andante cantabile con moto.
- III. Menuetto: Allegro Molto e vivace; Trio.
- IV. Finale: Adagio; Allegro molto e vivace.

Lourié "Sonate Liturgique," in the form of Four Chorales
(With Alto Voices)

- I. Sequentia.
- II. Cantus Passionis.
- III. Prosa.
- IV. Horae Passionis.

Alto: Nellie Rich Hottel; Ida C. Keay; Elsa Limbach; Mildred Merrill; Marie Murray; Mary Osborne; Isabelle Ray; Alice Reese; Elizabeth Stoddard; Claramond Thompson; Marion Aubens Wise; Louisa Burt Wood. Trained by ARTHUR FIEDLER
(First time in the United States)

Strauss "Ein Heldenleben," Tone Poem, Op. 40

STEINWAY PIANO

There will be an intermission after Lourié's "Sonate Liturgique"

A fiftieth anniversary exhibition is now on view in the Huntington Avenue foyer
(first balcony)

Boston Symphony

Two numbers constituted the program for the tenth pair of concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, in Symphony Hall, Boston, Dec. 26 and 27. They were Arensky's Variations on a Theme of Tchaikovsky and Mahler's "Song of the Earth."

The Arensky item presumably was Dr. Koussevitzky's seasonal gesture, since the Tchaikovskyan song which provides the theme is a setting of verses by Pletscheev on a legend of the childhood of Jesus. Unfortunately, the program book did not contain this information, probably because the decision to include this number was made too late to permit of changing the analytical notes. This work for string orchestra is familiar, we believe, to many audiences, but we do not recall its having been played before in Symphony Hall. One carried away the impression that the theme—which is lovely, very Russian, quite Tchaikovskyan and rather liturgical—is superior to the variations, which are workmanlike but also workaday. The piece served nevertheless to display the superb tone and flexibility of the string choirs.

The Mahler opus had been heard two years ago at these concerts for the first time in Boston. The present hearing renewed the feeling that the composer is entitled to our respectful admiration for his work, even while it again reminded us forcibly of his debt to his predecessors. Unquestionably there are passages of great beauty in this work, both for voices and for instruments—as in Part II and elsewhere. There are also periods of great tediousness—as notably in the orchestral interlude between the last two songs. Mahler surely allowed himself more time than was strictly necessary for the conveyance of his ideas.

Richard Crooks permitted us to appreciate the qualities of the tenor solo parts as we had not been able to enjoy them at the previous Boston hearing. Besides possessing an excellent voice, well trained, Mr. Crooks has musical intelligence. And from a lyric tenor he has developed into a quite heroic singer. His rendition of Parts III and V won enthusiastic applause. That splendid artist, Margaret Matzenauer, was the contralto soloist. Like Mme. Charles Cahier (the original singer in this part) she sang without notes or words, thereby enhancing the dramatic quality of her contribution. We have heard Mme. Matzenauer in better voice, but with her rare artistry she achieved a splendid performance.

L. A. S.

Richard Crooks

FIFTIETH SEASON, NINETEEN HUNDRED THIRTY AND THIRTY-ONE

Eleventh Programme

FRIDAY AFTERNOON, JANUARY 2, at 2.30 o'clock

SATURDAY EVENING, JANUARY 3, at 8.15 o'clock

Beethoven

Symphony No. 1 in C major, Op. 21

- I. Adagio molto; Allegro con brio.
- II. Andante cantabile con moto.
- III. Menuetto: Allegro Molto e vivace; Trio.
- IV. Finale: Adagio; Allegro molto e vivace.

Laurié

"Sonate Liturgique," in the form of Four Chorales
(With Alto Voices)

- I. Sequentia.
- II. Cantus Passionis.
- III. Prosa.
- IV. Horae Passionis.

Alto: Willie Rich Hottel; Ida C. Keay; Elsa Limbach; Mildred Merrill; Marie Murray; Mary Osborne; Isabelle Ray; Alice Reese; Elizabeth Stoddard; Claramond Thompson; Marion Aubens Wise;
Louisa Burt Wood. Trained by ARTHUR FIEDLER
(First time in the United States)

Strauss

"Ein Heldenleben," Tone Poem, Op. 40

STEINWAY PIANO

There will be an intermission after Laurié's "Sonate Liturgique"

A fiftieth anniversary exhibition is now on view in the Huntington Avenue foyer
(first balcony)

Arthur Lourie

Whose Devoutly Religious and Highly Christianized Music Will Be Heard at the Symphony Concerts Today and Tomorrow.

(Sketch by Courtesy of the New York Times)

MUSIC

SYMPHONY CONCERT

By PHILIP HALE (Jan. 3, 1931)

The program of the 11th concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra conducted by Dr. Koussevitzky yesterday afternoon in Symphony hall was as follows: Beethoven, symphony C major, No. 1, Lourie "Sonate Liturgique" in the form of four chorales (with alto voices). Strauss, "Ein Heldenleben."

Arthur Lourie, or Lurye, born at Leningrad in 1889 (some say 1892), was, according to a Russian biographer, a roaring and ramping "futurist" in his younger years. He was to be seen, and no doubt heard, at "The Stray Dog," frequented by writers, musicians, painters, and all entertaining extremely "advanced" views. The revolution possibly sobered him; at any rate under the soviet rule he became a government official to maintain friendly artistic relations with other nations. In 1923 he left Russia to make Paris his home. Some of his music has been performed in New York as well as in Paris; for example, his Concerto Spirituale for piano and chorus, heard in New York last March.

This sonata was performed yesterday for the first time in the United States. Composed in 1928 it was brought out in Paris last February at a concert conducted by Walter Straram, who used to live in Boston as a conductor of the ill-fated Boston Opera Company. The sonata is in four movements. The first a "Sequence" and the third a "Prose," are instrumental; the second with a text, "Cantus Passionis"—describing the Crucifixion is taken from a lesson in "Feria VI in Parascave"—and the fourth, a hymn in three verses—"The Hours of the Passion"—author unnamed—are for orchestra and alto voices. The orchestra is composed of a few wind instruments, a few double basses and a piano.

Now a sonata in old times was a word applied to any piece of music. From the derivation of the word it is easily to be inferred that this piece of music should "sound." Whether the sound should ravish the ear or rasp the nerves, is left to the ability of the composer and the executants, and to the predilection and taste of the hearer.

Lourie's sonata, when the altos sang the sacred words—their voices were euphonious in themselves and well-trained—sounded as if bolshevistic instruments were attempting to discompose the singers, if not to jeer and mock their pious office. Seldom, if ever, have we heard such a laborious, ineffectual, needlessly cacophonous use of instruments, which, when treated kindly and skilfully, respond gratefully to the wish of a composer who would be picturesque, dramatic, or emotional by the assemblage and disposition of sounds. Puccini did his best to give musical emphasis to the torture scene in "Tosca." That music is of pastoral melliflence compared to the excruciating sounds that came from M. Lourie's tortured instruments. The sounds were not illustrative of the Divine passion; they might have served at the black mass with Satan grinning hideously as the celebrant.

M. Lourie is not brainless; he has written fluently and often shrewdly about music, but it is easier to write about music than to write it. Years ago Fontenelle asked: "Sonata, what do you wish of me?" The hearers yesterday would not answer this question in an equivocal manner.

But there was much to enjoy in the concert; the sonata was only a passing disturbance in the air of the hall. There was a charming performance of Beethoven's symphony by a reduced orchestra; one that for clarity, fine taste, sheer beauty could not be surpassed. This performance in its way was as severe a test of the players and the interpretative ability of Dr. Koussevitzky as was the superbly glowing and stirring performance of Strauss' autobiography with its amazingly egotistic pages. Much of this tone poem is of the too fluent poorer Strauss, but the performance almost persuaded the hearer that the music was worthy the composer of "Till," "Don Juan," "Don Quixote" and "Der Rosenkavalier." Certain pages in "Ein Heldenleben" still worked their spell. Those depicting the hero's wooing, with the solo violin played brilliantly by Mr. Burgin. It was pleasant to hear the quotations from Strauss' earlier works. Then there is the peaceful contemplative ending, pages that Strauss has seldom surpassed, perhaps only in the "recognition" scene of "Elektra" and the presentation of the rose by the cavalier.

The concert will be repeated tonight. The next concerts will be on Jan. 16, 17, when Arthur Hadley will conduct. His program is thus arranged: Haydn, Symphony, E flat major, No. 1; McKinley, "Masquerade" (first time at these concerts). Hadley "Salome" (after Oscar Wilde); also Hadley's suite, "Streets of Pekin," which will be played for the first time in Boston. The conductor of the concerts of Jan. 23, 24, will be E. Fernandez Arbos.

"HELDENLEBEN" AT SYMPHONY CONCERT

Strauss' Tone Poem Given Brilliant Performance

The chief item on a curiously assorted program at yesterday's Symphony concert was Richard Strauss' tone poem, "Ein Heldenleben." Beethoven's First Symphony, and a work entitled "Sonate Liturgique, in the form of Four Chorales," by Arthur Lourie, performed for the first time in America, were the other numbers.

"Ein Heldenleben" was more warmly applauded yesterday than it has usually been at these concerts. Its greater length and complexity, as well as its less salient thematic material, have in the past made it less appealing than "Don Juan" or "Till Eulenspiegel" have long since proved to be to the audiences here and elsewhere.

One may now dismiss the problem of relating the music to the legend of the hero as unimportant. It does not matter whether the quotations from other works by Strauss indicate that the composer is his own hero. It does not matter just which measures indicate the low earthly nature of the hero's detractors, and which indicate his soul taking its final flight. Most musicians now are agreed that it is futile to endeavor to tell a circumstantial story, or paint a detailed picture in tones. Absolute music is again in fashion, and the 19th century with its program music is dead and gone.

Love Music

What really matters in "Ein Heldenleben" is that Strauss has run out of musical ideas. His themes are no more vital, no more powerful than those in his "Alpine Symphony." Nor can all his mastery of instrumentation and of polyphony hide the essential poverty of this score. The love music, its most appealing page, is commonplace. The hero's struggles, though magnificently sonorous, delight only by sheer volume and quality of tone.

One has only to imagine "Ein Heldenleben" transcribed for string quartet to perceive the weakness of Strauss' music. Yesterday's applause was a tribute to the interpretative talent of Dr. Koussevitzky, and to the magnificent outpouring of orchestral tone from the players. Nor should Mr. Burgin's admirable playing of the taxing cadenza-like passages for solo violin be forgotten.

Lourie, or Lurye (the name is spelled both ways), is a Russian Jew, whose family is said to have been converted to Catholicism some generations back. He is a well-to-do resident of Paris, where he has a hand in many musical ventures. He has composed a good deal of music. He is writing a biography of Dr. Koussevitzky, which is announced for publication in New York next Spring.

The work by Lourie heard yesterday is unlike anything else ever played in Boston. It is scored for a small group of wind instruments, double basses, piano, and alto voices. There are four movements, with titles taken from the Roman Catholic liturgy. The first is instrumental, though its title "Sequentia" would make one expect a setting of, say, "Victimae paschali laudes." The second is "Cantus Passionis," for altos and instruments. Its text is the "Tenebrae factae sunt." The third movement is called "Prosa," a liturgical term which would also lead one to expect verses spoken or sung, but it, like the first, is for instruments. The last is verses for alto chorus about the hours of suffering of Christ on the cross. The singers were from the Cecilia Society, trained by Arthur Fiedler.

Wished to Be Original

The title, "sonata in the form of four chorals," is nonsense, according to received notions of musical form. One felt in the music, also, that the composer wished to be original and believed that originality means breaking all the rules. But any child can do that. It takes a Schoenberg or a Stravinsky to do it well. Lourie's music is not devoid of talent. He plainly has harmonic sense and a devotion to medieval liturgical music. But the work heard yesterday is amateurish.

Beethoven's first is, by common consent, the least interesting of his symphonies. In it he played the sedulous ape to Mozart without attaining to anything like the style of the G minor and "Jupiter" symphonies of that composer. Yesterday's performance, inaccurate in detail in the first movement, was spirited and lively in minuet and finale.

There are no Symphony concerts next Friday and Saturday. Dr. Henry Hadley will appear as guest conductor Jan. 16 and 17.

Afternoon Of Richard The Second

Dr. Koussevitzky Creates Anew A Straussian Masterpiece, The Cerebral Lourie

THE second half of the Symphony Concert, yesterday afternoon, fell to Strauss's tone-poem, "A Hero's Life." Piece and performance nearly effaced the memory of all that had gone before. "Ein Heldenleben," as the German title runs, was the first of Strauss's longer works played by Dr. Koussevitzky to Bostonian audiences. With it, he was then on the way to be master-conductor. Now he has gained and assured that mastery. His orchestra, in those earlier years, was still an imperfect instrument. Now it is entirely and instantly responsive to his will, able, besides, to bring to pass whatever he—or the composer—asks. Remember from this performance of Strauss's tone-poem the unfailing certainty and richness of the eight horns, the beauty with which the first of them, Mr. Böttcher, clothed his tone; the wealth of voice in the strings, controlled by the utmost sensibility; the measured power of the brass; the individual quality of the woodwinds, the endless plasticity and resilience of the whole orchestra. It played as 110 men—for it was present in full numbers. It played also as one man—Dr. Koussevitzky, for Strauss.

The outcome was a performance of "A Hero's Life" in which veracity, saliency and felicity deepened into beauty or ascended into power. As exposition, it made "Ein Heldenleben" as clear as an autumn day. For once, those intricate passages in which Strauss twines together motifs from his earlier works, seemed a sounding as well as a paper music. For once, the measures of battle were ordered, not jumbled, dissonance; while the derision from the hero's adversaries proceeded, as it should, out of a cheeping background. These signs denote a performance in the newer, rather than the elder, manner with Strauss. When "Ein Heldenleben" first made the round of American concert-halls, it was custom to bear on hard and speak very loud. The adversaries squealed; the battle; the so-called heroic than in the outset the on the world, so, d from it most the canvas, the e broader the e conductor, or to the heroic ne Straussians— were sometimes gone the way of recent memory simplified it here- er now prevails. Dr. Koussevitzky orchestra failed hat first superb less proclaimed; upbuilding him the tonal stage. he pause before e mélée of living e pages for the uality as music t of the shadows, d shrill far down the "love-scene" price of the be-upon Mr. Bur- arous close, with an melody tem- those who may . . . The battle- ear by riot than the close, of the down the wind. . . . The rest, pes it, is a single mulating music. s memories and e feats of coun- the Straussian house. To our for granted—in s, these semi- brance; hear the be only débris ng; then resigned ess. They will a solemn mur- ear and high. He is less trans- n now by "Wel- into descending 'Birthday Over-ed and played, ains high-placed afternoon was in the music of ta," played and in the United y. Thirty years as first cleared; t lessen. Save as first cleared; ersaries and the nvoked a small odwinds (less uba), of double- it a chamber- s from Arthur chestra played "Prose," out of as described a olumnas; joined Song" and the again out of the quality of ssible to write.

"HELDENLEBEN" AT SYMPHONY CONCERT

Strauss' Tone Poem Given Brilliant Performance

The chief item on a curiously assorted program at yesterday's Symphony concert was Richard Strauss' tone poem, "Ein Heldenleben." Beethoven's First Symphony, and a work entitled "Sonate Liturgique, in the form of Four Chorales," by Arthur Lourie, performed for the first time in America, were the other numbers.

"Ein Heldenleben" was more warmly applauded yesterday than it has usually been at these concerts. Its greater length and complexity, as well as its less salient thematic material, have in the past made it less appealing than "Don Juan" or "Till Eulenspiegel" have long since proved to be to the audiences here and elsewhere.

One may now dismiss the problem of relating the music to the legend of the hero as unimportant. It does not matter whether the quotations from other works by Strauss indicate that the composer is his own hero. It does not matter just which measures indicate the low earthly nature of the hero's detractors, and which indicate his soul taking its final flight. Most musicians now are agreed that it is futile to endeavor to tell a circumstantial story, or paint a detailed picture in tones. Absolute music is again in fashion, and the 19th century with its program music is dead and gone.

Love Music

What really matters in "Ein Heldenleben" is that Strauss has run out of musical ideas. His themes are no more vital, no more powerful than those in his "Alpine Symphony." Nor can all his mastery of instrumentation and of polyphony hide the essential poverty of this score. The love music, its most appealing page, is commonplace. The hero's struggles, though magnificently sonorous, delight only by sheer volume and quality of tone.

One has only to imagine "Ein Heldenleben" transcribed for string quartet to perceive the weakness of Strauss' music. Yesterday's applause was a tribute to the talent of Dr. Koussevitzky's magnificent outpouring of tone from the players. Mr. Burgin's admirable playing of the taxing cadenza-like passage for violin be forgotten.

Lourie, or Lurye (the name in both ways), is a Russian. His family is said to have been converted to Catholicism some generations ago. He is a well-to-do resident of Paris where he has a hand in many musical ventures. He has composed a great deal of music. He is writing a biography of Dr. Koussevitzky, which is announced for publication in New York next Spring.

The work by Lourie heard yesterday is unlike anything else ever played in Boston. It is scored for a small group of wind instruments, double bass, piano, and alto voices. There are five movements, with titles taken from the Roman Catholic liturgy. The first instrumental, though its title "Sequentia" would make one expect a setting of, say, "Victimae paschali laude." The second is "Cantus Paschalis," for altos and instruments. Its text is "Tenebrae factae sunt." The third movement is called "Prosa," a liturgical term which would also lead one to expect verses spoken or sung, but like the first, is for instruments. The last is verses for alto chorus about the hours of suffering of Christ on the cross. The singers were from the Cecilia Society, trained by Arthur Fiedler.

Wished to Be Original

The title, "sonata in the form of chorals," is nonsense, according to received notions of musical form. One felt in the music, also, that the composer wished to be original and believe that originality means breaking all the rules. But any child can do that. It takes a Schoenberg or a Stravinsky to do it well. Lourie's music is not a work of talent. He plainly has no melodic sense and a devotion to medieval liturgical music. But the work heard yesterday is amateurish.

Beethoven's first is, by common consent, the least interesting of his symphonies. In it he played the sedulous ape to Mozart without attaining anything like the style of the G minor and "Jupiter" symphonies of that composer. Yesterday's performance, in accurate detail in the first movement, was spirited and lively in the finale.

There are no Symphony concerts on Friday and Saturday. Dr. Henry Lewis will appear as guest conductor on 16 and 17.

PERU A Mystic Empire

Ageless as the Beliefs, weird and

... fables of An-lighted by a Sun-mighty Condor tal-

cestors descende-

Moon and god-like came riding the fo-

... fuse with the ling-dor of medieval Spin the Peru of today

aeon-threaded pat-

Splendid ruins...

mountain terraces

verdant valleys lus-glories... recall a than any on Earth

engineering... masonry etched mosaics, survive in desolation... mute irony on the of Conquistadores to civilize.

Different... glorification, is the voylatitudes on famships. Solacing d-

the witchery of t-sprinkled with bri-

where in Colo-

He was a brazen tumult; the so-called "love-scene" was more heroic than intimate and solitary; as at the outset the hero was proclaimed upon the world, so, at the close, he departed from it most sonorously. The vaster the canvas, the bolder the outline, the broader the strokes, the nearer were conductor, orchestra and audience to the heroic Strauss. No wonder, the Straussians—Huneker in the van—were sometimes hard put to defend him.

The old manner has gone the way of most over-zeal. Within recent memory only Mr. Mengelberg exemplified it hereabouts. The new manner now prevails. Consistently, yesterday, Dr. Koussevitzky followed it. Though the orchestra failed him ever so little at that first superb leap into the music, he less proclaimed than characterized the hero; upbuilding him in full-rounded life upon the tonal stage. Finely suspensive was the pause before the hero springs into the mêlée of living and doing. . . . The pages for the adversaries had true quality as music heard from a distance out of the shadows, as light-birds chatter and shrill far down the horizon. . . . The "love-scene" mounted out of the caprice of the beginning—lightly moody upon Mr. Burgin's violin—to the rapturous close, with the sweep of the Straussian melody tempered to its depth, as of those who may not speak for loving. . . . The battle-episode less stirred the ear by riot than by the sounding, toward the close, of the hero's motif, victorious, down the wind, over the stricken field. . . . The rest, as Dr. Koussevitzky shapes it, is a single unfolding, ascending, cumulating music. We traverse the hero's memories and barely heed the incredible feats of counterpoint—once for all the Straussian technique is to be taken for granted—in the melancholy of remembrance; hear the hero restless and champing; then resigned and contemplative; to a solemn music putting the world away. He is less transfigured than vanished—into descending silence.

So imagined, designed and played, "Ein Heldenleben" remains high-placed in the music of Strauss, in the music of the turn of the century. Thirty years on, its shadow does not lessen. Save for the pages of the adversaries and the battle, there is no need to regard it in historical perspective. Rather, the listener looks forward; wonders how the next generation will in turn receive it. No doubt the snarling of the adversaries belongs to the days when bitter realism was a strange new thing in symphonic music. Reasonably enough, these sneering pages seem now a perverse petulance on the part of Strauss. But when was a genius such without that counter-quality? Nowadays, again, the din of the battle

ism in the con- is the course ose—the reduc- a background, of hero and en- which the love- all three signify, is not lowered. tions and there r sons and suc- s "the greater who is manifold n in tones; of nd definition of has thereby ex- c. The Strauss the blending of e simultaneous ion, character- of the theater ely pinnacle in in, the Strauss heart to water ng, deep-sound- e superior may but they still imagination of ther half of the all-shapen form, re of color, the resource.

can exalt us th beauty, join nity, in more ve heard him, at the end of on" and now of re yet to hear in the match- h of Don Quix- of Strauss is ontaet with his "Alpine Sym- to "The Egyp- house. To our es, these semi- be only débris ess. They will ear and high, n now by "Wel- figured than vanished—into descending "Birthday Over-afternoon was ta," played and in the United as first cleared; invoked a small oodwinds (less uba), of double- it a chamber- s from Arthur orchestra played "Prose," out of as described a olums; joined Song" and the again out of the quality of ssible to write.

"HELDENLEBEN" AT SYMPHONY CONCERT

Strauss' Tone Poem Given Brilliant Performance

The chief item on a curiously assorted program at yesterday's Symphony concert was Richard Strauss' tone poem, "Ein Heldenleben." Beethoven's First Symphony, and a work entitled "Sonata Liturgique, in the form of Four Chorales," by Arthur Lourie, performed for the first time in America, were the other numbers.

"Ein Heldenleben" was more warmly applauded yesterday than it has usually been at these concerts. Its greater length and complexity, as well as its less salient thematic material, have in the past made it less appealing than "Don Juan" or "Till Eulenspiegel" have long since proved to be to the audiences here and elsewhere.

One may now dismiss the problem of relating the music to the legend of the hero as unimportant. It does not matter whether the quotations from other works by Strauss indicate that the composer is his own hero. It does not matter just which measures indicate the low earthly nature of the hero's detractors, and which indicate his soul taking its final flight. Most musicians now are agreed that it is futile to endeavor to tell a circumstantial story, or paint a detailed picture in tones. Absolute music is again in fashion, and the 19th century with its program music is dead and gone.

Love Music

What really matters in "Ein Heldenleben" is that Strauss has run out of musical ideas. His themes are no more vital, no more powerful than those in his "Alpine Symphony." Nor can all his mastery of instrumentation and of polyphony hide the essential poverty of this score. The love music, its most appealing page, is commonplace. The hero's struggles, though magnificently sonorous, delight only by sheer volume and quality of tone.

One has only to imagine "Ein Heldenleben" transcribed for string quartet to perceive the weakness of Strauss' music. Yesterday's applause was a tribute to the talent of Dr. Koussevitzky, magnificent outpouring of tone from the players. Mr. Burgin's admirable playing taxing cadenza-like passages, violin be forgotten.

Lourie, or Lurye (the name both ways), is a Russian family is said to have been converted to Catholicism some generations ago. He is a well-to-do resident of New York where he has a hand in many musical ventures. He has composed a deal of music. He is writing a biography of Dr. Koussevitzky, which is announced for publication in New York next Spring.

The work by Lourie heard yesterday is unlike anything else ever played in Boston. It is scored for a small group of wind instruments, double bass, piano, and alto voices. There are four movements, with titles taken from Roman Catholic liturgy. The first instrumental, though its title "Sequentia" would make one expect a setting of, say, "Victimae paschali laudes," the second is "Cantus Paschalis," the third is "Tenebrae factae sunt." The last movement is called "Prosa," a musical term which would also lead one to expect verses spoken or sung, but like the first, is for instruments. The last is verses for alto chorus about hours of suffering of Christ on the cross. The singers were from the Cecilia Society, trained by Art Fiedler.

Wished to Be Original

The title, "sonata in the form of four chorals," is nonsense, according to received notions of musical form. It is felt in the music, also, that the composer wished to be original and believed that originality means breaking all rules. But any child can do that. It takes a Schumann or a Stravinsky to do it well. Lourie's music is not a work of talent. He plainly has a musical sense and a devotion to musical liturgical music. But the work he presented yesterday is amateurish.

Beethoven's first is, by common consent, the least interesting of his symphonies. In it he played the sedulous ape to Mozart without attaining anything like the style of the German and "Jupiter" symphonies of that composer. Yesterday's performance, accurate in detail in the first movement, was spirited and lively in the finale.

There are no Symphony concerts on Friday and Saturday. Dr. Henry Lewis will appear as guest conductor on 16 and 17.

P
A M Agel Beliefs,
... fal lighted mighty cestor Moon came r
... fus dor of in the l aeon-t Splenc mount verdar glorie than a engir maso mosa deso mute of C to ci Diff tinat latit ship
the spri

at the Atlantic side of in Panama City and on the Pacific. You are throughout by the comforts, and super of Grace Line service
If time is important make the circle, New Peru and back in 23
for as little as $395.
more and a few days time you can include at a correspondingly make the circle America.

Write today for

Grace

33 DEVONSHIRE ST. or Local Steamship HUB hard 036

Four Horses in New Orleans

New Orleans, Jan. 3 (A) and a barking dog early heric roles in a fire that four Thoroughbreds at the race plant which opened racing season on New Year.

Mrs. J. W. Thoman, assistant near the track, was dog's continuous barking to see flames licking at the eight.

The quick response of ment was credited with valuable Thoroughbreds in six and seven nearby.

The racers lost in the Minister, Rusticate and three owned by W. H. Fize a fourth horse, Honey Gre.

Two Negroes and an aroused before the fire arrived, managed to save horses quartered in the bla

N. E. Amateur Three Championship Her

The New England cushion championship to be held at the State Theat is a commonplace of realism in the concert-hall. The salvation is the course that Dr. Koussevitzky chose—the reduction of the tumult to a background, against which the motifs of hero and enemy may flare, above which the love-motiv may hover. Then all three signify, and the level of the whole is not lowered.

Put by these two divisions and there remains fourfold what our sons and successors may call with us "the greater Strauss." The Strauss who is manifold master of characterization in tones; of the musical implication and definition of psychological states; who has thereby extended the domain of music. The Strauss who is no less master of the blending of musical progress with the simultaneous course of thought, emotion, characterization. As such—music of the theater aside—he sits upon a lonely pinnacle in the concert-hall. Yet again, the Strauss who can turn the listening heart to water with those long, upswelling, deep-sounding, diatonic melodies. The superior may call them commonplace; but they still seize the ears and the imagination of most that hear; while another half of the mind lays hold upon the full-shapen form, the rich texture, the range of color, the inexhaustible, ever-ready resource.

Last, the Strauss who can exalt us with power, touch us with beauty, join together pathos and solemnity, in more than one close. We have heard him, from Dr. Koussevitzky, at the end of "Death and Transfiguration" and now of "A Hero-Life." We have yet to hear him, from the conductor, in the matchless close of all—the death of Don Quixote. . . . Our notion of Strauss is cluttered by too close contact with his years of decline from the "Alpine Symphony" in the concert-hall to "The Egyptian Helen" in the opera house. To our sons' sons these routines, these semi-failures and failures, will be only debris about the feet of greatness. They will see Richard Strauss clear and high. Who remembers Beethoven now by "Wellington's Victory" or the "Birthday Overture?"

The novel number of the afternoon was Lourie's "Liturgical Sonata," played and sung for the first time in the United States. For it, the stage was first cleared; then in the center were convoked a small chamber-orchestra of woodwinds (less flutes), of brass (less the tuba), of double-basses and piano; around it a chamber-choir of twelve alto voices from Arthur Fiedler's Cecilia. This orchestra played the "Sequence" and the "Prose," out of the ancient Roman office, as described a few days back in these columns; joined with the voices in the "Song" and the "Hours" of the Passion, again out of Roman service-books. Of the quality of the performance it is impossible to write.

since it asked a recondite knowledge and a state of listening mind which nowadays not one in a hundred, in any concert-room, may yield. With the rarest exceptions, what do the most learned and cultivated listeners at Symphony Hall know of the Ambrosian plain-song which was, by report, Mr. Lourié's source book and model? With as few exceptions, how many of us may regain the mystical, ecstatic moods of the pietists of the early church, when they listened to these stark and monotonous measures and knew the Son of God upon his Cross? Since Dr. Koussevitzky had prepared the music of a friend; since virtuosi of the Symphony Orchestra played and a well-schooled choir sang, be it assumed that the performance did the Sonata justice.

To the nearly insuperable obstacle of musical matter and procedure alien to listeners in this thirty-first year of the twentieth century, even though our own polytonality now and then streaks it; to the nearly total lack in most of us of responsive mind and mood, add yet another barrier. There is no doubt that Mr. Lourié is deeply devout, worshipping God in spirit and in truth; that he believes himself possessed of a spiritual illumination which he would communicate in music to his follow-men. Yet to most that listened yesterday, that faith and enlightenment seemed wholly mental; that transmission wholly from the mind. The most pagan of us may listen to Bach and know the mystical longings of the believing and uplifted Christian. Bach touches our emotions as he sways our minds. Sursum corda, and we also must obey.

Down the centuries, with Franck at his highest, we may again share, from tones, mystical vision and rapture. In our own time, the English Holst is no stranger to the idiom and the exaltation of ancient plain-song. Here and now on remembered pages, Mr. Loeffler has touched us with the stripped beauty, the evocative power, of this music of the Roman fathers. But his heart had first been touched. Whereas, Mr. Lourié's processes in this "Liturgical Sonata" seem wholly mental. In his mind he assimilated the ancient music; by mental will would write in the twentieth century kindred matter in kindred manner. In his mind are all his faith and all his exaltation. For him a state of the spirit becomes an operation of the reason. To no more than our minds can he communicate it; whereas he should penetrate our hearts; while between most of our minds and his opens an impassable breach. No more dryly cerebral music (as the word goes) than Mr. Lourié's has been heard in recent memory across Symphony Hall. Little has been more coldly received. He might be readable in shire

after-
W. manu-
y. At thered or the Fran-church. funeral out by ly and Lodge.
Wale was in ter of ational rvice son of many es in quartet country times

H. but amed.

St. Thomas Aquinas, but comprehension as tone-poet
Dr. Koussevitzky is, most open-minded of conduc-

Beethoven began the conthoven of the First Sym-d by a diminished orchesa conductor all susceptible itive hand. So this "new hony for full orchestra" sounded to the Viennese the spring of 1800. But we knowing well the succeed-d Beethoven's other master-concert-hall. Whatever his upon this beginning, they the back of the conductor's lays the first movement and fancy we hear, a bolder out-spacing, a broader melody, eenth-century Viennese symof the Beethoven who was enlarge symphonic substance mic form. The slow moves, and all agree that it is century—Beethoven following lels. The Minuet-Scherzo folteenth-century and the best say again to ourselves. But beyond is our perceptive who can find in it the germ new-made Scherzi to come.
introduction to the Finale
s, indeed, none but the future could so herald his maturer

Thus our ears and minds little symphony, still pleasing self, is nearly lost in a haze
on.
H. T. P.

SYMPHONY GLORIFIES STRAUSS

"A Hero's Life" Given Superbly Artistic Performance

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

To the eye as to the ear the Symphony Concert of yesterday afternoon presented curious contrasts.
For Beethoven's First Symphony, which began the concert, Dr.
Koussevitzky reduced the number of strings, as is now his judicious way with 18th century pieces. Lourié's
"Sonate Liturgique," which followed, called for a band of 13, plus 10 alto singers, while Strauss' "Ein Helden-leben," assembled, as it seemed by comparison, a veritable army of instrumentalists.

LOURIE'S MUSIC DISMAL

The oddly styled sonata by Arthur Lourié, a Russian, who lives in Paris, a Jew whose forebears turned to Christ-ianity, was first intended by Dr. Koussevitzky for performance at the concerts of last week. Fortunately, Dr.
Koussevitzky saw the light and postponed it. Here is no music for the holiday season, even if the Latin words of the second and fourth sections, in which the singers are used, had not specifically to do with the crucifixion.
For Lourié's music, scored for wind instruments, four stringed basses and pianoforte, is dismal, lugubrious; music suggestive of sackcloth and ashes.

When the final chord of this sonata died away the audience seemed not to realize that the piece was ended, and there was no answering applause until Dr. Koussevitzky turned on the stand as if to signify that hand-clapping was in order. Indeed he had completed part of his journey toward the green room ere the perfunctory plaudits were forthcoming. Plainly few had found Lourié's sonata, music of undoubted sincerity and individuality of expression, to their liking.

Make Strauss Imposing

How different was the reception accorded the "Heldenleben," which yesterday, for all its extreme length, and the strain it imposes on the listening ear and the receiving mind, scored a popular success.

In turn these long-continued signs of approbation were acknowledged by Dr.
Koussevitzky, who had conducted with sympathy, understanding and a quickening ardor; by Mr. Burgin, who had played as virtuoso and poetizing musician the difficult and important part for solo violin, and by all the players of the orchestra who had responded nobly to Dr. Koussevitzky's efforts to make songful each strand of the contrapuntal web, to bring clarity and proportion out of Strauss' maze of notes, to characterize the hero, his snarling adversaries, his coy, yet tender helpmeet, his brave challenge to the world, his mighty struggle, and his final retreat from the sphere of action into that of contemplation.

32 Years of Age

Next March will bring the 32nd anniversary of the first performance of this remarkably conceived, remarkably executed tone-poem which at that time must have seemed, as we know in fact that it did, a baffling, confusing, overwhelmingly distracting music. Today
"A Hero's Life" is far easier of comprehension, yet not all who sit in critical places are willing to admit that the later symphonic Strauss is the greater Strauss, to accept the obvious parallel with Wagner and place the second Richard's "Don Juan," "Death and Transfiguration" and "Till Eulen-spiegel" with the "Flying Dutchman," "Tannhauser" and "Lohengrin," his "Zarathustra," "Ein Heldenleben,"
"Don Quixote" and Alpine Symphony with "Tristan," "Meistersinger," "Parsifal" and the "Ring."

Like Mahler and Bruckner, the Strauss of the later tone-poem is a debatable figure, by some adored, by others suspected.

since it asked a recondite knowledge a treatise upon St. Thomas Aquinas, but he is beyond comprehension as tone-poet in plain-song. . . . Dr. Koussevitzky is, indeed, the most open-minded of conductors.

The young Beethoven began the concert—the Beethoven of the First Symphony, played by a diminished orchestra, with the conductor all susceptible ear and sensitive hand. So this "new grand symphony for full orchestra" may have sounded to the Viennese hearing it in the spring of 1800. But we of 1930 listen, knowing well the succeeding eight and Beethoven's other masterpieces of the concert-hall. Whatever his concentration upon this beginning, they are also at the back of the conductor's head. He plays the first movement and we hear, or fancy we hear, a bolder outline, a wider spacing, a broader melody, less of eighteenth-century Viennese symphonies than of the Beethoven who was to free and enlarge symphonic substance and symphonic form. The slow movement ensues, and all agree that it is the best models. The Minuet-Scherzo follows. Eighteenth-century and the best models, we say again to ourselves. But three rows beyond is our perceptive friend, Ixe, who can find in it the germ of all the new-made Scherzi to come. The slow introduction to the Finale sounds. Yes, indeed, none but the future Beethoven could so herald his maturer self. . . . Thus our ears and minds go, and a little symphony, still pleasing in its young self, is nearly lost in a haze of speculation.

To the nearly insuperable obstacle of musical matter and procedure alien to listeners in this thirty-first year of the twentieth century, even though our polytonality now and then streaks the nearly total lack in most of the responsive mind and mood, add yet another barrier. There is no doubt Mr. Lourie is deeply devout, worshipping God in spirit and in truth; that he believes himself possessed of a spiritual illumination which he would communicate to his follow-men. Yet to that listened yesterday, that faith-enlightenment seemed wholly mental; transmission wholly from the self. The most pagan of us may listen to and know the mystical longings of believing and uplifted Christian. touches our emotions as he sways go, and a little symphony, still pleasing in its young self, is nearly lost in a haze of speculation.

Down the centuries, with Franck at his highest, we may again share, from tones, mystical vision and rapture. In our own time, the English Holst is no stranger to the idiom and the exaltation of ancient plain-song. Here and now on remembered pages, Mr. Loeffler has touched us with the stripped beauty, the evocative power, of this music of the Roman fathers. But his heart had first been touched. Whereas, Mr. Lourie's processes in this "Liturgical Sonata" seem wholly mental. In his mind he assimilated the ancient music; by mental will would write in the twentieth century kindred matter in kindred manner. In his mind are all his faith and all his exaltation. For him a state of the spirit becomes an operation of the reason. To no more than our minds can he communicate it; whereas he should penetrate our hearts; while between most of our minds and his opens an impassable breach. No more dryly cerebral music (as the word goes) than Mr. Lourie's has been heard in recent memory across Symphony Hall. Little has been more coldly received. He might be readable in

The young Beethoven began the concert—the Beethoven of the First Symphony, played by a diminished orchestra, with the conductor all susceptible ear and sensitive hand. So this "new grand symphony for full orchestra" may have sounded to the Viennese hearing it in the spring of 1800. But we of 1930 listen, knowing well the succeeding eight and Beethoven's other masterpieces of the concert-hall. Whatever his concentration upon this beginning, they are also at the back of the conductor's head. He plays the first movement and we hear, or fancy we hear, a bolder outline, a wider spacing, a broader melody, less of eighteenth-century Viennese symphonies than of the Beethoven who was to free and enlarge symphonic substance and symphonic form. The slow movement ensues, and all agree that it is the best models. The Minuet-Scherzo follows. Eighteenth-century and the best models, we say again to ourselves. But three rows beyond is our perceptive friend, Ixe, who can find in it the germ of all the new-made Scherzi to come. The slow introduction to the Finale sounds. Yes, indeed, none but the future Beethoven could so herald his maturer self. . . . Thus our ears and minds go, and a little symphony, still pleasing in its young self, is nearly lost in a haze of speculation.

H. T. P.

SYMPHONY GLORIFIES STRAUSS

"A Hero's Life" Given Superbly Artistic Performance

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

To the eye as to the ear the Symphony Concert of yesterday afternoon presented curious contrasts. For Beethoven's First Symphony, which began the concert, Dr. Koussevitzky reduced the number of strings, as is now his judicious way with 18th century pieces. Lourie's "Sonate Liturgique," which followed, called for a band of 13, plus 10 alto singers, while Strauss' "Ein Heldenleben," assembled, as it seemed by comparison, a veritable army of instrumentalists.

LOURIE'S MUSIC DISMAL

The oddly styled sonata by Arthur Lourie, a Russian, who lives in Paris, a Jew whose forebears turned to Christianity, was first intended by Dr. Koussevitzky for performance at the concerts of last week. Fortunately, Dr. Koussevitzky saw the light and postponed it. Here is no music for the holiday season, even if the Latin words of the second and fourth sections, in which the singers are used, had not specifically to do with the crucifixion. For Lourie's music, scored for wind instruments, four stringed basses and pianoforte, is dismal, lugubrious; music suggestive of sackcloth and ashes.

When the final chord of this sonata died away the audience seemed not to realize that the piece was ended, and there was no answering applause until Dr. Koussevitzky turned on the stand as if to signify that hand-clapping was in order. Indeed he had completed part of his journey toward the green room ere the perfunctory plaudits were forthcoming. Plainly few had found Lourie's sonata, music of undoubted sincerity and individuality of expression, to their liking.

Make Strauss Imposing

How different was the reception accorded the "Heldenleben," which yesterday, for all its extreme length, and the strain it imposes on the listening ear and the receiving mind, scored a popular success.

In turn these long-continued signs of approbation were acknowledged by Dr. Koussevitzky, who had conducted with sympathy, understanding and a quickening ardor; by Mr. Burgin, who had played as virtuoso and poetizing musician the difficult and important part for solo violin, and by all the players of the orchestra who had responded nobly to Dr. Koussevitzky's efforts to make songful each strand of the contrapuntal web, to bring clarity and proportion out of Strauss' maze of notes, to characterize the hero, his snarling adversaries, his coy, yet tender helpmeet, his brave challenge to the world, his mighty struggle, and his final retreat from the sphere of action into that of contemplation.

32 Years of Age

Next March will bring the 32nd anniversary of the first performance of this remarkably conceived, remarkably executed tone-poem which at that time must have seemed, as we know in fact that it did, a baffling, confusing, overwhelmingly distracting music. Today "A Hero's Life" is far easier of comprehension, yet not all who sit in critical places are willing to admit that the later symphonic Strauss is the greater Strauss, to accept the obvious parallel with Wagner and place the second Richard's "Don Juan," "Death and Transfiguration" and "Till Eulenspiegel" with the "Flying Dutchman," "Tannhauser" and "Lohengrin," his "Zarathustra," "Ein Heldenleben," "Don Quixote" and Alpine Symphony with "Tristan," "Meistersinger," "Parsifal" and the "Ring."

Like Mahler and Bruckner, the Strauss of the later tone-poem is a debatable figure, by some adored, by others suspected.

Holiday Ends, The Concerts Proceed Again

Lourie and His Plain Song,
New Grist of Programs,
Guest-Conductors

FOR the first concerts of the new year Dr. Koussevitzky and the Symphony Orchestra, together with a semi-chorus of altos from The Cecelia, will play, and sing, as novelty Arthur Lourie's "Sonate liturgique en forme de quatre chorales." To which title the score adds "Anno Domini 1928." The career of Arthur Lourie, of whose work Boston has as yet heard nothing, is a varied one. He is of Jewish stock, though the family have been Roman Catholics for some generations. He was born in Petersburg (as it then was in 1892. (Reimann's Dictionary, according to the best information obtainable hereabouts, is incorrect in giving the date as 1884.) He was educated in the schools, musical and otherwise, of his native city. After the Revolution he was active in Government service. From 1918 to 1920 he held a position which we should probably call head of the Music Division of the Department of Fine Arts.—If we had a Fine Arts Department in the Cabinet of our country. A large part of his duty was to facilitate the interchange of artists between Russia and the rest of Europe. In 1923 he left Russia and settled in Paris, where he has since remained. While in Russia he was known as an extremely radical composer.

Arrived in Paris, Lourie spent some years in meditation and study, thinking through his methods, polishing his technical equipment, enlarging his point of view, building for himself finally a personal esthetic. During this period he avoided publicity as far as possible. While other composers were looking for performances of their works, Lourie tried to keep his ally, that performed. According to the New York Times, "from without merged with a technique which clarified, and a prevailing had altered from that last half to pure faith and last summer article on Lourie's London heard in New York it or the ntorum, March 26, 1930, was the ues: "It is evident from as once m various literary ex-us" out-composer, that Lourie complete absorption and New York, toward one object—veyed to expression of religion, roach of intense concentration is ersed and with and experience. a season to plain chant as the y, it has to recon- words could be used possibly in tness about the "Son- d it forth Devotion to his re- gress in otivating power in ater and his music as well as d of the he goes back to the piece is he music of the church ton from s new style. Not con- good, aser music of his plain- ed. Andles and hymns of the ough and of the Christian era. play it in rces, in other words, mbrosian (after Am- ilan, A. D. 333 to 397) -ian (after Gregory the o 604). To continue onorable Mr. Downes: "In em- Colonial sian chant Lourie logi- the town schews nineteenth-cen- light and and returns to what is e rapidly ism, although he does ger audi some passages d Mrs. lity."

case at author of no little im- tributes variously nian hori- id periodicals. For the luced by Music he has writ- 1929, now 'Neogothic and Neo- ter a full inquiry into Melody.' the wis- himself a profound pretended philosopher whose pro- ooth, Be- he ring of authority. cessor to: two articles Schae- Tremont of expressionists are Monday, oth." while Stravin Theater 'neo-classicists.' He with thees a possible synthe- next with ends by questioning life in the h a desirable union in the lody" places melody music, entirely out- Barrymore e opines that "per- ter Mary" at hand when that trying play have set aside will cific coast. ornerstone."

The New Work

The four "chorales" of the "Liturgical Sonat" are I. Sequentia; II. Chant de la Passion; III. Prosa; IV. Horloges de la Passion. The orchestra consists of oboes and English horn, clarinets and bass-clarinets, bassoons, trumpets, trombones, piano, double-basses, and in the second and fourth numbers a small chorus of altos. The Sequence and Prose are hymns taken from the office of the Mass. In the article, "Sequence," in Grove's Dictionary we read: "A hymn of peculiar structure, which owes its name to its position in the Mass. It appears there as the continuation or sequence of the Gradual (the response sung between Epistle and Gospel) and the Alleluia. Originally it was a long jubilus or melody attached to the final a' of the Alleluia. In the ninth century in France words were adapted to the notes, and these were called a 'Prose,' because they followed the lines of the music, and not any scheme of meter. When these compositions had thus won a place for themselves, fresh ones came to be written in regular meter, and the old name 'Prose' being unsuitable, gave way to the new name Sequence. From the twelfth century to the fifteenth such compositions were most popular. Two examples are the Stabat Mater and the Dies Irae, both technically sequences."

Lourie's four "chorales" are all short. The longest will scarcely require five minutes; while the shortest is less than two minutes. In the Sequence a much-repeated note, quietly played by a trumpet, is heard against simple, diatonic chords. This melody, if such it can be called, suffers several inflections; then proceeds again upon the one note. For contrast, there is a fortissimo section, in which the solo-part advances with an even-rhythmed melody that can be compared only to the simplest and starkest plain-song formula. The accompanying chords are still diatonic but slightly more complex. After which the first portion, that of the monotonous with occasional inflections is repeated a minor third lower than at first.

The text of the "Song of the Passion" is that of the "Tenebrae," a part of the offices for Good Friday:

"And there was darkness when the Jews crucified Jesus."

And about the ninth hour Jesus cried out with a loud voice,

My God, my God, why hast Thou forsaken me? And he bowed his head and gave up the ghost.

"And Jesus cried with a loud voice, Father, into Thy hands I commend my spirit. And he bowed his head and gave up the ghost."

The melody sung by the altos is the plain-song assigned to this text in the service-books of the Roman Church. The orchestral part rises to a solemn, mys-

tensity in the last portion. The is in the seventh, or Mixolydian, the "Prose" a melodic texture as background for a curious, like, descending figure in half-harmonized by inversions of at, unrelated seventh-chords. The are eleven measures in length. the phrases orchestra and piano each other antiphonally. The ent is well constructed, with or- turn to the first material after fasting section. A cadenza for leads into this return. Mystical of the religious past is strong this movement. The composer power to summon and convey d untried moods (so we of the would be inclined to say) in his

Latin of "Hours of the Passion," ung by the altos, may be roughly ed thus:

First hour Jesus was led to Pilate. Third hour the multitude cried out 'Crucify.' Fourth hour Jesus was nailed to the cross. Fifth hour Jesus died. Sixth hour of vespers Jesus was taken from the cross. Seventh hour which ends the day Jesus was laid in the grave."

voices proceed in two parts, in holding or dissonant intervals, suggestive of the mysticism of the of the church. There is or- introduction and epilogue in de- slowly moving chords, against beglio figures. These descending gures assume almost the impor- f a common motif for the last ovements. In the "Song of the " it is descending eighth notes in estral bass. In the "Prose" it is -note choral in high register. In ours of the Passion" it is in the ing whole-note chords of intro- and epilogue.

difficult to recall any other com- who has used plain-song so con- for its own sake. From De- onward, many composers have se of it. But that use has ever an exotic, to provide new color ie scheme or plan about some object in the mind of the com- Lourie uses plain-song to express was originally intended to ex- he mysteries, devotions and exalt- of the church itself. The oldest cal themes is again, through him, into use. And the Catholics of re said to be acclaiming him as ader in this newest plain-song ance. A. H. M.

Holiday Ends, The Concer Proceed Ag

Lourie and His Plain
New Grist of Program
Guest-Conductors

FOR the first concerts of the year Dr. Koussevitzky at the Symphony Orchestra, with a semi-chorus of alt The Cecelia, will play, and sing. elty Arthur Lourie's "Sonate lit en forme de quatre chorales." The title the score adds "Anno Domini The career of Arthur Lourie, of work Boston has as yet heard not a varied one. He is of Jewish though the family have been Catholics for some generations. born in Petersburg (as it then 1892. (Reimann's Dictionary, ac to the best information obtainab abouts, is incorrect in giving ti as 1884.) He was educated in the musical and otherwise, of his nati After the Revolution he was ac Governn.ent service. From 1918 he held a position which we shou ably call head of the Music Div the Department of Fine Arts,—if a Fine Arts Department in the of our country. A large part of l was to facilitate the interchange ists between Russia and the Europe. In 1923 he left Rus settled in Paris, where he has s mained. While in Russia he was as an extremely radical composer Arrived in Paris, Lourie spen years in meditation and study, t through his methods, polishing his cal equipment, enlarging his point building for himself finally a t esthetic. During this period he publicity as far as possible. Whil composers were looking for perfor of their works, Lourie tried to k

own from being performed. According to Mr. Olin Downes, in an authoritative article in the New York Times, "from those years he emerged with a technic and style universally clarified, and a viewpoint which had altered from that of skeptical inquiry to pure faith and mysticism." In an article on Lourie's Concerto Spirituale heard in New York from the Schola Cantorum, March 26, 1930. Mr. Downes continues: "It is evident from these pages, as from various literary expressions of the composer, that Lourie is working with complete absorption and singleness of aim toward one object—music as a modern expression of religion, and that this intense concentration is the result of growth and experience. He goes far back to plain chant as the basis of his score."

The identical words could be used with equal correctness about the "Sonate liturgique." Devotion to his religion is the motivating power in Lourie's life, in his music as well as elsewhere. Thus he goes back to the treasure house of the music of the church for the basis of his new style. Not content with the later music of his plain-song period, he frequently delves into the chants, melodies and hymns of the earliest centuries of the Christian era. His plain-song sources, in other words, are frequently Ambrosian (after Ambrose, Bishop of Milan, A. D. 333 to 397) rather than Gregorian (after Gregory the Great, A. D. 540 to 604). To continue still further from Mr. Downes: "In employing the Ambrosian chant Lourie logically, inevitably, eschews nineteenth-century chromaticism and returns to what is an essential diatonism, although he does not hesitate in some passages to employ polytonality."

Lourie is also an author of no little importance. He contributes variously to Parisian journals and periodicals. For the American "Modern Music" he has written two articles, "Neogothic and Neoclassic" and "An Inquiry into Melody." In them he shows himself a profound thinker, a musical philosopher whose pronouncements have the ring of authority. In the first of these two articles Schenker and his school of expressionists are of course the "neo-Goths," while Stravinsky et al., are the "neo-classicists." He longs for and discusses a possible synthesis of the two but ends by questioning the possibility of such a desirable union. The "Inquiry into Melody" places melody as the chief matter of music, entirely outranking rhythm. He opines that perhaps the moment is at hand when what which the builders have set aside will again become their cornerstone."

The New Work

The four "chorales" of the "Liturgical Sonat" are I. Sequentia; II. Chant de la Passion; III. Prosa; IV. Horloges de la Passion. The orchestra consists of oboes and English horn, clarinets and bass-clarinets, bassoons, trumpets, trombones, piano, double-basses, and in the second and fourth numbers a small chorus of altos. The Sequence and Prose are hymns taken from the office of the Mass. In the article, "Sequence," in Grove's Dictionary we read: "A hymn of peculiar structure, which owes its name to its position in the Mass. It appears there as the continuation or sequence of the Gradual (the response sung between Epistle and Gospel) and the Alleluia. Originally it was a long jubilus or melody attached to the final 'a' of the Alleluia. In the ninth century in France words were adapted to the notes and these were called a 'Prose,' because they followed the lines of the music, and not any scheme of meter. When these compositions had thus won a place for themselves, fresh ones came to be written in regular meter, and the old name 'Prose' being unsuitable, gave way to the new name Sequence. From the twelfth century to the fifteenth such compositions were most popular. Two examples are the Stabat Mater and the Dies Irae, both technically sequences."

Lourie's four "chorales" are all short. The longest will scarcely require five minutes, while the shortest is less than two minutes. In the Sequence a much-repeated note, quietly played by a trumpet, is heard against simple, diatonic chords. This melody, if such it can be called, suffers several inflections; then proceeds again upon the one note. For contrast, there is a fortissimo section, in which the solo-part advances with an even-rhythmed melody that can be compared only to the simplest and starkest plain-song formula. The accompanying chords are still diatonic but slightly more complex. After which the first portion, that of the monotone with occasional inflections, is repeated a minor third lower than at first.

The text of the "Song of the Passior" is that of the "Tenebrae," a part of the offices for Good Friday:

"And there was darkness when the Jews crucified Jesus.

And about the ninth hour Jesus cried out with a loud voice,

My God, my God, why hast Thou forsaken me? And he bowed his head and gave up the ghost.

"And Jesus cried with a loud voice, Father, into Thy hands I commend my spirit. And he bowed his head and gave up the ghost."

The melody sung by the altos is the plain-song assigned to this text in the service-books of the Roman Church. The orchestral part rises to a solemn, mys-

tensity in the last portion. The is in the seventh, or Mixolydian, the "Prose" a melodic texture as background for a curious, like, descending figure in half-harmonized by inversions of it, unrelated seventh-chords. The are eleven measures in length. the phrases orchestra and piano each other antiphonally. The ent is well constructed, with or return to the first material after fasting section. A cadenza for leads into this return. Mystical of the religious past is strong this movement. The composer power to summon and convey id untried moods (so we of the would be inclined to say) in his

Latin of "Hours of the Passion," sung by the altos, may be roughly ed thus:

First hour Jesus was led to Pilate.
Third hour the multitude cried out 'crucify.'
Sixth hour Jesus was nailed to the cross.
Ninth hour Jesus died.
Our of vespers Jesus was taken from the cross.
Our which ends the day Jesus was laid the grave."

voices proceed in two parts, in holding or dissonant intervals, suggestive of the mysticism of the of the church. There is or introduction and epilogue in de; slowly moving chords, against peggio figures. These descending gures assume almost the impor of a common motif for the last ovements. In the "Song of the" it is descending eighth notes in estral bass. In the "Prose" it is note choral in high register. In ours of the Passion" it is in the ing whole-note chords of intro-and epilogue.

difficult to recall any other com-who has used plain-song so con- for its own sake. From De-onward, many composers have se of it. But that use has ever an exotic, to provide new color ie scheme or plan about some object in the mind of the com-Lourie uses plain-song to express was originally intended to ex-he mysteries, devotions and exalt-of the church itself. The oldest cal themes is again, through him, into use. And the Catholics of re said to be acclaiming him as ader in this newest plain-song ance. A. H. M.

Holiday Ends, The Concer Proceed Ag

Lourie and His Plain
New Grist of Program
Guest-Conductors

FOR the first concerts of the year Dr. Koussevitzky and the Symphony Orchestra, with a semi-chorus of altos, The Cecelia, will play, and sing, Arthur Lourie's "Sonate liturgique en forme de quatre chorales." The title the score adds "Anno Domini 1884." The career of Arthur Lourie, of Boston has as yet heard not a varied one. He is of Jewish birth though the family have been Catholics for some generations. Born in Petersburg (as it then was) in 1892. (Reimann's Dictionary, according to the best information obtainable, is incorrect in giving the date as 1884.) He was educated in the musical and otherwise, of his native land. After the Revolution he was active in Government service. From 1918 he held a position which we should call head of the Music Division of the Department of Fine Arts, if not a Fine Arts Department in the Department of our country. A large part of his work was to facilitate the interchange of artists between Russia and the West. In 1923 he left Russia and settled in Paris, where he has remained. While in Russia he was as an extremely radical composer. Arrived in Paris, Lourie spent years in meditation and study, through his methods, polishing his musical equipment, enlarging his point of view, building for himself finally a personal esthetic. During this period he was not publicly as far as possible. While composers were looking for performance of their works, Lourie tried to keep own from being performed. According to Mr. Olin Downes, in an authoritative article in the New York Times, "from those years he emerged with a technique and style universally clarified, and a viewpoint which had altered from that of skeptical inquiry to pure faith and mysticism." In an article on Lourie's Concerto Spirituale heard in New York from the Schola Cantorum, March 26, 1930, Mr. Downes continues: "It is evident from these pages, as from various literary expressions of the composer, that Lourie is working with complete absorption and singleness of aim toward one object—music as a modern expression of religion, and that this intense concentration is the result of growth and experience. He goes far back to plain chant as the basis of his score." The identical words could be used with equal correctness about the "Sonate liturgique." Devotion to his religion is the motivating power in Lourie's life, in his music as well as elsewhere. Thus he goes back to the treasure house of the music of the church for the basis of his new style. Not content with the later music of his plain-song period, he frequently delves into the chants, melodies and hymns of the earliest centuries of the Christian era. His plain-song sources, in other words, are frequently Ambrosian (after Ambrose, Bishop of Milan, A. D. 333 to 397) rather than Gregorian (after Gregory the Great, A. D. 540 to 604). To continue still further from Mr. Downes: "In employing the Ambrosian chant Lourie logically, inevitably, eschews nineteenth-century chromaticism and returns to what is an essential diatonicism, although he does not hesitate in some passages . . . to employ polytonality." Lourie is also an author of no little importance. He contributes variously to Parisian journals and periodicals. For the American "Modern Music" he has written two articles, "Neogothic and Neoclassic" and "An Inquiry into Melody." In them he shows himself a profound thinker, a musical philosopher whose pronouncements have the ring of authority. In the first of these two articles Schenker and his school of expressionists are of course the "neo-Goths," while Stravinsky et al., are the "neo-classicists." He longs for and discusses a possible synthesis of the two but ends by questioning the possibility of such a desirable union. The "Inquiry into Melody" places melody as the chief matter of music, entirely out of the ranking rhythm. He opines that "perhaps the moment is at hand when that which the builders have set aside will again become their cornerstone."

The New Work

The four "choral Sonat" are I. La Passion; III. F Passion; The or and English horn, clarinets, bassoon, piano, double-bass and fourth number. The Sequer taken from the of article, "Sequency we read: "A ture, which owes in the Mass. It a tuation or sequ response sung be pel) and the Alle a long jubilus or final a' of the century in France the notes, and 'Prose,' because of the music, a meter. When the won a place for came to be writt the old name 'gave way to th From the twelfth such composition Two examples a the Dies Irae, both Lourie's four s The longest will a utes; while the s minutes. In th peated note, quie is heard against. This melody, if s fers several in again upon the there is a fortiss solo-part advance melody that can simplest and str The accompan tonic but slight which the first tone with occ peated a minor The text of t is that of the offices for Good "And there wa crucified Jy And about the p a loud voi My God, my God, And he bowed hi "And Jesus cried Father, into Thy And he bowed his The melody s plain-song assi service-books of orchestral part comedy.

Providence.

The nex fessional I pected at Jan. 26, w the princip Yorkers li The piece humorously an honest school-mas room for b and cynic

"Artists tion) will next week, will be sh arrives on whether d toriously " fortunes " drawal.

There w Shaw's "A on Tuesday Actors' Fu have front regular pe the Theater half of The lecture nee lic Library eral and Country"

Finally spect "Dra perennials a third st

Jewish

New Ha David Go elected pre Association Schools at vention he Beryl Coh and Rubin

Kansan

Kansas C. Dent, I elected gra Gamma, n ternity. T biennial c Cleveland, v

tical intensity in the last portion. The melody is in the seventh, or Mixolydian, mode.

In the "Prose" a melodic texture serves as background for a curious, choral-like, descending figure in half-notes, harmonized by inversions of dissonant, unrelated seventh-chords. The phrases are eleven measures in length. Within the phrases orchestra and piano reply to each other antiphonally. The movement is well constructed, with orderly return to the first material after a contrasting section. A cadenza for piano leads into this return. Mystical flavor of the religious past is strong upon this movement. The composer shows power to summon and convey new and untried moods (so we of the present would be inclined to say) in his music.

The Latin of "Hours of the Passion," again sung by the altos, may be roughly translated thus:

"At the first hour Jesus was led to Pilate.
At the third hour the multitude cried out 'Crucify.'
At the sixth hour Jesus was nailed to the cross.
At the ninth hour Jesus died.
At the hour of vespers Jesus was taken from the cross.
At the hour which ends the day Jesus was laid in the grave."

The voices proceed in two parts, in hollow sounding or dissonant intervals, deeply suggestive of the mysticism of the early days of the church. There is orchestral introduction and epilogue in descending slowly moving chords, against slow arpeggio figures. These descending scale figures assume almost the importance of a common motif for the last three movements. In the "Song of the Passion" it is descending eighth notes in the orchestral bass. In the "Prose" it is the half-note choral in high register. In the "Hours of the Passion" it is in the descending whole-note chords of introduction and epilogue.

It is difficult to recall any other composer who has used plain-song so consistently for its own sake. From Debussy onward, many composers have made use of it. But that use has ever been as an exotic, to provide new color for some scheme or plan about some other subject in the mind of the composer. Lourie uses plain-song to express what it was originally intended to express, the mysteries, devotions and exaltations of the church itself. The oldest of musical themes is again, through him, coming into use. And the Catholics of Paris are said to be acclaiming him as the leader in this newest plain-song renaissance.

A. H. M.

The Strange Case of Arthur Vincent Lourié

His Record and Music from
A Revolutionary Past
To a Religious
Present

AN Italian mathematician, one Codazzi, thought that music can be composed with the aid of calculus: he is classed by Lombroso as an insane genius, along with those musicians who thought they were divinely inspired. Among the champions of the new musico-mathematical theology, only one—Stravinsky—has genius, and none is insane.

The case of Arthur Vincent Lourié (the insertion of the middle name is significant, for it emphasizes the Roman Catholic religion of the bearer—Russian Jews have but one given name) is interesting from the sociological rather than musical point of view, for, be it said at once, he does not possess a degree of creative power which would entitle him to the dignity of an individual composer. He is an extraordinarily gifted man, eclectic in his tastes, and just as vague in his musical expressions as in his general ideas. But, lacking in creative power, he has developed an acute sense for persuasive argument. He possesses the necessary literary technique to present his cause with seeming coherence. But the amazing hollowness of his fundamental concepts stands out all the more clearly. He battles in an empty air—and for a dialectician of his order it may be all he cares for.

□ ————— □

Some time ago, Modern Music published Lourié's disquisition upon Melody as a theological virtue. It is a depressing document of mental sterility, a mesh of unsupported statements interwoven with Biblical quotations and theological references. "It is probable," he argues, "that in our time we do not compose good melodies because we have become evil-minded. Out of the abundance of the heart the mouth speaketh. Our melodic gift is in direct ratio to our capacity for good, not in the sentimental but in the religious sense. . . . Melody in itself is a pri-of purification through. Melody is a virtue, acted with the three the- and therefore, its high- lies incontestably in i. e., prayer."

a publication devoted to may be a sign of the e said in full fairness, great deal of the sancti- he Russian original was nan deplores our evil his moralistic attitude? en a repentant sinner, ry into this preacher's s mind moves on such that they are not in worldliness of our own was well known to the emian club, graphically g," in St. Petersburg of the war. It was a recognized geniuses, and ed with people. Some such as Vladimir May- t-suicide, and Arthur re to receive their offi- the hands of the Soviet as then a champion of usic. As is his nature, open to conflicting n, Schönberg, early sy paid a visit to the d to the "Stray Dog" the war; and a year composed a Suite for iano in the Nursery" rived from Debussy's he rain-patter etc.) mpositions in a small series of songs to a's poems; a String th sufficient clumsi on); Three Sonatina with a long title i Vierge Marie, Fra- deuse du XIII siècle Alto et Violoncel- Vincent Lourié. Pe nd "Forms in th nd-script" and de-

P.)—Offic. It is an exerci- g this weedy, rather than ay when it—a series of arabe homes weing from one sta- of resident the range of t piano is spanned. What there is of music suggests a caricature of Scriabin.

All these masterpieces would have never seen light had it not been for the October Revolution that threw the futurists into temporary power. And the dawn of the year 1918 saw Arthur Vincent Lourié, in a velvet jacket and a bow tie, establish his headquarters as Musical Commissar of the Department of Education. The Bolsheviks were then shunned by all "decent" people, and the intelligentsia boycotted the Government by means of a general strike. Lourié's "treason" was condemned, but it proved a blessing to his fellow-musicians. If, by duty of office, he had to sign unpleasant warrants for confiscation of pianos owned by the bourgeoisie, with the same pen he could restore the property to their owners as "tools of production." He was a great help to many, not excluding himself. As musical commissar, he had the State Publishing House print his futuristic pastiches, and at one time, when the paper shortage was great, he was the only publishing composer in all the Russias. He left for France as a representative of the State, but Paris caused in him a change of heart, and he settled there for good. The Soviet papers never mention his name in any connection. To them, he is just as good as a dead man, shot down according to the law.

It is very difficult to estimate the artistic deserts of Lourié's musical works. Being an indefatigable dialectician, he can temporarily create an impression of reality. He lacks talent, but he possesses a constructive mind capable of producing excellent imitations. Furthermore, being Stravinsky's intimate, he bears a certain weight with the musical world. In some respects he may exert an influence on the master himself; certainly he can supply argument in defence of Stravinsky's courses. And at times he gets ahead of Stravinsky in works such as the "Concerto Spirituale," produced by the Schola Cantorum of New York on March 26, 1930.

In fact it is his only work (discounting the early Cantata to Alexander Blok's words, and a "Japanese Suite" for Orchestra) that deserves serious consideration. It is scored for a double-chorus, piano, brass and six double-basses. The Prologue for Solo Baritone accompanied by three trumpets, two trombones and tuba, is impressive, and the piano-cadenza is "just as good as Stravinsky." The idiom is necessarily diatonic (as opposed to the chromatic and ultra-chromatic infatuations of his youth); the writing is done according to the rules of mediaeval counterpoint, with all its futile clumsiness. The key of C for and its modal ramifications pre- Of melodic invention there is, how- not a question. The general im- sion from one hearing is that of an ere, deliberately colorless work, to be formed at solemn occasions. A reli- is fanatic such, as the strange Nico- Obouhov, hurling sounds and shouts of the abundance of his heart, may justified in the eyes of the world, for is a natural aberration. Arthur rie knows no such ecstasies. His rt is empty. NICOLAS SLONIMSKI

Boston Symphony

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky, conductor, gave its eleventh program of the season in Symphony Hall, Boston, on the afternoon of Jan. 2. Beethoven's Symphony No. 1 in C major, Lourié's "Sonate Liturgique" and Strauss's "Ein Heldenleben" made up the list.

Arthur Lourié, as Mr. Sabaneev has related in these columns, was at one time Commissar of the People's Music in Soviet Russia. Formerly, we are told, his music was revolutionary too. Then he fell in step with Stravinsky, followed him back to Bach, and now we are assured has developed a style of his own.

He was introduced to Boston by this curious composition "in the form of four chorales," which was heard for the first time in America at the concert under review. The score calls for a little group of wind instruments, a piano, four contrabasses and a dozen alto voices. The style has been based on the ancient plain-song. The names of the four divisions are said to be taken from the Roman Catholic liturgy: "Sequentia," "Cantus Passionis," "Prosa" and "Horæ Passionis." The chorus sings in the second and the fourth divisions. The music does not stir admiration at a single hearing. It is very severe-sounding, and we imagine its effectiveness is supposed to lie in its severity. But the chief impression retained by one listener is that this score contains more plain-song than originality.

There was a delightful performance of Beethoven's very modern First Symphony, and (except for insecurity of intonation in the solo violin) a youth; the writing is done according to magniloquent and periphrastic tone poem. L. A. S.

The Strange Case of Arthur Vincent Lourié

His Record and Music from
A Revolutionary Past
To a Religious
Present

AN Italian mathematician, one C. d'Azzi, thought that music can be composed with the aid of calculus: he is classed by Lombroso as an insane genius, along with those musicians who thought they were divinely inspired. Among the champions of the new musico-mathematical theology only one—Stravinsky—has genius, and none is insane.

The case of Arthur Vincent Lourié (the insertion of the middle name is significant, for it emphasizes the Roman Catholic religion of the bearer—Russia's Jews have but one given name) is interesting from the sociological rather than the musical point of view, for, be it said once, he does not possess a degree of creative power which would entitle him to the dignity of an individual composer. He is an extraordinarily gifted maverick in his tastes, and just as vague in his musical expressions as in his general ideas. But, lacking in creative power, he has developed an acute sense for persuasive argument. He possesses the necessary literary technique to present his cause with seeming coherence. But the amazing hollowiness of his fundamental concepts stands out the more clearly. He battles in an empty air—and for a dialectician of his order it may be all he cares for.

Some time ago, Modern Music published Lourié's disquisition upon Melody as a theological virtue. It is a depressing document of mental sterility, a mesh of unsupported statements interwoven with Biblical quotations and theological references. "It is probable," he argues, "that in our time we do not compose good melodies because we have become evil-minded. Out of the abundance of the heart the mouth speaketh. Our melodic gift is in direct ratio to our capacity for goodness, not in the sentimental but in the religious sense. . . . Melody in itself is a very good, a sort of purification through repentance. . . . Melody is a virtue, organically connected with the three theological virtues, and therefore, its highest achievement lies incontestably in religious music, i. e., prayer." This, printed in a publication devoted to Modern Music, may be a sign of the times. It must be said in full fairness, however, that a great deal of the sanctimonious stuff of the Russian original was cut out by the editor.

Who is this man who deplores our evil minds? Whence his moralistic attitude? A preacher is often a repentant sinner, but we need not pry into this preacher's conscience; for his mind moves on such dialectical heights that they are not in contact with the worldliness of our own space and time.

Arthur Lourié was well known to the habitués of a Bohemian club, graphically called "Stray Dog," in St. Petersburg during the days of the war. It was a refuge for all unrecognized geniuses, and was always packed with people. Some of its frequenters, such as Vladimir Mayakovsky, the poet-suicide, and Arthur Lourié himself were to receive their official recognition at the hands of the Soviet Government.

Arthur Lourié was then a champion of the last word in music. As is his nature, he was an eclectic, open to conflicting influences.—Skriabin, Schönberg, early Stravinsky. Debussy paid a visit to the Russian capital (and to the "Stray Dog") at the beginning of the war; and a year or two later Lourié composed a Suite for Children ("Grand Piano in the Nursery") which is directly derived from Debussy's favorite devices (the rain-patter etc.). There were other compositions in a small form: "Rosary," a series of songs to Madame Akhmatova's poems; a String Quartet (written with sufficient clumsiness to attract attention); Three Sonatinas for Piano; a work with a long title in French: "Pleurs de la Vierge Marie. Fragment d'une chanson pieuse du XIII siècle. Pour Chant, Violon, Alto et Violoncelle, composé par Arthur Vincent Lourié. Petrograde MCMXV," and "Forms in the Air," subnamed "sound-script" and dedicated to Pablo Picasso. It is an exercise in fanciful typography, rather than in musical composition,—a series of arabesques languidly dropping from one staff-line to another, until the range of the piano is spanned. What there is of music suggests a caricature of Skriabin.

All these masterpieces would have never seen light had it not been for the October Revolution that threw the futurists into temporary power. And the dawn of the year 1918 saw Arthur Vincent Lourié, in a velvet jacket and a bow tie, establish his headquarters as Musical Commissar of the Department of Education. The Bolsheviks were then shunned by all "decent" people, and the intelligentsia boycotted the Government by means of a general strike. Lourié's "treason" was condemned, but it proved a blessing to his fellow-musicians. If, by duty of office, he had to sign unpleasant warrants for confiscation of pianos owned by the bourgeoisie, with the same pen he could restore the property to their owners as "tools of production." He was a great help to many, not excluding himself. As musical commissar, he had the State Publishing House print his futuristic pastiches, and at one time, when the paper shortage was great, he was the only publishing composer in all the Russias. He left for France as a representative of the State, but Paris caused in him a change of heart, and he settled there for good. The Soviet papers never mention his name in any connection. To them, he is just as good as a dead man, shot down according to the law.

It is very difficult to estimate the artistic deserts of Lourié's musical works. Being an indefatigable dialectician, he can temporarily create an impression of reality. He lacks talent, but he possesses a constructive mind capable of producing excellent imitations. Furthermore, being Stravinsky's intimate, he bears a certain weight with the musical world. In some respects he may exert an influence on the master himself; certainly he can supply argument in defence of Stravinsky's courses. And at times he gets ahead of Stravinsky in works such as the "Concerto Spirituale," produced by the Schola Cantorum of New York on March 26, 1930.

In fact it is his only work (discounting the early Cantata to Alexander Blok's words, and a "Japanese Suite" for Orchestra) that deserves serious consideration. It is scored for a double-chorus, piano, brass and six double-basses. The Prologue for Solo Baritone accompanied by three trumpets, two trombones and tuba, is impressive, and the piano-cadenza is "just as good as Stravinsky." The idiom is necessarily diatonic (as opposed to the chromatic and ultra-chromatic infatuations of his youth); the writing is done according to the rules of mediaeval counterpoint, with all its futile clumsiness. The key of C or and its modal ramifications preclude. Of melodic invention there is, however, not a question. The general impression from one hearing is that of an austere, deliberately colorless work, to be performed at solemn occasions. A religious fanatic such, as the strange Nicobouhov, hurling sounds and shouts of the abundance of his heart, may be justified in the eyes of the world, for it is a natural aberration. Arthur Lourié knows no such ecstasies. His art is empty. NICOLAS SLONIMSKI

Boston Symphony

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky, conductor, gave its eleventh program of the season in Symphony Hall, Boston, on the afternoon of Jan. 2. Beethoven's Symphony No. 1 in C major, Lourié's "Sonate Liturgique" and Strauss's "Ein Heldenleben" made up the list.

Arthur Lourié, as Mr. Sabaneev has related in these columns, was at one time Commissar of the People's Music in Soviet Russia. Formerly, we are told, his music was revolutionary too. Then he fell in step with Stravinsky, followed him back to Bach, and now we are assured has developed a style of his own.

He was introduced to Boston by this curious composition "in the form of four chorales," which was heard for the first time in America at the concert under review. The score calls for a little group of wind instruments, a piano, four contrabasses and a dozen alto voices. The style has been based on the ancient plain-song. The names of the four divisions are said to be taken from the Roman Catholic liturgy: "Sequentia," "Cantus Passionis," "Prosa" and "Horæ Passionis." The chorus sings in the second and the fourth divisions. The music does not stir admiration at a single hearing. It is very severe-sounding, and we imagine its effectiveness is supposed to lie in its severity. But the chief impression retained by one listener is that this score contains more plain-song than originality.

There was a delightful performance of Beethoven's very modern First Symphony, and (except for insecurity of intonation in the solo violin) a virtuosic proclamation of Strauss's magniloquent and periphrastic tone poem.

L. A. S.

The Strange Case of Arthur Vincent Lourie

His Record and Music from
A Revolutionary Past
To a Religious
Present

AN Italian mathematician, one C. dazzi, thought that music can be composed with the aid of calculus: he is classed by Lombroso as an insane genius, along with those musicians who thought they were divinely inspired. Among the champions of the new musico-mathematical theology only one—Stravinsky—has genius, and none is insane.

The case of Arthur Vincent Lourie (the insertion of the middle name is significant, for it emphasizes the Roman Catholic religion of the bearer—Russians have but one given name) is interesting from the sociological rather than the musical point of view, for, be it said once, he does not possess a degree of creative power which would entitle him to the dignity of an individual composer. He is an extraordinarily gifted man, eclectic in his tastes, and just as vague in his musical expressions as in his general ideas. But, lacking in creative power, he has developed an acute sense for persuasive argument. He possesses the necessary literary technique to present his cause with seeming coherence. But the amazing hollowness of his fundamental concepts stands out the more clearly. He battles in an empty air—and for a dialectician of his order it may be all he cares for.

Some time ago, Modern Music published Lourie's disquisition upon Melody as a theological virtue. It is a depressing document of mental sterility, a mesh of unsupported statements interwoven with Biblical quotations and theological references. "It is probable," he argues, "that in our time we do not compose good melodies because we have become evil-minded. Out of the abundance of the heart the mouth speaketh. Our melodic gift is in direct ratio to our capacity for goodness, not in the sentimental but in the religious sense. . . . Melody in itself is a very good, a sort of purification through repentance. . . . Melody is a virtue organically connected with the three theological virtues, and therefore, its highest achievement lies incontestably in religious music, i. e., prayer."

This, printed in a publication devoted to Modern Music, may be a sign of the times. It must be said in full fairness, however, that a great deal of the sanctimonious stuff of the Russian original was cut out by the editor.

Who is this man who deplores our evil minds? Whence his moralistic attitude? A preacher is often a repentant sinner, but we need not pry into this preacher's conscience; for his mind moves on such dialectical heights that they are not in contact with the worldliness of our own space and time.

Arthur Lourie was well known to the habitués of a Bohemian club, graphically called "Stray Dog," in St. Petersburg during the days of the war. It was a refuge for all unrecognized geniuses, and was always packed with people. Some of its frequenters, such as Vladimir Mayakovsky, the poet-suicide, and Arthur Lourie himself were to receive their official recognition at the hands of the Soviet Government.

Arthur Lourie was then a champion of the last word in music. As is his nature, he was an eclectic, open to conflicting influences.—Skriabin, Schönberg, early Stravinsky. Debussy paid a visit to the Russian capital (and to the "Stray Dog") at the beginning of the war; and a year or two later Lourie composed a Suite for Children ("Grand Piano in the Nursery") which is directly derived from Debussy's favorite devices (the rain-patter etc.). There were other compositions in a small form: "Rosary," a series of songs to Madame Akhmatova's poems; a String Quartet (written with sufficient clumsiness to attract attention); Three Sonatinas for Piano; a work with a long title in French: "Pleurs de la Vierge Marie. Fragment d'une chanson pleuse du XIII^e siècle. Pour Chant, Violon, Alto et Violoncelle. Composé par Arthur Vincent Lourie. Petrograde MCMXV," and "Fermes in the rograde MCMXV," and "Fermes in the rograde MCMXV," subnamed "sound-script" and dedicated to Pablo Picasso. It is an exercise in fanciful typography, rather than in musical composition—a series of arabesques languidly dropping from one staff line to another, until the range of the piano is spanned. What it suggests is a caricature.

All these masterpieces never seen light had their October Revolution turned tourists into temporary dawn of the year 1918. cent Lourie, in a velvet bow tie, establish his Musical Commissar of Education. The Bolsheviks shunned by all "decent" intelligentsia boycotted him by means of a general strike. "treason" was condemned, a blessing to his fellow-musicians of duty of office, he had to sign warrants for confiscation owned by the bourgeoisie, when he could restore the their owners as "tools of

He was a great help to many, including himself. As musical commissioner, he had the State Publishing House publish his futuristic pastiches, and at times when the paper shortage was the only publishing commission in the Russia. He left for France as representative of the State, but caused in him a change of heart, settled there for good. The Soviet Government never mention his name in any connection. To them, he is just as good as dead man, shot down according to the

It is very difficult to estimate the artistic deserts of Lourie's musical Being an indefatigable dialectician, he can temporarily create an impression of reality. He lacks talent, but he possesses a constructive mind capable of producing excellent imitations. Furthermore, being Stravinsky's intimate, he bears a certain weight with the musical world. In some respects he may exert an influence on the master himself: certainly he can supply argument in defence of Stravinsky's courses. And at times he gets ahead of Stravinsky in works such as the "Concerto Spirituale," produced by the Schola Cantorum of New York on March 26, 1930.

In fact it is his only work (discounting the early Cantata to Alexander Blok's words, and a "Japanese Suite" for Orchestra) that deserves serious consideration. It is scored for a double-chorus, piano, brass and six double-basses. The Prologue for Solo Baritone accompanied by three trumpets, two trombones and tuba, is impressive, and the piano-cadenza is "just as good as Stravinsky's." The idiom is necessarily diatonic (as opposed to the chromatic and ultra-chromatic infatuations of his youth); the writing is done according to the rules of mediaeval counterpoint, with all its futile clumsiness. The key of C major and its modal ramifications prevail. Of melodic invention there is, however, not a question. The general impression from one hearing is that of an austere, deliberately colorless work, to be performed at solemn occasions. A religious fanatic such, as the strange Nicolas Obouhov, hurling sounds and shouts out of the abundance of his heart, may be justified in the eyes of the world, for his is a natural aberration. Arthur Lourie knows no such ecstasies. His heart is empty. NICOLAS SLONIMSKY

Boston Symphony

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Serge Koussevitzky, conductor, gave its eleventh program of the season in Symphony Hall, Boston, on the afternoon of Jan. 2. Beethoven's Symphony No. 1 in C major, Lourie's "Sonate Liturgique" and Strauss's "Ein Heldenleben" made up the list.

Arthur Lourie, as Mr. Sabaneev has related in these columns, was at one time Commissar of the People's Music in Soviet Russia. Formerly, we are told, his music was revolutionary too. Then he fell in step with Stravinsky, followed him back to Bach, and now we are assured has developed a style of his own.

He was introduced to Boston by this curious composition "in the form of four chorales," which was heard for the first time in America at the concert under review. The score calls for a little group of wind instruments, a piano, four contrabasses and a dozen alto voices. The style has been based on the ancient plain-song. The names of the four divisions are said to be taken from the Roman Catholic liturgy: "Sequentia," "Cantus Passionis," "Prosa" and "Horæ Passionis." The chorus sings in the second and the fourth divisions. The music does not stir admiration at a single hearing. It is very severe-sounding, and we imagine its effectiveness is supposed to lie in its severity. But the chief impression retained by one listener is that this score contains more plain-song than originality.

There was a delightful performance of Beethoven's very modern First Symphony, and (except for insecurity of intonation in the solo violin) a virtuosic proclamation of Strauss's magniloquent and periphrastic tone poem.

L. A. S.

BEETHOVEN

Twelfth Programme

FRIDAY AFTERNOON, JANUARY 16, at 2.30 o'clock

SATURDAY EVENING, JANUARY 17, at 8.15 o'clock

HENRY HADLEY will conduct these concerts

PROGRAMME

Haydn Symphony No. 1, in E-flat
 I. Adagio; Allegro con spirito.
 II. Andante.
 III. Minuet.
 IV. Finale.

McKinley Masquerade
 (First time at these concerts)

Hadley "Salome," Tone Poem after Oscar Wilde's
 Tragedy, Op. 55

Hadley Suite for Orchestra, "Streets of Pekin"
 I. Great Stone Man's Street.
 II. Sweet Rain Street.
 III. Ricksha Boy No. 309 (Ma Ben).
 IV. Jade Street (Moonlight).
 V. Shoe-makers' Street.
 VI. Sleeping Lotuses.
 VII. The Forbidden City.
 (First time in Boston)

STEINWAY PIANO

There will be an intermission after McKinley's "Masquerade"

A fiftieth anniversary exhibition is now on view in the Huntington Avenue foyer
 (first balcony)

Twelfth Programme

FRIDAY AFTERNOON, JANUARY 16, at 2.30 o'clock

SATURDAY EVENING, JANUARY 17, at 8.15 o'clock

HENRY HADLEY will conduct these concerts

PROGRAMME

Haydn Symphony No. 1, in E-flat
I. Adagio; Allegro con spirito.
II. Andante.
III. Minuet.
IV. Finale.

McKinley Masquerade
(First time at these concerts)

Hadley "Salome," Tone Poem after Oscar Wilde's
Tragedy, Op. 55

Hadley Suite for Orchestra, "Streets of Pekin"
I. Great Stone Man's Street.
II. Sweet Rain Street.
III. Ricksha Boy No. 309 (Ma Ben).
IV. Jade Street (Moonlight).
V. Shoe-makers' Street.
VI. Sleeping Lotuses.
VII. The Forbidden City.
(First time in Boston)

STEINWAY PIANO

There will be an intermission after McKinley's "Masquerade"

A fiftieth anniversary exhibition is now on view in the Huntington Avenue foyer
(first balcony)

HAYDN

SYMPHONY CONCERT

By PHILIP HALE Jan. 17, 1933

As Dr. Koussevitzky is taking a vacation of two weeks Henry Hadley, the conductor of the Manhattan orchestra of New York, was the leader yesterday afternoon. He will lead tomorrow night. The conductor of the concerts next week will be Enrique Fernandez Arbos. Mr. Hadley arranged this program: Haydn, Symphony No. 1 E flat major. McKinley, "Masquerade" (first time at these concerts). Hadley, "Salome," tone poem (after Oscar Wilde). Hadley, Suite "Streets of Pekin" (first time in Boston).

Mr. Hadley, cordially welcomed, was loudly applauded throughout the concert, as conductor; and in the latter part, as composer. He has had much experience as a conductor in cities of this country and of Europe; Buenos Aires, and Tokio are not foreign to him. It was a great pleasure to hear the Symphony by Haydn, a composer who is much neglected, and when attention is paid to him by conductors the Symphonies chosen are thrice familiar. Dr. Koussevitzky rejoiced the audience by bringing out the "Horn" Symphony. The one chosen yesterday is as fresh as if it were composed last year. It has vitality; it overflows with high spirits; here and there are passages that are singularly "modern": harmonically and in mood. Mr. Hadley's interpretation was not perfunctory, as is too often the case when a conductor deigns to notice Haydn; nor was it too reverential. The music appealed to him; he knew what he wished for the performance; the orchestra sympathized with him; the result was delightful.

Mr. McKinley's "Masquerade" was played in Boston for the first time at a concert of the New England Conservatory of Music's orchestra late in 1929. Last June it was heard at a "Pop." concert. Composed in 1924, it waited a public hearing till it was performed in 1926 at a New York Stadium concert. It has been played by symphony orchestras of Chicago, Detroit, Philadelphia, New York, Syracuse. The composer, born at Yarmouth, Me., in 1895, is now a member of the New England Conservatory's faculty. He disclaims any program or descriptive intention for his "Masquerade." The title suffices.

This music is agreeable to hear, while it is playing, but it leaves no definite impression; it does not disclose marked individuality. When it breaks into what is loosely known as "jazz," the rhythms lead one to expect pages that are exhilarating, exciting. The hearer remains calm, and longs for a less refined, less genteel handling. After all, frank vulgarity in moderation, is not displeasing in compositions of this order. Not that a musical masquerade should be a tonal orgy, but it should quicken the pulse and stir the blood. Even the most refined composer should be able to let himself go occasionally, as Beethoven did at the end of the "Egmont" overture and in the finales of the "Eroica" and the Seventh Symphonies.

Hadley's "Salome" was performed for the first time in this country by the Boston Symphony orchestra in April, 1907. It was composed before 1905. It made a favorable impression when it was first heard here. The audience yesterday evidently enjoyed the various sections that tell in tones the story of Salome and John the Baptist according to Wilde, who invented the character of Salome (unnamed by the evangelists), having been fascinated by pictures, legends, tales and poems in which she is the dancing heroine. Mr. Hadley's tone poem was highly creditable to him at the time he wrote it. Frankly descriptive, it has picturesque pages. If there are measures that show the influence of the Strauss of the tone poems—even in Mr. McKinley's "Masquerade" there is a fleeting reminder of Till Eulenspiegel's impudence—there are many more that are Mr. Hadley's own. The dance section is not too deliberately oriental in character, which is a blessing, for there has been far too much pseudo-orientalism in music. When Mr. Eichheim gives us the real thing, bringing the native instruments with him, the effect is chiefly the gratification of curiosity—and this in spite of all his skill and taste as a musician.

Mr. Hadley conducted a series of orchestral concerts last September in Tokyo where his suite "Streets of Pekin" was first performed. There are seven short movements. There is no attempt to be rigorously, phonographically oriental. In fact, the Suite might easily bear another title. Occasionally a theme pops up that Mr. Hadley may have heard, as he sojourned in the east, but the treatment throughout the Suite is European-American. Two of the slow movements have genuine charm—especially the one with the expressive violoncello solo, beautifully played by Mr. Bedetti. These movements might as well have been entitled "Nocturne" and "Moonlight on the Hudson." The Suite is interesting; there are skilfully orchestrated pages. It is the work of a well-grounded musician who happened to be in the east and paid his compliment by giving his new work the title "Streets of Pekin," with sub-titles which would give the local color not to be found in the music itself.

The concert will be repeated tonight. Mr. Arbos has arranged the following program for next week: Corelli, Suite. Cesar Franck, Symphony in D minor; De Falla; Suite from "El Amor Brujo;" Albeniz, "El Albaicin" and "Navarra" (arranged for orchestra by Arbos).

DR. HADLEY CONDUCTS SYMPHONY

Plays Own "Salome"
and "Streets of Pekin"

Post Jan. 17, 1931
BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

Dr. Koussevitzky is now taking the well-earned fortnight's rest that it has been his custom to take in mid-season, therewith entrusting two pairs of Symphony Concerts to guest conductors. Thus the concert of yesterday afternoon, as will that of this evening, brought to the conductor's stand an eminent American musician who has more than once before presided, Henry Hadley.

TWO OF OWN WORKS

Since Dr. Hadley is composer as well as conductor, he not unnaturally likes to appear simultaneously in both capacities; hence yesterday under his baton a revival of his tone-poem, "Salome," last played here in 1907, and the first Boston performance of his new suite, "Streets of Peking," seven short descriptive pieces, fruit of a recent visit to the Orient. To the classics Dr. Hadley paid his respects by placing at the head of his programme Haydn's seldom-heard Symphony in E-flat major, known in Germany as the "symphony of the drum-roll," and he recognized a younger colleague by playing after this symphony Carl McKinley's "Masquerade," a piece heard here in Boston twice last season, at a concert of the orchestra of the New England Conservatory, the institution where Mr. McKinley is now teaching, and at a Pop concert.

Mr. McKinley's piece has already been played by several of the major

American orchestras and it is to be presumed that he had offered it to Dr. Koussevitzky. If that is the case, it is not altogether easy to see why Dr. Koussevitzky should have rejected it, especially since his eagerness to help the deserving young American composer is well known.

"Masquerade" Well Received

This "Masquerade" is not a particularly individual or original music. It is not important. But as a symphonic treatment of dance forms, from the waltz to the fox-trot, it is entertaining, gay and brilliant, and it "comes off." And if a choice is to be made between unimportant music which comes off and unimportant music which does not, the former is, from the listener's standpoint, much to be preferred, though Dr. Koussevitzky has given us plenty of the latter, domestic as well as foreign. "Masquerade" was well received by yesterday's audience, and from his seat in the balcony the composer was compelled many times to bow his acknowledgements.

In that it followed one of the less genial and inspired of Haydn's symphonies, "Masquerade" had yesterday a flattering setting. One of the 12 that Haydn wrote for his concerts in London, this symphony in E flat has been overshadowed by most of its companions. The most pleasing movement of the four is the Andante, with its recurring theme of folk-song character. Dr. Hadley conducted the symphony in straightforward fashion, yet it might be said that in the role of interpreter he did less for Haydn than for McKinley's music and for his own.

To come finally to Dr. Hadley's compositions, both the youthful tone-poem and the recent suite place the well-intentioned reviewer in the quandary wherein Dr. Hadley's music generally places him. It were idle to deny Dr. Hadley's mastery of every musical resource, as it were also idle to deny his possession of a certain gift for apposite and telling expression. There are glowing and seductive pages in "Salome," derived to be sure, like much music of the period of its composition, straight from Wagner. There are atmospheric and suggestive pages in the Chinese suite, an evocation of the spell and mystery of the East accomplished without recourse to bald thematic or instrumental literalism that, somewhat paradoxically, may quite easily fail of its purpose. Yet, with these compelling and arresting pages come measures that are undistinguished, platitudinous, that are even banal. There is much that is even tily bombastic in "Salome"; there are measures in the suite that stand not much above the level of tailor-made incidental music for stage-play or film.

Both compositions obviously pleased yesterday's audience, and at the close of the concert there was much applause for the composer-conductor.

Symphonic Afternoon In Routine

Henry Hadley for Conductor,
With His Own and Others' Pieces Drifting By

THESE are concerts to be discussed, praised, remembered. There are concerts to be discussed, blamed, forgotten. There are also concerts that merely drift past the best-intentioned listener; proceed in routine; leave no other trace behind. No long annual series may altogether escape them. Now and then they recur in our Symphony Concerts, energized and manifold as Dr. Koussevitzky, above all his predecessors, keeps them. For the first time this season one such befell yesterday at Symphony Hall. "The master"—as the word goes in New York—is on winter "holiday." That is to say, he is devoting a fortnight, free from rehearsals and concerts, to the making of plans and the study of scores for the half year to come. Consequently a guest-conductor reigned in his place—and in this January of 1931, guest-conductors are hard to come by.

To these two pairs of concerts from which Dr. Koussevitzky is annually absent, it has become custom to invite, first, a notable composer who can also conduct in his own music; second, a notable conductor to set forth his specialties before a new audience. For some years past, such a composer—Honegger, Ravel, Glazunov—has been on tour in the United States, ready and waiting for invitation, possibly with a program slipped casually into his portfolio. His presence, his conducting, the excursion through his "works," were sure to make an event of his pair of concerts. This season, however, no eminent composer is spending the winter in the United States; while such Americans as Mr. Loeffler or Mr. Carpenter are too familiar figures to make an occasion, even if they had the inclination.

European conductors, on visit, are likewise few. The rising Russo-Parisian, Vladimir Golschmann, has "come out" to take over the St. Louis Orchestra for a few weeks—the particular week included in which, were he disengaged, Symphony Hall might have sought him. Mr. Fernandez-Arbo lastly finished his annual in St. Louis and is available for week in Boston. Again, most conductors settled in America were out of choice. They lead "union" orchestras while the Boston Orchestra remains obstinately "non-union." Shall Stock, for example, risk a lasting gaffe in Chicago for the pleasure and profit of a week in Boston? Not adroitly. From a field that was nearly empty, Symphony Hall finally picked Henry Hadley. He might pass for conductor, having divided his work-life between the two careers. He was home-born and bred. More than once he had been called to Symphony Hall. A prudent sailor, riding the musical seas these forty years, he has made and friends in every port. Wherefore was guest at the Symphony Concert yesterday afternoon; will be such at the same time this evening.

Now Mr. Hadley as conductor and composer is a highly respectable talent, of a sort that we good-natured Americans, at all times polite in the arts, take and propulsively. The fortunate patrons of our tolerant good will hear and no harsh words about themselves their work; make their bows, gain plaudits, go confidently along their way with never a thought of troublesome criticism. If, heeding King Solomon, they are "diligent in business" and watch for opportunity and connections, they usually "arrive"; are finally taken for granted. In this agreeable position, as he turns into his sixtieth year, Mr. Hadley now finds himself. Nobody lifted an eyebrow of surprise when it was announced that he would be guest this time at Symphony Hall. Nor, visibly, did anyone toss his hat in air. Yesterday he was welcomed to the stage with polite applause, mild and brief; at each recurrence renewed. The usual audience, seemingly substitutes—was present in the usual numbers; sat tranquilly through a concert of the usual length, the way improving its acquaintance with the daughter of Herodias, upon whom Mr. Hadley bestowed a tone-poem the editor of the program-book and all. At a quarter past four the concert dispersed, stirred to neither approval nor demur. There had merely been a Symphony Concert.

Of long experience, Mr. Hadley continued conductor. As the stock goes, he knows what he wants and the means wherewith to get it; before him on Friday was an orchestra as sensitive as it is puissant, the loyal Burgin, as concert-master, giving it to familiar mettle. Playing it, Mr. Hadley brought to pass a full, competent, smooth-surfaced performance of Haydn's Symphony in

DR. HADLEY CONDUCTS SYMPHONY

Plays Own "Salome"
and "Streets of Pekin"

Post Jan. 17, 1931
BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

Dr. Koussevitzky is now taking the well-earned fortnight's rest that it has been his custom to take in mid-season, therewith entrusting two pairs of Symphony Concerts to guest conductors. Thus the concert of yesterday afternoon, as will that of this evening, brought to the conductor's stand an eminent American musician who has more than once before presided, Henry Hadley.

TWO OF OWN WORKS

Since Dr. Hadley is composer as well as conductor, he not unnaturally likes to appear simultaneously in both capacities; hence yesterday under his baton a revival of his tone-poem, "Salome," last played here in 1907, and the first Boston performance of his new suite, "Streets of Peking," seven short descriptive pieces, fruit of a recent visit to the Orient. To the classics Dr. Hadley paid his respects by placing at the head of his programme Haydn's seldom-heard Symphony in E-flat major, known in Germany as the "symphony of the drum-roll," and he recognized a younger colleague by playing after this symphony Carl McKinley's "Masquerade," a piece heard here in Boston twice last season, at a concert of the orchestra of the New England Conservatory, the institution where Mr. McKinley is now teaching, and at a Pop concert.

Mr. McKinley's piece has already been played by several of the major

American orchestras and it is to be presumed that he had offered it to Dr. Koussevitzky. If that is the case, it is not altogether easy to see why Dr. Koussevitzky should have rejected it, especially since his eagerness to help the deserving young American composer is well known.

"Masquerade" Well Received

This "Masquerade" is not a particularly individual or original music. It is not important. But as a symphonic treatment of dance forms, from the waltz to the fox-trot, it is entertaining, gay and brilliant, and it "comes off." And if a choice is to be made between unimportant music which comes off and unimportant music which does not, the former is, from the listener's standpoint, much to be preferred, though Dr. Koussevitzky has given us plenty of the latter, domestic as well as foreign. "Masquerade" was well received by yesterday's audience, and from his seat in the balcony the composer was compelled many times to bow his acknowledgements.

In that it followed one of the less genial and inspired of Haydn's symphonies, "Masquerade" had yesterday a flattering setting. One of the 12 that Haydn wrote for his concerts in London, this symphony in E flat has been overshadowed by most of its companions. The most pleasing movement of the four is the Andante, with its recurring theme of folk-song character. Dr. Hadley conducted the symphony in straightforward fashion, yet it might be said that in the role of interpreter he did less for Haydn than for McKinley's music and for his own.

To come finally to Dr. Hadley's compositions, both the youthful tone-poem and the recent suite place the well-intentioned reviewer in the quandary wherein Dr. Hadley's music generally places him. It were idle to deny Dr. Hadley's mastery of every musical resource, as it were also idle to deny his possession of a certain gift for apposite and telling expression. There are glowing and seductive pages in "Salome," derived to be sure, like much music of the period of its composition, straight from Wagner. There are atmospheric and suggestive pages in the Chinese suite, an evocation of the spell and mystery of the East accomplished without recourse to bald thematic or instrumental literalism that, somewhat paradoxically, may quite easily fail of its purpose. Yet, with these compelling and arresting pages come measures that are undistinguished, platitudinous, even banal. There is much that is untidily bombastic in "Salome"; there are measures in the suite that stand not much above the level of tailor-made incidental music for stage-play or film.

Both compositions obviously pleased yesterday's audience, and at the close of the concert there was much applause for the composer-conductor.

Symphonic Afternoon In Rotunda

Henry Hadley for Co.
With His Own and C
Pieces Drifting

THESE are concerts to be praised, remembered, concerts to be discussed, forgotten. There are concerts that merely drift past the intended listener; proceed to leave no other trace behind. Now and then they recur in phony Concerts, energized as Dr. Koussevitzky, above all others, keeps them. For this season one such befell the Symphony Hall. "The mast word goes in New York—is 'holiday.'" That is to say, he is fortnight, free from rehearsals, to the making of plans study of scores for the half year. Consequently a guest-conductor in his place—and in this Jan. guest-conductors are hard to

To these two pairs of concerts which Dr. Koussevitzky is sent, it has become custom first, a notable composer will conduct in his own music. Notable conductor to set foot on the stage before a new audience years past, such a composer as Ravel, Glazunov—has been the United States, ready and invitation, possibly with lights, slipped casually into his presence, his conducting, through his "works," were an event of his pair of seasons, however, no eminence is spending the winter in States; while such American figures to make an occasion had the inclination.

European conductors, on the other hand, are few. The rising star, Vladimir Golschmann, has taken over the St. Louis Symphony for a few weeks—the particular in which, were he disengaged, Hall might have sought to in St. Louis and is available for next week in Boston. Again, most conductors settled in America were out of the choice. They lead "union" orchestras; while the Boston Orchestra remains obstinately "non-union." Shall Mr. Stock, for example, risk a lasting grudge in Chicago for the pleasure and honor of a week in Boston? Not advisedly. From a field that was nearly empty, Symphony Hall finally picked Henry Hadley. He might pass for composer-conductor, having divided his working life between the two careers. He was Boston-born and bred. More than once he had been called to Symphony Hall. Like a prudent sailor, riding the musical seas these forty years, he has made and kept friends in every port. Wherefore he was guest at the Symphony Concert yesterday afternoon; will be such at the repetition this evening.

Now Mr. Hadley as conductor and composer is a highly respectable talent, of the sort that we good-natured Americans, almost always polite in the arts, take kindly and propulsively. The fortunate recipients of our tolerant good will hear or read no harsh words about themselves and their work; make their bows, gain their plaudits, go confidently along their way, with never a thought of troublesome self-criticism. If, heeding King Solomon, they are "diligent in business" and watch out for opportunity and connections, they gradually "arrive"; are finally taken for granted. In this agreeable position, as he turns into his sixtieth year, Mr. Hadley now finds himself. Nobody lifted an eyebrow of surprise when it was announced that he would be guest this week at Symphony Hall. Nor, visibly, did anyone toss hat in air. Yesterday he was welcomed to the stage with polite applause, mild and brief; at each re-entrance renewed. The usual audience—or seemingly substitutes—was present in the usual numbers; sat tranquilly through a concert of the usual length, along the way improving its acquaintance with the daughter of Herodias, upon whom Mr. Hadley bestowed a tone-poem and the editor of the program-book an essay. At a quarter past four the company dispersed, stirred to neither approval nor demur. There had merely been another Symphony Concert.

Out of long experience, Mr. Hadley is routinized conductor. As the stock phrase goes, he knows what he wants and the means wherewith to get it; while before him on Friday was an orchestra as sensitive as it is puissant, with the loyal Burgin, as concert-master, holding it to familiar mettle. Playing upon it, Mr. Hadley brought to pass a faithful, competent, smooth-surfaced performance of Haydn's Symphony in

B-flat, the first of the London series. Written by Carl McKinley, New now of the faculty at the Con-in recent past variously abouts. It is free in form; full orchestra, plentiful in the corner; has no more "prothe single word of the title recognizable figure wanders with the staves, the orchestra stening imagination. As perotiv undergoes sundry varia-haps in the play with the fig-
the disguises of the motif, to find the title fulfilled. More and equally suiting it, are ims—some out of the popular jazz age—handled elastically gly, spangled with harmonic mental color. Gruenberg-like, sudden snaps and catches.
Mr. McKinley has a flair for thing in that sort of treatay even be counted as off-set y to remember, oftener than "is materia musica. . . . Alto-er afternoon for the common ic than for invention and in-among American composers.
long peace, to respectable
H. T. P.

With his own compositions, which filled half the concert. Mr. Hadley succeeded better. In matter and manner his tone-poem, "Salome," is of the mus-cal period in which he most flourished and with which he remains most in sympathy—the first decade of the century twenty years back. Into the piece went the best of his invention, resource and imagination, to make a whole less calculated and put together than many another of his scores. If he wrote thoughtfully, he wrote also ardently. In these days of other fashions and a different goal in music-making, not a little of "Salome" sounds outmoded or conventional.
Strauss himself, in a whole music-drama,
has not been able to save Wilde's princess and her Jokanaan from semi-oblivion.
Yet there are sonorities and delineative measures on Mr. Hadley's pages that still make their effect. The conductor-composer manifestly exhibits the tone-poem
as his favorite and longest-lived child.
Warrantably, it received the warmest applause of the afternoon.

The newest addition to the accumulated Hadleyana—the composer must be near, or have passed, his Opus 100—is a suite "Streets of Peking," travel-sketches and travel-notes set down in tones during a recent journey to the Orient. Mr. Hadley was not disposed to the research and assimilation with strange scales and instrumental timbres that have made Mr.
Elchheim a curious and unique composer.
Nor did the rhythms and colors of land and folk in the Far East touch his imagination as they touched, say, Roussel's.
He saw and heard as tourist; wrote as competent and conventional musician. He would be atmospheric and glamorous, fanciful and moonlit; or large and sonorous; or else rattle in street-scenes with pleasant and humorous din. The common stock of music the world over yields him much. The common stock of Oriental color in the concert-hall ekes it out.
The harmonic and instrumental surfaces are wholly conventional. A more undi-vidualized music were hard to imagine.
In composition and in performance a lighter hand than Mr. Hadley's would have better served it.

Along with the Hadleyan Suite came another and more fortunate effort to make something out of nothing—"Mas-

PHO
ARI
C EVEN
W TOR
H
H RO

Hadley es the Baton

Jan. 16, 1931.
of the Boston Symphony Cambridge last evening, ley proffered a program same program which he ymphony Hall this after-rrow evening as guest-ing the vacation of Dr.
Even the oldest number, ony in E-flat, No. 1 in id Härtel catalogue, is so ard as to produce an en-ot a particularly stimu-on. Mr. Hadley's own gh more familiar to syms when tone-poems were n, has been neglected suf-to make it appear novel lay listener. Still better term is Carl McKinley's and Mr. Hadley's latest of Peking," bearing the reeptember, 1930. A well-to the public of Boston ile composer of long serv-putation, genial and parof musicians, Mr. Hadley al welcome. He conducted rity and precision of a accustomed to orchestral lar but not ungraceful, he ntentions with broad ges-ms and sweeping move-l body. The Boston Symphony Orchestra was quite its accurate, responsive and polished self under his leadership, the musicians following his beat with ease and responding readily to the peculiarities of his leadership.

Principal interest in the occasion converged upon Mr. Hadley's new suite,
"Streets of Peking," and Mr. McKinley's "Masquerade." Haydn's early symphony was not inexpertly chosen as preliminary piece against which might be set to good advantage the two novelties. This is the symphony popularly known as "with the drum-roll." Even against the comparatively mild modernism of Hadley and McKinley, it is serene, inoffensive music and it must be admitted, rather dull throughout the greater portion of its length. It begins auspiciously with its drum-roll and prophetic introductory chords, but the subsequent measures of beat pattern-making appear, to contemporary listeners, not particularly inspired.
There are two or three engrossing variations in the slow movement, the trio of the minuet is delightful and the closing movement contains some stirring measures. Mr. Hadley read the score with straightforward accuracy with no attempt to discover fresh nuances.

Though it may be said that Mr. Mc-Kinley and Mr. Hadley ignore cert in-trends of the time as regards orchestral composition, they are none the less individual and sincere in using the idiom which is more naturally their medium of expression. At one time organist in a New York theater and now member of the faculty of the New England Conservatory of Music, Mr. McKinley has observed at close range the fashion of the people's music outside the hallowed concert hall. By this is meant the music of the movie palace, the musical stage and jazz. "Masquerade" has some first-rate jazz. True, it is idealized jazz in the main, in a skilful and workmanlike transcription, but it is rough and earthy enough to be unashamedly toe-ticking at the same time. Orchestraly, it lthers and glints with the sh en that is the essence of present-day pl a ure-seeking. Its honesty is one of its most engaging features. The young people of yesterday's audience enjoyed it, immensely.

This is scarcely the time to review
Mr. Hadley's "Salome." Written in the idion of Wagner and Strauss, but not necessarily imitative of these two composers, it became familiar nearly twenty years ago. It serves now to cite the fact that even then Mr. Hadley was an adroit manipulator of orchestral effect, a skilled technician and a confirmed melodist, as he is today. The change in fashion is to him as well as to others who, through no fault of their own, found their creative faculties shaped by an earlier school, unfortunate.

ets of Peking" is one of Mr. Had-most graceful and spontaneous

Not so very long ago, the Sym-
Orchestra produced in Sanders
Ravel's orchestra transcription
Sorgsky's much-admired "Pictures Exhibition." There is very little nce between the artistic concept
her piece. Both are descriptive based upon external impressions.
has used his orchestra in the way
nown to him. Hadley, likewise, sed peculiar means, regardless of actices of others. Though it may d that his orchestral harmony rethe Western idea of Chinese musi-ect, no one has yet come forward ufficient authority to successfully
e this idea. Personal impressions stimate in all art. Suffice it that s of Peking" has much material ctive melodic beauty, particularly case of the excerpt entitled "Jade

Harmony and orchestral color
the sensuous ear. We sometimes have our music please the sen-
ear. For which reason, yesterday's se received Mr. Hadley's new piece
uch enthusiasm. N. M. J.

HADLEY CONDUCTS SYMPHONY CONCERT

McKinley's "Masquerade" and Hadley Pieces Heard

Jan. 17, 1931
Mr. Koussevitzky is taking his annual midseason vacation. Yesterday's nphony concert was conducted by ary Hadley, as guest. Next week Fernandez Arbos will return as st conductor. Mr Hadley's program terday included Haydn's E-flat nphony, the one with the drum roll;
one poem entitled "Masquerade,"

Carl McKinley; Mr Hadley's lome," first performed in 1927, and latest work, "Streets of Peking," tten in Japan last Summer.
r Hadley, born in Somerville in l, grew up and studied music in city, though he has not lived here ce the 1890s. He last appeared as st conductor at the Boston Symny concerts five years ago. In the antime he has more than once con-ted the People's Symphony as st. He is now living in New York conducting concerts by the Man-tan Symphony. A good deal of his sic has been heard in Boston from time to time.

With his own compositions, filled half the concert. Mr. Hadley succeeded better. In matter and in his tone-poem, "Salome," is of the best of his invention, resourceful and put together than many other of his scores. If he wrote fully, he wrote also ardently. In days of other fashions and a goal in music-making, not a little Strauss himself, in a whole has not been able to save Wilde's and her Jokanaan from semi-obscure and in the disguises of the motif, hearers are to find the title fulfilled. More apparent, and equally sultry it, are dance-rhythms—some out of the popular stock of the jazz age—handled elastically and amusingly, spangled with harmonic and instrumental color. Gruenberg-like, alive with sudden snaps and catches. Seemingly Mr. McKinley has a flair for that sort of thing in that sort of treatment. It may even be counted as offset to a tendency to remember, oftener than to invent, his materia musica. . . Altogether, a better afternoon for the common stocks of music than for invention and in-lome sounds outmoded or conventional. American composers, Peace, and a long peace, to respectable II. T. P.

Trans. — Jan. 16, 1931.
the Boston Symphon

AT the concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Cambridge last evening, Henry Hadley proffered a program of novelties—the same program which he will project at Symphony Hall this afternoon and tomorrow evening as guest-conductor during the vacation of Dr. Koussevitzky. Even the oldest number, Haydn's Symphony in E-flat, No. 1 in the Breitkopf and Härtel catalogue, is so infrequently heard as to produce an entirely fresh if not a particularly stimulating impression. Mr. Hadley's own "Salome," though more familiar to symphony audiences when tone-poems were more the fashion, has been neglected sufficiently of late to make it appear novel to the present-day listener. Still better deserving the term is Carl McKinley's "Masquerade" and Mr. Hadley's latest piece, "Streets of Peking," bearing the recent date of September, 1930. A well-known figure to the public of Boston and suburbs, facile composer of long service and wide reputation, genial and particular leader of musicians, Mr. Hadley received a cordial welcome. He conducted with the authority and precision of a musician long accustomed to orchestral procedure. Angular but not ungraceful, he expressed his intentions with broad gestures of his arms and sweeping movements of his tall body. The Boston Symphony Orchestra was quite its accurate, responsive and polished self under his leadership, the musicians following his beat with ease and responding readily to the peculiarities of his leadership.

Principal interest in the occasion converged upon Mr. Hadley's new suite, "Streets of Pekin," and Mr. McKinley's "Masquerade." Haydn's early symphony was not inexpertly chosen as preliminary piece against which might be set to good advantage the two novelties. This is the symphony popularly known as "with the drum-roll." Even against the comparatively mild modernism of Hadley and McKinley, it is serene, inoffensive music and it must be admitted, rather dull throughout the greater portion of its length. It begins auspiciously with its drum-roll and prophetic introductory chords, but the subsequent measures of neat pattern-making appear, to contemporary listeners, not particularly inspired. There are two or three engrossing variations in the slow movement, the trio of the minuet is delightful and the closing movement contains some stirring measures. Mr. Hadley read the score with straightforward accuracy with no attempt to discover fresh nuances.

Though it may be said that Mr. McKinley and Mr. Hadley ignore certain trends of the time as regards orchestral composition, they are none the less individual and sincere in using the idiom which is more naturally their medium of expression. At one time organist in a New York theater and now member of the faculty of the New England Conservatory of Music, Mr. McKinley has observed at close range the fashion of the people's music outside the hallowed concert hall. By this is meant the music of the movie palace, the musical stage and jazz. "Masquerade" has some first-rate jazz. True, it is idealized jazz in the main, in a skiful and workmanlike transcription, but it is rough and earthy enough to be unashamedly toe-ticking at the same time. Orchestraly, it litters and glints with the shen that is the essence of present-day pleasure-seeking. Its honesty is one of its most engaging attributes. The young people of yesterday's audience enjoyed it immensely.

This is surely the time to review Mr. Hadley's "Salome." Written in the idiom of Wagner and Strauss, but not necessarily imitative of these two composers, it became familiar nearly twenty years ago. It serves now to cite the fact that even then Mr. Hadley was an adroit manipulator of orchestral effect, a skilled technician and a confirmed melodist, as he is today. The change in fashion is to him as well as to others who, through no fault of their own, found their creative faculties shaped by an earlier school, unfortunate.

Not so very long ago, the Sym-
Orchestra produced in Sanders or Ravel's orchestra transcription
sorgsky's much-admired "Pictures Exhibition." There is very little nce between the artistic concept
her piece. Both are descriptive based upon external impressions.
has used his orchestra in the way
known to him. Hadley, likewise, sed peculiar means, regardless of ntices of others. Though it may
d that his orchestral harmony re-he Western idea of Chinese musi-ct, no one has yet come forward ufficient authority to successfully
e this idea. Personal impressions timate in all art. Suffice it that s of Pekin" has much material ctive melodic beauty, particularly
case of the excerpt entitled "Jade Harmony and orchestral color
the sensuous ear. We sometimes have our music please the sen-
ear. For which reason, yesterday's received Mr. Hadley's new piece
uch enthusiasm. N. M. J.

Kinley's "Masquerade" and Hadley Pieces Heard

Mr. Koussevitzky is taking his annual midseason vacation. Yesterday's symphony concert was conducted by Henry Hadley, as guest. Next week Fernandez Arbos will return as assistant conductor. Mr Hadley's program yesterday included Haydn's E-flat symphony, the one with the drum roll; a poem entitled "Masquerade," Carl McKinley; Mr Hadley's "Home," first performed in 1927, and latest work, "Streets of Pekin," written in Japan last Summer.

Mr. Hadley, born in Somerville in 1861, grew up and studied music in that city, though he has not lived here since the 1890s. He last appeared as assistant conductor at the Boston Symphony concerts five years ago. In the meantime he has more than once conducted the People's Symphony as assistant. He is now living in New York and conducting concerts by the Manhattan Symphony. A good deal of his music has been heard in Boston from time to time.

Mr McKinley, born in Yarmouth, Me., in 1895, and a graduate of Harvard, is now a member of the New England Conservatory faculty. His "Masquerade," written in 1924, has been played at the Pops in Boston and at series of orchestral concerts in a number of other American cities. It is, rather surprisingly, the first work of his to be played by the Boston Symphony.

Light Music

"Masquerade" has no program beyond that implied by the title. It is an ingratiating and lively piece of light music, written with gusto and discrimination. Mr McKinley has succeeded better than anyone else one can recall in securing from a symphony orchestra some of the effects many musicians admire in the best jazz bands. His "blues" are delightful. The style of the piece is not modernistic. He does not break rules and smash precedents out of any doctrinaire radicalism.

But despite the conventionality of the idiom and a few reminiscences, "Masquerade" is an original and agreeable piece, one that would bear repetition at these concerts far better than would some recent imported novelties by Lourie and others. Mr Hadley gave a sympathetic reading of McKinley's music and a spirited one of the familiar Haydn symphony. The audience liked McKinley's piece better than it likes most new pieces. The composer was obliged to stand repeatedly and bow in his place in the first balcony.

Mr Hadley's choice of program yesterday showed that it was as composer rather than as conductor that he wished to come before the Boston Symphony audience. His long experience and the resultant skill in orchestral routine left no difficulties in the way of his giving an authoritative interpretation of his own music.

Tone Poem

His "Salome," published in 1906, was finished before he saw Richard Strauss' opera, also based on Wilde's notorious play. If he had known that Strauss was writing a "Salome" he would doubtless have selected a different topic for his tone poem. With the exception of the symphony, "Youth and Life," one felt that Hadley's "Salome" is the most interesting and the most successful artistically of his numerous compositions. Its style is sometimes turgid, sometimes too facile, sometimes reminiscent. But despite obvious faults, this tone poem was for 1906 an original and stimulating work. Nor has it in 1930 lost all its imaginative appeal.

The orthodoxy and conventionality characteristic of Mr Hadley's music are also shown in the new "Streets of Pekin," with its seven brief sections suggested by impressions of that city. The audience was pleased with the suave and piquant Orientalism of this score, not based on actual Chinese music, or on modernist technique, but on a tradition long familiar to Western ears. Even those who prefer Elchhelm's "Oriental Impressions" or Stravinsky's "Nightingale" as musical pictures of China cannot deny to Mr Hadley the mint of doing well what he set out to do. P. R.

cars and trucks c 15 models.

received from our-ers throughout they believe that the au-will show a steady Ford said. "Since dustry is a basic it in it cannot help cial influence on-coupe and sedan, model of greatest duction is respec-

★A BIG SE

★A POWER

★A BRILL

won by the new W

onal Auto Show is of how thoroughly

has achieved its aim introduce to the

TH IMI

the ser-

las-had 30s-cont is in-

in arge

Dr. Henry Hadley

Mr McKinley, born in Yarmouth, Me., in 1895, and a graduate of Harvard, is now a member of the New England Conservatory faculty. His "Masquerade," written in 1924, has been played at the Pops in Boston and at series of orchestral concerts in a number of other American cities. It is, rather surprisingly, the first work of his to be played by the Boston Symphony.

Light Music

"Masquerade" has no program beyond that implied by the title. It is an ingratiating and lively piece of light music, written with gusto and discrimination. Mr McKinley has succeeded better than all recall in securing for his orchestra some of the best musicians in the city. For the first week of Dr. Koussevitzky's midwinter vacation, Henry Hadley, distinguished American conductor and composer, was invited to take over the podium and incidentally to set before the Boston public some examples of his own compositions.

But despite the fact that the idiom and a few of the "Masquerade" is an original and capable piece, one that would stand up to any of the recent works of Carl McKinley's "Masquerade," and by Lourie and others. Mr. Hadley's Tone Poem, "Salome," and Suite, "Streets of Peking." Mr. Hadley's musicianship and authoritative leadership are well known to audiences not only in the United States, but in Europe, South America and the Far East. With the cooperation of the splendid orchestral instrument lent to him by Dr. Koussevitzky, he obtained an excellent performance of the Haydn Symphony. His long experience and resultant skill in conducting left no difficulties in giving an authoritative performance of his own music.

Tone Poem

His "Salome," published before he finished his New England as Strauss' opera, also "Maine," is now a member of the faculty of the New England Conservatory of Music, in Boston. "Masquerade" was written in 1924. It had been played twice previously in Boston, but not before "at these concerts." The composer says that it is successful artistically without program or descriptive intention other than that implied by its title. He has employed a large orchestra to restate very competently and stimulating work. Nor has it in 1930 lost all its imaginative appeal.

The orthodoxy and conventionality characteristic of Mr Hadley's music are also shown in the new "Streets of Pekin," with its seven brief sections suggested by impressions of that city. The audience was pleased with the suave and piquant Orientalism of this score, not based on actual Chinese music, or on modernist technique, but on a tradition long familiar to Western ears. Even those who prefer Eichheim's "Oriental Impressions" or Stravinsky's "Nightingale" as musical pictures of China cannot deny to Mr Hadley the merit of doing well what he set out to do. P. R.

★A BIG SIZE
★A POWER
★A BRILLIANT

is won by the new W onal Auto Show is
of how thoroughly
has achieved its aim introduce to the

Dr. Henry Hadley

Mr McKinley, born in Yarmouth, Me., in 1895, and a graduate of Harvard, is now a member of the New England Conservatory faculty. His "Masquerade," written in 1924, has been played at the Pops in Boston and at series of orchestral concerts in a number of other American cities. It is, rather surprisingly, the first work of his to be played by the Boston Symphony.

Light Music

"Masquerade" has no program beyond that implied by the title. It is an ingratiating and lively piece of light music, written with gusto and discrimination. Mr McKinley has succeeded better than all recall in securing for orchestra some of the musicians admire Iivitzky's midwinter bands. His "blues" style of the piece is a Hadley, distinguish himself as a conductor and composer. He does not break precedents out of radicalism.

But despite the idiom and a few examples of his notes pointed out, before Strauss's "Masquerade" is an operatic piece, one that would some recent by Lourie and others. Mr. Hadley's music and a spirited and Suite, "Streets of Peking," which was completed before Mr. Hadley was acquainted with Strauss's score. It is evident, however, that it had not been completed before certain other European musical masterworks had been made known to the world. But originality is rare, and it was perfectly proper that Mr. Hadley should tell his story in the musical language which 25 years ago was commonly current.

Mr Hadley's choice of the splendor of the instrument lent to it rather than as conduct to come before the Eivitzky, he obtained no earlier than last September, while to audience. His long performance of the Mr. Hadley was serving as guest conductor of the Tokyo New Symphony Orchestra. It has been heard in Tokyo, New York and in Chicago. There are seven divisions, descriptive of contrasted scenes of city life in the East. The idiom is effectively Oriental in the Puccinian style, though some of the atmosphere comes from no farther away than Paris. The most interesting of the sketches is the fourth, called "Jade Street (Moonlight)." Here with strings, flute and horn, the composer has conveyed impressions of loveliness.

Tone Poem

His "Salome," published before he finished New England Strauss' opera, also "Maine," is now notorious play. If he faculty of the New England Conservatory of Music, would doubtless have "Masquerade" was written for his tone poem. It has been played twice with exception of the symphony "Life," one felt that it was not before the most interesting. The compositions. Its stilted, sometimes too turgid, sometimes too reminiscent. But despite this tone poem was for orchestra to rest and stimulating work. Nor has it in 1930 lost all its imaginative appeal.

The orthodoxy and conventionality characteristic of Mr Hadley's music are also shown in the new "Streets of Peking," with its seven brief sections suggested by impressions of that city. The audience was pleased with the suave and piquant Orientalism of this score, not based on actual Chinese music, or on modernist technique, but on a tradition long familiar to Western ears. Even those who prefer Eichheim's "Oriental Impressions" or Stravinsky's "Nightingale" as musical pictures of China cannot deny to Mr Hadley the merit of doing well what he set out to do. P. R.

Boston certain musical truths which first were discovered variously in Vienna and in Harlem.

For the first we Mr. Hadley's tone poem, after Oscar Wilde's tragedy, has been played many times since its first performance in Boston under Dr. Muck in 1907. The work was composed, as the program notes pointed out, before Strauss's opera on the same subject was produced at Dresden, and was completed before Mr. Hadley was acquainted with Strauss's score. It is evident, however, that it had not been completed before certain other European musical masterworks had been made known to the world. But originality is rare, and it was perfectly proper that Mr. Hadley should tell his story in the musical language which 25 years ago was commonly current.

The "Peking" Suite was composed no earlier than last September, while Mr. Hadley was serving as guest conductor of the Tokyo New Symphony Orchestra. It has been heard in Tokyo, New York and in Chicago. There are seven divisions, descriptive of contrasted scenes of city life in the East. The idiom is effectively Oriental in the Puccinian style, though some of the atmosphere comes from no farther away than Paris. The most interesting of the sketches is the fourth, called "Jade Street (Moonlight)." Here with strings, flute and horn, the composer has conveyed impressions of loveliness.

Mr. Hadley was cordially received at the Friday concert, and at the close there were mutual congratulations between conductor and orchestra. L. A. S.

Dr. Henry Hadley

Light Music

But despite the c

Mr Hadley's choice yesterday showed that rather than ascondu to come before the audience. His long resultant skill in left no difficulties giving an authority of his own music.

Tone Poem

[illegible]

The orthodoxy and conventionality characteristic of Mr Hadley's music are also shown in the new "Streets of Pekin," with its seven brief sections suggested by impressions of that city. The audience was pleased with the suave and piquant Orientalism of this score, not based on actual Chinese music, or on modernist technique, but on a tradition long familiar to Western ears. Even those who prefer Eichheim's "Oriental Impressions" to Stravinsky's "Nightingale" as musical pictures of China cannot deny to Mr. Hadley the merit of doing well what he set out to do.

P. R.

Boston S

S
 certain musical truths which had been discovered variously in Vienna and in we Harlem.

ter Mr. Hadley's long tour after Orestes Wilde's tragedy, has been played many times since its first performance in Boston under Dr. Muck in 1907. The work was composed, as the program is notes pointed out, before Strauss's opera on the same subject was produced at Dresden, and was completed before Mr. Hadley was acquainted with Strauss's score. It is evident, however, that it had not been completed before certain other European musical masterworks had been made known to the world. But original composers, artists are rare, and it was perfectly proper that Mr. Hadley should tell his story in the musical language of his time, which 25 years ago was completely current.

to Y. The "Peking" Suite was composed nine months earlier than last September, when the Mr. Hadley was serving as guest conductor of the Tokyo New Symphony and Orchestra. It has been heard in Tokyo, Amén in New York and in Chicago. The suite are seven divisions, descriptive of conditions in the East.

Under the seven divisions of life in the Eastern world, the sketches of daily life in the East and the East idiom is effectively Oriental in the Puccinian style, though some of the atmosphere comes from no farther away than Paris. The most interesting of the sketches is the fourth, called "Jade Street (Moonlight)." Here the strings, flute and horn, the composer has conveyed impressions of joy and beauty.

Mr. Hadley was pardonedly a good the Friday concert and at the close there were mutual congratulations between conductor and orchestra.

Dr. Henry Hadley

Max Kunze, Richard Burgin, concert master; Jean Bedetti, first violoncello; Jean Letranc, Fernand Thillois, leader of the second violins. Julius Theodorowicz.

Thirteenth Programme

FRIDAY AFTERNOON, JANUARY 23, at 2.30 o'clock

SATURDAY EVENING, JANUARY 24, at 8.15 o'clock

ENRIQUE F. ARBÓS will conduct these concerts

Corelli Suite
Sarabande—Gigue—Badinérie.
(First time in Boston)

Franck Symphony in D minor
I. Lento. Allegro non troppo.
II. Allegretto.
III. Allegro non troppo.

de Falla . . . Suite from "El Amor Brujo" ("Love the Sorcerer")
Introduction and Scene—The Gypsies (Evening)—The Homecomer—
Dance of Terror—The Magic Circle (Narrative of the Fisherman)—Midnight (Sorceries)—Ritual Dance of Fire (To dispel Evil Spirits)—Pantomime—Dance of the Game of Love—Finale (Morning Chimes).

Albéniz . . . Two Pieces (Transcription for Orchestra by E. F. Arbós)
I. El Albaicin.
II. Navarra.
(First time in Boston)

STEINWAY PIANO

There will be an intermission after the symphony

A fiftieth anniversary exhibition is now on view in the Huntington Avenue foyer
(first balcony)

SYMPHONY CONCERT

Herald By PHILIP HALE

Enrique Fernandez-Arbos, as a guest, conducted the 13th concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra yesterday afternoon in Symphony hall. The program was as follows: Corelli, Suite; Franck, symphony in D minor; De Falla, suite from the ballet-pantomime, "El Amor Brujo"; Albeniz, two pieces, "El Albaicin" and "Navarra," piano pieces transcribed for orchestra by Mr. Arbos.

Corelli was known to the symphony audience by his "Christmas" concerto. The suite played yesterday consists of a Sarabande, a Gigue and a Badinerie, a term equivalent to juggling or foolery, a term found in a concerto by Bach. Ettore Pinelli, a Roman musician of note, took these movements from a book of Corelli's sonatas, and showed taste in the selection. How much he did to the original music is unknown to us, but there is fidelity to the old grace and spirit; there is no attempt at impudent modernization, fortunately; for the music is charming in its simplicity—the Sarabande with its simple tenderness; the Gigue, fresh and sparkling, not overlabored and spun out as is too often the case in Bach's movements of this nature; the Badinerie precisely what the title indicates. Mr. Arbos gave the necessary nuances with a fine regard for the spirit of Corelli's period, and did not try to give undue importance by overconducting. How beautiful this old music is! What a spell it works, and by what simple means! The trouble with so many of contemporaneous composers is that they cannot write simply, for they have few musical ideas; so they are forced to follow the frog in the fable, or they strive to startle an audience by desperate endeavors to be original, thinking that they will be like Offenbach's Archduke Ernest:

"Original! Original!
Combien je suis original!
Non rien n'est plus original,
Qu'un Archiduc original!"

And that the hearers will shout in chorus:

"Oui, c'est un original!"

In Mr. Arbos's reading of Franck's symphony many features of the detail, features in the thematic development were brought out, but not in a manner to check the musical flow; not as if certain passages—revealed clearly to the audience for the first time—were so many digressions, but as if they were illustrations, comments on the treatment of the fundamental ideas; and so the ultimate triumph of faith over the torments of doubt was all the more glorious. The performance was thus poetically dramatic; the drama was that of the questioning soul. Too much stress has been put on the singular goodness, the child-like innocence of Franck's character. It has been wisely said that in the soul of every saint, evil lurks. Blessed is the holy man that realizes this; thus is he humanized! It is curious that when Franck tried to portray evil, when the hosts of hell were supposed to be wicked in song, as in "The Beatitudes," he only was conventionally operatic in Meyerbeer's worst manner. The mental struggle between doubt and faith inspired the composer of the symphony. No wonder that after the performance of yesterday the orchestra joined the audience in tumultuous applause.

Excellent as was the performance of De Falla's music, an interpretation arresting through the understanding and the fire of the composer's friend and countryman, it still holds good that ballet music, whatever its intrinsic worth, suffers by separation from the action. The reading yesterday was splendid in vitality, dash and color, but the music would have been thrice as significant if it had served to emphasize the strange drama on the stage.

It is fortunate for Albeniz that he is not known by his own orchestration of the pieces in "Iberia." Mr. Arbos urged Albeniz to arrange them for the orchestra, but in the two that were ready for performance the composer showed little skill. It was meet and proper that Mr. Arbos himself should undertake the task. The symphony audience heard "La Fete-dieu a Seville" and "Tirana" two years ago when the transcriber was a guest conductor. Yesterday it heard "El Albaicin" and "Navarra," the first from "Iberia"; the second a posthumous work which was left unfinished. Deodat de Severac completed it for the piano, but his musical nature was not in rapport with that of the Spaniard. Mr. Arbos in his arrangement completed "Navarra" as a Spaniard should. It is not probable that any other countryman was the man for the task; Mr. Arbos has a peculiar gift for orchestration. He is master of finesse as well as gorgeous coloring. And so yesterday the music of Albeniz seemed the soul of Spain—the Spain of the Moors and the gypsies.

The concert will be repeated tonight. The program of the concerts to be conducted next week by Dr. Koussevitzky will comprise: Elgar's "Introduction and Allegro for Strings"; Sibelius's symphony No. 7, and Strauss's Symphonia Domestica. Jan. 24, 1931

ARBOS AT HELM WITH SYMPHONY

Receives Ovation for His Reading of Franck

Post Jan. 24, 1931
BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

Many years ago concert-master at the Boston Symphony Orchestra and much more recently guest conductor at a pair of Symphony Concerts, Enrique Fernandez Arbos returned to Symphony Hall, yesterday afternoon, to direct this week's concerts in the absence of Dr. Koussevitzky. Well received throughout the afternoon, Mr. Arbos was accorded what might be described as an ovation after the Symphony of Cesar Franck, which completed the first half of the programme.

WARMLY RECEIVED

Occasionally audiences restore, if they often shatter, one's faith in human nature. There have been more exciting, more sensational performances of Franck's Symphony at Symphony Hall, performances far better calculated to sway, to arouse, to inflame the susceptible hearer. Yet not within long memory has that symphony been received so warmly as it was received yesterday.

Familiar as it is and clear as it is today, the Symphony of Franck proves often a stumbling-block to conductors.

Some, taking their cue from the idolatrous attitude of Vincent d'Indy, endeavor to read into the music the mysticism and other-worldliness of "Father" Franck the man. Others again, following the implications of the printed page, produce a version of the music which, to quote an inspired commentator, might be described as a blend of the sentimentality of Gounod and the theatricality of Liszt.

Reminds Some of Gericke

But Franck's Symphony has no need to be regarded, on the one hand, as music of the cloister nor, on the other, to be set forth as music of the boudoir and the footlights. Read and played simply as music, without exaggeration, over-emphasis or pose, it makes, as it made yesterday, its fullest effect and appeal. It were difficult to decide, in commenting on the interpretation of Mr. Arbos, which to stress first, the unflinching rightness of his tempi, his lucid exposition of the music's structure, his ability to seize upon significant detail without doing violence to the larger concept, or his unflinching feeling for a euphony that steadily charmed the ear yet never once cloyed. After the performance of yesterday one enthusiast was heard to declare that the Symphony had not so sounded in that auditorium since the distant days of Wilhelm Gericke.

For the rest, Mr. Arbos introduced to Boston yesterday a suite of three pieces for strings, arranged by one E. Pinelli from the sonatas of Corelli and also the conductor's own effective transcriptions for full orchestra of two piano pieces of Albeniz, "El Albaicin" and "Navarra." Between Franck's Symphony and these last-named pieces there came the familiar suite from De Falla's ballet, "Love the Sorcerer," to be seen on the stage of the Opera House next Wednesday evening.

Corelli a Master

Corelli's music, anticipating now that of Bach, now that of Handel, and now that of the later Italians, yet having, withal, an individuality of its own, gave much pleasure. No mere pioneer was Arcangelo Corelli, but a master in his own right.

De Falla's music, perhaps the most significant that has come out of modern Spain, was sympathetically interpreted by his gifted countrymen. Beside it the music of Albeniz seemed of the conventional, the parlor Spain, though "Navarra," recalling a little Chabrier's brilliant "Espana," made an effective final number and brought forth warm applause.

A Friendly Symphonic Afternoon

Mr. Arbos, as Guest, Prevails in Franck's Symphony And Spanish Pieces

Spans. — Jan. 24, 1931

CYNICUS has invented a new wisecrack. Through the intermission, at the Symphony Concert on Friday, he was busy circulating it. The audience, he said, and not Dr. Koussevitzky, had gone on vacation. Every one knew that the conductor was working in his study at the programs for the Bach Festival and other plans for the second half of the season. Through a fortnight he had "passed up" rehearsals and concerts, only to busy himself with scores. Whereas an appreciable part of the usual audience was taking a second Friday holiday. Look around anywhere, and familiar figures were missing; while up in the second balcony there were rush-seats standing empty.

The subscribers in presence—Cynicus rattled on—were clearly in vacation mood. Last week they had lolled through Mr. Hadley's array of his own and other masterpieces; while today they had settled back in their chairs to hear a comfortable performance of Franck's familiar Symphony; only to be aroused by Mr. Arbos's well-placed fervors. Cynicus himself had picked the half-hour to listen with one lobe of such brain as he has; while with the other he chose the family guests for a supper-party he is soon giving on his sister-in-law's birthday. The conductor's vigors detached him from that pious task and he had joined in the tumult of applause that crowned the performance. Cynicus, who migrated from New York twenty-five years ago, had clapped the louder, because he had overheard someone calling Mr. Arbos "our old and esteemed friend"—in the "most patronizing Boston manner."

The gentleman from Madrid is indeed rather more than "our old and esteemed friend" from his days as concert-master

Gericke in 1903 to his first return "at" Symphony Hall two years ago is in fact an able and refreshing experience, even when weeks of exacting St. Louis have tired him. In days we expect "individual reading" from our eminences of the baton, them the composers outspread in front of them the orchestra ready to do their bidding. Behind the audience await the illumination of the masterpiece in hand by the personality. (If some turns out to be a darkening of the composer's counsels, never mind. All "thinking" people take genius as it is.) In contrast, Mr. Arbos is a man of faithful, honest, straightforward conducting. Clear-minded music reads the score on his desk, the composer set it down. Practitioner, he transmits it to hear without a thought of "filtering it through his own personality." When the orchestra is as sympathetic as it was yesterday, the transmission is the richer. Arbos had no need to spur his mates (a week ago.)

Those who would have the con-mirror to the composer, there is no more truthful glass—Toscanini aside—than Mr. Arbos. His grace and poise likewise commend him. Of late years, on his travels, he has been a quiet apostle of the older and Spanish composers. But he has not overloaded a program with their while one, yesterday, long since international recognition—de ballet, "Love the Sorcerer." When himself transcriber for orchestra, was now, with two piano-pieces of Albeniz, the record on the program suffices. He is all for Albeniz, a new dress, as little as may be himself as dressmaker. He has, be-queant ways longer to be remembered than a deal of "personality." Who watched him on Friday will forget the springs into the air with which he emphasized to the orchestra the swift changes of rhythm in de Falla's

Mr. Arbos, like the rest of us, can be obtrusively in the fashion. Time when a classic or a modern over-egan symphonic programs. Now the piece is an eighteenth-century piece or suite, as often as not for choir. Mr. Arbos's choice lighted a suite of three movements, assembled and arranged from sonatas of Corelli. The first was a Sarabande, slow-grave and songful; the second a accented gigue; the third, the traditional chit-chat and sport with fig-

ARBOS AT HELM WITH SYMPHONY

Receives Ovation for
His Reading of Franck

Post Jan. 24, 1931
BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

Many years ago concert-master at the Boston Symphony Orchestra and much more recently guest conductor at a pair of Symphony Concerts, Enrique Fernandez Arbos returned to Symphony Hall, yesterday afternoon, to direct this week's concerts in the absence of Dr. Koussevitzky. Well received throughout the afternoon, Mr. Arbos was accorded what might be described as an ovation after the Symphony of Cesar Franck, which completed the first half of the programme.

WARMLY RECEIVED

Occasionally audiences restore, if they often shatter, one's faith in human nature. There have been more exciting, more sensational performances of Franck's Symphony at Symphony Hall, performances far better calculated to sway, to arouse, to inflame the susceptible hearer. Yet not within long memory has that symphony been received so warmly as it was received yesterday.

Familiar as it is and clear as it is today, the Symphony of Franck proves often a stumbling-block to conductors.

Some, taking their cue from the idolatrous attitude of Vincent d'Indy, endeavor to read into the music the mysticism and other-worldliness of "Father" Franck the man. Others again, following the implications of the printed page, produce a version of the music which, to quote an inspired commentator, might be described as a blend of the sentimentality of Gounod and the theatricality of Liszt.

Reminds Some of Gericke

But Franck's Symphony has no need to be regarded, on the one hand, as music of the cloister nor, on the other, to be set forth as music of the boudoir and the footlights. Read and played simply as music, without exaggeration, over-emphasis or pose, it makes, as it made yesterday, its fullest effect and appeal. It were difficult to decide, in commenting on the interpretation of Mr. Arbos, which to stress first, the unfailing rightness of his tempi, his lucid exposition of the music's structure, his ability to seize upon significant detail without doing violence to the larger concept, or his unfailing feeling for a euphony that steadily charmed the ear yet never once cloyed. After the performance of yesterday one enthusiast was heard to declare that the Symphony had not so sounded in that auditorium since the distant days of Wilhelm Gericke.

For the rest, Mr. Arbos introduced to Boston yesterday a suite of three pieces for strings, arranged by one E. Pinelli from the sonatas of Corelli, and also the conductor's own effective transcriptions for full orchestra of two piano pieces of Albeniz, "El Albañil" and "Navarra." Between Franck's Symphony and these last-named pieces there came the familiar suite from de Falla's ballet, "Love the Sorcerer," to be seen on the stage of the Opera House next Wednesday evening.

Corelli a Master

Corelli's music, anticipating now that of Bach, now that of Handel, and now that of the later Italians, yet having, withal, an individuality of its own, gave much pleasure. No mere pioneer was Arcangelo Corelli, but a master in his own right.

De Falla's music, perhaps the most significant that has come out of modern Spain, was sympathetically interpreted by his gifted countrymen. Beside it the music of Albeniz seemed of the conventional, the parlor Spain, though "Navarra," recalling a little Chabrier's brilliant "Espana," made an effective final number and brought forth warm applause.

A Friend Symp Af

Mr. Arbos, as in Franck's
And Spani

CYNICUS has a crack. Throu at the Symph day, he was The audience, he said, -vitzky, had gone one knew that the cor. in his study at the Bach Festival and second half of the fortnight he had, "pa and concerts, only to scores. Whereas an the usual audience v Friday holiday. Look and familiar figures up in the second balc seats standing empty

The subscribers in rattled on—were e mood. Last week the Mr. Hadley's array o masterpieces; while r tled back in their ch fortable performance miliar Symphony; on Mr. Arbos's well-plac himself had picked t ten with one lobe o has; while with the family guests for a soon giving on his day. The conductor him from that piou joined in the tumul crowned the performa migrated from New years ago, had clap cause he had overh Mr. Arbos "our old a —in the "most patro ner."

The gentleman fro rather more than "of friend" from his day,

BROOK apart 6134.

BROOK famil

CAMBR vard rooms, b legs; for POR ter

CAMBR 10 r ond floor party on 4089-W.

CAMBR room, fir floor; pri

CAMBR Gent section.

CAMBR large locality, estants.

CAMBR keep reasonable

CAMBR ern versity 7

CAMBR beds, UNI vers

COOLIN ble floor; rea reasonable (bo) 61

LANCAS a fe cation, rooms, week-end Address

NEWT Prote out hot near New lines.

NEWT pleas e ass in bus lines

NEWT for finest as front room comfort. rent 1305-W.

WINTH Mode open oces rates. D $1 each; OCE an

WANT by br dress G.I. WS:

WANT priv Address 1

under Gericke in 1903 to his first return "as guest" at Symphony Hall two years ago. He is in fact an able and refreshing conductor, even when weeks of exacting work in St. Louis have tired him. In these days we expect "individual readings" from our eminences of the baton. Before them the composers outspread scores. In front of them the orchestra sits ready to do their bidding. Behind them we of the audience await the illumination of the masterpiece in hand by the light of their personalities. (If sometimes it turns out to be a darkening of the composer's counsels, never mind. All "right-thinking" people take genius as they find it.) In contrast, Mr. Arbos is a paragon of faithful, honest, straightforward conducting. Clear-minded musician, he reads the score on his desk as the composer set it down. Practised conductor, he transmits it to hearers without a thought of "filtering it through his own personality." When the orchestra is as sympathetic as it was yesterday, the transmission is the richer. (Mr. Burgin had no need to spur his mates as he did a week ago.)

For those who would have the conductor mirror to the composer, there is usually no more truthful glass—Toscaninian finesse aside—than Mr. Arbos. His modesty and poise likewise commend him. Of late years, on his travels, he has been quiet apostle of the older and younger Spanish composers. But he does not overload a program with their works; while one, yesterday, long since gained international recognition—de Falla's ballet, "Love the Sorcerer." When he is himself transcriber for orchestra, as he was now with two piano-pieces by Albeniz, the record on the program-sheet suffices. He is all for Albeniz in a new dress, as little as may be for himself as dressmaker. He has, besides, piquant ways longer to be remembered than a deal of "personality." Who that watched him on Friday will forget the little springs into the air with which he emphasized to the orchestra the swift, sharp changes of rhythm in de Falla's ballet?

Yet Mr. Arbos, like the rest of us, can be unobtrusively in the fashion. Time was when a classic or a modern overture began symphonic programs. Now the mode is an eighteenth-century piece—concerto or suite, as often as not for string choir. Mr. Arbos's choice lighted upon a suite of three movements, assembled and arranged from sonatas of Corelli. The first was a Sarabande, slow-paced, grave and songful; the second a lightly accented gigue; the third, the orchestral chit-chat and sport with figures that the day named "badinerie." The suite was not Bach, father or sons; no more was it Handel. It was not even the later and luscious Vivaldi. Instead, it gave a quiet pleasure of its own. Invention was not Corelli's strong point; nor could he compass vivid and stirring polyphony. By exception in his Roman day, he had skill and what we should now call "feeling" for instrumental voices. For its time Corelli's Sarabande is uncommonly rich-textured; while in the finale he is making play not only with figures but also with the contrasts of brighter and darker strings. The texture and the timbres were both the gainers by the tone of Dr. Koussevitzky's choir.

Nor could Mr. Arbos resist the fashionable temptation to dramatize Franck's intrinsically contemplative Symphony. It is not necessary to believe with the elderly people who "enjoyed" the war (because it brought them excitement) that Germans are the authors of all evil; but certain it is that Dr. Muck set that fashion at Symphony Hall. Not even Dr. Koussevitzky, who dramatized first, last and nearly all the time, outdid him in the apocalyptic, and also sonorous, proclamation of the triumphant chief motif in final progress toward the heavenly heights. Then and there Mr. Arbos kept brass choir and strings within plausible bounds. He no more than saw Franck facing, elate, the sun of righteousness.

Rather, the Arbosian specialty was the rhythming of this motif whenever it entered emphatically or in climax as though Stravinsky himself had written it, as though the orchestra of "Le Sacre" were sounding it. All of which, it is permissible to suggest, is a bit far from "Father" Franck hearing the trumpets of beatitude as he mused in the organ loft of Sainte-Clothilde; or from the Franck who, with this motif, speaks nobly of the soul. Mr. Arbos, however, departs pardoned, as becomes a guest. From his hand, ear and true divination the second movement sang itself out of a troubled sadness into ingenuous and tender beauty. Therein, for these measures, is the Franckian essence. Not a trace of symphonic "theater" marred or distorted them.

Now and again in the Spanish pieces, Mr. Arbos's Iberian blood ran clear and hot, even through the veins of the late sixties. He was not, apparently, the first conductor of "Love the Sorcerer" in the theater of Pastora Imperio, the gypsy dancer; but he was the first to lead de Falla's music, in earlier, slenderer form, into the concert-room as suite or tone-poem. Of course, the rhythm of the Fire Dance beats when Miss Hess, the Englishwoman, plays it from the piano;

young bushevitzky, the Russian, or roomersymphony Hall. With el. REG en-r, as with Mme. Ar- 84tJa 21 m beats home as no ear Beaco it. More: the con- gle; owner'versed a dozen meas- 6t: REG en- ories of the dancer 5155. 5155. ssible to all the world

oom for re ie Meistersinger" goes apartmenth it does in Munich. Call eved also that Mr. Arbos ite 1. o the orchestra the near batf that he drew from the family of he concert-version—by and dinne o) (4685K) an undernote of rest- with privat Both instincts in the strict; suit to the greater glory s; handy t illusion and atmosphere o) (363B) But a ballet is not a suite a represented in the thea- team heat not waterina ought long since to (bo): "Love the Sorcerer" shed room:ain. Instead, no farther privilegesWednesday, the Chica-ja 21 mimes will proffer it in e. Attrac or. continuish pieces—transcrip- on 3168. "El Albaicin," which ished roomr of Granada, and of privilegesre—came, went and left aces behind. Both are ja 22 ooks of piano-pieces in Pleasant Spain on tonal tour a. all mod ed out sharper rhythms ily. Tel at from this Jota: been A) ja 24 at from this Jota: been

Two largeot with harmonic color, continuous not be all that Debussy REG en his delight in Spanish o) ja 20 his delight in Spanish ection. Apanish nights; but the an gentle-gypsy-tune that haunts el. ASP lurge and piercing idonit ja 17, scoring for orchestra ner. One lic timbres, the guitar- der room he did conduct- o) ja 14 alla's more adept ballet.

shed room water and centennArbos w suggestny Concerts of the week- will pro guest-conductor of the ommen as he did two years ago.

his own from the dances erla." This time they are d "Navarra." Of "Iberia" en wrote in The Garret:

e Pinevthout exception, are all piano-literature. More: rner-stone, the Koran, of anish school. They are in T songs, the sights and s presen peninsula, translated with n: Bett into the language of the d Bett beniz has even success-for his purposes. In spoke otion, in harmony, in the Atom

mal content, and in their polyphonic-complexity they are almost unique." One may add that in the orchestral dress given some of them by Mr. Arbos they are as felicitously treated.

"El Albaicin" has been praised more than many of the others. The composer's direction is "Allegro assai, ma melan-colico." It would suggest the gypsy quarter at Grenada. Debussy said that "in it one discovers the fragrance of the blossom-filled nights of Spain." In an article on Albeniz in The Musical Quarterly Edgar Istel writes of the "guitar figurations and the melodic peculiarities of the canto jondo, which give this movement its specific character." The canto jondo is the profound, often tragic, cantilena of ancient, traditional Andalusian folk-music. In "El Albaicin" the middle section is derived directly from it. Throughout the piece there are many effects suggestive of guitars. Mr. Van Vechten discovers "an old gypsy woman singing a plaintive melody—'Wander-lust,' wildness and woe—the dirty, gypsy tents, poverty, the life of Bohemians."

"Navarra" was left incomplete by Albeniz. Déodat de Séverac completed the version for piano, which Mr. Arbos has scored for orchestra. It is a bravura fantasia on a jota theme. The jota, of Moorish origin, is one of the most popular of Spanish song-dances. Every province has its own jota, but the most famous are those of Aragon, Valencia and Navarra. (The title of the present piece indicates its origin.) The jota is a kind of waltz, but with much more freedom. The man and the woman face each other, using castanets; advance and retreat aggressively, as if in combat. Such couples sometimes form a circle. There is no suggestion of voluptuousness, but rather a militant spirit. Nevertheless, in the twelfth century, Alben Jot, from whom the dance takes its name, was routed out of Valencia because of his "licentious" singing. He found refuge in Aragon.

A. H. M.

Music

Monitor—Jan. 24, 1931
Boston Symphony

For the second week of Dr. Koussevitzky's midwinter holidays, Enrique Fernandez Arbós was called to the dais of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The program he set for the concerts of Jan. 23 and 24 in Symphony Hall, Boston, consisted of a Corelli Suite (Sarabande—Gigue—Badinerie); Franck's Symphony; de Falla's Suite from "El Amor Brujo," and two Albeniz piano pieces transcribed for orchestra by Mr. Arbós, "Albaicin" and "Navarra." The Corelli item and the transcriptions were played for the first time in Bos-

tr. Arbós was welcomed with exceptional warmth, and not only because 27 years ago he was concertmaster of the Boston orchestra. He is remembered too for his vital leadership as guest conductor at a pair of concerts two years ago. He was cited even more enthusiastically for the symphony and at the close of the concert; for he had reasserted qualities which won admiration on his previous visit. He obviously had the cooperation of the superb orchestra as well as the good will of audience, and a most pleasurable concert resulted.

The Corelli Suite was characteristic of charming, and was delightfully formed. Mr. Arbós employed for the full string orchestra—contrary to Dr. Koussevitzky's present practice in old-time music—but he so held the reins in leash that there was no of over-weight.

had anticipated that Mr. Arbós would diverge from the Koussevitzkyan path also by giving a "light" reading of the symphony, evidently the Spanish approach. The score is similar to the Russian or the visitor made it as dramatic as ever did the resident commander. This pointing up has protest before; no doubt it gains, but not from your correspondent. Years ago we wearied of "randeur" of the Franck Symphony and we welcome treatment decently veils the banality of of its material.

Arbós of course is in effect ambassador of the music of Spain. It was a pleasure to hear the familiar and admired music of de Falla come alive under his baton. The first of the two transcriptions from Albeniz also was agreeable to hear, but we doubt whether the second was worth the transcriber's trouble. Philip Hale's erudite program notes informed us that this piano piece was left unfinished, and was completed by Déodat de Séverac "in a 'contradictory manner,' as Henri Collet thinks. 'Déodat was too original not to stamp his own charming but not exuberant ures that the day named "bad." The suite was not Bach, father of no more was it Handel. It was not the later and luscious Vivaldi. It gave a quiet pleasure of its own; it was not Corelli's strong invention nor could he compass vivid and polyphony. By exception in his man day, he had skill and what should now call "feeling" for instrumental voices. For its time Corelli's bande is uncommonly rich-textured while in the finale he is making play only with figures but also with the trasts of brighter and darker strings and the timbres were bold and gainers by the tone of Dr. Koussevitch's choir.

Nor could Mr. Arbos resist the temptation to dramatize the intrinsically contemplative Symphony. It is not necessary to believe with the elderly people who "enjoyed" the (because it brought them excitement) Germans are the authors of all evil; certain it is that Dr. Muck set the tone at Symphony Hall. Not even Koussevitch, who dramatized first and nearly all the time, outdid him in apocalyptic, and also sonorous, production of the triumphant chief motif. Then and there Mr. Arbos kept brass and strings within plausible bounds. He no more than saw Franck elate, the sun of righteousness.

Rather, the Arbosian specialty was rhythming of this motif when entered emphatically or in climax though Stravinsky himself had written as though the orchestra of "Les Femmes d'Alger" were sounding it. All of which is permissible to suggest, is a hint from "Father" Franck hearing the pets of beatitude as he mused in the loft of Sainte-Clothilde; or from Franck who, with this motif, speaks of the soul. Mr. Arbos, however, parts pardoned, as becomes a dancer. From his hand, ear and true divination the second movement sang itself of troubled sadness into ingenuous tender beauty. Therein, for these measures, is the Franckian essence. trace of symphonic "theater" marred distorted them.

Now and again in the Spanish Mr. Arbos's Iberian blood ran clear hot, even through the veins of the sixties. He was not, apparently, the conductor of "Love the Sorcerer" theater of Pastora Imperio, the dancer; but he was the first to take de Falla's music, in earlier, sleek form, into the concert-room as a tone-poem. Of course, the rhythm of Fire Dance beats when Miss Hess, Englishwoman, plays it from the

or when Dr. Koussevitch, the Russian, outflings it across Symphony Hall. With Mr. Arbos, however, as with Mme. Argentina, the rhythm beats home as no foreigner can drive it. More: the conductor had not traversed a dozen measures before memories of the dancer pushed him into an imaginary orchestra-pit and she herself, passioning above the ritual fire, filled the stage. All things Spanish are not possible to all the world any more than "Die Meistersinger" goes better in Paris than it does in Munich.

It was to be noted also that Mr. Arbos often infused into the orchestra the guitar-like, metallic quality of de Falla's rhythmic figures; that he drew from the songs, sung—in the concert-version—by the English horn, an undertone of restless melancholy. Both instincts in the conductor worked to the greater glory of de Falla and to illusion and atmosphere in his gypsying. But a ballet is not a ballet until it is represented in the theater, as the Argentina ought long since to have proved with "Love the Sorcerer" and her Spanish train. Instead, no farther away than next Wednesday, the Chicago goan dancers and mimes will proffer it in the Opera House.

The other Spanish pieces—transcriptions of Albéniz's "El Albaicin," which is the gypsy quarter of Granada, and of his Jota of Navarre—came, went and left not too many traces behind. Both are pages from the books of piano-pieces in which he traversed Spain on tonal hair. But he has whipped out sharper rhythms than any that beat from this Jota; been more lavish and hot with harmonic color. "El Albaicin" may not be all that Debussy imagined out of his delight in Spanish perfumes and Spanish nights; but the doleful, aching gypsy-tune that haunts it, runs in strange and piercing idiom while Mr. Arbos, scoring for orchestra, hears the metallic timbres, the guitar-like figures, no less than he did conducting through de Falla's more adept ballet. H. T. P.

New—from Mr. Arbos

To the Symphony Concerts of the week-end Mr. Arbos, guest-conductor of the moment, brings, as he did two years ago, arrangements of his own from the dances of Albéniz's "Iberia." This time they are "El Albaicin" and "Navarra." Of "Iberia" Carl Van Vechten wrote in The Garret: "These pieces, without exception, are all masterpieces of piano-literature. More: they are the corner-stone, the Koran, of the modern Spanish school. They are the dances and songs, the sights and sounds, of the peninsula, translated with peculiar felicity into the language of the piano, which Albéniz has even successfully extended for his purposes. In rhythm, in emotion, in harmony, in the mal content, and in their polyphonic-complexity they are almost unique." One may add that in the orchestral dress given some of them by Mr. Arbos they are as felicitously treated.

"El Albaicin" has been praised more than many of the others. The composer's direction is "Allegro assai, ma melan-colico." It would suggest the gypsy quarter at Grenada. Debussy said that "in it one discovers the fragrance of the blossom-filled nights of Spain." In an article on Albéniz in The Musical Quarterly Edgar Istel writes of the "guitar figurations and the melodic peculiarities of the canto jondo, which give this movement its specific character." The canto jondo is the profound, often tragic, cantilena of ancient, traditional Andalusian folk-music. In "El Albaicin" the middle section is derived directly from it. Throughout the piece there are many effects suggestive of guitars. Mr. Van Vechten discovers "an old gypsy woman singing a plaintive melody—'Wander-lust, wildness and woe—the dirty, gypsy tents, poverty, the life of Bohemians.'" "Navarra" was left incomplete by Albéniz. Déodat de Séverac completed the version for piano, which Mr. Arbos has scored for orchestra. It is a bravura fantasia on a jota theme. The jota, of Moorish origin, is one of the most popular of Spanish song-dances. Every province has its own jota, but the most famous are those of Aragon, Valencia and Navarre. (The title of the present piece indicates its origin.) The jota is a kind of waltz, but with much more freedom. The man and the woman face each other, using castanets; advance and retreat aggressively, as if in combat. Such couples sometimes form a circle. There is no suggestion of voluptuousness, but rather a militant spirit. Nevertheless, in the twelfth century, Alben Jot, from whom the dance takes its name, was routed out of Valencia because of his "licentious" singing. He found refuge in Aragon.

A. H. M.

effective.

Music

Boston Symphony

For the second week of Dr. Koussevitch's midwinter holidays, Enrique Fernandez Arbós was called to the dais of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The program he set for the concerts of Jan. 23 and 24 in Symphony Hall, Boston, consisted of a Corelli Suite (Sarabande—Gigue—Badinerie); Franck's Symphony; de Falla's Suite from "El Amor Brujo," and two Albeniz piano pieces transcribed for orchestra by Mr. Arbós, "Albaicin" and "Navarra." The celli item and the transcriptions were played for the first time in Boston. Mr. Arbós was welcomed with exceptional warmth, and not only because 27 years ago he was concertmaster of the Boston orchestra. He is remembered too for his vital leadership as guest conductor at a pair of concerts two years ago. He was cited even more enthusiastically for the symphony and at the close of the concert; for he had reasserted qualities which won admiration in his previous visit. He obviously had the coöperation of the superb orchestra as well as the good will of the audience, and a most pleasurable result resulted.

The Corelli Suite was characteristic of charming, and was delightfully formed. Mr. Arbós employed for the full string orchestra—contrary to Dr. Koussevitch's present practice in old-time music—but he so held the reins in leash that there was no

of over-weight. had anticipated that Mr. Arbós would diverge from the Koussevitchian path also by giving a "light" reading of the symphony, idently the Spanish approach. The score is similar to the Russian; the visitor made it as dramatic as ever did the resident conductor. This pointing up has protest before; no doubt it gains, but not from your correspondent. Years ago we wearied of "randonneur" of the Franck Symphony and we welcome treatment decently veils the banality of of its material.

Arbós of course is in effect ambassador of the music of Spain. It was a pleasure to hear the familiar and admired music of de Falla come alive under his baton. The first of the two transcriptions from Albéniz also was agreeable to hear, but we doubt whether the second was worth the transcriber's trouble. Philip Hale's erudite program notes informed us that this piano piece was left unfinished, and was completed by Déodat de Séverac "in a contradictory manner," as Henri Collet thinks. Déodat was too original not to stamp his own charming but not exuberant ures that the day named "bad." The suite was not Bach, father of no more was it Handel. It was not the later and luscious Vivaldi. It gave a quiet pleasure of its own; it was not Corelli's strong invention was not Corelli's strong nor could he compass vivid and polyphony. By exception in his man day, he had skill and wit should now call "feeling" for instrumental voices. For its time Corelli's bande is uncommonly rich, while in the finale he is making play only with figures but also with the trasts of brighter and darker strings texture and the timbres were both gainers by the tone of Dr. Koussevitch.

Nor could Mr. Arbos resist the temptation to dramatize. Frably intrinsically contemplative. SymIt is not necessary to believe in elderly people who "enjoyed" it (because it brought them excitement). Germans are the authors of all events certain it is that Dr. Muck set the ion at Symphony Hall. Not even Koussevitch, who dramatized first and nearly all the time, outdid him apocalyptic, and also sonorous, production of the triumphant chief motif progress toward the heavenly. Then and there Mr. Arbos kept brass and strings within plausible bounds. He no more than saw Franck elate, the sun of righteousness.

Rather, the Arbosian specialty was rhythming of this motif when entered emphatically or in climax, though Stravinsky himself had written as though the orchestra of "Le" were sounding it. All of which, permissible to suggest, is a by-product from "Father" Franck hearing the pets of beatitude as he mused in the loft of Sainte-Clothilde; or from Franck who, with this motif, speaks of the soul. Mr. Arbos, however, parts pardoned, as becomes a dancer. From his hand, ear and true divinity the second movement sang itself of troubled sadness into ingenuous tender beauty. Therein, for these ures, is the Franckian essence. trace of symphonic "theater" mar distorted them.

Now and again in the Spanish Mr. Arbos's Iberian blood ran clear hot, even through the veins of the sixties. He was not, apparently, the conductor of "Love the Sorcerer" theater of Pastora Imperio, the dancer; but he was the first to de Falla's music, in earlier, sleek form, into the concert-room as a tone-poem. Of course, the rhythm Fire Dance beats when Miss Hess Englishwoman, plays it from the

or when Dr. Koussevitch, the Russian, outflings it across Symphony Hall. With Mr. Arbos, however, as with Mme. Argentina, the rhythm beats home as no foreigner can drive it. More: the conductor had not traversed a dozen measures before memories of the dancer pushed him into an imaginary orchestra-pit and she herself, passioning above the ritual fire, filled the stage. All things Spanish are not possible to all the world any more than "Die Meistersinger" goes better in Paris than it does in Munich.

It was to be noted also that Mr. Arbos often infused into the orchestra the guitar-like, metallic quality of de Falla's rhythmic figures; that he drew from the songs, sung—in the concert-version—by the English horn, an undernote of restless melancholy. Both instincts in the conductor worked to the greater glory of de Falla and to illusion and atmosphere in his gypsying. But a ballet is not a ballet until it is represented in the theater, as the Argentina ought long since to have proved with "Love the Sorcerer" and her Spanish train. Instead, no farther away than next Wednesday, the Chicagoan dancers and mimes will proffer it in the Opera House.

The other Spanish pieces—transcriptions of Albéniz's "El Albaicin," which is the gypsy quarter of Granada, and of his Jota of Navarre—came, went and left not too many traces behind. Both are pages from the books of piano-pieces in which he traversed Spain on tonal tour. But he has whipped out sharper rhythms than any that beat from this Jota: been more lavish and hot with harmonic color. "El Albaicin" may not be all that Debussy imagined out of his delight in Spanish perfumes and Spanish nights; but the doleful, aching gypsy-tune that haunts it, runs in strange and piercing idiom; while Mr. Arbos, scoring for orchestra, hears the metallic timbres, the guitar-like figures, no less than he did conducting through de Falla's more adept ballet. H. T. P.

New—from Mr. Arbos

To the Symphony Concerts of the week-end Mr. Arbos, guest-conductor of the moment, brings, as he did two years ago, arrangements of his own from the dances of Albeniz's "Iberia." This time they are of Albeniz's "Iberia" and "Navarra." Of "Iberia" Carl Van Vechten wrote in The Garret: "These pieces, without exception, are all masterpieces of piano-literature. More: they are the corner-stone, the Koran, of the modern Spanish school. They are the dances and songs, the sights and sounds, of the peninsula, translated with peculiar felicity into the language of the piano, which Albeniz has even successfully extended for his purposes. In rhythm, in emotion, in harmony, in the mal content, and in complexity they are almost may add that in the orchestra some of them by Mr. Al felicitously treated.

"El Albaicin" has been than many of the others. Its direction is "Allegro assai colico." It would suggest a quarter at Grenada. That "in it one discovers the blossom-filled nights of an article on Albeniz Quarterly Edgar Istel's "guitar figurations and the harities of the canto jondo this movement its speed. The canto jondo is the tragic, cantilena of and Andalusian folk-music. In the middle section is derived. Throughout the piece effects suggestive of gypsy Vechten discovers "an singing a plaintive melody, wildness and woe—tents, poverty, the life of

"Navarra" was left in beniz. Déodat de Séverac version for piano, which scored for orchestra. It was a jota them Moorish origin, is one of of Spanish song-dances has its own jota, but are those of Aragon, e varre. (The title of th dicates its origin.) Th waltz, but with much man and the woman using castanets; aggressively, as if in co sometimes form a suggestion of voluptu a militant spirit. N twelfth century, Albe the dance takes its n of Valencia because singing. He found re

Music

Monitor—Jan. 24, 1931
Boston Symphony

For the second week of Dr. Koussevitch's midwinter holidays, Enrique Fernandez Arbós was called to the dais of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The program he set for the concerts of Jan. 23 and 24 in Symphony Hall, Boston, consisted of a Corelli Suite (Sarabande—Gigue—Badinerie); Franck's Symphony; de Falla's Suite from "El Amor Brujo,"

Mater chosen the fl garet Kansboro; N. Y. should how won't keep how

Clar

Clar

of Si

reigna

Brook

to an

to be

Count

will a

Enos

borou

and avenue

Fifth

The

Went

school nearly present

entert

The ert A.

ward T

assisted

Leggee

freshme

personality on it." That, no doubt, is why it seemed uninteresting. The orchestrations were expert and effective.

and two Albeniz piano pieces transcribed for orchestra by Mr. Arbós, "El Albaicin" and "Navarra." The Corelli item and the transcriptions were played for the first time in Boston.

Mr. Arbós was welcomed with exceptional warmth, and not only because 27 years ago he was concert-master of the Boston orchestra. He was remembered too for his vital leadership as guest conductor at a pair of concerts two years ago. He was saluted even more enthusiastically after the symphony and at the close of the concert; for he had reasserted the qualities which won admiration on his previous visit. He obviously had the cooperation of the superb orchestra as well as the good will of the audience, and a most pleasurable concert resulted.

The Corelli Suite was characteristic and charming, and was delightfully performed. Mr. Arbós employed for it the full string orchestra—contrary to Dr. Koussevitch's present practice with old-time music—but he so held yers in leash that there was no of over-weight. had anticipated that Mr. Arbould diverge from the Koussevitch path also by giving a "ht" reading of the symphony, idently the Spanish approach's score is similar to the Russian or the visitor made it as dramatic as ever did the resident commander. This pointing up has protest before; no doubt it gain, but not from your correspondent. Years ago we wearied of "randeur" of the Franck Symphony and we welcome treatment decently veils the banality of of its material.

Arbós of course is in effect ambassador of the music of Spain. It was a pleasure to hear the familiar and admired music of de Falla come alive under his baton. The first of the two transcriptions from Albeniz also was agreeable to hear, but we doubt whether the second was worth the transcriber's trouble. Philip Hale's erudite program notes informed us that this piano piece was left unfinished, and was completed by Déodat de Séverac "in a 'contradictory manner,' as Henri Collet thinks. Déodat was too original not to stamp his own charming but not exuberant ures that the day named "bad". The suite was not Bach, father of no more was it Handel. It was not the later and luscious Vivaldi. It gave a quiet pleasure of its own. The convention was not Corelli's strong nor could he compass vivid and polyphony. By exception in his man day, he had skill and what should now call "feeling" for instrumental voices. For its time Corelli's bande is uncommonly rich, while in the finale he is making play only with figures but also with the trasts of brighter and darker strings texture and the timbres were begainers by the tone of Dr. Koussevitch.

Nor could Mr. Arbos resist the temptation to dramatize. It is not necessary to believe in elderly people who "enjoyed" (because it brought them excitement) Germans are the authors of all evil. It is that Dr. Muck set the tone at Symphony Hall. Not even Koussevitch, who dramatized first and nearly all the time, outdid him. He was apocalyptic, and also sonorous, progression of the triumphant chief motif. Then and there Mr. Arbos kept brass and strings within plausible bounds. He no more than saw Franck elate, the sun of righteousness.

Rather, the Arbosian specialty was rhythming of this motif when entered emphatically or in climax. Though Stravinsky himself had written as though the orchestra of "Les Femmes d'Alger" were sounding it. All of which, permissible to suggest, is a by-product from "Father" Franck hearing the pets of beatitude as he mused in the loft of Sainte-Clothilde; or from Franck who, with this motif, speaks of the soul. Mr. Arbos, however, parts pardoned, as becomes a dancer. From his hand, ear and true divinity the second movement sang itself of troubled sadness into ingenuous tender beauty. Therein, for these ures, is the Franckian essence. trace of symphonic "theater" mar distorted them.

Now and again in the Spanish Mr. Arbos's Iberian blood ran clear, hot, even through the veins of the sixties. He was not, apparently, the conductor of "Love the Sorcerer" theater of Pastora Imperio, the dancer; but he was the first to de Falla's music, in earlier, sleek form, into the concert-room as a tone-poem. Of course, the rhythm of Fire Dance beats when Miss Hess, Englishwoman, plays it from the

or when Dr. Koussevitch, the Russian, outflings it across Symphony Hall. With Mr. Arbos, however, as with Mme. Argentina, the rhythm beats home as no foreigner can drive it. More: the conductor had not traversed a dozen measures before memories of the dancer pushed him into an imaginary orchestral pit and she herself, passioning above the ritual fire, filled the stage. All things Spanish are not possible to all the world any more than "Die Meistersinger" goes better in Paris than it does in Munich.

It was to be noted also that Mr. Arbos often infused into the orchestra the guitar-like, metallic quality of de Falla's rhythmic figures; that he drew from the songs, sung—in the concert-version—by the English horn, an undernote of restless melancholy. Both instincts in the conductor worked to the greater glory of de Falla and to illusion and atmosphere in his gypsying. But a ballet is not a ballet until it is represented in the theater, as the Argentina ought long since to have proved with "Love the Sorcerer" and her Spanish train. Instead, no farther away than next Wednesday, the Chicagoan dancers and mimes will proffer it in the Opera House.

The other Spanish pieces—transcriptions of Albéniz's "El Albaicin," which is of the gypsy quarter of Granada, and of his Jota of Navarre—came, went and left not too many traces behind. Both are pages from the books of piano-pieces in which he traversed Spain on total tour. But he has whipped out sharper rhythms than any that beat from this Jota; been more lavish and hot with harmonic color. "El Albaicin" may not be all that Debussy imagined out of his delight in Spanish perfumes and Spanish nights; but the doleful, aching gypsy-tune that haunts it, runs in strange and piercing idiom, while Mr. Arbos, scoring for orchestra, hears the metallic timbres, the guitar-like figures, no less than he did conducting through de Falla's more adept ballet.

New—from Mr. Arbos

To the Symphony Concerts of the week-end Mr. Arbos, guest-conductor of the moment, brings, as he did two years ago, arrangements of his own from the dances of Albéniz's "Iberia." This time they are "El Albaicin" and "Navarra." Of "Iberia" Carl Van Vechten wrote in The Garrett: "These pieces, without exception, are all masterpieces of piano-literature. More; they are the corner-stone, the Koran, of the modern Spanish school. They are the dances and songs, the sights and sounds, of the peninsula, translated with peculiar felicity into the language of the piano, which Albéniz has even successfully extended for his purposes. In rhythm, in emotion, in harmony, in the mal content, and in complexity they are almost may add that in the orchestra some of them by Mr. Albéniz felicitously treated.

"El Albaicin" has been more than many of the others. Its direction is "Allegro assai, colico." It would suggest a quarter at Grenada, that "in it one discovers the blossom-filled nights of an article on Albéniz's Quarterly Edgar Isted's guitar figurations and the harities of the canto jondo this movement its speed. The canto jondo is the tragic, cantilena of and Andalusian folk-music. In the middle section is derived. Throughout the piece effects suggestive of gypsies. Vechten discovers "an effect singing a plaintive melody, lust, wildness and woe—tents, poverty, the life of

"Navarra" was left in Albéniz. Déodat de Séverac's version for piano, which he scored for orchestra. It is a fantasia on a jota them Moorish origin, is one of the of Spanish song-dances. It has its own jota, but it is those of Aragon, and Navarre. (The title of the indicates its origin.) The waltz, but with much man and the woman using castanets; advancing, as if in a suggestion of voluptuous a militant spirit. twelfth century. Albéniz the dance takes its of Valencia because singing. He found

Music

Monitor—Jan. 24, 1931
Boston Symphony

For the second week of Dr. Koussevitch's midwinter holidays, Enrique Fernandez Arbós was called to the dais of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The program he set for the concerts of Jan. 23 and 24 in Symphony Hall, Boston, consisted of a Corelli Suite (Sarabande—Gigue—Badinerie); Franck's Symphony; de Falla's Suite from "El Amor Brujo," and two Albéniz piano pieces transcribed for orchestra by Mr. Arbós, "El Albaicin" and "Navarra." The Corelli item and the transcriptions were played for the first time in Boston.

Mr. Arbós was welcomed with exceptional warmth, and not only because 27 years ago he was concertmaster of the Boston orchestra. He was remembered too for his vital leadership as guest conductor at a pair of concerts two years ago. He was saluted even more enthusiastically after the symphony and at the close of the concert; for he had reasserted the qualities which won admiration on his previous visit. He obviously had the cooperation of the superb orchestra as well as the good will of the audience, and a most pleasurable concert resulted.

The Corelli Suite was characteristic and charming, and was delightfully performed. Mr. Arbós employed for it the full string orchestra—contrary to Dr. Koussevitch's present practice with old-time music—but he so held the players in leash that there was no sense of over-weight.

One had anticipated that Mr. Arbós would diverge from the Koussevitchian path also by giving a "straight" reading of the symphony, but evidently the Spanish approach to this score is similar to the Russian, for the visitor made it as dramatic as ever did the resident commissioner. This pointing up has stirred protest before; no doubt it will again, but not from your correspondent. Years ago we wearied of the "grandeur" of the Franck Symphony, and we welcome treatment which decently veils the banality of some of its material.

Mr. Arbós of course is in effect ambassador of the music of Spain. It was a pleasure to hear the familiar and admired music of de Falla come alive under his baton. The first of the two transcriptions from Albéniz also was agreeable to hear, but we doubt whether the second was worth the transcriber's trouble. Philip Hale's erudite program notes informed us that this piano piece was left unfinished, and was completed by Déodat de Séverac "in a contradictory manner," as Henri Collet thinks. Déodat was too original not to stamp his own charming but not exuberant

176

ARBOS CONDUCTS SYMPHONY CONCERT

Globe Jan. 24, 1931
Cesar Franck Symphony
Brilliantly Performed

Enrique Fernandez Arbos conducted yesterday's Symphony concert as guest, in the absence of Koussevitzky, who is taking his customary mid-season vacation. The noted Spanish conductor was applauded with unusual warmth for his remarkably subtle and brilliant reading of Cesar Franck's symphony. De Falla's suite from his ballet "El amor brujo," a suite by Corelli, and two piano pieces by Albeniz, admirably transcribed for orchestra by Mr Arbos were the other numbers. This concert was one of the most enjoyable of recent seasons.

Mr Arbos, recalled by most of yesterday's audience from his appearances as guest conductor in 1929, was remembered also by the elder generation as having been for the season of 1903-4 concert master of the Boston Symphony under Gericke. He is conductor of the Madrid Orchestra, and has made many appearances as guest in Europe and the United States.

Suite by Corelli

The little suite by Corelli with which the concert began was arranged by Pinelli from a collection of violin sonatas. It is new to Boston. The opening sarabande is unusually beautiful. The other movements heard yesterday, a gigue and a badinerie, are less remarkable. Mr Arbos' flexible rhythm, his sensitive phrasing, his feeling for lightness and brightness of tone made his reading notable. A violinist himself, he got the violins in the orchestra to play more gracefully, more deftly, than is their present habit. A musician of the first order, Mr Arbos adds to impeccable taste imaginative intensity.

These qualities were even more strikingly exemplified in the performance of the Franck symphony which followed, a performance that was the best given here in many seasons. This symphony, regarded 40 years ago as unpleasantly modernistic, has become with the passage of time one of the best liked works in the entire orchestral repertory. It is now suffering the fate of most popular classics, and meeting the dislike, even the scorn, of the youthful musical intelligentsia.

One must concede that Franck's habit of ceaseless modulation sometimes degenerates into a mannerism, and that some of the climaxes, especially in the first movement, can be made to sound bombastic and vulgar.

Mr Arbos, who obviously loves and understands this symphony, contrived to bring out all its beauties and minimize its defects. Yesterday's audience was thrilled beyond its wont by listening to a masterpiece eloquently yet reverently interpreted. He never obtruded his personality between the listener and the music.

Brilliant Ballet Music

As a Spaniard, Mr Arbos obviously has special qualifications for interpreting the music of his own country. Its rhythms fascinate, yet too often baffle foreign musicians. In De Falla's brilliant ballet music, and in his own even more sonorous and brilliant arrangements of Albeniz, Mr Arbos showed a master's command of rhythm. Here, one felt, was the true Spain; here, and not in Bizet's "Carmen," Chabrier's "Espana," or Rimsky Korsakoff's "Spanish Caprice." These sinuous, swaying rhythms, phrase balancing phrase with no hint of metronomic rigidity, were fascinating.

The orchestra has never sounded better than it did yesterday. Mr Arbos likes brilliant, sonorous tone, but he obviously detests overplaying, excessive loudness, blatant brass and other tonal exaggerations. His long and varied experience as a conductor has made him able to impose his will on an orchestra easily and successfully.

His absorption in his task of conducting, his freedom from any hint of self-consciousness or affectation, compelled respect and liking. One hopes he will appear in Boston more often in future.

Dr Koussevitzky will conduct next week a program including a new introduction and allegro by Elgar, Debussy's Seventh Symphony and Strauss' Symphonia Domestica. P. R.

Fourteenth Programme

FRIDAY AFTERNOON, JANUARY 30, at 2.30 o'clock

SATURDAY EVENING, JANUARY 31, at 8.15 o'clock

Elgar . . . Introduction and Allegro for String Orchestra, Op. 47
(First time in Boston)

Sibelius Symphony No. 7, Op. 105
(In one movement)

Strauss Symphonia Domestica, Op. 53
(In one movement)

There will be an intermission after Sibelius' symphony

A lecture on this programme will be given on Thursday, January 29, at 5.15 o'clock in the Lecture Hall, Boston Public Library

The works to be played at these concerts may be seen in the Allen A. Brown Music Collection of the Boston Public Library one week before the concert

ARBOS CONDUCTS SYMPHONY CONCERT

Globe Jan. 24, 1931
Cesar Franck Symphony
Brilliantly Performed

Enrique Fernandez Arbos conducted yesterday's Symphony concert as guest, in the absence of Koussevitzky, who is taking his customary mid-season vacation. The noted Spanish conductor was applauded with unusual warmth for his remarkably subtle and brilliant reading of Cesar Franck's symphony. De Falla's suite from his ballet "El amor brujo," a suite by Corelli, and two piano pieces by Albeniz, admirably transcribed for orchestra by Mr Arbos were the other numbers. This concert was one of the most enjoyable of recent seasons.

Mr Arbos, recalled by most of yesterday's audience from his appearances as guest conductor in 1929, was remembered also by the elder generation as having been for the season of 1903-4 concert master of the Boston Symphony under Gericke. He is conductor of the Madrid Orchestra, and has made many appearances as guest in Europe and the United States.

Suite by Corelli

The little suite by Corelli with which the concert began was arranged by Pinelli from a collection of violin sonatas. It is new to Boston. The opening sarabande is unusually beautiful. The other movements heard yesterday, a gigue and a badinerie, are less remarkable. Mr Arbos' flexible rhythm, his sensitive phrasing, his feeling for lightness and brightness of tone made his reading notable. A violinist himself, he got the violins in the orchestra to play more gracefully, more deftly, than is their present habit. A musician of the first order, Mr Arbos adds to impeccable taste imaginative intensity.

These qualities were even more strikingly exemplified in the performance of the Franck symphony which followed, a performance that was the best given here in many seasons. This symphony, regarded 40 years ago as unpleasantly modernistic, has become with the passage of time one of the best liked works in the entire orchestral repertory. It is now suffering the fate of most popular classics, and meeting the dislike, even the scorn, of the youthful musical intelligentsia.

One must concede that Franck's habit of ceaseless modulation sometimes degenerates into a mannerism, and that some of the climaxes, especially in the first movement, can be made to sound bombastic and vulgar.

Mr Arbos, who obviously loves and understands this symphony, contrived to bring out all its beauties and minimize its defects. Yesterday's audience was thrilled beyond its wont by listening to a masterpiece eloquently yet reverently interpreted. He never obtruded his personality between the listener and the music.

Brilliant Ballet Music

As a Spaniard, Mr Arbos obviously has special qualifications for interpreting the music of his own country. Its rhythms fascinate, yet too often baffle foreign musicians. In De Falla's brilliant ballet music, and in his own even more sonorous and brilliant arrangements of Albeniz, Mr Arbos showed a master's command of rhythm. Here, one felt, was the true Spain; here, and not in Bizet's "Carmen," Chabrier's "Espana," or Rimsky Korsakoff's "Spanish Caprice." These sinuous, swaying rhythms, phrase balancing phrase with no hint of metronomic rigidity, were fascinating.

The orchestra has never sounded better than it did yesterday. Mr Arbos likes brilliant, sonorous tone, but he obviously detests overplaying, excessive loudness, blatant brass and other tonal exaggerations. His long and varied experience as a conductor has made him able to impose his will on an orchestra easily and successfully.

His absorption in his task of conducting, his freedom from any hint of self-consciousness or affectation, compelled respect and liking. One hopes he will appear in Boston more often in future.

Dr Koussevitzky will conduct next week a program including a new introduction and allegro by Elgar, Debussy's Seventh Symphony and Strauss' Symphonia Domestica. P. R.

Fourteenth Programme

FRIDAY AFTERNOON, JANUARY 30, at 2.30 o'clock

SATURDAY EVENING, JANUARY 31, at 8.15 o'clock

Elgar . . . Introduction and Allegro for String Orchestra, Op. 47
(First time in Boston)

Sibelius Symphony No. 7, Op. 105
(In one movement)

Strauss Symphonia Domestica, Op. 53
(In one movement)

There will be an intermission after Sibelius' symphony

A lecture on this programme will be given on Thursday, January 29, at 5.15 o'clock in the Lecture Hall, Boston Public Library

The works to be played at these concerts may be seen in the Allen A. Brown Music Collection of the Boston Public Library one week before the concert

Sir EDWARD ELGAR

SYMPHONY CONCERT

Jan. 31, 1921 By PHILIP HALE Herald

Dr. Koussevitzky's reappearance on the platform of Symphony hall yesterday afternoon, after his vacation of a fortnight, was greeted by vigorous and prolonged applause. He had arranged this program for the 14th concert: Elgar, Introduction and Allegro for string orchestra, op. 47 (first time at these concerts perhaps the first time in Boston); Sibelius, Symphony No. 7, op. 105. Strauss, Symphonie Domestica.

Elgar, like cricket, Punch, and the "glorious bit-tah beer," is an English institution. Even Bernard Shaw, who before he turned his attention to dramatic work and various schemes for reforming society and bringing in the millennium, was a brilliant music critic, writing fearlessly and with full understanding, declared some months ago that Elgar is "one of the greatest composers in the world." Sir Edward, not to be outdone, said in a presumably hoarse voice choked with emotion: "Shaw is the best friend to any artist." Blest is the tie that binds.

In this instance is it not possible that G. B. S. was unduly heated by free indulgence in his habitual vegetables?

Take the piece heard yesterday. It was first performed over 25 years ago when Elgar was at the height of his creative powers. He had already sent out his overtures Cockaigne and In the South; also his Enigma Variations. What does one find in this Introduction and Allegro? Careful workmanship, a mastery of form and thematic treatment, sound, orthodox instrumentation, but little or no poetic thought, no imagination, little noteworthy melodic invention. A highly respectable work that arouses in the listener only respect for the maker.

If Elgar were the only British composer, one would not be surprised at finding leading critics in this year of grace analyzing at some length a march of his recently produced; speaking of its "effulgence," proclaiming it to be a masterpiece. But there are Delius, Bax, Vaughan Williams, Holst, Ireland, not to mention others. It should not be forgotten that Elgar is "Sir Edward." The title may impress even music critics.

Mr. Lawrence Gilman was right in characterizing Sibelius's seventh symphony as "enigmatic, puissant." Is it also, as he says, "strangely moving"? It is not a symphony for an afternoon's careless pleasure. The music is not descriptive, pictorial, decorative; it has no literary basis. In his earlier works Sibelius sought inspiration in Finland's epic "Kalevala." The works thus inspired, will be more generally popular than the later symphonies. (The first and second have already made their way; the people hear them gladly.)

The music of Sibelius is never frankly sensuous. It seldom accepts the canons of obvious beauty. His musical soul is proud, regardless of popular applause. In his latest works he seems to be writing for himself; to be absorbed in introspection and the expression of what he finds that is dear and important to himself alone. There are noble ideas, fleeting and haunting passages, in this symphony, but the plan and the conclusion of the whole are not easily grasped; nor could Sibelius give any explanation that would satisfy a doubting Thomas or a man from Missouri. He would simply say: "That's what I felt; that's what you may or may not feel." So it goes back to the famous definition of music by Walt Whitman. Jones is reminded by the instruments of Sibelius; Ferguson has ears and he does not hear, much less feel.

Strauss, on the other hand, made musical copy of his wife, interesting baby, and himself. He takes the hearer into the nursery, bathroom, bed chamber, and probably the kitchen, though no rapt admirer of Richard has pointed out the section of music particularizing the pots, pans, and servant giving notice. Here is skill wasted on the unimportant; gorgeous orchestral robes covering an insignificant body, as in Thackeray's picture of Louis XIV in royal dress and without it. The splendor of the performance was great; the enjoyment of the audience corresponded.

The concert will be repeated tonight. The orchestra will be out of town next week. The program for Feb. 13 and 14 comprises Pilati's suite for piano and string orchestra (first time in Boston); Honegger's symphony composed for the orchestra's jubilee (first performance; Loeffler's "La Bonne Chanson" and "Pagan Poem."

STRAUSS OVERTOPS SYMPHONY

Elgar and Sibelius
Used in Formidable
List

Post Jan. 31, 1931

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

In the midst of a feast of opera, a Symphony Concert. But Dr. Koussevitzky, preparing his programme for the concert of yesterday which marked his return, after a three weeks absence, to what are called the "regular" Symphony Concerts, gave little thought to those who were to sit through "Die Walkure" in the evening.

ELGAR, SIBELIUS AND STRAUSS

In other words, the programme of yesterday was, in some respects, a formidable one. Music by living composers made it. At the outset there came, for the first time in Boston, although the piece is by no means new, an Introduction and Allegro for strings by Edward Elgar, a composer heard here none too frequently of late. Followed the Seventh Symphony of Sibelius, an austere and baffling composition known here only, by performance at a single pair of concerts four years ago. And after Sibelius, for final number, came another symphony in one movement, though the piece is sometimes styled a tone-poem: the "Symphonie Domestica" of Richard Strauss.

To speak first of the novelty of the afternoon, Sir Edward Elgar's composition begins genially, persuasively; there is mood and atmosphere; and we are told in the programme notes that the music was inspired by distant singing heard on a visit to Wales. But once launched upon his Allegro, Sir Edward indulges in what may be styled academic virtuosity. Save when the Welsh song returns this portion of the music is not free from the reproach of dryness and artificiality. But if it were Dr. Koussevitzky's purpose to find yet another composition whereby he might disclose the technical prowess and tonal virtues of his string choir, he could hardly have found a better one. Perhaps the applause, which was unmistakably hearty, was as much for the performance as for the music.

Even more than did Sibelius' Sixth Symphony, more recently heard here, did the Finn's Seven and latest work in this form impress yesterday as music in which reticence or an unwillingness to speak out is carried to lengths approaching perversity.

Ever and anon in the course of this symphony come hints of the earlier Sibelius, though a Sibelius with his warmth cooled and his ardors diminished. But between these momentary gleams of light the music fades into something not far removed from barrenness. Perhaps our ears are not yet properly attuned to this music. Perhaps it is a true music of the future. Not a few of us, however, still unashamedly prefer the Sibelius of the first five, even, if the truth be told, of the first two symphonies.

Yet it is hardly safe to say that the powers of a contemporary composer are declining. When Strauss' "Symphonie Domestica" was first given to the world, 27 years ago this coming spring, more than one voice was raised to proclaim the fact that Strauss was done for; that there remained in his music only a colossal technique; that inspiration and inventiveness, dangerous terms both, had failed him.

Persuasive and Eloquent

Now for many the "Domestica," that idyll expanded to the dimensions of an epic, music, if ever there was such, of the joy of living and the fullness of life, is the very crown of his symphonic writing. And that "period of decline," concerning which there was so much foreboding, was to bring forth, among other things, "Salome," "Elektra" and "Der Rosenkavalier." No, Strauss was not done for in the year 1904.

For the music of Elgar and Sibelius Dr. Koussevitzky presumably did yesterday all that might be done; here the present reviewer at least has no basis for comparison. But from the vantage point of previous experience with many performances and many interpretations of the "Domestica," it may confidently be said that Dr. Koussevitzky's reading of the score and his orchestra's playing of it is the most persuasive, the most eloquent that Boston has known.

The Master Returns to His People

Koussevitzky Conducts Again,
Sibelius and Strauss Memorably

Trans. Jan. 31, 1931

THE CONDUCTOR who is not guest returned to his post yesterday afternoon at Symphony Hall. His orchestra rose to greet him, and there seemed less of formality than of feeling in their interchanges. Warmly the audience added its plaudits; but Dr. Koussevitzky was in the mood to settle at once into the work of the day. Elgar's Introduction and Allegro for Strings may pass, for the moment, as so much preluding. Then followed, with Sibelius' Seventh Symphony, as signal a performance as in all their association conductor and orchestra have accomplished. Above even his later habit the composer is sparing with his forces—the usual strings, the usual wood-winds, horns, trumpets, trombones, kettle-drums; all in the usual, or less than the usual, numbers. He reduces the orchestra to its kernel. He uses it with the utmost directness of means and effect. There are no technical exactions, unless Sibelius finds them necessary to the disclosure of his thought, the release of his emotion. There are no flourishes of virtuosity, no exhibitional measures; for his Seventh Symphony he would have an orchestra of musicians rather than virtuosi. They play stripped. No harmonic veils, no luscious overlaying of timbres hide them. They attack directly, speak directly. They are sinewy and austere. They move unhurriedly, graphically and with power. The kernel of the Symphony Orchestra met every one of these tests; played with and for composer and conductor.

Within recollection, Dr. Koussevitzky has not been more master of himself, his band, the music before them. No over-zeal trapped him. He did not dramatize a Symphony intrinsically undramatic. He did not sentimentalize a music that shuns every such weakening of emotion. No dual and enthralling raptures be- him from his post of command. were no languors of motion, no ing over-emphasis, for the sake of vice sonority upon the ear. Dr. Koussevitzky saw in outline the tonal ure that Sibelius would raise. With and for him he raised it. The com- is clear-minded in what he puts to paper. As lucidly the conductor ted every detail within that struc- The sinewy progress, the curt trans-; the stark speech—bare phrases, periods, bare harmonies, bare tim- the impact of emerging motifs, the f unexpected modulation or disso-; above all the great ground-swell the depths upward, urging and ex- ing the whole—nothing of all these ed Dr. Koussevitzky.

ensibly, this Seventh Symphony of us is an "absolute," self-contained. If, as some infer, a program or a ground haunted the composer's cre- mind, he has divulged no hint. Yet rsonal and introspective emotion y and unmistakably suffuses it; to- the end rises to passionate procla- on. Dr. Koussevitzky answered to the on and the passion; infused them he performance; wrought them upon ore sensitive hearers. At every call, as master of himself, the orchestra the music in hand—the unsurpassed actor, since Dr. Muck's day, of Sibe- n American concert-halls.

r the reviewer, putting pen to copy- r, this Seventh Symphony remains ly inexpressible. The motifs emerge; n words for print their thrill weak- They are born of intense personal ion communicated to the hearer; but paper-phrase bears them poor wit- Curt as they are, the naked ear s in them—as naked—a puissant g. They are enlarged, unfolded, new- nted, new-colored; opposed, contrast- oined together. The structure unfolds is upreared. The progress goes firm- nd more variously. Changes of pace mood bring new intensities.

ow an orchestral choir is the back- nd; again it is the proclaiming voice. choirs cry out to each other, urge each r on. To the isolated and united igs fall measures that seethe and cut. e are dark and sombre passages; stark flashes of color in the wood- i; in the brass heroic chanting. Dis- nt chords sweep by. Climaxes rise fall away, leaving the tremulous gs to whisper mysteries. But always ground-swell mounting and passionate he emotion within; making out of these vs its own music. There is suspense conclusion—an end in grandeur at

STRAUSS OVERTOPS SYMPHONY

Elgar and Sibelius
Used in Formidable
List

Post Tax 31.1934

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

In the midst of a feast of opera, a Symphony Concert. But Dr. Koussevitzky, preparing his programme for the concert of yesterday which marked his return, after a three weeks absence, to what are called the "regular" Symphony Concerts, gave little thought to those who were to sit through "Die Walkure" in the evening.

ELGAR, SIBELIUS AND STRAUSS

In other words, the programme of yesterday was, in some respects, a formidable one. Music by living composers made it. At the outset there came, for the first time in Boston, although the piece is by no means new, an Introduction and Allegro for strings by Edward Elgar, a composer heard here none too frequently of late. Followed the Seventh Symphony of Sibelius, an austere and baffling composition known here only by performance at a single pair of concerts four years ago. And after Sibelius, for final number, came another symphony in one movement, though the piece is sometimes styled a tone-poem: the "Symphonie Domestica" of Richard Strauss.

To speak first of the novelty of the afternoon, Sir Edward Elgar's composition begins genially, persuasively; there is mood and atmosphere; and we are told in the programme notes that the music was inspired by distant singing heard on a visit to Wales. But once launched upon his Allegro, Sir Edward indulges in what may be styled academic virtuosity. Save when the Welsh song returns this portion of the music is not free from the reproach of dryness and artificiality. But if it were Dr. Koussevitzky's purpose to find yet another composition whereby he might disclose the technical prowess and tonal virtues of his string choir, he could hardly have found a better one. Perhaps the applause, which was unmistakably hearty, was as much for the performance as for the music.

Even more than did Sibelius' Sixth Symphony, more recently heard here, did the Finn's Seven and latest work in this form impress yesterday as music in which reticence or an unwillingness to speak out is carried to lengths approaching perversity.

Ever and anon in the course of this symphony come hints of the earlier Sibelius, though a Sibelius with his warmth cooled and his ardors diminished. But between these momentary gleams of light the music fades into something not far removed from barrenness. Perhaps our ears are not yet properly attuned to this music. Perhaps it is a true music of the future. Not a few of us, however, still unashamedly prefer the Sibelius of the first five, even, if the truth be told, of the first two symphonies.

Yet it is hardly safe to say that the powers of a contemporary composer are declining. When Strauss' "Symphonie Domestica" was first given to the world, 27 years ago this coming spring, more than one voice was raised to proclaim the fact that Strauss was done for; that there remained in his music only a colossal technique; that inspiration and inventiveness, dangerous terms both, had failed him.

Persuasive and Eloquent

Now for many the "Domestica," that idyll expanded to the dimensions of an epic, music, if ever there was such, of the joy of living and the fullness of life, is the very crown of his symphonic writing. And that "period of decline," concerning which there was so much foreboding, was to bring forth, among other things, "Salome," "Elektra" and "Der Rosenkavalier." No, Strauss was not done for in the year 1904.

For the music of Elgar and Sibelius Dr. Koussevitzky presumably did yesterday all that might be done; here the present reviewer at least has no basis for comparison. But from the vantage point of previous experience with many performances and many interpretations of the "Domestica," it may confidently be said that Dr. Koussevitzky's reading of the score and his orchestra's playing of it is the most persuasive, the most eloquent that Boston has known.

The Master

Return

His

TERS LOTTI

y Lee Elm

Koussevitzky Co Mat., 50c

Sibelius a

Memo

ESDAY

NCE SAT

THE CONDUCT

guest returned day afternoon

His orchestra

and there seemed less of feeling in their int

the audience added

Koussevitzky was in

at once into the w

gar's Introduction

Strings may pass, fo much preluding.

Sibelius's Seventh

a performance as in conductor and orche

plished. Above eve

composer is sparing usual strings, the horns, trumpets, tro

all in the usual

usual, numbers. H tra to its kernel.

utmost directness

There are no techni

Sibelius finds them

closure of his th

his emotion. Ther virtuosity, no ex

his Seventh Sym

an orchestra of virtuosi. They p

monic veils, no

timbres hide them speak directly.

austere. They m

ically and with p

Symphony Orche

these tests; play

poser and conduc

Within recolle

has not been mo band, the music

zeal trapped hin

a Symphony int

did not sentiment

every such wea

individual and enthralling raptures betrayed him from his post of command. There were no languors of motion, no lingering over-emphasis, for the sake of a choice sonority upon the ear. Dr. Koussevitzky saw in outline the tonal structure that Sibelius would raise. With him and for him he raised it. The composer is clear-minded in what he puts to music-paper. As lucidly the conductor adjusted every detail within that structure. The sinewy progress, the curt transitions; the stark speech—bare phrases, bare periods, bare harmonies, bare timbres; the impact of emerging motifs, the jab of unexpected modulation or dissonance; above all the great ground-swell from the depths upward, urging and expanding the whole—nothing of all these escaped Dr. Koussevitzky.

Ostensibly, this Seventh Symphony of Sibelius is an "absolute," self-contained music. If, as some infer, a program or a background haunted the composer's creating mind, he has divulged no hint. Yet a personal and introspective emotion deeply and unmistakably suffuses it; toward the end rises to passionate proclamation. Dr. Koussevitzky answered to the emotion and the passion; infused them into the performance; wrought them upon his more sensitive hearers. At every call, he was master of himself, the orchestra and the music in hand—the unsurpassed conductor, since Dr. Muck's day, of Sibelius in American concert-halls.

For the reviewer, putting pen to copy-paper, this Seventh Symphony remains nearly inexpressible. The motifs emerge; but in words for print their thrill weakens. They are born of intense personal emotion communicated to the hearer; but any paper-phrase bears them poor witness. Curt as they are, the naked ear hears in them—as naked—a puissant clang. They are enlarged, unfolded, new-accented, new-colored; opposed, contrasted, joined together. The structure unfolds and is upreared. The progress goes firmer and more variously. Changes of pace and mood bring new intensities.

Now an orchestral choir is the background; again it is the proclaiming voice. The choirs cry out to each other, urge each other on. To the isolated and united strings fall measures that seethe and cut. There are dark and sombre passages; then stark flashes of color in the woodwind; in the brass heroic chanting. Dissonant chords sweep by. Climaxes rise and fall away, leaving the tremulous strings to whisper mysteries. But always the ground-swell mounting and passioned by the emotion within; making out of these motifs its own music. There is suspense and conclusion—an end in grandeur at once concentrated and outspread. The ear recalls, the mind assimilates, the tense, terse advance from strength to strength. For this Seventh Symphony is the symphony of Sibelius's power and will.

Though intermission separated the two, the other major piece of the afternoon made the veriest contrast—Strauss's spacious and showy (as it now seemed) "Symphonia Domestica." Set beside Sibelius's Seventh, the listener half-forgot its merits for its differences. Strauss now seemed prolix, as one who could not bear to leave his full-throated singing in the middle division, or abate by one jot the prancings of his double fugue; who dwelt too lovingly upon a conscious art of transition. Strauss's long-breathed themes after Sibelius's curt motifs! Strauss's harmonic and instrumental luxuriance beside Sibelius's bareness! The externalized characterization, the candid emotions of the tone-poem, over against the tight-lipped speech, the inner passion of the Symphony! Sibelius the introspective, self-devouring solitary. Strauss the high-placed composer, achieving one more tone-poem on the great scale out of the common stock of domestic emotion. Sibelius, inventing his own technique because no other may release him. Strauss, the heir and master of multifarious musical procedures.

So much for the accident of a chance juxtaposition upon a well-contrasted program. Rather, dwell upon the transfigurations that, for a second or a third time, Strauss's tone-poem underwent at Dr. Koussevitzky's imagining hands. The conductor cares little for the so-called drastic humors of Straussian domesticity; for the tonal delineation of some of its incidents—if the analysts are right in their over-energetic labels. For him—to choose convenient example—the striking clock is quite by the way. Nor, the listener suspects, is he much drawn to the music of the child, save where it yields sturdy measures or is suffused with the mother's tenderness. Instead, and divinely, Dr. Koussevitzky is most for Strauss's characterization and Strauss's poetry. He is not content merely to array the motifs that express on this side and that the father and the mother. He gives them profile, warmth and animation; glimmers them when they are in lighter interplay; invigorates them when they turn assertive. He is zealous to discover the poetry of many a page—for it is there; quick in response and revelation.

Believing and practicing, Dr. Koussevitzky distills beauty out of the gentle close of the first division. The second may sing the passion of artistic creation or the passion of marital love; likely enough would blend them both. Whatever the ara

NAS

by Jean Bar e Squall"
LO PE
BRAGG
Directed b

$2.50—Wed.

S WEDN

PERFORMA

A

PIRE THR
50c, $1.

TIC

NG

esent

H-

SAR

SICAL

IT!

TSO

MARGARE

OW NIGHTS

WED. &

UTH-

The Proc

FRA

Marcel Pag

7

H. T. P.

H. T. P.

H. T. P.

H. T. P.

H. T. P.

H. T. P.

H. T. P.

H. T. P.

H. T. P.

H. T. P.

H. T. P.

H. T. P.

H. T. P.

H. T. P.

H. T. P.

Elgar as "Novelty" At Symphony Hall

THE novelty of the week at Symphony Hall this week is novel only in the sense that it has remained unplayed in Boston. For it dates from 1905, when Stravinsky was still studying with Rimsky-Korsakov (or at any rate had just completed his course with that master), and Debussy's "Pelléas and Mélisande" was only a very few years old. Debussy was still the chief bone of contention in the musical world. And the very newest scandal in such matters was the treatment of the young Ravel at the hands of the committee that declared him ineligible to compete further for the Prix de Rome. Elgar, the composer of our novelty, was being hailed as the redeemer of English music; even in those days was not "advanced" or "futuristic" or "modern" enough to shock the most conservative.

Elgar's Introduction and Allegro for Strings, Opus 47, is dedicated "To his friend, Professor S. S. Sanford, Yale University, U. S. A." It is in the key of G (minor and major). It is scored for string quartet and orchestra; the orchestral voices are each divided into two parts. Its first performance was by the London Symphony Orchestra, March 8, 1905, on an all-Elgar program. In 1914, when it was performed by the Chicago Symphony Orchestra, the excellent Mr. Borowski wrote in the program book: "To Mr. Ernest Newman Elgar stated that his work had its origin in Wales, where he was impressed by the sound of distant singing, in which the cadence of a falling third caught his fancy. From the train of thought thus generated sprang the main theme of the work, the pseudo-Welsh tune. Later on, a song heard in the valley of the Wye, reinforced the Welsh impressions and led to the completion of the work."

The Introduction (G minor) alternates between short divisions of Moderato and Allegretto. The Moderato is an impetuous descending figure. The Allegretto brings the bright tripping motif which will presently blossom into the chief theme of the Allegro, the main body of the work. Twice these are repeated. Then the viola of the solo quartet sings the haunting theme which Elgar evolved out of things heard during his Welsh travels. This at once receives a certain amount of development. Then, after a restatement of the introductory figure we are led into the Allegro and with it the key of G major. The tripping motif above alluded to is fully worked out. This in turn to a bright and sprightly dance, ataccato repeated sixteenth notes, following which there is an exuberant exposition upon an exceedingly and active subject. After fully worked out there is return to previous divisions of the Allegro, one on the bright tripping motif, one on the repeated sixteenth notes. And at the end there is a full and expressive climax on the Welsh theme. A. H. M.

The exigencies of program-making and of travel-schedules compel Dr. Koussevitzky to defer for a fortnight the marking by the Symphony Orchestra of Mr. Loeffler's seventieth birthday. The anniversary falls tomorrow; but at the concert of that day—and the following Saturday—the conductor must play pieces necessary for the journey Southward next week. The orchestra will not be heard again in Boston until Friday and Saturday, Feb. 13 and 14; while Mr. Loeffler himself will be absent for a time in Cleveland, to hear the first performance of his dedicatory piece written for the orchestra of that city on its entrance into a new hall.

Consequently not until Feb. 13 and 14 can Dr. Koussevitzky fill the second part of a pair of Symphony Concerts with Mr. Loeffler's "Pagan Poem" and "La Bonne Chanson," to be played in the presence of the composer and as the homage of his city. . . . During the same week the Philharmonic Society of New York will also pay him tribute. For its concerts of Feb. 12, 13, 14 and 15 Mr. Molinari, then conducting, announces "Pagan Poem," in the modest hope that at the first of the last of the series, Mr. Loeffler may honor the Society with his presence. "Six performances of an American composition in a single week by two great Eastern orchestras," writes one of his friends, "seems something like a record."

once concentrated and outspread. recalls, the mind assimilates, the terse advance from strength to strength. For this Seventh Symphony is the phony of Sibelius's power and will.

Though intermission separated the other major piece of the afternoon made the veriest contrast—Sibelius's spacious and showy (as it now is) "Symphonia Domestica." Set beside Sibelius's Seventh, the listener half its merits for its differences. Strauss seemed prolix, as one who could not leave his full-throated singing middle division, or abate by one prancings of his double fugue dwelt too lovingly upon a conscious of transition. Strauss's long-bellied themes after Sibelius's curt Strauss's harmonic and instrumental luxuriance beside Sibelius's bare externalized characterization, the emotions of the tone-poem, over the tight-lipped speech, the inner of the Symphony! Sibelius the intuitive, self-devouring solitary. the high-placed composer, achieves more tone-poem on the great scale of the common stock of domestication. Sibelius, inventing his own nique because no other may release Strauss, the heir and master of various musical procedures.

So much for the accident of a juxtaposition upon a well-contrasted gram. Rather, dwell upon the figurations that, for a second or time, Strauss's tone-poem under Dr. Koussevitzky's imagining hand, conductor cares little for the drastic humors of Straussian ditty; for the tonal delineation of its incidents—if the analysts are in their over-numerous label him—to choose convenient ple—the striking clock is quite way. Nor, the listener suspect much drawn to the music of the save where it yields sturdy meat is suffused with the mother's ten. Instead, and divinely, Dr. Koussevitzky is most for Strauss's characterization Strauss's poetry. He is not content to array the motifs that express side and that the father and the He gives them profile, warmth and tion; glimmers them when they lighter interplay; invigorates the they turn assertive. He is zealous cover the poetry of many a page there; quick in response and revelation.

Believing and practicing, Dr. Koussevitzky distills beauty out of the gentle close of the first division. The second may sing the passion of artistic creation or the passion of marital love; likely enough would blend them both. Whatever the purpose, deep-toned, rich-textured, upswelling music floods the page. Dr. Koussevitzky sounds it deep and high. Tenderly again he touches in the transition from sleep to waking; graces it as he passes; then springs into the frenzy of the high-leaping, hard-hitting, tirelessly exuberant fugue; at Strauss's call dashes in this memory and that of gentler moods; whips up the final strokes of characterization; so achieves the beaming, bounding end.

The "Symphonia Domestica" is more than a quarter-century old. Those years have sifted it; disclosed and preserved its more significant, poetized and universal content. Dr. Koussevitzky seizes upon these pages; transfigures them out of his own imagination; adds himself to Strauss as a conductor should. Thereby composer and composition are the gainers, which is the conductor's reward. Add, besides, an orchestra capable of all things and stimulated by the Straussian resource, craft and opportunity. Forthwith the "Symphonia Domestica" emerges purged from dross, clarified musically, poetized humanly, enriched throughout.

Back, finally, to Elgar's prelude, Sir Edward comes seldom nowadays into the Symphony Concerts; is known there only by his "Enigma Variations." These twenty years his symphonies have been counted antipathetic to American ears. His "Falstaff," his overtures, nearly all his work in the larger symphonic forms, are forgotten—if they were ever remembered. Outside the Variations, Dr. Koussevitzky prefers him in a transcription of Bach or in such a mingling of skill, scholarship and sonorities as the Introduction and Allegro of yesterday. In this instance Sir Edward writes sturdily; takes thought and proceeds with the dignity becoming the Master of the King's Music. More to the point and the pleasure, he is fertile in development and device; divides or masses his string choir with a clear preference for its united voice; is solicitous of detail; reunites a Welsh tune with a queer members a Welsh tune with a queer cadence; abounds more in matter than in mood; makes an end—the strings of Symphony Hall materially assisting—well on the sunny side of boredom. But the ancients had a way with them in such pieces; while the modernists have come nearer than Elgar's generation to recapturing it.

H. T. P.

Elgar as "Novelty" At Symphony Hall

THE novelty of the week at Symphony Hall this week is novel only in the sense that it has remained unplayed in Boston. For it dates from 1905, when Stravinsky was still studying with Rimsky-Korsakov (or at any rate had just completed his course with that master), and Debussy's "Pelléas and Mélisande" was only a very few years old. Debussy was still the chief bone of contention in the musical world. And the very newest scandal in such matters was the treatment of the young Ravel at the hands of the committee that declared him ineligible to compete further for the Prix de Rome. Elgar, the composer of our novelty, was being hailed as the redeemer of English music; even in those days was not "advanced" or "futuristic" or "modern" enough to shock the most conservative.

Elgar's Introduction and Allegro for Strings, Opus 47, is dedicated "To his friend, Professor S. S. Sanford, Yale University, U. S. A." It is in the key of G (minor and major). It is scored for string quartet and orchestra; the orchestral voices are each divided into two parts. Its first performance was by the London Symphony Orchestra, March 8, 1905, on an all-Elgar program. In 1914, when it was performed by the Chicago Symphony Orchestra, the excellent Mr. Borowski wrote in the program book: "To Mr. Ernest Newman Elgar stated that his work had its origin in Wales, where he was impressed by the sound of distant singing, in which the cadence of a falling third caught his fancy. From the train of thought thus generated sprang the main theme of the work, the pseudo-Welsh tune. Later on, a song heard in the valley of the Wye, reinforced the Welsh impressions and led to the completion of the work."

The Introduction (G minor) alternates between short divisions of Moderato and Allegretto. The Moderato is an impetuous descending figure. The Allegretto brings the bright tripping motif which will presently blossom into the chief theme of the Allegro, the main body of the work. Twice these are repeated. Then the viola of the solo quartet sings the haunting theme which Elgar evolved out of things heard during his Welsh travels. This at once receives a certain amount of development. Then, after a restatement of the introductory figure we are led into the Allegro and with it the key of G major. The tripping motif above alluded to is fully worked out. This in turn to a bright and sprightly ditty, staccato repeated sixteenth notes, following which there is an exuberant exposition upon an exceedingly and active subject. After fully worked out there is return to previous divisions of the Allegro on the bright tripping motif one on the repeated sixteenth notes and at the end there is a full and expressive climax on the Welsh theme.

A. H. M.

The exigencies of program-making and of travel-schedules compel Dr. Koussevitzky to defer for a fortnight the marking by the Symphony Orchestra of Mr. Loeffler's seventieth birthday. The anniversary falls tomorrow; but at the concert of that day—and the following Saturday—the conductor must play pieces necessary for the journey Southward next week. The orchestra will not be heard again in Boston until Friday and Saturday, Feb. 13 and 14; while Mr. Loeffler himself will be absent for a time in Cleveland, to hear the first performance of his dedicatory piece written for the orchestra of that city on its entrance into a new hall.

Consequently not until Feb. 13 and 14 can Dr. Koussevitzky fill the second part of a pair of Symphony Concerts with Mr. Loeffler's "Pagan Poem" and "La Bonne Chanson," to be played in the presence of the composer and as the homage of his city. . . . During the same week the Philharmonic Society of New York will also pay him tribute. For its concerts of Feb. 12, 13, 14 and 15 Mr. Molinari, then conducting, announces "Pagan Poem," in the modest hope that at the first or the last of the series, Mr. Loeffler may honor the Society with his presence. "Six performances of an American composition in a single week by two great Eastern orchestras," writes one of his friends, "seems something like a record."

once concentrated and outspread. It recalls, the mind assimilates, the terse advance from strength to st For this Seventh Symphony is the phony of Sibelius's power and will. purpose, deep-toned, rich-textured, upswelling music floods the page. Dr. Koussevitzky sounds it deep and high. . . . Tenderly again he touches in the transition from sleep to waking; graces it as he passes; then swings into the frenzy of

Though intermission separated the other major piece of the affair, made the veriest contrast—Sibelius's spacious and showy (as it now is) "Symphonia Domestica." Set beside Strauss's Seventh, the listener hallows its merits for its differences. Strauss seemed prolix, as one who could not leave his full-throated singing in the middle division, or abate by one prancings of his double fugue dwelt too lovingly upon a conscious transition. Strauss's long-bowed themes after Sibelius's curt Strauss's harmonic and instrumental luxuriations beside Sibelius's bare externalized characterization, the emotions of the tone-poem, over the tight-lipped speech, the inner of the Symphony! Sibelius the intuitive, self-devouring solitary. the high-placed composer, achieves the high-leaping, hard-hitting, tireless exuberant fugue; at Strauss's call dashes in this memory and that of gentler moods; whips up the final strokes of characterization; so achieves the beaming bounding end.

The "Symphonia Domestica" is more than a quarter-century old. Those years have sifted it; disclosed and preserved its more significant, poetized and universal content. Dr. Koussevitzky seizes upon these pages; transfigures them out of his own imagination; adds himself to Strauss as a conductor should. Thereby composer and composition are the gainers, which is the conductor's reward. Add, besides, an orchestra capable of all things and stimulated by the Straussian resource, craft and opportunity. Forthwith the "Symphonia Domestica" emerges poeured from dross, clarified musically, poetized humanly, enriched throughout.

So much for the accident of a juxtaposition upon a well-contrasted gram. Rather, dwell upon the figures that, for a second or time, Strauss's tone-poem under Dr. Koussevitzky's imagining hand conductor cares little for the drastic humors of Straussian ditty; for the tonal delineation of its incidents—if the analysts are in their over-numerous label him—to choose convenient—the striking clock is quite way. Nor, the listener suspect much drawn to the music of the save where it yields sturdy meal is suffused with the mother's ten. Instead, and divinely, Dr. Kous is most for Strauss's characterization Strauss's poetry. He is not contently to array the motifs that express side and that the father and the He gives them profile, warmth and tion; glimmers them when they lighter interplay; invigorates the they turn assertive. He is zealous cover the poetry of many a page there; quick in response and revelation.

Dr. Kous

Believing and practicing, Dr. Koussevitzy distills beauty out of the gentle close of the first division. The second may sing the passion of artistic creation or the passion of marital love; likely enough would blend them both. Whatever the purpose, deep-toned, rich-textured, upswelling music floods the page. Dr. Kous-sevitzy sounds it deep and high. . . . Tenderly again he touches in the transition from sleep to waking; graces it as he passes; then springs into the frenzy of the high-leaping, hard-hitting, tirelessly exuberant fugue; at Strauss's call dashes in this memory and that of gentler moods; whips up the final strokes of characterization; so achieves the beaming, bounding end.

The "Symphonia Domestica" is more than a quarter-century old. Those years have sifted it; disclosed and preserved its more significant, poetized and universal content. Dr. Koussevitzky seizes upon these pages; transfigures them out of his own imagination; adds himself to Strauss as a conductor should. Thereby composer and composition are the gainers, which is the conductor's reward. Add, besides, an orchestra capable of all things and stimulated by the Straussian resource, craft and opportunity. Forthwith the "Symphonia Domestica" emerges purged from dross, clarified musically, poetized humanly, enriched throughout.

Back, finally, to Elgar's preluding. Sir Edward comes seldom nowadays into the Symphony Concerts; is known there only by his "Enigma Variations." These twenty years his symphonies have been counted antipathetic to American ears. His "Falstaff," his overtures, nearly all his work in the larger symphonic forms, are forgotten—if they were ever remembered. Outside the Variations, Dr. Koussevitzky prefers him in a transcription of Bach or in such a mingling of skill, scholarship and sonorities as the Introduction and Allegro of yesterday. In this instance Sir Edward writes sturdily; takes thought and proceeds with the dignity becoming the Master of the King's Music. More to the point and the pleasure, he is fertile in development and device; divides or masses his string choir with a clear preference for its united voice; is solicitous of detail; remembers a Welsh tune with a queer cadence; abounds more in matter than in mood; makes an end—the strings of Symphony Hall materially assisting—well on the sunny side of boredom. But the ancients had a way with them in such pieces; while the modernists have come nearer than Elgar's generation to recapturing it.

H. T. P.

Elgar as 'At Syn

THE novelty phony Hall in the sense unplayed in Boston 1905, when Strav with Rimsky-Ko had just completed master, and D Méliande" was old. Debussy was contention in th the very newest was the treatmer the hands of the him ineligible to Prix de Rome.

our novelty, was deemer of English days was not "ad or "modern" and conservative.

Elgar's Introductory Strings, Opus 4 friend, Professor versity, U. S. A G (minor and n string quartet a tral voices are parts. Its first London Sympho 1905, on an all-Elgar when it was performed by the Symphony Orchestra. Borowski wrote in "To Mr. Ernest Newman" that his work had "where he was imprecise distant singing. In what a falling third caught the train of thought sprang the main theme pseudo-Welsh tune. Inward in the valley forced the Welsh line the completion of the. The Introduction (between short divisions) tretto. The Moderato descending figure. The bright tripping in only blossom into the Allegro, the main theme. Twice these are repeated of the solo quartet's theme which Elgar heard during his Welsh time receives a certain development. Then, of the introductory of the Allegro and the major. The tripping it to is fully worked newly arrived repairs. heavier-than-test in the weight of The new has been recounts from the hon last miral Cap vited pas tion beca

the plan was one Atlantic
the Afric

Predict Sai

Washington sailings from and the Company the present are in preparation. House In Mr. Litch the McNamara industries accorded promotion.

Now, ness, c
You v again-Teuton
Pro ful of the ne Radio aid off
No v compl noises.
each Teuton
4 1/2 ou
The societi them t for the League
The phone promis hearin Compe ever us or at t

gives way to a bright and sprightly division in staccato repeated sixteenth notes. Following which there is an extended fugal exposition upon an exceedingly lively and active subject. After this is fully worked out there is return to the two previous divisions of the Allegro, the one on the bright tripping motif and the one on the repeated sixteenth notes. And at the end there is a full-throated and expressive climax on the lyrical Welsh theme.

The exigencies of program-making and of travel-schedules compel Dr. Koussevitzky to defer for a fortnight the marking by the Symphony Orchestra of Mr. Loeffler's seventieth birthday. The anniversary falls tomorrow; but at the concert of that day—and the following Saturday—the conductor must play pieces necessary for the journey Southward next week. The orchestra will not be heard again in Boston until Friday and Saturday, Feb. 13 and 14; while Mr. Loeffler himself will be absent for a time in Cleveland, to hear the first performance of his dedicatory piece written for the orchestra of that city on its entrance into a new hall.

Consequently not until Feb. 13 and 14 can Dr. Koussevitzky fill the second part of a pair of Symphony Concerts with Mr. Loeffler's "Pagan Poem" and "La Bonne Chanson," to be played in the presence of the composer and as the homage of his city. . . . During the same week the Philharmonic Society of New York will also pay him tribute. For its concerts of Feb. 12, 13, 14 and 15 Mr. Molinari, then conducting, announces "Pagan Poem," in the modest hope that at the first or the last of the series, Mr. Loeffler may honor the Society with his presence. "Six performances of an American composition in a single week by two great Eastern orchestras," writes one of his friends, "seems something like a record."

TWO SYMPHONIES AT SYMPHONY CONCERT

Global — Jan. 31, 1931

Strauss' "Domestica" and Sibelius' Seventh Heard

Dr. Koussevitzky, returning to his post after his annual mid-season vacation, chose a program from the elder generation of living composers for yesterday's Symphony concert. There were but three numbers, two of them symphonies, Sibelius' Seventh and Richard Strauss' "Symphonia Domestica." An introduction and Allegro for strings by Sir Edward Elgar, composed in 1904, but not previously performed in Boston, began the concert.

Dr. Koussevitzky's interest in pieces for string orchestra is probably responsible for his choice of Elgar's well-written but dull piece, which is not one of the best works of that composer.

It is unfair to judge Elgar by his popular pieces of the salon type, or his "Pomp and Circumstance" marches. His oratorio, "The Dream of Gerontius," and his "Enigma" variations are the work of a composer greater than the Baxes and Waltons of the younger generation in England. But the music heard yesterday will not be often played in the future. Dr. Koussevitzky showed off once more the qualities of the strings in the Boston Symphony, of whose virtuosity he is obviously proud. The audience applauded cordially.

Powerful Work

Sibelius' Seventh Symphony, introduced here by Dr. Koussevitzky in 1926, is an original and powerful work, by a composer who, like the masters of the past, goes his own way musically, never following current fashions or aligning himself with any much-touted group. Yesterday's performance was clearer, more accurate, and thus more genuinely eloquent than the one in 1926.

The music made a deep impression on some in the audience, though it still apparently baffled the great majority. The real greatness of Sibelius becomes more obvious with the passage of time. His music does not "date." It is the work of a master, and will live.

Richard Strauss' reputation has so far overshadowed that of Sibelius. His music, as the "Symphonia Domestica" abundantly proved yesterday, is more brilliantly scored, more effectively written. At a first hearing its appeal to a sophisticated audience is greater than that of the serious work of Sibelius, whose vogue with the public has rested on things like his "Finlandia" and "Valse Triste," at which the sophisticated musician is now apt to sneer.

Yet despite the superlative workmanship of Strauss, the magnificent sonorities of his orchestration, and, one must add, despite his "showmanship," his talent for getting himself and his music talked about, one begins to wonder whether the symphonies of Sibelius have not a better chance than all but two or three of Strauss' works of being in the orchestral repertory 50 years hence.

Admirable Performance

The chief trouble with the "Symphonia Domestica," as with "Heldenleben," aside from the curious bad taste of the programmatic description of life in the Strauss household, is a paucity of original musical ideas. Strauss can do wonders with a little musical material, to be sure. But he has not many ideas.

Dr. Koussevitzky and the orchestra gave an admirable performance of Strauss' music, brilliant without blatancy or coarseness, dramatic and emphatic only within the bounds set by the composer's directions.

The orchestra goes on tour next week. For Feb. 13 and 14 the program now announced, subject, of course, to change, includes Honegger's new symphony written for the orchestra's anniversary season, two works by Loeffler, in honor of his recent 70th birthday, and a new suite for piano and strings by a young Italian named Piliati, otherwise unknown here. P. R.

Boston Symphony

Monday — Jan. 31, 1931

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, returning from his midwinter holidays, prepared this program for the Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts of Jan. 30 and 31 in Symphony Hall, Boston: Elgar's Introduction and Allegro for string orchestra, op. 47; the Seventh Symphony of Sibelius, and Strauss' "Symphonia Domestica." The usual rites were observed by the orchestra in honor of its restored shogun.

The Elgar item, which has been familiar to the rest of the western world this quarter-century, was heard at the Friday concert for the first time in the capital of music which this orchestra serves. Its advent had been delayed too long. It may have sounded more thrilling (though this seems improbable) in 1905. There are Englishmen who proclaim Elgar one of the great creative geniuses of his time, just as there are Austrians who look upon Mahler and Bruckner with like reverence. If Elgar has a claim to such consideration it will receive stronger support from other compositions of his which we have heard than from this Introduction and Allegro. The work did serve, however, to reveal again the tonal beauties, the virtuosity and the flexibility of the Boston string choirs.

Among the many signal services rendered by Dr. Koussevitzky to the art of music must be included his publicity campaign in behalf of such composers as Sibelius and Delius, who deserve a great deal more attention than they receive in most quarters. Dr. Koussevitzky has played most of Sibelius' symphonies in Boston, even including the Third, which has seemed baffling to more than one autocrat of the baton. This Sibelius Seventh, composed in 1925, was introduced by Dr. Koussevitzky late in 1926. It is not the most ingratiating composition of this composer who disdains to be ingratiating. Yet this austere musical utterance, with its basic theme of an ascending scale, its subdued colors and its restrained passion and power, exercises a potent spell upon the imagination. Conductor and orchestra become the voice of its vital and compelling utterance.

Strauss' bed-time story had been restudied with more devotion perhaps than it deserved. Richard the Second remains one of the most exasperating of composers. A little more taste, a touch of modesty, a capacity for self-criticism, and what an artist the author of "Till Eulenspiegel" and "Rosenkavalier" might have continued to become. The beauties of this score are so manifold that it is difficult to forgive the composer for the inconcinnities. You think you can free yourself of the less pleasing aspects of the domestic scene if you put aside the "program" and listen to the music purely as music. But even if you can do that—it is very difficult—you are distressed by the banality of some of the musical material itself.

But we should be grateful for the performance. Strauss, if he could have heard it, doubtless would entertain a still higher opinion of his powers. For the Boston orchestra in these days is at the top of its superb form, sensitive and responsive to the most exacting demands a conductor can make upon it. Dr. Koussevitzky had discovered, and the orchestra revealed at his behest, more charms than this score had yielded to us before. Only such an imaginative leader, with an orchestra capable of such subtle inflections of shading and tempo, could have exposed them.

L. A. S.

For New York

From Dr. Koussevitzky for the concerts of the Symphony Orchestra in New York next week. On Thursday evening: Introduction and Allegro for Strings... Elgar Symphony, No. 7, in One Movement... Sibelius
Symphonia Domestica... Strauss

For Saturday afternoon:

Two Preludes (Adagio: Vivace) ... Bach
(Scored for String Orchestra by Plick-Mangiagalli)
Caprice for Orchestra with Piano... Stravinsky
(Pianist: Mr. Sanroma)
Symphonia Domestica ... Strauss

From Dr. Koussevitzky

FOR the Symphony Concerts of Friday, Feb. 13, and Saturday, Feb. 14, the next in the series:

Suite for Piano and String Orchestra... Piliati
(New: First Times: Pianist, Mr. Sanroma)
Symphony ... Honegger
(First Performances: Written for the Jubilee of the Orchestra)
Pagan Poem (After Vergil) ... Loeffler
La Bonne Chanson (After Verlaine) ... Loeffler (Both Played to Mark the Composer's Seventieth Birthday)

For the supplementary matinee of the Symphony Orchestra on Tuesday, Feb. 10 in Symphony Hall:

Overture to Goethe's Play, "Egmont" Beethoven
Concerto, No. 4, in G major for Piano and Orchestra ... Beethoven (Pianist: Miss Hess)
Symphony, No. 3, in E-flat major "Eroica" ... Beethoven

SIR EDWARD ELGAR
Composer of several oratorios and other famous works; created a baronet.

Fifteenth Programme

FRIDAY AFTERNOON, FEBRUARY 13, at 2.30 o'clock

SATURDAY EVENING, FEBRUARY 14, at 8.15 o'clock

Pilati Suite for Pianoforte and String Orchestra

- I. Introduction.
- II. Sarabande.
- III. Minuet (Rondo).
- IV. Finale.

Piano: Jesús María Sanromá.
(First time in Boston)

Honegger Symphony

- I. Allegro marcato.
- II. Adagio.
- III. Presto.

(First Performance: Composed for the 50th Anniversary of the Boston Symphony Orchestra)

Loeffler Canticum Fratris Solis (After St. Francis of Assisi) for Voice and Orchestra

Loeffler "A Pagan Poem" (after Virgil) for orchestra, Pianoforte, English Horn and Three Trumpets Obbligati, Op. 14

SOLOIST
POVLA FRIJSH

STEINWAY PIANO

There will be an intermission after the symphony

A fiftieth anniversary exhibition is now on view in the Huntington Avenue foyer
(first balcony)

POVLA FRIJSH
Renown Danish Soprano

Symphony Concert Herald By PHILIP HALE

The program of the 15th concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Koussevitzky, conductor, given in Symphony hall yesterday afternoon, was as follows: Pilati, Suite for piano and orchestra (first time in Boston). Honegger, Symphony (composed for the jubilee of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. First performance). Loeffler, Canticum Fratris Solis (after St. Francis of Assisi) for voice and orchestra; also "A Pagan Poem" (after Virgil), Mme. Povla Frijsh, soprano, was the singer; Mr. Sanroma the pianist.

Mario Pilati is a Neapolitan born in 1903, now a teacher of counterpoint, composition and musical history. This Suite is in four movements, Introduction, Sarabande, Minuet (Rondo), Finale. These movements are comparatively short. The Sarabande is the most musically thought and expressed of the four. In the other movements there is a too apparent endeavor to shun the obvious. One might say that in the three there are "smart Alecisms." The Minuet begins in a charming manner; suddenly the composer says to himself, "This will never do;" he introduces at intervals rapid and inconsequential passages and excuses himself for the liberty by putting "Rondo" after "Minuet." The Finale is an Allegro burlesca. As Queen Victoria once remarked: "We were not amused." The Introduction consists of tentative phrases which hint at something worth while to come. Pilati undoubtedly has a certain talent; he is not devoid of sentiment; he appreciates the beautiful—this is shown in his Sarabande. The other movements suffer from "smartness."

Mr. Honegger took his commission seriously. He considered the dignity and the importance of the occasion, nor was he willing to write the conventional "piece d'occasion" which is heard, disappoints expectation, and is at once forgotten. This symphony must be ranked with the best of his many orchestral works; in some respects it is the best. The first movement with its crashing discords will probably disturb those who like to led in the paths of the dominant and sub-dominant with now and then a straying into the field of the sub-dominant. But there is impressive power, there is fiery energy in the skillfully contrived discordant measures; they are there with a purpose. Have-lock Ellis, speaking of the many who found—and still find—Proust unreadable and Joyce unintelligible, says "until we find the door and the clue the new writer remains obscure. Therein lies the truth of Landor's saying that the poet must himself create the beings who are to enjoy his Paradise." Surely no one yesterday, hearing the remaining two movements, if he knocked at Honegger's door found it shut. One could hardly fail to recognize the strength of the Adagio, its massive architecture, the heroic spirit of the long and resonant melodic lines; music of lofty thoughts not lowered by the medium of expression. As for the last movement, with its persistent rhythmic figures on which compelling musical sentences, always interesting, often eloquent, are declaimed; then the lovely tranquillity of the last pages—one may well fear lest this movement become at once "popular," and not in the best meaning of that word. It is a pleasure to add that this new work of a high standing composer was well received. Even those who have exclaimed "Honegger" to scare the timid from attending a concert when that name is on the program; who have honestly thought him a Bogyman, if not the Antichrist in music, were obliged to admit that there might be something in him after all.

Two of Mr. Loeffler's compositions were performed to bring him public honor, as a fortnight ago he passed his 70th birthday. It was on Nov. 20-21, 1891, that he appeared for the first time as a composer at a concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. He then played his suite for violin with the orchestra of which he was a valued member; his suite "Les Veillees de l'Ukraine" (after Gogol). Since then while he was still a member and after his regretted retirement, he has enriched the repertoire of this orchestra and the repertoires of other orchestras in this country and in Europe by his compositions. Those chosen yesterday are no doubt among his best, some may say they are his best, but there are earlier works that one would gladly hear. For example, his "Villanelle du Diable"—in which the macabre side of his musical nature is revealed; his Divertimento for violin and orchestra; his concerto for violoncello; his tragic "Mort de Tintagiles," nor should his composition for a jazz orchestra be neglected nor thought too light for a symphony concert—we suffer from undue seriousness, not to say solemnity that is almost ecclesiastical—for Mr. Loeffler has shown that jazz may be refined, even poetic, as well as exciting.

Yesterday the composer, the conductor, the singer and the orchestra were loudly applauded; and singer, conductor and orchestra were united in the payment of tribute to Mr. Loeffler.

The concert will be repeated tonight. The program of next week will be as follows: Handel, Concerto Grosso for strings, G minor, No. 6 (not op. 6 No. 9 as previously announced). Stravinsky, "Symphonie de Psalms" for orchestra and chorus. Berlioz, Symphonie Fantastique. Feb. 14, 1931

MODERN MUSIC AT SYMPHONY CONCERT

Loeffler Honored, and New Honegger Work

By Bob. Feb. 14, 1931

Dr Koussevitzky devoted yesterday's Symphony concert to the performance of an all-modern program. Honegger's Symphony, dedicated to the Boston Symphony and to its present conductor, was played for the first time in public. Charles Martin Loeffler, two of whose works were played was warmly applauded, orchestra and audience standing to do him honor at the end of the concert. The only other number was an insignificant suite for piano and string orchestra by an obscure young Italian named Pilati.

Mr Loeffler has so long been a familiar figure at Symphony Hall that there is some danger of people forgetting that he is a composer of rare distinction and considerable repute. His recent 70th birthday was said to be the occasion of including his "Pagan Poem" and "Canticle of the Sun" on yesterday's program. But his music deserved to be heard for its own sake, with no commemorative or anniversary motive in the offing.

Mme Povla Frijsch repeated the sensitive and musicianly interpretation of the solo in the "Canticle" which she first gave here last season. Yesterday her voice was in fine condition, so that tonal beauty as well as musical taste distinguished her singing.

Mr Sanroma not only played the piano solo in "A Pagan Poem" but was also the pianist in Pilati's suite. In Mr Loeffler's brilliantly written measures for piano he excelled. In Pilati's rather trivial music he did all that anyone might to make it seem interesting and original.

Honegger's Symphony

This Pilati suite is the work of a young modernist composer trying to revive the formulae of 18th century music without understanding them. He fell into most of the cliches of both 18th and 20th century music. But his piece is sprightly, and very showily written for strings.

Honegger's symphony seemed at a first hearing to be a masterpiece, despite hints of the styles of other composers as diverse as Wagner and Stravinsky. In one piece, in fact, there is more than a hint of a theme from the latter's "Firebird," but Honegger is no mere tepid imitator, trimming his sails to every musical breeze, following the latest current fashion blindly and eagerly. On the contrary his music has almost excessive vigor of substance. Its rhythms, singly and in combination, are vital and original.

Almost alone in his generation, Honegger is not afraid to be, on occasion, frankly melodious. Almost alone among the younger moderns, he is not afraid of heroics, of the intensity, the passionate outbursts so characteristic of both good and bad 19th century composers. Nor do Honegger's outbursts become bombastic. They seem the spontaneous overflow of powerful feeling and are therefore, by all the canons of 19th century critical authority, positively justified.

It is, of course, absurd to pass judgment on so intricate a new piece after the first performance. One can only in such circumstances record impressions. The style of this piece seems a bit crabbed. There are curiously angular melodic and rhythmic figures. The writing for orchestra sometimes seemed yesterday to lack clarity and sonority. The idiom is modernistic, so much so that some of the combinations of notes heard sounded fortuitous, as though they could not be what was written.

Loving Care

Yet one trusts conductor and orchestra to play such things pretty accurately. It was evident that this symphony had been rehearsed by them with loving care. The performance triumphed over many obvious difficulties produced by Honegger's passion for rhythmic counterpoint.

Dr Koussevitzky's commissions to noted present-day composers for works to be written for the Boston Symphony's 50th anniversary season have fully justified themselves in the production of Russell's symphony, Stravinsky's "Symphonie de Psalms" and this Honegger symphony. Each has seemed at a first hearing a masterpiece. Each should, if possible, be repeated this season, as Stravinsky's work will be next week. P. R.

SYMPHONY'S TRIBUTE TO LOEFFLER

Two Numbers Played —Honegger's Work for First Time

Post Feb. 14, 1931

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

A distinguished citizen of these parts, Charles Martin Loeffler, is appropriately honored at the Symphony Concerts of this week. Mr. Loeffler has just passed his 70th birthday, and Dr. Koussevitzky paid his respects by playing yesterday afternoon, as he will this evening, Mr. Loeffler's "Pagan Poem" and his more recent "Canticle of the Sun." In the latter piece, Povla Frijsch was the singer.

TWO NEW PIECES

Mr. Loeffler heard his setting of St. Francis' canticle, first performed here 13 months ago, from his accustomed place in the balcony. Before the performance of the "Pagan Poem" he left his seat, and when that piece was concluded he was escorted by Dr. Koussevitzky to the front of the platform where he was obliged to bow again and again in acknowledgement of the applause.

It was an eventful afternoon. Immediately before these complimentary rites had come the world premiere of a symphony by Arthur Honegger, composed for the 50th anniversary of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and dedicated to the orchestra and its conductor, while before that there was played for the first time in Boston a suite for piano and strings by the 28-year-old Italian, Mario Pilati, a composer hitherto unknown here.

Mr. Pilati, as his suite disclosed him, is a gifted young man who has not yet found his own voice. In the first two movements of his suite, an introduction and Sarabande, he indulges in the popular modern sport of pouring new wine into old bottles. In the Sarabande he does this with conspicuous success.

The movement has a wistful charm, a fragrance as of things old and half-forgotten. The ensuing Minuet is disturbed by a bizarre figure of sharply reiterated notes and there are suggestions here, as in the final Allegro Burlesca, that Mr. Pilati is well acquainted with the music of the modern Frenchmen, particularly that of Ravel. The suite was brilliantly played by the orchestra's strings and Jesus Maria Sanroma, who was also the pianist in the two pieces of Loeffler.

Another Railroad Piece

Mr. Honegger's Symphony was to be heard with mixed emotions. Portions of the work are forceful and convincing, but not all of it. The first movement disconcertingly recalls that musically most famous of locomotives, Mr. Honegger's own "Pacific 231"; possibly this is "Pacific 232." The engine puffs and snorts; it telescopes a "local" at Readville; but at the end it steams, battered but still jaunty, into the South station. The second movement is marked by a sort of strained lyricism and is not without its moments of intensity. The opening measures, scored for violin, cellos and basses, are original and effective. This movement has character.

In the finale there are irresistible rhythms combined with a grim and rasping harmonic and orchestral dress. The very end, however, is blandly placid, seeming by contrast with what had gone before almost smugly suphonic. But this happy ending pleased the audience. Few of the many works written for this anniversary season have been so warmly received.

Loeffler's Canticle

There are beautiful pages in Mr. Loeffler's Canticle, pages in which the soul takes wings and soars aloft, pages truly mystical. But the nature of the text made difficult both the avoidance of monotony and the attaining of perfect continuity. A voice more sensuously lovely than that of Mme. Frijsch, who sang with her customary insight and intelligence, is needed for this work with its coloring so softly rich, a voice that would not shrill, as did Mme. Frijsch's now and then, against this melting euphony.

There was a glowing performance of the "Pagan Poem." But it is heresy to suggest that this ecstatic, rapturous composition, one of the notable scores of the 20th century, is beginning to sound a little prolix and diffuse? That it tends here and there, if ever so slightly, to cloy and to lose its grip upon the hearer?

Honegger's New Symphony

Monitor Feb. 14, 1931. By L. A. SLOPER

ARTHUR HONEGGER, whose musical achievements are many and familiar, was among the composers invited to supply compositions in honor of the fiftieth anniversary of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. His contribution to the festival year occupied the central position on the program prepared by Dr. Serge Koussevitzky for the concerts of Feb. 13 and 14 in Symphony Hall, Boston. This proved to be a symphony without key designation, made audible at the Friday concert for the first time anywhere.

M. Honegger, if not the most original of all composers, is certainly among the most accomplished. His symphony is characteristic of him. That is, it is the sort of symphony one would expect from the man who wrote "Horace Victorieux" and the "Pastorale d'été," "King David" and the Prayer of Judith, "Pacific 231" and the Concertino.

Upon the ears of M. Honegger, if not upon those of all his auditors, sevenths and seconds fall with a soothing incidence. Most of his works, therefore, demand that the conservative listener revise his theories of beauty in sound. This symphony is no exception. Of its three movements, the first is of Stravinskian violence and harshness, and the second is lyrical and the third is a Presto in the nature of a Scherzo, which includes among its many ingredients passages of folk dance flavor and a touch of jazz in a portamento figure in the solo trombone; not to mention an echo of the horns of King Marke's hunting party.

It is this last movement, too, which opens with a short descending figure (in the contrabassoon) which Honegger seems to have used in many of his works much as Whistler used a butterfly. But strangely enough, the symphony closes with a brief Andante tranquillo, quite in the mood of the "Pastorale d'été." No doubt it was because of these measures that an active minority of the audience recalled the conductor until he was justified in inviting the players to share in what amounted to a considerable success, for a new piece in modernist vein. This result probably will not be surprising to the composer. It is not only by a noisy conclusion that one may achieve an effect.

Now it is all very well to intimate that had not Wagner, Liszt, Strauss, Florent Schmitt, Stravinsky and Schönberg lived and written, this symphony would never have graced the Boston orchestra's fête year. Every composer makes use of his musical inheritance. Honegger perhaps more than most. But it must be noted that he is at all events master of his materials. His music is atonal, but in structure it is severely classical. Honegger is not one of those who can compose without ever having had a lesson in their lives. His technique, in both composition and orchestration, is expert. Perhaps it is even too expert for his inspiration. That may be why we feel that for all his brilliance, Honegger need not yet be placed in the first rank of composers. Yet his symphony is by no means the least important of the compositions written for the Boston anniversary. The work had been devotedly prepared and the performance was magnificent.

Another novelty (so far this time as Boston was concerned) was the Suite for pianoforte (J. M. Sanromá) and string orchestra by Mario Pilati, a young Italian musician. Consisting of an Introduction, Sarabande, Minuet and Finale, it pleased by its simplicity and by its nostalgic evocation of more graceful days.

The remainder of the program was devoted to one of America's most distinguished composers. Charles Martin Loeffler, although born in Alsace, has lived and worked in the United States for nearly 50 years, and used to sit beside Franz Kneisel at the first desk of the Boston orchestra's violins. It was fitting, therefore, that in honor of his recent seventieth birthday, Dr. Koussevitzky should perform two of his most important works, the "Canticum Fratris Soli" for soprano (Povla Frijsh) and orchestra, and the "Pagan Poem" for orchestra, pianoforte, English horn and three trumpets obbligati. At the close, Mr. Loeffler was brought to the stage, and artists and audience delighted in paying him homage.

For Loeffler, For Honegger, The Garlands

The Parisian's New Symphony,
The Bostonian Honored
And Epitomized

Janus. Feb. 14, 1931

TO a certainty, Honegger completed no half-finished manuscript; clapped upon the fly-leaf a dedication to the Boston Symphony Orchestra; so fulfilled a commission for its jubilee. Nor, having received the invitation, did he search his soul and cudgel his brains to write the desired piece of music. Whether his "Symphony for Orchestra"—played at the Symphony Concert yesterday for the first time anywhere—attracted or repelled the hearer, there was no doubting 'it as work of a composer possessed by what he would say: striking out, white-hot, the means to the saying. For Honegger—the chroniclers agree—composition is a rapid, absorbing process. He wrote, for example, the whole music to "King David" in an incredibly brief time. By the dates on the score the new Symphony occupied him through six months, for him a long incubation. To hear it, however, is to believe that he sketched it in a passion of creation; amplified, revised and rounded it with no chill upon the earlier heats. Never once does progress falter or texture sag. Like or dislike it, his Symphony is a design accomplished, a state of spirit expressed.

Honegger, now entering the prime of the forties, writes out of full mind, large resource, busy experience. His range of musical knowledge extends from Bach to the newest prodigy of Paris. Some who have scrutinized this first Symphony say they find in the score traces (as chemists call them) of this, that and the other composer. Likely enough; for to discover such, even of Monsieur Massenet, was a favorite process when "King David" was new. Hearing is another matter. Whatever Honegger may have new Symphony stamped by his throughout it is the Honegger writes force at command. he may put to most part send orchestra. As it unfolding Sym- brim. One de- stance, facture, ear only to be ct. The listener enriched. Two old not exhaust music. (It is to maining third of vitzky will find was fertile in the al ideas. In the L," he sets forth

modernisms, Hon- temperament. Con- practice, his slow atic as though it agnerian heyday. elody—not as the ssics" or the nine- fics" invented and modernist melody, ged, thin-clothed, in long line rather cut as in a cham- ardent and inten- d yet alight with g luxuriance that may go bare and ovement, vitalized ger's counterpart of power.

er of exuberance. subsidiary, jostle bout in a demonic all is flux and sharp voice—until tiv calls for order; heir contrapuntal e Symphony end ill say breathless. ise in modernist n modernist ardor, th this fine frenzy

Here at at, without a pro- any other verbal If and of itself not ate time; that de- earsals spent upon sympathy, force Dr. Koussevitzky claimed it. Once hestra, and he as kesmen par excel- his immediate day.

Honegger's New Sym

Monitor Feb. 14, 1931. By L. A. SLOPER

ARTHUR HONEGGER, whose musical achievements are many and familiar, was among the composers invited to supply compositions in honor of the fiftieth anniversary of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. His contribution to the festival year occupied the central position on the program prepared by Dr. Serge Koussevitzky for the concerts of Feb. 13 and 14 in Symphony Hall, Boston. This proved to be a symphony without key designation, made audible at the Friday concert for the first time anywhere.

M. Honegger, if not the most original of all composers, is certainly among the most accomplished. His symphony is characteristic of him. That is, it is the sort of symphony one would expect from the man who wrote "Horace Victorieux" and the "Pastorale d'été," "King David" and the Prayer of Judith, "Pacific 231" and the Concertino.

Upon the ears of M. Honegger, if not upon those of all his auditors, sevenths and seconds fall with a soothing incidence. Most of his works, therefore, demand that the conservative listener revise his theories of beauty in sound. This symphony is no exception. Of its three movements, the first is of Stravinskian violence and harshness, and the second is lyrical and the third is a Presto in the nature of a Scherzo, which includes among its many ingredients passages of folk dance flavor and a touch of jazz in a portamento figure in the solo trombone; not to mention an echo of the horns of King Marke's hunting party.

It is this last movement, too, which opens with a short descending figure (in the contrabassoon) which Honegger seems to have used in many of his works much as Whistler used a butterfly. But strangely enough, the symphony closes with a brief Andante tranquillo, quite in the mood of the "Pastorale d'été." No doubt it was because of these measures that an active minority of the audience recalled the conductor justified in its share in what considerable success, for modernist vein. This will not be surprising. It is not only by a of that one may achieve Now it is all very n that had not Wagner Florent Schmitt, a Schönberg lived with symphony would need the Boston Orchest Every composer in a musical inheritance, haps more than most noted that he is at es of his materials. Hl but in structure it is Honegger is not one d compose without ev lesson in their liv in both composition is expert. Perhaps d pert for his inspirat why we feel that for Honegger need not r the first rank of c t symphony is by no c important of the con for the Boston anny had been devotedly e performance was m

Another novelty as Boston was conf Suite for piano foray and string orchestra a young Italian mue of an Introduc Minuet and Final is simplicity and by of cation of more gra The remain

THUR. EVE.
FEB. 26
AT 8:15
MAXIM

THUR. EVE.
MAR. 5
AT 8:30
PERCY

SAT. EVE.
MAR. 7
AT 8:30
MARY

SUN. AFT.
MAR. 8
AT 3:30
ALBER

TUES. EVE.
MAR. 10
AT 8:15
HAM

BRANSON D
3 SATURDAY AFT
OUR COLORFUL SOU

BACH
ORCHESTRAL CH
BOSTON SY

HARVARD GLEE CLUB—
Dr. A. T. DAVISON.
AMY EVANS—MARGARET ALEXANDER
WALLACE COURSE

WILBUR
"UP PO
Comedy Hit with Eves. 50c to $2.50; W
MAJESTIC

assimilated into the new Symphony comes forth unmistakably stamped by his mind and hand. Throughout it is the full voice of a full man.

By the same token Honegger writes with every desired resource at command. Whatever he wills, that he may put to music-paper; for the most part send sounding from his orchestra. As it seemed yesterday, the unfolding Symphony was filled to the brim. One detail after another, of substance, facture, expression, pricked the ear only to be thrust away by the next. The listener heard, exhilarated and enriched. Two or three repetitions would not exhaust the surprises of this music. (It is to be hoped that in the remaining third of the season Dr. Koussevitzky will find room for one.)

Long since Honegger was fertile in the development of his musical ideas. In the "Symphony for Orchestra," he sets forth the leading motifs unescapably. They are stripped, clarified, reiterated. From them he develops secondary motives; weaves this development into a many-stranded web of counterpoint—linear counterpoint in the modernist sense of the words. (An applauding minority bore witness to ears already accustomed.) Once and again these lines are so many and close that ear and mind may hardly carry and differentiate them. Then, as with Strauss in kindred, abundance, comes a moment of paper-music, written rather than heard.

Honegger writes atonally, not because atonality is the newest musical discovery or the current musical fashion—for it has ceased to be either—but because it is the idiom in which he best expresses himself. His is an honest, spontaneous atonality. So written, this keyless Symphony teems with dissonance, shrill and piercing, harsh and deep, unmitigated, driven home. All ears, unless they are deliberately closed to the voice of modernist music, are now well schooled to these barrages. (The intent listening of yesterday was the proof.) In the Symphony, as usual with Honegger, it is unforced and unfaunted dissonance—the natural turn, the particular emphasis, of the musical moment. But, admittedly, it is uncommonly acrid and astringent. Similarly with his instrumental voices as such. Often they are harsh, acidulous. They protrude, bear down, shout, hammer. Or, if they sing, the melodies turn bitter on their lips. Honegger is frank, honest, urgent composer. Having chosen his ways and means, he does not spare them upon an audience. He plies them—as the American vernacular puts it—"until they hurt." When his "Horace Victorieux" was played at Symphony Hall, some found him—to quote their very words—"the most repul-by will now count hestra" as comegger of the first ably a composer are bold. Even s they are little s beat sharp or e linear counter- progressions grind ching themselves ad oftenest from The brass affirms ght to mutter or melodic measures semblance. Yet nd ascendant; the In sum a music on many a page ent; a music in- present halls as modernisms. Hon- temperament. Con- practice, his slow atic as though it agnerian heyday. elody—not as the ssics" or the nine- ics" invented and modernist melody, ged, thin-clothed, in long line rather cut as in a cham- ardent and inten- d yet alight with g luxuriance that may go bare and ovement, vitalized ger's counterpart of power.

er of exuberance. subsidiary, jostle bout in a demonic t; all is flux and sharp voice—until tiv calls for order; heir contrapuntal e Symphony end ill say breathless. ise in modernist n modernist ardor, th this fine frenzy . . . Here at at, without a pro- any other verbal lf and of itself not ate time; that de- earsals spent upon sympathy, force Dr. Koussevitzky claimed it. Once hestra, and he as kesmen par excel- his immediate day.

Honegger's New Sym

Monitor Feb. 14, 1931. By L. A. SLOPER

ARTHUR HONEGGER, whose musical achievements are many and familiar, was among the composers invited to supply compositions in honor of the fiftieth anniversary of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. His contribution to the festival year occupied the central position on the program prepared by Dr. Serge Koussevitzky for the concerts of Feb. 13 and 14 in Symphony Hall, Boston. This proved to be a symphony without key designation, made audible at the Friday concert for the first time anywhere.

M. Honegger, if not the most original of all composers, is certainly among the most accomplished. His symphony is characteristic of him. That is, it is the sort of symphony one would expect from the man who wrote "Horace Victorieux" and the "Pastorale d'été," "King David" and the Prayer of Judith, "Pacific 231" and the Concertino.

Upon the ears of M. Honegger, if not upon those of all his auditors, sevenths and seconds fall with a soothing incidence. Most of his works, therefore, demand that the conservative listener revise his theories of beauty in sound. This symphony is no exception. Of its three movements, the first is of Stravinskian violence and harshness, and the second is lyrical and the third is a Presto in the nature of a Scherzo, which includes among its many ingredients passages of folk dance flavor and a touch of jazz in a portamento figure in the solo trombone; not to mention an echo of the horns of King Marke's hunting party.

It is this last movement, too, which opens with a short descending figure (in the contrabassoon) which Honegger seems to have used in many of his works much as Whistler used a butterfly. But strangely enough, the symphony closes with a brief Andante tranquillo, quite in the mood of the "Pastorale d'été." No doubt it was because of these measures that an active minority of the audience recalled the concert justified in its share in what considerable success, for modernist vein. They will not be surprised. It is not only by that one may achieve that had not Wagner. Florent Schmitt, a Schönberg lived a symphony would be the Boston orchestra. Every composer, a musical inheritance, perhaps more than noted that he is at of his materials. H but in structure it Honegger is not one compose without a lesson in their liv in both composition is expert. Perhaps pert for his inspira why we feel that Honegger need not the first rank of at symphony is by the important of the for the Boston anny had been devoted the performance was Another novelty as Boston was of Suite for piano and string orchestra a young Italian m of an Introduc Minuet and Final of simplicity and by cation of more g The remain

THUR. EVE.
FEB. 26
AT 8:15

MAXIM

THUR. EVE.
MAR. 5
AT 8:30

PERCY

SAT. EVE.
MAR. 7
AT 8:30

MARY

SUN. AFT.
MAR. 8
AT 3:30

ALBER

TUES. EVE.
MAR. 10
AT 8:15

HAM

BRANSON D

3 SATURDAY AFT
OUR COLORFUL SOU

BACH

ORCHESTRAL

BOSTON S

HARVARD GLEE CLUB

Dr. A. T. DAVIS

AMY EVANS—MARGA

ALEXAND

WALL

COURS

WILBUR

"UP P

Comedy Hit
Eves. 50c to $2.50

MAJESTIC

ass, or com min full ot
Ber with Wha mus sout seer a pho tail exp thru heav or the be le
the room
L dev
"Sy
the str he r th we in le ar an
the eg f

D. GRIFF

LYRIC

SHUB

NIN

PLYMO

FRA

PLYMOUTH

"TH

LESLIE

BEST SEATS
$1.50

CO

TH

KEN

Mats. Tues.
TODAY at 2:30
TONIGHT 8:30

MOND

ONE

"H

CARD

LO

By JACQ

Delightful

RACHEL

ROBERT H

BEST SEATS
$1.50

BOSTON OP

Fri. Eve. Feb.

modernists." They will now count Symphony for Orchestra" as com-piece.

vertheless, the Honegger of the first ment is unmistakably a composer wer. The contours are bold. Even the songful measures they are little ned. The rhythms beat sharp or The march of the linear counter-is inexorable. Progressions grind ast each other, wrenching themselves
The strings sound oftenest from upper registers. The brass affirms twentieth-century right to mutter or brill. The more melodic measures alter the pervading semblance. Yet design is spacious and ascendant; the texture glows. In sum a music ck off at white heat, on many a page rous and incandescent; a music int with what this present hails as

With all his honest modernisms, Hon-ger has the eclectic temperament. Con-v to much current practice, his slow vement is as chromatic as though it e written in the Wagnerian heyday.
is also music of melody—not as the teenth-century "classics" or the nineenth-century "romantics" invented and hioned it. Instead, modernist melody, ort-breathed, hard-edged, thin-clothed, arp-voiced, unfolding in long line rather an vivid color, clear-cut as in a cham-r-piece; none the less ardent and inten-ve. Unsentimentalized yet alight with ark emotion, shunning luxuriance that urface and underbody may go bare and ear, such a slow movement, vitalized roughout, is Honegger's counterpart the first movement of power.

The finale is a welter of exuberance.
Motifs, principal or subsidiary, jostle notifs; figures whirl about in a demonic wondo. All is rhythm; all is flux and art; high tension and sharp voice—until at last the principal motif calls for order;
sets the others in their contrapuntal place; bids the whole Symphony end calmed—or as some will say breathless.
After his first exercise in modernist power and his second in modernist ardor, Honegger "tops off" with this fine frenzy of modernist tension. . . . Here at last is a symphony that, without a program, a foreword or any other verbal gloss, expresses in itself and of itself not a little of this immediate time; that deserved the week of rehearsals spent upon it; the understanding, sympathy, force and fullness with which Dr. Koussevitzky and the orchestra proclaimed it. Once more, the Boston Orchestra, and he as conductor, are the spokesmen par excellence for the music of this immediate day.

H. T. P.

Once more a considerable part of the audience heard and rewarded. The commissions that have added to the phony of Honegger to Stravinsky, "Psalms," and both to Rouse's phony with which the series began, are not bestowed in vain.

The second half of the concert was nearly as might be the birthday of Charles Martin Loeffler as violinist and composer, has marked these forty years his work in his dwelling. The Symphony had reason to honor the violinist out of its ranks has become a distinguished composer in his time; handed it many a manuscript; wh

ness to a fine, true and vital culture existent in Boston and concert-capitals of these United States. To end the afternoon came a domestic scene. At the call of D. S. S. sevitzy, Mr. Loeffler descended the stage from his seat in the balcony hailed with united and hearty applause by the waiting audience; while the orchestra rose to salute him, and plaudits, and the conductor, as enthusiastically as might be, joined in a general homage. No one was lacking except Mme. Frijsh who had sung the part in Mr. Loeffler's setting of Francis's "Canticle of the Sun" from her place on the platform a gesture, she had already passed on to the composer her well-earned applause. Here in America, she is essential to the Hymn. From the outset it has known no other voice. Still she ripens in it.

The "Canticle," and "Pagan Poem" which followed, were discerningly chosen to exemplify the symphonic Loeffler. Unless the Symphony ("Hymn") which he still reserves for seemingly less revision, shall ultimately excise this hymn of the holy and fraternal, it is his most completely accomplished and most characteristic work. In a new yesterday, this music is neither place nor period. It is self-contained, self-sufficient, timeless, its own life. Out of the crucible of imagination, it is expression not of Francis's verse but of Francis's. It suffuses the Hymn, yet marks detail as it mounts. It is no less a vision of the devout, the mystical, truly spiritual Loeffler—the sacred as the old phrase ran—who may of these things only in tones; and singing, lift up also the hearts of those who hear.

Over against the Canticle went "Pagan Poem" to embody the romantic dramatizing, the exorcising Loeffler conjuring out of Vergil's a world the sorceress-girl, forsaken of her lover, spelling him back. The trumpets sound her refrain; the piano rhythms her magic; the whole orchestra speaks out her grief, longing, suspense, rejoicing. The very dog barks in the doorway. For Loeffler the spiritualizing, read Loeffler, the humanizing, tone-poet. Find in both the mating master of means to ends. "Pagan Poem" was first written a quarter of a century ago. Here and there it does not escape birthmarks. The technician, the stylist and the poet, audible in Mr. Loeffler from first piece to last, quickly efface them. In "Canticle and Poem" the orchestra played as for a fête.

There was also a prelude to this full-freighted afternoon—a Suite for Piano and strings by young Maestro Mario Pilati of Naples and Cagliari, which is in Sardinia. It would pour a mild new wine of modernism into the old bottles of Prelude, Saraband, Minuet, Finale Burlesca. By no means did it crack them. Mr. Sanromá played expertly and sympathetically upon a percussive piano; the accompanying strings—for they were no more—did amiably what Pilati bade. Throughout, he forgot that an insistent avoidance of every cliché becomes as tedious as trite repetition. One expected cadence would have been tonic.

H. T. P.

Charles Martin Loeffler: Born at Mulhouse (Alsace) Jan. 30, 1861 Now Living at Medfield

(Garro)

Added Leaves To. Loeffler's Wreath of Bay

For His Seventieth Birthday
New York Pens also Write His Praises

Trans. — Feb. 11, 1931

SOME years ago—never mind just when: dates are dry food—Arthur Whiting, musician, composer, scholar and observer, gave a musical party. It was a coming-out party. The debutante was not a fair maiden, but a group of songs. The place was Whiting's studio. About thirty men gathered in the room. There were fire-light, the dull glow of lamps and the enshrouding veil of fragrant tobacco-smoke. Before the songs were sung Vincent d'Indy, composer of the "Ishtar," variations and high priest of the Schola Cantorum of Paris, read with elegant diction the texts by Paul Verlaine from which the songs were made. Then we heard the music.

Francis Rogers sang the lyrics Arthur Whiting played the piano and the composer of the songs played the viola obbligato. After the group had been disclosed to us we had an interval for conversation beer, sandwiches and continued smoke. Then we resumed our seats and the songs were sung again. It was in the intermission that Walter Damrosch said to his brother: "Frank, this man Loeffler has something that the rest of them have not."

And that was straight talk. It took many of them years to find it out and there are dullards in the world of music who do not know it yet. However, there are celebrations just now because Charles Martin Loeffler has attained the Biblical three score and ten. He has been dwelling for several years in the seclusion of his house in Medfield, Mass.; but Boston, which knew him when he sat at the first desk of its great orchestra beside Franz Kneisel, has drawn him out of his den and turned the white light of approbation upon him.

A&P
these are Pot SUNNY Har your ch
Che

Grand delive Whole White

You C Beef,

Cor

Years Now Bear Him Witness

once Gilman Plaits The Birthday Wreath

Remember, in listening to the Thessalian, the desirous, and the enchantress sick to trace her urgent songs; we find the strange and stirring thing that inspired the music is enough—the movement of its noble and sweeping light is more beauty, its sorcerous art, whether Loeffler himself, he is today one haps and honors, known as a per fund, has never cheapened or as prop, model for artists of every on of its quiet simplicity, its devotion to the modest per beautiful things, to the shap e institutions and individual excellence earned the question institutions. They not word quest, on important number on the on their Charles Martin Loeffler's cal ques. The composition is no lved the our concert halls, but it was ions. It evening for a special purpose e should, the most eminent composer lated, this country with the possible law by of Rakhmaninov, was seventy was no on Jan. 30 and his composition presented in celebration of the political. Molinari had made a thorough the score and conducted it with those earnestness and moving results. slave, sent forth once again its pro of the visions of Virgil. ne it birthday was honored not long on o e audience applauded the music nean enthusiasm astonishing after so uivalent. [The Sun as a] You C ar Symphony Orchestra has Beef, arly able history. Older concert.

will recall the seasons when at the two desks sat Kneisel and Loeffler, Adamowski and Otto Roth, all of appeared at various times as soloists at concerts of the organization. one occasion Mr. Loeffler was not soloist, but composer. This was at ourth concert of the twelfth season e orchestra in New York. It was in Metropolitan Opera House. The pro comprised Beethoven's "Egmont" ure, Mr. Loeffler's Divertimento for and orchestra, Mrs. Beach's "Gael-symphony, the customary three ex-s from "The Damnation of Faust" Rimsky-Korsakov's "Scheherazade." Loeffler was the soloist in his own Mr. Kneisel played the solos in Rimsky-Korsakov music.

st why violinists, who are none too supplied with material, do not ex-e this piece is a subject for wonder. not one of Mr. Loeffler's loftiest ions, but it is distinctly good violin-and grateful for the soloist. It is in movements, preamble, "Eclogue" classic view of the composer already-acteristic) and "Carnival des Mortes." finale is a set of brilliant variations de "Dies Irae." The composition is in melody, color and effective orches-on. It is crowded with difficulties perhaps in these days might be rude-shed aside by Brahmins as a virtuoso-but since violinists persistently rm compositions which have only ical disp! y to recommend them, Divertimento of Loeffler, which is also music, might be worth at least one ing. It is not necessary to descant the merits of the composer's better n works. They deserve to enjoy a period of active life. They possess iduality and musical beauty of a high [W. J. Henderson in The Sun

Added To Loeffler's Wreath

For His Sev-
New York
His

Trans.

SOME years
when; dates
Whiting,
scholar and cal party. It was The debutante was a group of songs. Occasion ing's studio. About in the room. The dull glow of lamp

veil of fragrant
the songs were composer of the high priest of the Paris, read with by Paul Veriaine were made. Then

Francis Rogers
Whiting played the poser of the songs
gato. After the
to us we had an tion beer, sandy smoke. Then we
the songs were su
intermission that
to his brother.
Loeffler has some
them have not."

And that was many of them yet
there are dullards
who do not know
are celebrations
Charles Martin L.
Biblical three so been dwelling for seclusion of his h
but Boston, which
at the first desk
beside Franz Kne
of his den and tu
approbation upon

What Walter Damrosch said was the pith of the whole matter. Loeffler is one of the composers who was developed under the spread of the Debussy influence over music. Loeffler's art is inconceivable except as part of the beginning of the modernist advance. But it is none the less strikingly original and distinguished by certain qualities of imaginative creation and by aristocracy of style. Loeffler, the reflective, introspective and highly cultivated man, the student of Vergil and Horace, the lover of long nature-vistas and of the thoughts of men, speaks in every work, whether it be the "Death of Tintagiles," the "Pagan Poem" or the "Villanelle du Diable."

It is fitting that this musician should be honored by his fellows. He has lived in this country many years and is a citizen of the United States. He was born and studied abroad, but he is thoroughly Americanized. He is at any rate the foremost composer in this country. More than that, he is one of the foremost composers of his time. The world of music, not only here but across the seas, has reason to be proud of him. [W. J. Henderson in The Sun]

At three score and ten, Charles Martin Tornov Loeffler still tends assiduously the fires he kindled many years ago upon the altars of the Muses. His latest composition, "Evocation," composed especially for the opening of Severance Hall in Cleveland, has just had a first performance in the Ohio city. An interview in Musical America tells of the enthusiasm of the septuagenarian for all kinds of music, jazz and "hyperprisms" included. The score composed for Cleveland makes use of three saxophones. When the violoncellos sound weak that is the help they need, avers this classicist. Or is he a romanticist? Or an impressionist?

Placing Loeffler has been one of the most perplexing tasks of those who have had to write about him. Is his music in any sense American? Born in Alsace, is he, by inspiration and derivation, still French? Are there Russian, Irish or Spanish influences asserting themselves alongside modal recollections of a world of monks and plain-song? Or, after all, is his kinship to Parker, Chadwick and others of the dwindling New England school a little closer than has been recognized?

Through all these conjectures Loeffler retains a distinct musical personality. Last Thursday, in observance of the composer's seventieth anniversary, Bernardino Molinari gave "A Pagan Poem" the place of honor on his Philharmonic program. As chamber music, the work dates back some thirty years; as music for orchestra, it is a quarter of a century old. It sounds as personal today, as his equality as it possesses, could evolved from the slave-rider antiquity but for the remarkable developments coming between, the Ages."

Years Now Bear Him Witness

Gilman Plaits The Birthday Wreath

McIlwain remarked at the time in dealing with slavery in the poem, the desirous, and es one must try to trace the condition, a merging of ideas into something different. This general movement of the music is enough—the flux of ideas corresponding to the noble and sweeping in life and thought is one beauty, its sorcerous art. Particularly which one has and honors, known as a considering, or other fund to his art; whose life government.

on Then on about all these institutions most vitally concerned the middle ages was the question. Were they institutions of nature or were they not? It came a historical question. The nature depended upon the intensely practical question because it involved the of all these institutions. I according to nature should. Should they be tolerated? obey the rules of law by ere enforced? This was not a question.

whole history of political fessor McIlwain asserted questions older than those the status of the slave ended the institution, prold be allowed to define it came from his notion of equality, for him, meant not an absolute equivalence proportional equality was in the fact that men are can be equivalent in vir the view which the early adopted.

two of three things about the speaker declared referred to repeat the cur about all men having by me status, and at the same the practical effort to equally enjoyed it. At the the theory of Aristotle been forgotten almost ere still discussing the ol renuously as in the time whether human institution only conventional, but fev of slavery is one of thos chamber, in listening to the Thessalian the enchantress sick one occasion Mr. Loeffler was not soloist, but composer. This was at ourth concert of the twelfth season e orchestra in New York. It was in etropolitan Opera House. The pro- comprised Beethoven's "Egmont" ure, Mr. Loeffler's Divertimento for and orchestra, Mrs. Beach's "Gael- symphony, the customary three ex- from "The Damnation of Faust" on of its quiet simplicity, its devotion, to the modest per- beautiful things, to the shap- and individual excellence [The Herald Tribune] important number on the Charles Martin Loeffler's The composition is no our concert halls, but it was evening for a special purpose. the most eminent composer this country with the possible Rakhmaninov, was seventy on Jan. 30 and his composition. It is crowded with difficulties perhaps in these days might be rudeshed aside by Brahmins as a virtuoso- but since violinists persistently rm compositions which have only ical disp! y to recommend them, Divertimento of Loeffler, which is also music, might be worth at least one ing. It is not necessary to descant the merits of the composer's better n works. They deserve to enjoy a period of active life. They possess iduality and musical beauty of a high [W. J. Henderson in The Sun]

Symphony Orchestra has history. Older concert-

will recall the seasons when at the two desks sat Kneisel and Loeffler, Adamowski and Otto Roth, all of appeared at various times as soloists at concerts of the organization. one occasion Mr. Loeffler was not soloist, but composer. This was at ourth concert of the twelfth season e orchestra in New York. It was in etropolitan Opera House. The pro- comprised Beethoven's "Egmont" ure, Mr. Loeffler's Divertimento for and orchestra, Mrs. Beach's "Gael- symphony, the customary three ex- from "The Damnation of Faust" on of its quiet simplicity, its devotion, to the modest per- beautiful things, to the shap- and individual excellence [The Herald Tribune]

st why violinists, who are none too supplied with material, do not ex- e this piece is a subject for wonder. not one of Mr. Loeffler's loftiest ons, but it is distinctly good violin- and grateful for the soloist. It is in movements, preamble, "Eclogue" classic view of the composer already eteristic) and "Carnival des Morts." finale is a set of brilliant variations ne "Dies Irae." The composition is in melody, color and effective orches- on. It is crowded with difficulties perhaps in these days might be rudeshed aside by Brahmins as a virtuoso- but since violinists persistently rm compositions which have only ical disp! y to recommend them, Divertimento of Loeffler, which is also music, might be worth at least one ing. It is not necessary to descant the merits of the composer's better n works. They deserve to enjoy a period of active life. They possess iduality and musical beauty of a high [W. J. Henderson in The Sun]

Added To Lo Wrea

For His Sev
New York I
His

Trans.

SOME years
when; dates
Whiting,
scholar and cal party. It wa

The debutante was a group of songs.

ing's studio. Abo

in the room. Th

dull glow of lamp

veil of fragrant

the songs were

composer of the high priest of th

Paris, read with e

by Paul Verlaine

were made. Then

Francis Rogers

Whiting played t

poser of the songs

gato. After the g

to us we had an

tion beer, sand

smoke. Then we

the songs were su

intermission that

to his brother:

Loeffler has som

them have not."

And that was

many of them y

there are dullards

who do not know

are celebrations

Charles Martin L

Biblical three so

been dwelling fo

seclusion of his h

but Boston, whic

at the first desk

beside Franz Kne

of his den and tu

approbation upon

What Walter Damrosch said was the with of the whole ma composers who spread of the D music. Loeffler cept as part of ernist advance.
strikingly origi certain qualities and by aristocra reflective, intros vated man, the s ace, the lover of the thoughts o work, whether i giles," the "Pag nelle du Diable."
It is fitting t be honored by in this country zen of the Unit and studied ab Americanized.
foremost compo than that, he is posers of his ti not only here b son to be proud son in the Sun

Occasion
At three score
Tornov Loeffler
the fires he upon the alta latest composi posed especially ance Hall in C first performan interview in M enthusiasm of t kinds of music included. The land makes u
When the violon
the help they r
Or is he a roma ist?

Placing Loeff
most perplexing had to write ab any sense Amer
he, by inspirat
French? Are Spanish influen alongside moda of monks and all, is his kins and others of th school a little cl nized?

Through all retains a distin
Last Thursday
poser's seventie dino Molinari g place of honor gram. As cham back some thi orchestra, it is old. It sounds as personal today, as his later music. Its line is too bold for it to be lumped with so-called Debussyan im pressionism, whatever the Debussyan in fluences to be noted in its chord structure.

Nor can the heritage of "Tristan," which Loeffler here shares with all the modern world, be construed as identifying this music as in any valid sense Wagnerian.
If there is a tie to Saint-Saëns in pas sages of more elementary coloring, this music leaves that worthy far behind when it spreads its wings. D'Indy, per haps? But for us d'Indy is dryer, more austere, less fluid. Straussian this music is not at all; and it is equally far from the once prevalent flood of diluted Brahms. If Loeffler is, indeed, a French composer, he is one whom America has every reason to be proud it has natura lized. No other living figure in the coun try's musical life has written as much that has worn as well. [The Evening
Post

And Again
The Philharmonic Society gave a birthday party Thursday evening at Carnegie Hall in honor of Charles Martin Loeffler, who was seventy years old on the thirtieth of last month; but the guest of honor did not appear to ac knowledge the plaudits (and several "bravos") which followed the perform ance by the orchestra of his "Pagan Poem," and so the audience had to con tent itself with recognizing the power and beauty of the music.
When the "Pagan Poem" was intro duced here almost a quarter-century ago it seemed to many a cryptic and baffling score, forbidding by reason of harmonies that then seemed strange and, to some, wayward and unephonious. But time and public susceptibility eventually catch up with genius that thinks in advance of its period, and they have caught up with Loeffler and his music.
The "Pagan Poem" seems today a model of clear and intelligible and wholly logical harmony (as to some it did from the first)—harmony that is used as the fitting and eloquent expression of the composer's individuality. We have caught up with the idiom which now seems only a little less transparent and familiar than that of Debussy, with whose style it developed concurrently.
And what a rich flowering of melodic beauty this score contains! No music yet composed in America can equal it for abundance and fervor and distinction of lyric speech—a lyric speech that is both enriched and subtilized by an extraordi nary art of counterpoint. The scholarly craftsman, the masterly polyphonist, is doubled here by the dramatizing poet, the rhapsodist of high and curious imagination.

Seventy Years Now Bear Him Witness

Lawrence Gilman Plaits The Birthday Wreath

We need not remember, in listening to this native masterpiece, the Thessalian girl of Virgil's poem, the desirous and forsaken woman, the enchantress sick with love, chanting her urgent songs; we may forget the strange and stirring imagery of the poem that inspired the composer. The music is enough—the music, with its noble and sweeping passion, its rare beauty, its sorcerous art. As for Loeffler himself, he is today full of years and honors, known as a musician who has never cheapened or exploited himself or his art; whose life has been a model for artists of every kind by reason of its quiet simplicity, its dignity, its devotion to the modest perfecting of beautiful things, to the shaping of a choice and individual excellence of the spirit. [The Herald Tribune will recall the seasons when at the two desks sat Kneisel and Loeffler, Adamowski and Otto Roth, all of whom appeared at various times as soloists at concerts of the organization. One occasion Mr. Loeffler was not soloist, but composer. This was at the fourth concert of the twelfth season of the orchestra in New York. It was in the Metropolitan Opera House. The program comprised Beethoven's "Egmont" and orchestra, Mrs. Beach's "Gaelic Symphony," the customary three excerpts from "The Damnation of Faust," Rimsky-Korsakov's "Scheherazade," and orchestra. Mr. Loeffler was the soloist in his own piece, the "Pagan Poem." Mr. Kneisel played the solos in the Rimsky-Korsakov music.

At why violinists, who are none too supplied with material, do not expect this piece is a subject for wonder. It is not one of Mr. Loeffler's loftiest compositions, but it is distinctly good violin and grateful for the soloist. It is in movements, preamble, "Eclogue" (characteristic) and "Carnival des Morts." The composition is a set of brilliant variations in melody, color and effective orchestration. It is crowded with difficulties perhaps in these days might be rudely brushed aside by Brahmins as a virtuoso's arm compositions which have only a technical display to recommend them. Divertimento of Loeffler, which is also music, might be worth at least one hearing. It is not necessary to descant the merits of the composer's better works. They deserve to enjoy a period of active life. They possess individuality and musical beauty of a high order. [W. J. Henderson in The Sun

For the Record

The other important number on the program was Charles Martin Loeffler's "Pagan Poem." The composition is no stranger to our concert halls, but it was played last evening for a special purpose. Mr. Loeffler, the most eminent composer resident in this country with the possible exception of Rakhmaninov, was seventy years of age on Jan. 30 and his composition was presented in celebration of the day. Mr. Molinari had made a thorough study of the score and conducted it with immense earnestness and moving results. The tone-poem sent forth once again its proclamation of the visions of Virgil, whose birthday was honored not long ago. The audience applauded the music with an enthusiasm astonishing after so long a session. [The Sun

More Memories

The Boston Symphony Orchestra has a remarkable history. Older concert

Added To Loe Wrea

For His Sev
New York
His

Trans.

SOME years
when; dates
Whiting,
scholar and cal party. It was
The debutante was

a group of songs. Occasion
ing's studio. About in the room. The dull glow of lamp
veil of fragrant
the songs were composer of the high priest of the Paris, read with e
by Paul Verlaine
were made. Then

Francis Rogers
Whiting played t
poser of the songs
gato. After the g
to us we had an tion beer, sandy smoke. Then we
the songs were su
intermission that
to his brother:
Loeffler has some
them have not."

And that was many of them y
there are dullards
who do not know
are celebrations
Charles Martin L
Biblical three se
been dwelling fo
seclusion of his h
but Boston, which
at the first desk
beside Franz Kne
of his den and tu
approbation upon

What Walter Damrosch said was the pith of the whole matter. Loeffler is too bold for it to be lumped with so-called Debussyan impressionism, whatever the Debussyan influences to be noted in its chord structure. Nor can the heritage of "Tristan," which Loeffler here shares with all the modern world, be construed as identifying this music as in any valid sense Wagnerian. If there is a tie to Saint-Saëns in passages of more elementary coloring, this music leaves that worthy far behind when it spreads its wings. D'Indy, perhaps? But for us d'Indy is dryer, more austere, less fluid. Straussian this music is not at all; and it is equally far from the once prevalent flood of diluted Brahms. If Loeffler is, indeed, a French composer, he is one whom America has every reason to be proud it has naturalized. No other living figure in the country's musical life has written as much that has worn as well. [The Evening Post]

And Again
The Philharmonic Society gave a birthday party Thursday evening at Carnegie Hall in honor of Charles Martin Loeffler, who was seventy years old on the thirtieth of last month; but the guest of honor did not appear to acknowledge the plaudits (and several "bravos!") which followed the performance by the orchestra of his "Pagan Poem," and so the audience had to content itself with recognizing the power and beauty of the music.

When the "Pagan Poem" was introduced here almost a quarter-century ago it seemed to many a cryptic and baffling score, forbidding by reason of harmonies that then seemed strange and, to some, wayward and uncouth. But time and public susceptibility eventually caught up with genius that thinks in advance of its period, and they have caught up with Loeffler and his music.

The "Pagan Poem" seems today a model of clear and intelligible and wholly logical harmony (as to some it did from the first)—harmony that is used as the fitting and eloquent expression of the composer's individuality. We have caught up with the idiom which now seems only a little less transparent and familiar than that of Debussy, with whose style it developed concurrently. And what a rich flowering of melodic beauty this score contains! No music yet composed in America can equal it for abundance and fervor and distinction of lyric speech—a lyric speech that is both enriched and subtilized by an extraordinary art of counterpoint. The scholarly craftsman, the masterly polyphonist, is doubled here by the dramatizing poet, the rhapsodist of high and curious imagination.

Through all retains a distinctness of last Thursday, the composer's seventieth birthday, when Loeffler was placed of honor beside Franz Kneisel. As chamber orchestra, it is old. It sounds as personal today, as his

Seventy Years Now Bear Him Witness

Lawrence Gilman Plaits The Birthday Wreath

We need not remember, in this native masterpiece, the girl of Virgil's poem, the forsaken woman, the enchantress with love, chanting her urgent may forget the strange and imagery of the poem that in composer. The music is er music, with its noble and passion, its rare beauty, its sor As for Loeffler himself, he full of years and honors, kr musician who has never che exploited himself or his art; has been a model for artist kind by reason of its quiet str dignity, its devotion to the rfecting of beautiful things, to ing of a choice and individual aced of the spirit. [The Herald T

For the Record

The other important number program was Charles Martin Loeffler's "Pagan Poem." The composer, stranger to our concert halls, played last evening for a special Mr. Loeffler, the most eminent resident in this country with exception of Rakhmaninov, years of age on Jan. 30 and was presented in celebration. Mr. Molinari had made study of the score and conducted with immense earnestness and mo The tone-poem sent forth or proclamation of the vision whose birthday was honored ago. The audience applauded with an enthusiasm astonishing long a session. [The Sun

More Memories

The Boston Symphony Orchestra has a remarkable history. Ol goers will recall the seasons when at the first two desks sat Kneisel and Loeffler, Tim Adamowski and Otto Roth, all of whom appeared at various times as solo-artists at concerts of the organization. On one occasion Mr. Loeffler was not only soloist, but composer. This was at the fourth concert of the twelfth season of the orchestra in New York. It was in the Metropolitan Opera House. The program comprised Beethoven's "Egmont" overture, Mr. Loeffler's Divertimento for violin and orchestra, Mrs. Beach's "Gaelic" symphony, the customary three excerpts from "The Damnation of Faust" and Rimsky-Korsakov's "Scheherazade." Mr. Loeffler was the soloist in his own work. Mr. Kneisel played the solos in the Rimsky-Korsakov music.

Just why violinists, who are none too well supplied with material, do not examine this piece is a subject for wonder. It is not one of Mr. Loeffler's loftiest creations, but it is distinctly good violin-stuff and grateful for the soloist. It is in three movements, preamble, "Eclogue" (the classic view of the composer already characteristic) and "Carnival des Morts." This finale is a set of brilliant variations on the "Dies Irae." The composition is rich in melody, color and effective orchestration. It is crowded with difficulties and perhaps in these days might be rudely pushed aside by Brahmins as a virtuoso-piece, but since violinists persistently perform compositions which have only technical display to recommend them, this Divertimento of Loeffler, which is also good music, might be worth at least one hearing. It is not necessary to descant upon the merits of the composer's better known works. They deserve to enjoy a long period of active life. They possess individuality and musical beauty of a high order. [W. J. Henderson in The Sun their nameless land a generation after their composer set them there; as his pagan Sorceress still sings to us her amorous, incantatory songs? Perhaps. Criticism has naught to do with prophecy. Yet we may wonder.

The musical idiom of Loeffler is not that of today—a grave disadvantage which it shares with the idioms of Debussy, Brahms, Wagner, Schubert, Beethoven, Mozart, Bach, Monteverdi and other ancients. Yet, oddly enough, it remains an apt and expressive vehicle of beauty and eloquence and distinguished musical thought.

It remains, too, a curiously personal possession. There is no music quite like this, with its fineness of fiber, its uncompromising distinction, its blended subtlety and passion. Loeffler is sui generis; he is still, as Mr. Carl Engel once happily called him, "that rare and comforting thing in life and art—a perfect anomaly."

Often in Loeffler's music we are brought close to immemorial things—to sorrow and loveliness and transport and faith and the haunted destiny of man, his terrors and fantasies and dreams; so that we may find ourselves wondering if this is not, perhaps, art of the sort that can afford to be indifferent to the hues of time.

LAWRENCE GILMAN

grand seigneur, and is inclined to address the wench as if she were his worshipped lady, the veritable Dulcinea del Toboso.

Loeffler's field of reference (barring his tentative dalliance with Jazzerella), is remote from the preoccupations of our day. Music and musicians have traveled far from the time when composers were addicted to symphonic poems, and chose for their subjects doomed and piteous children, velled hand-maidens and sinister dread Queens, Sorceresses out of Virgil, wind among Celtic reeds, the deathlessness of Helen. Composers no longer write symphonic poems, or, if they do, they go for their subjects to regions far removed from those nameless lands "in the strange years of legends" that yielded such music as Loeffler's. They go to the football field, or the railroad yard, or the steel-mill—which is all very well, and quite as it should be; though one may be tempted to ask if the drop-kick or the locomotive or the foundry have yet given us any music that shows signs of enduring vitality. Will Honegger's "Pacific, 231" still be snorting and pounding through the symphonic night thirty years after it was written, as Loeffler's Xgraine and Tintagiles still cry to us from the darkness of

If Charles Martin Loeffler at seventy is not, musically speaking, the First Citizen of Massachusetts, at least he seems so to many among those who observe that Commonwealth from a distance. It is almost half a century since Loeffler came to America (the French ship "Le Canada" brought him to New York from Havre in July, 1881); and during most of that half-century he has been conspicuously associated with the musical life of Boston. He joined the Symphony Orchestra in the season of 1882-83, and remained a member of the organization for two decades. He became an American citizen in 1887. Since his retirement to Medfield, he has continued, in his reluctant and self-challenging way, to add to his output as a creative artist; and whatever he has put forth has redounded to the honor of musical art as practised in the land of his adoption. Long ago he was ranked by the discerning as the most individual and in many ways the most remarkable music-maker in America. He is still a solitary figure, salient, aloof, autonomous—a composer extraordinary for his purity of intention, his distinction of thought, his choiceness of procedure. He is among the aristocrats of musical style. Even when he pays brief court to Jazzerella, he cannot quite dissemble the

Sixteenth Programme

FRIDAY AFTERNOON, FEBRUARY 20, at 2.30 o'clock

SATURDAY EVENING, FEBRUARY 21, at 8.15 o'clock

Handel . . . Concerto Grosso for String Orchestra, Op. 6, No. 6, G minor
Larghetto e affetuoso—Allegro ma non troppo; Musette; Allegro; Allegro.

Stravinsky . . . "Symphonie de Psalms," for Orchestra with Chorus
I. Psalm XXXVIII Verses 13 and 14.
II. Psalm XXXIX Verses 2, 3 and 4.
III. Psalm CL (Entire).
CECILIA SOCIETY CHORUS (Arthur Fiedler, Conductor)

Berlioz . . . Symphonie Fantastique, in C major, Op. 14A
I. Dreams, Passions.
Largo: Allegro agitato e appassionato assai.
II. A Ball.
Waltz: Allegro non troppo.
III. Scene in the Meadows.
Adagio.
IV. March to the Scaffold.
Allegretto non troppo.
V. A Witches' Sabbath.
Larghetto: Allegro.

STEINWAY PIANOS

There will be an intermission after Stravinsky's "Symphonie de Psalms"

Information on the Bach Festival will be found on page 1131.

IF Charles Martin Loeffler at seventy is not, musically speaking, the First Citizen of Massachusetts, at least he seems so to many among those who observe that Commonwealth from a distance. It is almost half a century since Loeffler came to America (the French ship "Le Canada" brought him to New York from Havre in July, 1881); and during most of that half-century he has been conspicuously associated with the musical life of Boston. He joined the Symphony Orchestra in the season of 1882-83, and remained a member of the organization for two decades. He became an American citizen in 1887. Since his retirement to Medfield, he has continued, in his reluctant and self-challenging way, to add to his output as a creative artist; and whatever he has put forth has redounded to the honor of musical art as practised in the land of his adoption. Long ago he was ranked by the discerning as the most individual and in many ways the most remarkable music-maker in America. He is still a solitary figure, salient, aloof, autonomous—a composer extraordinary for his purity of intention, his distinction of thought, his choiceness of procedure. He is among the artists of musical style. Even when he pays brief court to Jazzerella, he cannot quite dissemble the grand seigneur, and is inclined to address the wench as if she were his worshipped lady, the veritable Dulcinea del Toboso.

Loeffler's field of reference (barring his tentative dalliance with Jazzerella), is remote from the preoccupations of our day. Music and musicians have traveled far from the time when composers were addicted to symphonic poems, and chose for their subjects doomed and piteous children, velled hand-maidens and sinister dread Queens, Sorceresses out of Virgil, wind among Celtic reeds, the deathlessness of Helen. Composers no longer write symphonic poems, or, if they do, they go for their subjects to regions far removed from those nameless lands "in the strange years of legends" that yielded such music as Loeffler's. They go to the football field, or the railroad yard, or the steel-mill—which is all very well, and quite as it should be; though one may be tempted to ask if the drop-kick or the locomotive or the foundry have yet given us any music that shows signs of enduring vitality. Will Honegger's "Pacific, 231" still be sporting and pounding through the symphonic night thirty years after it was written, as Loeffler's Xgraine and Tintarella still cry to us from the darkness of their nameless land a generation after their composer set them there; as his pagan Sorceress still sings to us her amorous, incantatory songs? Perhaps. Criticism has naught to do with prophecy. Yet we may wonder.

The musical idiom of Loeffler is not that of today—a grave disadvantage which it shares with the idioms of Debussy, Brahms, Wagner, Schubert, Beethoven, Mozart, Bach, Monteverdi and other ancients. Yet, oddly enough, it remains an apt and expressive vehicle of beauty and eloquence and distinguished musical thought.

It remains, too, a curiously personal possession. There is no music quite like this, with its fineness of fiber, its uncompromising distinction, its blended subtlety and passion. Loeffler is sui generis: he is still, as Mr. Carl Engel once happily called him, "that rare and comforting thing in life and art—a perfect anomaly."

Often in Loeffler's music we are brought close to immemorial things—to sorrow and loveliness and transport and faith and the haunted destiny of man, his terrors and fantasies and dreams; so that we may find ourselves wondering if this is not, perhaps, art of the sort that can afford to be indifferent to the hues of time.

LAWRENCE GILMAN

Sixteenth Programme

FRIDAY AFTERNOON, FEBRUARY 20, at 2.30 o'clock

SATURDAY EVENING, FEBRUARY 21, at 8.15 o'clock

Handel Concerto Grosso for String Orchestra, Op. 6, No. 6, G minor
Larghetto e affetuoso—Allegro ma non troppo; Musette; Allegro; Allegro.

Stravinsky "Symphonie de Psaumes," for Orchestra with Chorus
I. Psalm XXXVIII Verses 13 and 14.
II. Psalm XXXIX Verses 2, 3 and 4.
III. Psalm CL (Entire).
CECILIA SOCIETY CHORUS (Arthur Fiedler, Conductor)

Berlioz Symphonie Fantastique, in C major, Op. 14A
I. Dreams, Passions.
Largo: Allegro agitato e appassionato assai.
II. A Ball.
Waltz: Allegro non troppo.
III. Scene in the Meadows.
Adagio.
IV. March to the Scaffold.
Allegretto non troppo.
V. A Witches' Sabbath.
Larghetto: Allegro.

STEINWAY PIANOS

There will be an intermission after Stravinsky's "Symphonie de Psaumes"

Information on the Bach Festival will be found on page 1131.

Berlioz

Arthur Fiedler

MUSIC

SYMPHONY CONCERT

By PHILIP HALE
The Boston Symphony orchestra, Dr.

Koussevitzky, conductor, gave the 16th concert of its 50th season yesterday afternoon in Symphony hall. The program was as follows: Handel, Concerto Grosso for string orchestra, G minor, op 6 No 6; Stravinsky, "Symphonie de Psaumes" for orchestra and chorus (Cecilia Society, Arthur Fiedler, its conductor); Berlioz, Symphonie Fantastique.

Seldom has anything more beautiful been heard in Symphony hall than the latter half of Stravinsky's 150th psalm as it was performed yesterday. Seldom has there been a more dramatic performance of any work than that of the "Fantastic" symphony as it was interpreted by Dr. Koussevitzky and played by Boston's superb orchestra. Much might be said about the two works themselves: Stravinsky's Three Psalms composed in 1930 for the orchestra's jubilee; the symphony of Berlioz, composed in 1830 and first performed in that year.

When one remembers that Beethoven had died only a few years before Berlioz wrote his symphony; that Schubert also had died; that Schumann and Wagner were not known as composers; one must regard this audacious work of Berlioz as nothing less than marvelous. No predecessor had given him hints for orchestration; he invented his own system; he thought and wrote orchestrally. Liszt, Meyerbeer, Wagner, Strauss, the Russian school, in fact the musical world of the last century is indebted deeply to Hector Berlioz. Without him all would have been sadly at a loss.

Yet it is the fashion today in some quarters to sneer at his harmonic schemes, to say that his melodic vein is thin and feeble. The Oxford crowd in its supercilious way speak flippantly of him; even in New York, the young lions of the press put him in the ranks of the impotent. The English philistines have met a valiant champion of Berlioz in no less a critic than Ernest Newman.

Another charge brought against Berlioz is that he was hysterically romantic. When he wrote this symphony, it was in a romantic period. The leading poets, novelists, dramatists, painters of France were then all wildly romantic. What we now decry as unaesthetic exaggeration was in the air. Not till his blood had cooled did Berlioz join classicists with his Virgilian opera "Les Troyens." In the 30's his passion also influenced his art. One may smile in this age of machinery at the frantic love of Berlioz for the Irish actress; at the program of the "Fantastic" symphony, written when he was not 27 years old; but there's no denying the genius shown in this work, the genius that has kept this music alive in spite of a few cheap or arid pages; for there is the imagination, the poetic sensitiveness that we rightly associate with genius. If one would gladly shorten the "Scene in the Fields" what is to be said against that masterpiece the "March to the Scaffold," with its haunting, nightmarish rhythm, its ghostly chatter of the bassoons, its mocking shouts of brass? Or who does not find beauty in the first movement, brilliance in the second, and a demoniacal spirit in the Finale?

Mr. Newman has wisely said that the harmonies of Berlioz suited exactly his aims; that however strange they may seem on paper, they are justified when they are heard. As for the charge of failure as a melodist, there are the songs; there is the pathetic air of Marguerite in "The Damnation of Faust"; the "Farewell of the Shepherds" in "The Childhood of Christ"; the grand arias in "Les Troyens."

Stravinsky's "Psalms," the third in order still seems to be the most musical, the most original in treatment. There are fine moments in the two preceding, but the orchestral portion at times is labored and unnatural, not in the spirit of the text; often at war with the choral expression and warring without justification. But the third Psalm is an answer to those who say that Stravinsky is now merely a man of patterns and rhythms; a man whose inspiration has fled, not to return.

The concert will be repeated tonight. The program of next week as announced comprises the Prelude to the second act of Chabrier's "Gwendoline"; Hill's new symphony (first time); Beethoven's Violin concerto (Mr. Heifetz, violinist) and the overture to "Egmont."

TWO SYMPHONIES AT SYMPHONY CONCERT

Berlioz' "Fantastic" and Stravinsky's New Work

Dr Koussevitzky put two symphonies on yesterday's Symphony concert program, Stravinsky's new "Symphonie de Psalmes," first performed earlier this season, and Berlioz' "Fantastic," a masterpiece too seldom heard of late years. To these he prefixed an unfamiliar and very dull Handel concerto grosso. This program was one of the longest and one of the most taxing to the listener's attention, that one can recall. It was not over until 4:40.

The repetition of Stravinsky's masterpiece was welcome. A second hearing convinced one that this symphony of psalms will remain in the repertory and grow upon the listener with familiarity. Yesterday's applause was longer and more hearty than that at the first performance last December. Both the chorus, from the Cecilia Society, and the orchestra surpassed their achievement at the premiere. Yesterday the intricate score was more clearly and more brilliantly interpreted than before.

Those who still deem Stravinsky a clever poseur, a mere juggler with rhythms and orchestral timbres, should listen to the last movement of this symphony, one of the noblest hymns of praise ever written. Its great emotional power comes from its melody and harmony. Here is none of the ostentation of the 19th century type of apotheosis, ending in a blare of sound and fury. This music is more noisy than Mozart's "Requiem" and quite as impressive.

His Own Language

The first two movements are as original, but again at a second hearing one cannot quite grasp them as a whole, either imaginatively or intellectually. Stravinsky throughout this symphony is speaking his own musical language, with no attempt at neo-classicism, or at daring cleverness.

What he is saying seems as new as his means of expression. One can catch bits of his meaning, but not his whole argument. This is not program music, but absolute music, as independent of nonmusical phenomena as is Mozart's work.

Berlioz wrote the symphony heard yesterday over a century ago, but writers about music still fail to agree about its qualities. Everyone concedes the uncanny cleverness of the scoring for orchestra, but to some the harmony is amateurish, the melody nonexistent, the technique crude. To others, including the writer, Berlioz is one of the few 19th-century composers whose music has gained rather than lost in attractiveness in the past 20 years. It is hard to believe this "Fantastic Symphony" was written in 1830, so much in it anticipates the later work of Wagner, even that of Debussy, even Stravinsky.

19th Century Melody

A tune to the average 19th century writer was a luscious and obvious thing. Most 19th century melody after Beethoven and Schubert was headed straight for the kind of thing it ended in, say, Massenet's "Elegie." Most musicians today are weary of Massenet's "Elegie." Some even grow weary of Schumann and Chopin and Liszt. But Berlioz' melody might be that of a contemporary of Honegger. His workmanship as a writer for orchestra is notably superior to that of so able a present day technician as Respighi. His music still stirs the pulse, still touches the heart, despite the absence of polyphonic texture, and the romantic overemphasis of every mood.

Berlioz was, however, a genuine romantic, as readers of his memoirs, one of the most interesting books ever written by a musician, do not need to be reminded. He was all his life a surexcited dreamer, always on the heights or in the depths, never calm, not even in old age. His music in its fever of passion expresses the man himself, and not the artistic fashions of the Parisian 1830s.

Yesterday's performance of the Berlioz was an unusually eloquent and sympathetic one, brilliant in the best sense of a much abused adjective. One wishes Dr Koussevitzky would revive other symphonies, say the "Harold in Italy" of Berlioz.

Conductor and Orchestra at Full Stature

Stravinsky's Summit in the Psalms — Berlioz as He Imagined Himself

Jan. 21. — Feb. 21. 1931

IT IS a year of anniversaries at the Symphony Concerts. The orchestra has been marking its own jubilee with a repetition of its first pair of concerts under its first conductor; with the intermittent performance of commissioned works. There are additional rites to come. Not until next May, possibly, will they all be fulfilled. Into the midst of things careless time chose to drop other anniversaries. At mid-January Mozart passed his one hundred seventy-fifth birthday. Performances of his Symphony in G minor noted it. A fortnight later Mr. Loeffler was seventy years old. A week ago half a program fell to him, with his fellow townsmen standing at salute. On the fifth day of December in 1830, Berlioz' Fantastic Symphony was born into the Parisian world. Dr. Koussevitzky would signalize its century of existence in the active repertory of many orchestras. Yesterday he found opportunity. The piece filled the second half of the longest Symphony Concert within recollection. It continued through nearly an hour. At the end of the March to the Scaffold came a burst of irrepressible clapping. At the close of the whole Symphony the audience forgot the speedy exit customary on Fridays; lingered obstinately until orchestra as well as conductor had received its plaudits. True, there were noticeable departures at the pause midway—after the "Scene in the Fields." Even so, there was no questioning the pervasive interest and pleasure.

In the fifty years of the Symphony Orchestra the Fantastic Symphony has been played at fourteen pairs of concerts. No longer ago than 1920, it was repeated, "by general request," at a second pair in the same season. In the time of Dr. Muck, who disliked it, though he was quite willing to play the super-romantic Liszt, it fell out of the repertory for Witzky has not useful Berlioz autumn of 1925. Lonable and in "Fantastic" is in Bostonian public good that visit. Only recurs in subscribing aud. ires overtures like Mr. Wein. and then even place. By the that this consual audience in the records at "Harold" oz' storm-ridden the onlooker scans the pro. philosophical, ring of the Fan. impulse and obably unaware, eternal in stress, Smithson, s and frenzies believed he had 30 are indeed Nor does it read and the emo- er the vast and by chance or h he also com-d down and Parisians cele- and see, first the Romantics Who knows? To us Americans ay be waiting l we take thema machine age. ong comes the romantic past C Berlioz—their seem, for the ad a Bostonian substance. ly through an concert-hall per- h unmistakable moment. Bee declined into fifty years the walking gentle- is been steadily before "Her- n—we have been receive the veri- rodomontade; at ould evoke; to classicism. It is sed his roman- survives in the in New York, the indictment scitated "Har- rants, the per- in Symphony cannot invent stic Symphony It loses the way his present or- as it crosses d often enough

He imagined the Fantastic he felt, as the agined and be- ; but no sooner asic-paper. Of images and sen- draw from a an he was frus- ifestly, it does himself burning ing and trans- n the outcome is an, on a for- lis counterpoint the self-deceiv- erile. Even his articulate. Dr. which tradition- more precious vindled and hol- n his ability to rearsal or avinsky. s open before flood on which is his insight, intensifies his

ce. Their ark, convention, is t to hear the indifferently as beloved and Hernani! in the Fantastic Sym- vention. It is as we survey "Wagner or the ardanapalus" it Strauss. The Who now reads t to salon mel- Byron, unless yesterday, as it task; or pulls whole music, when he has an orchestra do- ks? By all the eorchestra do- viui, so snaped and colored it, so

TWO SYMPHONIES AT SYMPHONY CONCERT

Berlioz' "Fantastic" and Stravinsky's New Work

Dr Koussevitzky put two symphonies on yesterday's Symphony concert program, Stravinsky's new "Symphonie des Psaumes," first performed earlier this season, and Berlioz' "Fantastic," a masterpiece too seldom heard of late years. To these he prefixed an unfamiliar and very dull Handel concerto grosso. This program was one of the longest and one of the most taxing to the listener's attention, that one can recall. It was not over until 4:40.

The repetition of Stravinsky's masterpiece was welcome. A second hearing convinced one that this symphony of psalms will remain in the repertory and grow upon the listener with familiarity. Yesterdays applause was longer and more hearty than that at the first performance last December. Both the chorus, from the Cecilia Society, and the orchestra surpassed their achievement at the premiere. Yesterday the intricate score was more clearly and more brilliantly interpreted than before.

Those who still deem Stravinsky a clever poseur, a mere juggler with rhythms and orchestral timbres, should listen to the last movement of this symphony, one of the noblest hymns of praise ever written. Its great emotional power comes from its melody and harmony. Here is none of the ostentation of the 19th century type of apotheosis, ending in a blare of sound and fury. This music is more noisy than Mozart's "Requiem" and quite as impressive.

His Own Language

The first two movements are as original, but again at a second hearing one cannot quite grasp them as a whole, either imaginatively or intellectually. Stravinsky throughout this symphony is speaking his own musical language, with no attempt at neo-classicism, or at daring cleverness.

What he is saying seems as new as his means of expression. One can catch bits of his meaning, but not his whole argument. This is not program music, but absolute music, as independent of nonmusical phenomena as is Mozart's work.

Berlioz wrote the symphony heard yesterday over a century ago, but writers about music still fail to agree about its qualities. Berlioz's music is the uncanny cleverness of scoring for orchestra, but his harmony is amateurish, non-existent, the technique of others, including the 19th century composers whose music has been lost in attractiveness. It is hard to believe that Berlioz wrote "Fantastic Symphony" in 1830, so much in it is the later work of Wagner and Debussy, even Stravinsky.

19th Century Melody

A tune to the average 19th century writer was a luscious thing. Most 19th century melody is straight for the kind of thing it is, say, Massenet's "Elegie." Musicians today are weary of Schumann and Chopin. Liszt. But Berlioz' melody is that of a contemporary of Beethoven. His workmanship as a writer of music is notably superior to that of a present day technician. His music still has a pulse, still touches the heart, the absence of polyphonic texture, the romantic overemphasis on mood.

Berlioz was, however, a romantic, as readers of his music of the most interesting kind. He was written by a musician, do not be reminded. He was all in a surexalted dreamer, always heights or in the depths, not even in old age. His fever of passion expressed himself, and not the artist of the Parisian 1830s.

Yesterday's performance of Berlioz was an unusually sympathetic one, brilliant in sense of a much abused word. It wishes Dr Koussevitzky to play other symphonies, say the "Italy" of Berlioz.

Situations Wanted

Situations Wanted

ACCOUNTANT. Married man, experience in accounting, office management, legal advice. Address C.K.L., Transcript, Boston.

ACCOUNTANT-AUDITOR with business experience wishes to join progressive firm; excellent references. U.S.E. Transcript, Boston.

ACCOUNTANT - BOOKKEEPER in manufacturing, corporation or office management, financial statement, three years' public accounting. Address Transcript, Boston.

BUTLER, chef, steward, man who really appreciates good food, willing, trustworthy, highly recommended. Tel. GRA 1-1000. Address P.N.E. Transcript, Boston.

BUTLER, first-class in every way, and good references, desires to go any distance. Address DELL, 255 Newbury Street, Boston 4660.

CARETAKERS—(married couple) man highly recommends, in charge of country club; wife a man good waiter. Address Transcript, Boston.

CHAUFFEUR. Summer position, chauffeur who has been with years. He will be free for all March to September, during my absence. Unqualified recommendation. HAN YER. Tel. HAN cock 2500. (sm)SM101.

CHAUFFEUR—Efficient and experienced chauffeur of many years, available at once; communication appointments made by the MA BILE OPERATORS' ASSOCIATION, 100 Newbury St., Boston. Tel. COM 1-1000. (sm)61 (2502L).

CHAUFFEUR. Desire to place 12 years; expert driver, honest, willing; go anywhere; employer. Mr. DILL, HAY market, J. HAGER, 179 High St., Boston 8504-W.

CHAUFFEUR. I wish to place who has given me complete satisfaction; five years; good driver and worker; neat and pleasant appearance. Address V.M.A., Transcript, Boston.

CHAUFFEUR desires position; 15 years in last position; can go anywhere; best of references. B.L.F. Transcript, Boston.

CHAUFFEUR. Business man, young man to seek position; best references. Address H.H.N. Boston.

CHAUFFEUR, house work, 12 years last situation. H.K.M., Transcript, Boston.

CHAUFFEUR—Experienced, willing to be generally useful, saddle horses. Address P.N.E. Transcript, Boston.

nine years. Dr. Koussevitzky has not returned to it since the autumn of 1925. None the less, "The Fantastic" is in good standing with the Bostonian public of symphonic music—so good that visiting conductors, with no subscribing audience, have ventured it, like Mr. Weingartner within long memory.

It is difficult to believe that this continuing audience is versed in the records and the legends of Berlioz' storm-ridden twenties. Except as it scans the program-book at each re-hearing of the Fantastic Symphony, it is probably unaware of his amours with the actress, Smithson, or of the retaliation he believed he had wrought into his music. Nor does it read in his letters and discover the vast and frenetic design in which he also composed it. Last year the Parisians celebrated the centenary of the Romantics of 1830 in all the arts. To us Americans they are less known and we take them less seriously. But along comes the Fantastic Symphony of Berlioz—their spokesman in music—and a Bostonian audience listens intently through an hour; then applauds with unmistakable emotion.

Now through all these fifty years the reputation of Berlioz has been steadily undermined. In his youth—we have been told—he wrote romantic melodrama; at maturity affected a pale classicism. It is the early Berlioz who survives in the concert-hall and there—the indictment continues—he poses and rants, the perpetual barnstormer. He cannot invent a melody; or if he does, it loses the way and dies of exhaustion as it crosses instrumental waste-lands. He imagined this, that and the other; he felt, as the French say, énormément; but no sooner would he transfer these images and sensations to music-paper than he was frustrated. He believes himself burning with white or red flame; in the outcome is only bathetic or lurid. His counterpoint is enep; his harmony sterile. Even his orchestral voices, with which traditionally he excelled, have dwindled and hollowed in these days of Strauss and Ravel, Rimsky-Korsakov and Stravinsky.

Finally, the romantic flood on which the Parisian generation of 1830 floated to fame, receded long since. Their ark, which was the romantic convention, is now derelict. We ought to hear the Fantastic Symphony as indifferently as we sit before Hugo's "Hernani" in the theater or as detachedly as we survey Delacroix's "Death of Sardanapalus" in a memorial exhibition. Who now reads the narrative poems of Byron, unless they are set as college task; or pulls down the poetry of Hugo when he has an evening among his books? By all the one's will, so snaped and colored it, so

TWO SYMPHONIES AT SYMPHONY CONCERT

Berlioz' "Fantastic" and Stravinsky's New Work

Globe Feb. 21, 1931.
Dr Koussevitzky put two symphonies on yesterday's Symphony concert program, Stravinsky's new "Symphonie des Psaumes," first performed earlier this season, and Berlioz' "Fantastic," a masterpiece too seldom heard of late years. To these he prefixed an unfamiliar and very dull Handel concerto grosso. This program was one of the longest and one of the most taxing to the listener's attention, that one can recall. It was not over until 4:40.

The repetition of Stravinsky's masterpiece was welcome. A second hearing convinced one that this symphony of psalms will remain in the repertory and grow upon the listener with familiarity. Yesterday's applause was longer and more hearty than that at the first performance last December. Both the chorus, from the Cecilia Society, and the orchestra surpassed their achievement at the premiere. Yesterday the intricate score was more clearly and more brilliantly interpreted than before.

Those who still deem Stravinsky a clever poseur, a mere juggler with rhythms and orchestral timbres, should listen to the last movement of this symphony, one of the noblest hymns of praise ever written. Its great emotional power comes from its melody and harmony. Here is none of the ostentation of the 19th century type of apotheosis, ending in a blare of sound and fury. This music is more noisy than Mozart's "Requiem" and quite as impressive.

His Own Language

The first two movements are as original, but again at a second hearing one cannot quite grasp them as a whole, either imaginatively or intellectually. Stravinsky throughout this symphony is speaking his own musical language, with no attempt at neo-classicism, or at daring cleverness.

What he is saying seems as new as his means of expression. One can catch bits of his meaning, but not his whole argument. This is not program music, but absolute music, as independent of nonmusical phenomena as is Mozart's work.

Berlioz wrote the symphony heard

yesterday over a century ago, but writers about music still fail to agree about its qualities. Berlioz's music is one of the few 19th century composers whose music has not lost in attractiveness 20 years. It is hard to believe that in 1830, so much in it later work of Wagner and Debussy, even Stravinsky.

19th Century Melody

A tune to the average writer was a luscious thing. Most 19th century composers, including Beethoven and Schubert, straight for the kind of melody, in, say, Massenet's "Elegie." Musicians today are weary of Schumann and Liszt. But Berlioz' melody is that of a contemporary of his. His workmanship as a writer of music for orchestra is notably superior to so able a present day composer as Respighi. His music, with its pulse, still touches the heart, the absence of polyphony and the romantic overemphasis on mood.

Berlioz was, however, a romantic, as readers of his music of the most interesting kind written by a musician, do not be reminded. He was a surexalted dreamer, always heights or in the depths, not even in old age. His fever of passion expressed himself, and not the artist of the Parisian 1830s.

Yesterday's performance of Berlioz was an unusually sympathetic one, brilliant sense of a much abused composer wishes Dr Koussevitzky to other symphonies, say the "Italy" of Berlioz.

CHAUFFEUR would like position; experience; 10 years in last place K.M.M. Transcript, Boston. (sm)6t

CHAUFFEUR AND GENERAL (tant); 15 years' experience in grade cars, careful city driver; eight position. 15 Cameron st., Brookline (sm)SW

CHAUFFEUR-GENERAL, married, age 20, best references; reasonable go anywhere; good mechanic. Call evenings. (sm)N

CHAUFFEUR-HOUSEMAN desires private family; 12 years' experience; careful driver; excellent references. MID dlesex 5026-W. (sm)6t

CHAUFFEUR-MECHANIC, young man; 5 years' experience as private chauffeur; well versed in work experienced with high-grade cars; driver; low wages no object; excellent Tel. LIB erty 6339, or address D. script, Boston. (sm)N

COLLEGE MAN, middle age, tactful; needs work, preferably mechanical; active, healthy; married, D. anywhere; references. Address M. script, Boston. (sm)N

COMPANION to wealthy person; young man; willing to do any must be exceptional. Address of 413 Columbus ave. (sm)6t

COOK-BUTLER and general; Young Japanese; with private good chauffeur; A-1 references. Ad 191 Main st., Charlestown, Mass. (sm)2t

COOK, HOUSEWORKER, experienced man, with good references, private family. ASP inwall 4857. (sm)N

ELECTRICIAN, licensed, 13 years' first class work, have tools. 5544. (sm)N

EXECUTIVE'S ASSISTANT—You 3 years' experience desires position to executive; tactful and assuming responsibility; accurate college graduate. Address O.D.M. Boston. (sm)N

GARDENER 20 years, experienced house, garden and landscape work and trustworthy; go anywhere. JOE BACH, Green St., Ashland, Mass. (sm)6t

GARDENER, American, married, child; life experience; well re Address L.O.A., Transcript, Boston. (sm)12t

GARDENER, single, would like private estate. Good references. F.A.E. Transcript, Boston. (sm)N

GENERAL HOUSEMAN, gardener, unmarried, hard worker, best 20 years' experience in all kinds of work. Tel. MYS tic 5017 or address Transcript, Boston. (sm)N

HERDSMAN or farm superintendent position where results count; college trained, experienced all producing grade A milk, construct etc.; very best references as to ability. Address E.E.T., Transcript. (sm)6t

JANITOR, HOUSEMAN or general Scotchman, 45, wants a position around house and garden; D. references. WILLIAM DAVIES, 1 st. COM monwealth 8547. (sm)N

LANDSCAPE GARDENER desires with architect or on private estate to take charge. Address O.E.E. Boston. (sm)N

CHAUFFEUR willing to be generally useful; address D.U.I. 1st. (sm)N exercises of reason the youthful Berlioz ought to be equally unfashionable and in disuse.

Yet the Fantastic Symphony recurs in the concert-hall; two or three overtures keep it company; now and then even "Harold in Italy" gains place. By the customary signs, the usual audience hears them gladly; even at "Harold" neither balks nor grins. If the onlooker chooses to be abstract and philosophical, he may say that romantic impulse and romantic sensibility linger eternal in human nature. The fervors and frenzies of the romanticists of 1830 are indeed relegated to the mental and the emotional garret; but when by chance or design they are fetched down and paraded again, we hear and see, first interested, then stirred. Who knows? A romantic renaissance may be waiting around the corner, even in a machine age. Meanwhile ghosts of the romantic past haunt the premises; may seem, for the instant, less shades than substance.

In the theater and the concert-hall performance may bring that moment. Before the Comédie-Française declined into a house of mistresses and walking gentlemen, it was possible to sit before "Hernani" or "Ruy Blas" and receive the veritable illusion that Hugo would evoke; to know the thrill that traversed his romantic time. Not so long ago in New York, Mr. Toscanini almost resuscitated "Harold in Italy." Yesterday, in Symphony Hall, we heard the Fantastic Symphony of Dr. Koussevitzky and his present orchestra; while out of it, and often enough to be engrossing, emerged the Fantastic Symphony that Berlioz imagined and believed he had put on music-paper. Of course, no conductor can draw from a piece of music what, manifestly, it does not contain; but by conjuring and transmitting imagination he can, on a fortunate day, release what the self-deceiving composer left semi-articulate. Dr. Koussevitzky has no more precious or triumphant quality than his ability to believe to the utmost, at rehearsal or performance, in the pages open before him. That faith sharpens his insight, warms his imagination, intensifies his imparting powers.

Berlioz' "idée fixe"—the motif that symbolizes the haunting beloved and therefore haunts the whole Fantastic Symphony—is no remarkable invention. It is paltry beside the motifs of Wagner or the more significant themes of Strauss. The scornful may even liken it to salon melody. Yet as it emerged yesterday, as it wandered through the whole music, Dr. Koussevitzky, and the orchestra doing his will, so shaped and colored it, so prepared its entrances and returns, so manipulated Berlioz' counterpoint—as in the waltz at the ball—that it gained tonal vitality and seldom failed of illusion. Berlioz' "Dreams and Passions" are obviously neither Beethoven's nor Brahms's; but they have their own quality of romantic restlessness, tossing no-whither, tortured by they know not what. From Berlioz' measures, the divining conductor drew it. Persuading himself that he was Berlioz' haunted lover, Dr. Koussevitzky made the waltz sound sensuously, from afar, upon a trembling air—which is to give it romantic voice.

A hundred years on, in this our particular time, the meditative Scene in the Fields seems over-long and overwrought. Call more or less of it, if the listener likes, romantic elaboration, hollow within. By these very tokens, it is next of kin to the long, decorative, furrowed speeches in Hugo's dramas. (Remember Charles V. before the tomb of Charlemagne in "Hernani"). Such music, such poetry, has reason in its rhetoric, by that rhetoric lives. It must be declaimed, not spoken; in the actor or the conductor is its final and compelling being. Dr. Koussevitzky manipulated this third movement elaborately; sung it rhetorically. Throughout it was alive again.

Conductor and orchestra must agree wholeheartedly to the tonal spectacle of the March to Execution, the frenetic fantasy and parody of the Witches' Sabbath. Doubt them for a moment, and thereafter performance only shams. But launch them as so much melodrama in tones and they prevail. When the brass travesties the "Dies Irae," Berlioz believed he was blaspheming. Such music is not intended to make sense. It is designed and written as pure sensation. Dr. Koussevitzky took Berlioz at his word; went him better, and hearing was near to believing. There is no other way in these days. Berlioz must be acted, staged, infused and intensified with an artful rhetoric. He must be performed as an act of faith. Then he speaks with his own voice; moves in his own image; sounds and illudes upon an audience seized and possessed.

It was indeed an afternoon of the unexpected. To the repertory of the string choir, Dr. Koussevitzky added a Concerto Grosso of Handel, hitherto unheard "at these concerts"—Number Six, in G minor, of Opus 9, in the usual five movements. Anticipation ran easily: a or Overture; ng in the deep d, warmly felt s of running joint. Instead, almost wholly roven against l and accented, od. To it suc- contrast. Next eing the dance austere, brood- sic, forswearing e march. and rather me- like an after- form and fulfill eighteenth-cen- or Handel that ents he had ex- ae end of the emingly a per- him, to be re- faced counter- had put by his e string choir, , gave him the A puzzled audi-

promised repeti- of Stravinsky's to be conveyed le performance the Schola Can- stra was recon- s according to the Mr. Sanromá ace at the two ided the chorus. therefore more diatonic periods. tudious listener singular and in- second division; motifs that fill n the third; bet- frame, the close- d pungent voice The seeker for anew the op- somber course. accents of the suspensive prog- pansion of the ie favor and the pulse of the fer- hat suffuses the . Hearing, the career added a s of "Le Sacre," f which is to say mphony" repeti- H. T. P.

SYMPHONY CONCERT VERY LONG

Handel, Stravinsky
and Berlioz Make Up List

Post Feb. 21, 1931
BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

The Symphony Concert of yesterday afternoon was one of the longest of recent seasons. Yet there have been many that offered more music in the narrower sense of the term. Only the Concerto Grosso of Handel, No. 6 in G minor, with which the afternoon began, gave the listener 100 cents on the musical dollar.

ANOTHER CENTENNIAL

But two other pieces made this generous programme: the one, Stravinsky's "Symphony of Psalms," composed for the present golden jubilee year of the Symphony Orchestra and first performed here last December; the other, Berlioz's "Fantastic Symphony," which reached its 100th birthday on the fifth of the same month and was played yesterday in somewhat belated commemoration of that anniversary.

A second hearing of Stravinsky's so-called Symphony clarified certain impressions and resulted in a much more satisfactory performance by the chorus of the Cecilia Society of the generally ungrateful measures that fell to its lot. To be fair to the composer, this re-hearing did bring to light certain striking effects that at first either went unheeded or were speedily forgotten. But it did not efface the conviction prompted by the first performance that this music is the work of an enormously clever man who was once a genius.

If Stravinsky had written as rewardingly for the voices as he has for the instruments, the work would afford more consistent pleasure. But the choral writing is too often not merely dissonant, but muddy and unsonorous. The play of timbres that make linear counter-point and atonal and polytonal writing effective for the orchestra does not operate, at least in the same degree, in the case of the chorus.

The most successful parts of the work are the first movement, which has a certain primitive strength, the orchestral introduction to the second, which conveys a far more definite emotion than does the succeeding choral part, and the last half of the third movement. But here, as was observed in these columns before, Stravinsky's music reminds us of the finale that one Giacomo Puccini contrived for the first act of his opera "Tosca."

Berlioz's Music Fades

None can take away from Berlioz the glory that is his for having invented, perhaps created is the better word, the modern art and science of orchestration. That the "Fantastic" should have come upon the world when it did seems today more than ever incredible. But alas, while Berlioz's command of orchestral resources at that distant day still causes us to gasp and stare, his music has faded sadly. There are persuasive pages in the first section, pages of genuine tonal poetry. The ensuing dance-scene is brilliant and alluring—as a whole, by far the strongest movement of the five. The "Scene in the Fields" is as empty of musical interest as it is long drawn out, the "March to the Scaffold" no longer sends shivers down our backs and the "Witches' Sabbath" has dwindled into a flat and tasteless racket.

Conductor and orchestra labored valiantly with the Symphony yesterday and were rewarded by warm and long continued applause on the part of those members of the audience who had not departed discouraged after the third movement.

Music

Monitor Feb. 21, 1931
Boston Symphony Orchestra

The "Fantastic" Symphony of Hector Berlioz holds an important place in the history of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. It stood upon the program that Friday afternoon, now nearly 11 years ago, when the "strike" was precipitated that for a time threatened the existence of the orchestra. Do not misunderstand; it was not Berlioz's music that caused the strike of a majority of the players. They walked out in sympathy with the then

Would
ower

prepared its entrances and manipulated Berlioz' counter the waltz at the ball—that nal vitality and seldom failed Berlioz' "Dreams and Passi- viously neither Beethoven's but they have their own g mantic restlessness, tossing tortured by they know From Berlioz' measures, conductor drew it. Persua that he was Berlioz' haun- Koussevitzky made the walt- suously, from afar, upon a tr which is to give it romantic

A hundred years on, particular time, the meditat the Fields seems over-long wrought. Call more or less listener likes, romantic elat low within. By these very, next of kin to the long, de- belowed speeches in Hug (Remember Charles V. before Charlemagne in "Hernani"). such poetry, has reason in by that rhetoric lives. It claimed, not spoken; in the conductor is its final and being. Dr. Koussevitzky this third movement elabor it rhetorically. Throughout again.

Conductor and orchestra whole-heartedly to the tonal the March to Execution, the tasy and parody of the W bath. Doubt them for a m thereafter performance only launch them as so much m tones and they prevail. Whe travesties the "Dies Irae," lieved he was blaspheming. is not intended to make sens signed and written as pure se Koussevitzky took Berlioz a went him better, and hearing believing. There is no other v days. Berlioz must be acted fused and intensified with rhetoric. He must be perfo act of faith. Then he spea own voice; moves in his c sounds and illudes upon a seized and possessed.

It was indeed an afternoon expected. To the repertory o choir, Dr. Koussevitzky ad- certo Grosso of Handel, h heard "at these concerts"—N in G minor, of Opus 9, in th movements. Anticipation rai stately, sonorous Preludium or Overture; a slow movement unfolding in the deep curve of amply fashioned, warmly felt melody; quick movements of running figures or lively counterpoint. Instead, came a first movement, almost wholly contrapuntal, strand woven against strand; restlessly phrased and accented, grave and troubled of mood. To it suc- ceeded a terse fugue of contrast. Next an extended Musette belieing the dance that named it; again an austere, brood- ing, closely wrought music, forswearing rich melody and propulsive march.

For ending, two brief and rather me- chanical Allegros, added, like an after- thought, to round out a form and fulfill the expectation of an eighteenth-cen- tury audience. Enough for Handel that in the first three movements he had ex- pressed himself: with the end of the Musette was done. Seemingly a per- turbed mood had beset him, to be re- leased in this hard-surfaced counter- point. Self-absorbed, he had put by his usual expansiveness. The string choir, used oftenest as a whole, gave him the edgy power he asked. A puzzled audi- ence applauded meagerly.

Middle piece was the promised repeti- tion, from last December, of Stravinsky's "Psalms-Symphony," soon to be conveyed to New York for double performance there with the chorus of the Schola Can- torum. Again, the orchestra was recon- stituted and reseated according to the composer's prescriptions. Mr. Sanromá and Mr. Fiedler took place at the two pianos. The Cecilia provided the chorus, more confident, and therefore more spirited, with their long diatonic periods. Under repetition, the studious listener grasped more clearly the singular and in- tricate fugue in the second division; heard plain the arrayed motifs that fill the orchestral interlude in the third; bet- ter perceived the sinewy frame, the close- knit texture, the lean and pungent voice of the whole music. The seeker for æsthetic sensations felt anew the op- pressed atmosphere, the somber course, the straining, sharpening accents of the Psalm of petition; the suspensive prog- ress, the sonorous expansion of the Psalm that foretells divine favor and the new song; the glow and pulse of the fer- vor, deep and mystical that suffuses the final praises into beauty. Hearing, the measurer of Stravinsky's career added a third summit to the peaks of "Le Sacre," and "Oedipus Rex." All of which is to say that with the "Psalms-Symphony" repeti- tion is confirmation. H. T. P.

SYMPHONY CONCERT VERY LONG

Handel, Stravinsky
and Berlioz Make Up List

Post Feb. 21, 1931
BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

The Symphony Concert of yester- day afternoon was one of the longest of recent seasons. Yet there have been many that offered more music in the narrower sense of the term. Only the Concerto Grosso of Handel, No. 6 in G minor, with which the after- noon began, gave the listener 100 cents on the musical dollar.

ANOTHER CENTENNIAL

But two other pieces made this gen- erous programme: the one, Stravinsky's "Symphony of Psalms," composed for the present golden jubilee year of the Symphony Orchestra and first per- formed here last December; the other, Berlioz's "Fantastic Symphony," which reached its 100th birthday on the fifth of the same month and was played yesterday in somewhat belated com- memoration of that anniversary.

A second hearing of Stravinsky's so- called Symphony clarified certain im- pressions and resulted in a much more satisfactory performance by the chorus of the Cecilia Society of the generally ungrateful measures that fell to its lot. To be fair to the composer, this re- hearing did bring to light certain strik- ing effects that at first either went un- heeded or were speedily forgotten. But it did not efface the conviction prompt- ed by the first performance that this music is the work of an enormously clever man who was once a genius.

If Stravinsky had written as reward- ingly for the voices as he has for the instruments, the work would afford more consistent pleasure. But the choral writing is too often not merely dissonant, but muddy and unsonorous. The play of timbres that make linear counter-point and atonal and polytonal writing effective for the orchestra does not operate, at least in the same degree, in the case of the chorus.

The most successful parts of the work are the first movement, which has a certain primitive strength, the orchestral introduction to the second, which con- vey a far more definite emotion than does the succeeding choral part, and the last half of the third movement. But here, as was observed in these columns before, Stravinsky's music re- minds us of the finale that one Glucio Puccini contrived for the first act of his opera "Tosca."

Berlioz's Music Fades

None can take away from Berlioz the glory that is his for having in- vented, perhaps created is the better word, the modern art and science of orchestration. That the "Fantastic" should have come upon the world when it did seems today more than ever in- credible. But alas, while Berlioz's com- mand of orchestral resources at that distant day still causes us to gasp and stare, his music has faded sadly. There are persuasive pages in the first sec- tion, pages of genuine tonal poetry. The ensuing dance-scene is brilliant and alluring—as a whole, by far the strong- est movement of the five. The "Scene in the Fields" is as empty of musical in- terest as it is long drawn out, the "March to the Scaffold" no longer sends shivers down our backs and the "Witches' Sabbath" has dwindled into a flat and tasteless racket.

Conductor and orchestra labored valiantly with the Symphony yesterday and were rewarded by warm and long continued applause on the part of those members of the audience who had not departed discouraged after the third movement.

Music

Monitor Feb. 21, 1931
Boston Symphony Orchestra

The "Fantastic" Symphony of Hec- tor Berlioz holds an important place in the history of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. It stood upon the program that Friday afternoon, now nearly 11 years ago, when the "strike" was precipitated that for a time threat- ened the existence of the orchestra. Do not misunderstand; it was not Berlioz's music that caused the strike of a majority of the players. They walked out in sympathy with the then concertmaster, who was dismissed on the technical ground that he had refused to obey Pierre Monteux's signal to the orchestra to rise and share the applause for an excellent performance of the "Fantastic."

For this reason, and because the score is a century old, and because controversy over the merits of its composer has been raging in Europe recently, and because Dr. Koussevitzky excels in riding the musical tempest, it was a pleasure to see this symphony restored to the active list for the concerts of Feb. 20 and 21. Now that memories have been revived, and curiosities satisfied, we shall not repine if the score is put back on the shelf for a long rest.

For the important thing about the "Fantastic" Symphony is that it is 100 years old. When it was first performed, as Mr. Hale's program notes reminded us, Beethoven and Schubert had only recently passed on, Schumann had just obtained his mother's permission to study music, Verdi was a student at Busseto, César Franck was eight years old, Wagner was studying at Leipzig, and Brahms and Tchaikovsky were unborn. Therefore, though we smile at the composer's naive extravagances, his absurd theatricalities and his banal musical material, let us not fail to marvel at the genius which enabled him to blaze the way for modern orchestration and for the symphonic poem. Perhaps this symphony should be played only in a musical equivalent of Mr. Morley's lamented Old Rialto Theater, Hoboken; or perhaps it should be kept in the museum or the classroom. Nevertheless, but for its author, it is unlikely that Liszt, Rimsky-Korsakoff or Strauss could have accomplished what they did. Conductor and orchestra did all they could for the piece, and won for themselves a generous reward of applause from an audience that had been kept in its seats half an hour longer than usual.

In 2031 will paragraphs like the above be written about Stravinsky's "Symphonie de Psaumes," for orchestra with chorus, one of the Boston Orchestra's jubilee presents, which was heard for the second time this season? We hope not, because a second hearing tended to confirm our first impression that it is among the more individual and characteristic works of its composer, ranking no doubt below the "Sacre" and the "Noces," but probably above the "Edipus Rex." The Cecilia Society Chorus (trained by Arthur Fiedler) and the orchestra distinguished themselves in the performance.

That imp of overstraining which always lurks at Dr. Koussevitzky's elbow again got control of his baton in the Handel Concerto Grosso in G minor, op. 6, no. 6, and obtained from this fine body of players some very ragged entries and a negation of the flow which belongs to Handelian music.

L. A. S.

Statue—Seventy-Five

Nearly thirty years ago, when the old Music Hall was abandoned as concert-room, the statue of Beethoven that had long stood at the back of the stage in front of the organ was removed to the New England Conservatory. There it was re-erected at the entrance into Jordan Hall from Huntington Avenue, in a much traversed corridor. Seventy-five years ago, on March 1, 1856, the statue—a gift from Charles C. Perkins—was unveiled in the Music Hall. To mark the anniversary, the Conservatory has arranged informal exercises next Tuesday afternoon at three o'clock in Jordan Hall. Professor Hill of Harvard will then say a word about Beethoven. The Conservatory Orchestra, with Mr. Goodrich conducting, will play the slow movement from the Ninth Symphony and the Overture to Goethe's "Egmont."

Seventeenth Programme

FRIDAY AFTERNOON, FEBRUARY 27, at 2.30 o'clock

SATURDAY EVENING, FEBRUARY 28, at 8.15 o'clock

Chabrier "Gwendoline," Entr'acte (Prelude to Act II)

Hill Symphony No. 2 in C major

- I. Moderato tranquillo e sostenuto.
- II. Scherzo molto vivace.
- III. Maestoso ma non troppo lento.
- IV. Allegro energico.

(First Performance)

Beethoven Concerto for Violin in D major, Op. 61

- I. Allegro ma non troppo.
- II. Larghetto.
- III. Rondo.

Beethoven Overture to Goethe's "Egmont," Op. 84

SOLOIST

JASCHA HEIFETZ

STEINWAY PIANO

There will be an intermission after the symphony

concertmaster, who was dismissed on the technical ground that he had refused to obey Pierre Monteux's signal to the orchestra to rise and share the applause for an excellent performance of the "Fantastic."

For this reason, and because the score is a century old, and because controversy over the merits of its composer has been raging in Europe recently, and because Dr. Koussevitzky excels in riding the musical tempest, it was a pleasure to see this symphony restored to the active list for the concerts of Feb. 20 and 21. Now that memories have been revived, and curiosities satisfied, we shall not repine if the score is put back on the shelf for a long rest.

For the important thing about the "Fantastic" Symphony is that it is 100 years old. When it was first performed, as Mr. Hale's program notes reminded us, Beethoven and Schubert had only recently passed on, Schumann had just obtained his mother's permission to study music, Verdi was a student at Busseto, César Franck was eight years old, Wagner was studying at Leipzig, and Brahms and Tchaikovsky were unborn. Therefore, though we smile at the composer's naive extravagances, his absurd theatricalities and his banal musical material, let us not fail to marvel at the genius which enabled him to blaze the way for modern orchestration and for the symphonic poem. Perhaps this symphony should be played only in a musical equivalent of Mr. Morley's lamented Old Rialto Theater, Hoboken; or perhaps it should be kept in the museum or the classroom. Nevertheless, but for its author, it is unlikely that Liszt, Rimsky-Korsakoff or Strauss could have accomplished what they did. Conductor and orchestra did all they could for the piece, and won for themselves a generous reward of applause from an audience that had been kept in its seats half an hour longer than usual.

In 2031 will paragraphs like the above be written about Stravinsky's "Symphonie de Psaumes," for orchestra with chorus, one of the Boston Orchestra's jubilee presents, which was heard for the second time this season? We hope not, because a second hearing tended to confirm our first impression that it is among the more individual and characteristic works of its composer, ranking no doubt below the "Sacre" and the "Noces," but probably above the "Oedipus Rex." The Cecilia Society Chorus (trained by Arthur Fiedler) and the orchestra distinguished themselves in the performance.

That imp of overstraining which always lurks at Dr. Koussevitzky's elbow again got control of his baton in the Handel Concerto Grosso in G minor, op. 6, no. 6, and obtained from this fine body of players some very ragged entries and a negation of the flow which belongs to Handelian music.

L. A. S.

Statue—Seventy-Five

Nearly thirty years ago, when the old Music Hall was abandoned as concert-room, the statue of Beethoven that had long stood at the back of the stage in front of the organ was removed to the New England Conservatory. There it was re-erected at the entrance into Jordan Hall from Huntington Avenue, in a much traversed corridor. Seventy-five years ago, on March 1, 1856, the statue—a gift from Charles C. Perkins—was unveiled in the Music Hall. To mark the anniversary, the Conservatory has arranged informal exercises next Tuesday afternoon at three o'clock in Jordan Hall. Professor Hill of Harvard will then say a word about Beethoven. The Conservatory Orchestra, with Mr. Goodrich conducting, will play the slow movement from the Ninth Symphony and the Overture to Goethe's "Egmont."

FIFTIETH SEASON, NINETEEN HUNDRED THIRTY AND THIRTY-ONE

Seventeenth Programme

FRIDAY AFTERNOON, FEBRUARY 27, at 2.30 o'clock

SATURDAY EVENING, FEBRUARY 28, at 8.15 o'clock

Chabrier "Gwendoline," Entr'acte (Prelude to Act II)

Hill Symphony No. 2 in C major

- I. Moderato tranquillo e sostenuto.
- II. Scherzo molto vivace.
- III. Maestoso ma non troppo lento.
- IV. Allegro energico.

(First Performance)

Beethoven Concerto for Violin in D major, Op. 61

- I. Allegro ma non troppo.
- II. Larghetto.
- III. Rondo.

Beethoven Overture to Goethe's "Egmont," Op. 84

SOLOIST

JASCHA HEIFETZ

STEINWAY PIANO

There will be an intermission after the symphony

HEIFETZ SYMPHONY SOLOIST

Reaches Heights in Beethoven's Concerto

Post Feb. 28, 1931

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

In days gone by, when assisting artists were the "regular thing" at the Symphony Concerts, the soloist, in the eyes of many, was the concert. The soloist today does not usurp the place that properly belongs to orchestra and conductor. Yet when he is an "eminence," he does, even in the enlightened present, tend to dominate the occasion.

HEIFETZ SERVES COMPOSER

Jascha Heifetz, violinist, in some respects without peer, appeared yesterday with the orchestra and there was no mistaking the air of impending excitement that hung over the hall immediately before his entrance. His playing was heeded as that of the orchestra alone is seldom heeded, and the applause at the end was of the sort bestowed on prima donnas.

In the meanwhile the cause of this furor, the centre of this adulation, bore himself with his usual quiet dignity. Mr. Heifetz's piece was the Concerto of Beethoven. He was there to serve the composer, if the audience was pleased, so much the better. And serve the composer Mr. Heifetz did, with a spirit humble, yet not abashed, in the presence of greatness and with all the skill that is his to command, with fine and true musicianship.

Violinist at Heights

For a time it seemed as though Mr. Heifetz was going to stop short of the highest rung on the violinistic ladder. When he played the Concerto of Brahms with the Symphony Orchestra a season or two ago, such forebodings were happily dispelled. It was then to be seen that Mr. Heifetz could rise, and magnificently, to an occasion. Yesterday he rose again, and conductor and players did not lag behind. Not since Mr. Kreisler and Dr. Muck between them brought about an ever-memorable performance of this same concerto many seasons ago had the piece so sounded in Symphony Hall. To write in detail of Mr. Heifetz's tone and technique would be an impertinence. They were means rather than end.

Mr. Heifetz did not play yesterday until after the intermission. Before the concerto, had come, for the first time under Dr. Koussevitzky's direction, the prelude to the second act of Chabrier's opera, "Gwendoline," and, for the first time anywhere, the Second Symphony of Edward Burlingame Hill. Beethoven's overture to "Egmont," in stirring performance, brought the close.

Was Dr. Koussevitzky's pace with Chabrier's music slower than that to which we were once accustomed? In any event he made the most of its richness of coloring, its warm and intense expressiveness.

Mr. Hill's Symphony

On first hearing, Mr. Hill's symphony seemed less individual, less salient in invention than its predecessor, which Dr. Koussevitzky has twice conducted here. There is mood and atmosphere in each of the four movements, pervadingly a grave and reflective mood that does not wholly disappear even in the Scherzo, a movement of much charm.

The great and enduring symphonies—and the last hundred years have produced few enough that deserve such characterization—have without exception been marked by striking thematic invention. And it is this that Mr. Hill's newest score, for all its wealth of pleasing detail, seems most to lack. The most arresting theme, at first blush, was the chief theme of the finale, but it was not to be felt, at least on one hearing, that the composer had made the most of its possibilities.

Present in the audience, Mr. Hill was brought to the platform by Dr. Koussevitzky, who had conducted his work eloquently, and there received the cordial plaudits of his fellow-townsmen.

HEIFETZ HEARD AT SYMPHONY CONCERT

Violinist Applauded in Beethoven Concerto

Globe — Feb. 28, 1931

Jascha Heifetz was the soloist at yesterday's Symphony concert. His playing in the Beethoven violin concerto was applauded with exceptional warmth not merely by the audience, but also by the members of the orchestra. The usually impassive demeanor of the celebrated virtuoso varied for a moment. His gratification at the applause from the orchestra was plain.

One can hardly blame him after experiencing it all his life, for accepting any amount of applause from any audience as the usual thing. A new symphony by Prof. E. B. Hill of Harvard, his second, performed for the first time in public won rather more applause than is given to most American compositions. The composer came on the stage to acknowledge it. Dr. Koussevitzky's program began with an entr'acte from Chabrier's "Gwendoline" and concluded with Beethoven's overture to "Egmont."

It was the Beethoven concerto in which Heifetz made his debut at the Boston Symphony concerts in 1919. To one who then heard him for the first time yesterday's repetition of the same piece offered an interesting chance to compare memories with actualities. In 1919 Heifetz played with the same astonishing technical facility, the same exquisite beauty of tone he still manifests at every appearance here. This generation has heard no other violinist equally gifted in these respects.

In 1919, however, his playing seemed superficial, musically considered. He then merely displayed his amazing virtuosity, exactly as though the concerto were by Vieuxtemps and not Beethoven.

Much Played Masterpiece

Yesterday's performance was far more mature, far more thoughtful. He has now worked out an individual interpretation of the much played masterpiece. He stresses its almost wistful lyricism, its romantic play of light and shade. He minimizes its classic serenity and vigor. For profound emotion, which some have revealed in this music, Heifetz substitutes tender sentiment, half veiled longing, sprightly graces. It is all very beautiful, but is it the true Beethoven? Dr. Koussevitzky and the orchestra, rather curiously, were not quite at their best in the orchestral accompaniment.

Mr. Hill explains in a program note that this C major symphony "has no descriptive background, no literary quotations appended."

"I find myself in sympathy with those of the younger generation who feel that music has enough intrinsic problems of its own without adding those of the other arts," he writes. "Also, I have kept to the traditional forms, thinking I had not had sufficient experience to experiment."

From this last remark some of the younger generation, not to mention their elders, might learn. For Mr. Hill, now in his 50s, has written a number of previous works for orchestra, most of them heard at Boston Symphony concerts.

Imaginative Power

One thought yesterday of the music of Prokofiev in listening to this symphony. Its graceful scherzo, placed by exception before the slow movement, recalled that composer's "Classical Symphony." The deliberate austerity, the intentional bareness verging on monotony of much in the other movements, the jagged rhythmic figures and harmonic clashes sedulously imposed on a musical substratum essentially conventional reminded one of the latest symphony by the clever Russian. Mr. Hill, unlike most of his musical generation, has changed with the musical times. He no longer models himself on Debussy, Ravel, and Faure.

This symphony did not yesterday impress one by its imaginative power. It was rather the good taste and the craftsmanship shown that struck the listener's mind. His heart remained unstirred.

Dr. Koussevitzky and the orchestra managed to make Chabrier's entr'acte sound less banal than it actually is. To make music appear better than it is, is a gift reserved to the greatest performers. Kreisler, for instance, can do it to perfection.

Their performance of the "Egmont" overture was much the best they have given that classic. It, like that of Chabrier's piece, demonstrated the great improvement achieved in recent seasons.

Old Concerto, New Symphony, Rare Fragment

Resurrection from Chabrier, Heifetz and Beethoven,
Mr. Hill Virtuoso

Times — Feb. 28, 1931

THOUGH the polite program-book makes no such distinction, an "assisting artist" is one thing at the Symphony Concerts, a "soloist" another. The "assisting artist" comes to serve the needs of a piece of music. Usually it is a "novelty" or a "revival." The conductor would include it in a pair of concerts. It contains a solo-part. No doubt, X, Y or Z would "get it up" for the sake of an appearance with a celebrated orchestra. He might even be interested in the piece for itself. X, Y or Z accepts the invitation—and the honorarium; plays the solo-part ably; if he is clear-minded, foresees his own fate. The discriminating will regard him as an accessory to the piece in hand, blending applause for him with applause for it and the composer. The casual may resent both and, subconsciously, let this distaste cool their warmth toward him. At best he is shackled to a task. He cannot soar through his own glories. He must be a very clear-minded virtuoso to count the piece and the occasion more important than himself.

Not so with the "soloist" in the full sense of the word. He also may come because the conductor desires to set a particular piece upon a program. Usually it is a classic Concerto, long familiar. Two audiences will listen to it as to a thing of custom; whereas they will hear the "soloist" as occasion for rare pleasure. They already know him as eminent hand upon violin or piano. Rightly enough, they believe him summoned that the given Concerto may shine anew in the radiance of his perfections. They will receive him as the whole house, yesterday, received Mr. Heifetz when he came to his place by the conductor's stand. The season through, for no "soloist"—not even for Mr. Gieseking—has there been such a burst of applause, so long, hearty and general. In five months, more rapt ears have not followed any piece played at these concerts. The first audience for this Violin-Concerto of Beethoven could have listened more intent. "Publicans and devotees of Mr. Heifetz" may be left to number the recalls and. As usual Dr. Koussevitzky is on the stage; but it is an old story to conductor, within memory at the Symphony Concerts, is so solicitous as to the orchestral part of a Concerto. As well, since he fuses the into a symphonic piece, yet not overclouds the "soloist."

poised Heifetz is an objective musician. He sees the music before him and whole; hears it in character. Even, in these middle years, pre-figures the violin as a songful instrument; for it and for his friend, Clementi, the Concerto. The so-called knocking may haunt the first movement; male may run away into crisp and exuberant phrase. Through-ly, however, it is the first concern of Heifetz to be songful. It is variously over the long Allegro. In the slow movement it sounds and transfigures melody. Not once through the whole Concerto did Mr. Heifetz depart from this clarity and pervading quality. As he plays them, the cadenzas—from his master—reiterated this quality. In the air of lyric innocence, the concerto contains exacting, even display-asures, as virtuoso-fiddling went in Mr. Heifetz took them so evenly, that the listener felt rather perceived—much less considered—mastery. It came and went as the vision of the passing moment.

Concerto is not a highly emotional music. The scale is less ambitious, spicing, the musical thought less the creative ardor less glowing they were to be in Beethoven's next to—"The Emperor" for the piano. It is not even the poetized conflict of orchestra and piano that perpetuates movement of the preceding Concerto in G major. Violin and orchestra play, sympathetically. They join in euphonies melting upon the or the orchestra sets in a luminous sound, stream-like, for the flowing. The "knocking" phrase animates, than troubles, the first movement. Ingressing Heifetz left room for than a thought of Dr. Koussevitzky's ability to every curve, accent and g. of his quick ear and instant hand every fusion or contrast of solo and tral parts; of a unanimity that together composer, conductor and st in a single voice and style.

in and orchestra are, indeed, embodied by Beethoven's will upon a single quest. They seek, all three, the which only music may compass convey. It is born in this Concerto external suggestion. It springs to inner emotional conflict. It is a attained passion for an ideal beauty ful sound in the particular voice of

HEIFETZ HEARD AT SYMPHONY CONCERT

Violinist Applauded in Beethoven Concerto

Globe — Feb. 29, 1931

Jascha Heifetz was the soloist at yesterday's Symphony concert. His playing in the Beethoven violin concerto was applauded with exceptional warmth not merely by the audience, but also by the members of the orchestra. The usually impassive demeanor of the celebrated virtuoso varied for a moment. His gratification at the applause from the orchestra was plain.

One can hardly blame him after experiencing it all his life, for accepting any amount of applause from any audience as the usual thing. A new symphony by Prof. E. B. Hill of Harvard, his second, performed for the first time in public won rather more applause than is given to most American compositions. The composer came on the stage to acknowledge it. Dr. Koussevitzky's program began with an entr'acte from Chabrier's "Gwendoline" and concluded with Beethoven's overture to "Egmont."

It was the Beethoven concerto in which Heifetz made his debut at the Boston Symphony concerts in 1919. To one who then heard him for the first time yesterday's repetition of the same piece offered an interesting chance to compare memories with actualities. In 1919 Heifetz played with the same astonishing technical facility, the same exquisite beauty of tone he still manifests at every appearance here. This generation has heard no other violinist equally gifted in these respects.

In 1919, however, his playing seemed superficial, musically considered. He then merely displayed his amazing virtuosity, exactly as though the concerto were by Vieuxtemps and not Beethoven.

Much Played Masterpiece

Yesterday's performance was far more mature, far more thoughtful. He has now worked out an individual interpretation of the much played masterpiece. He stresses its almost wistful lyricism, its romantic play of light and shade. He minimizes its classic serenity and vigor. For profound emotion, which some have revealed in this music, Heifetz substitutes tender sentiment, half veiled longing, sprightly graces. It is all very beautiful, but is it the true Beethoven? Dr. Koussevitzky and the orchestra, rather curiously, were not quite at their best in the orchestral accompaniment.

Mr. Hill explains in a program note that this C major symphony "has no descriptive background, no literary quotations appended."

"I find myself in sympathy with those of the younger generation who feel that music has enough intrinsic problems of its own without adding those of the other arts," he writes. "Also, I have kept to the traditional forms, thinking I had not had sufficient experience to experiment."

From this last remark some of the younger generation, not to mention their elders, might learn. For Mr. Hill, now in his 50s, has written a number of previous works for orchestra, most of them heard at Boston Symphony concerts.

Imaginative Power

One thought yesterday of the music of Prokofiev in listening to this symphony. Its graceful scherzo, placed by exception before the slow movement, recalled that composer's "Classical Symphony." The deliberate austerity, the intentional bareness verging on monotony of much in the other movements, the jagged rhythmic figures and harmonic clashes sedulously imposed on a musical substratum essentially conventional reminded one of the latest symphony by the clever Russian. Mr. Hill, unlike most of his musical generation, has changed with the musical times. He no longer models himself on Debussy, Ravel, and Faure.

This symphony did not yesterday impress one by its imaginative power. It was rather the good taste and the craftsmanship shown that struck the listener's mind. His heart remained unstirred.

Dr. Koussevitzky and the orchestra managed to make Chabrier's entr'acte sound less banal than it actually is. To make music appear better than it is, is a gift reserved to the greatest performers. Kreisler, for instance, can do it to perfection.

Their performance of the "Egmont" overture was much the best they have given that classic. It, like that of Chabrier's piece, demonstrated the great improvement achieved in recent seasons.

Old of all
New DI Ra N

Resurrect

Heifetz

Mr.

THANK

THOUGH book an angle thing a

a "soloist" comes a piece of m
"novelty" or now ductor would in certs. It contains X, Y or Z we sake of an appe orchestra. He in the piece for the invitation—plays the solo—minded, foresees criminating will sory to the piece
plause for him w.
both and, subcon taste cool their
At best he is sh cannot soar thro
He must be a very to count the piece important than his Not so with the sense of the word
because the conduct ticular piece upon it is a classic Co
Two audiences will thing of custom; w
the "soloist" as occ are. They already nent hand upon viol enough, they believe the given Concerto
the radiance of his pe receive him as the day, received Mr. Heifetz
to his place by the
The season through,
even for Mr. Giesek
such a burst of appl
and general. In five ears have not follow
at these concerts. Th
this Violin-Concerto

TOMO

Even

Mat

THEATRE

PLAYERS

POS

by H. M.

ndon & New

ERT PRESE

THE

R. SALLY

and Sat. M

day, received Mr. Heifetz

to his place by the

The season through,

even for Mr. Giesek

such a burst of appl

and general. In five

ears have not follow

at these concerts. Th

this Violin-Concerto

hardly have listened more intent. "Publicity counsellors" and devotees of Mr. Heifetz may be left to number the recalls at the end. As usual Dr. Koussevitzky forsook the stage; but it is an old story that no conductor, within memory at the Symphony Concerts, is so solicitous as he with the orchestral part of a Concerto. Felicitous as well, since he fuses the whole into a symphonic piece, yet not once overclouds the "soloist."

The poised Heifetz is an objective musician. He sees the music before him clear and whole; hears it in character. Beethoven, in these middle years, preferred the violin as a songful instrument; wrote for it and for his friend, Clementi, a lyric Concerto. The so-called knocking motif may haunt the first movement; the finale may run away into crisp rhythm and exuberant phrase. Throughout, however, it is the first concern of the violin to be songful. It is variously such over the long Allegro. In the slow division it sounds and transfigures melody. Not once through the whole Concerto did Mr. Heifetz depart from this particular and pervading quality. As he played them, the cadenzas—from his master, Auer—reiterated this quality. In spite of its air of lyric innocence, the Concerto contains exacting, even displayful, measures, as virtuoso-fiddling went in 1806. Mr. Heifetz took them so evenly, so easily, that the listener felt rather than perceived—much less considered—this mastery. It came and went as the impression of the passing moment.

The Concerto is not a highly emotionalized music. The scale is less ambitious and aspiring, the musical thought less deep, the creative ardor less glowing than they were to be in Beethoven's next Concerto—"The Emperor" for the piano. There is not even the poetized conflict of orchestra and piano that perpetuates the slow movement of the preceding Concerto in G major. Violin and orchestra go amiably, sympathetically. They join together in euphonies melting upon the ear. Or the orchestra sets in a luminous background, stream-like, for the flowing violin. The "knocking" phrase animates, rather than troubles, the first movement. The engrossing Heifetz left room for more than a thought of Dr. Koussevitzky's sensibility to every curve, accent and shading, of his quick ear and instant hand for every fusion or contrast of solo and orchestral parts; of a unanimity that bound together composer, conductor and violinist in a single voice and style.

Violin and orchestra are, indeed, embarked by Beethoven's will upon a single-hearted quest. They seek, all three, the beauty which only music may compass and convey. It is born in this Concerto of no external suggestion. It springs from no inner emotional conflict. It is a self-contained passion for an ideal beauty of songful sound in the particular voice of the violin. The Allegro gains it variously in a gentle fervor of creation. In the Larghetto the violin and the orchestra first speak it one to another; then the violin takes it to itself; carries it, as a bird wings upward, through the last ineffable measures. The orchestra recalls the violin to the light vigors of the finale; but through the interstices still plays that beauty in another phase.

Whatever the music, this disembodied beauty of sound, pellucid, unflawed, finely measured, is the essence of Mr. Heifetz's violin-playing. Yesterday he had only to join the beauty which he emanates to the kindred beauty which Beethoven would create. From first bar to last, the jointure was complete and unbroken, equally of the spirit within and the tone without. Kreisler and Muck, Heifetz and Koussevitzky—twice within twenty years Beethoven's Violin-Concerto has been Ariel's music of an enchanted air.

* It is the moment for an intermezzo about another rare performance. The Introduction to the Second Act of Chabrier's opera, "Gwendoline," began the concert. On paper, it seemed a convenience. For the congenitally tardy must be served, lest their late and inconsiderate entrances disturb—as they did yesterday—more important music. And "Gwendoline" itself? One of the operas written in Paris when the example of Wagner was potent upon the generation of the eighties. Perhaps, the best of them; now fallen out of the repertory everywhere, preserved only by an Overture and this Introduction. To lift the curtain upon an amorous second act, Chabrier wrote misty, longing, dreamful measures; distributed them to the woodwinds and the strings of a hushed orchestra; swelled them to climax; bade them droop and sigh and vanish into silence. Dr. Koussevitzky and his choirs played them with a diaphanous beauty and a gentle intensity renewing and transfiguring Chabrier's pages. The effect was momentary; but it vies in recollection with that of the Concerto itself.

Finally to the new Symphony of Professor Hill, in C major and the full panoply of four movements, played for the first time, and in the applauded presence of the composer. His fellow townsfolk do not forget his services in Boston and Cambridge to the art of music; to that art liberalized and falling upon open ears and minds. Before them of late he has proved his maturing quality as composer, excelling with the concentration of full-furnished years the more desultory adventures of younger days. If their applause yesterday seemed more hesitant than of old, the explanation is the nature of this second Symphony.

ENING
IC SKUBER
OFESSON
N IN
ious Comedred nor opinionated;
he Entire Lelay of sonorities;
to emotionalized or a young man's Sym-LEE SHUB
POPS
GER PRY
$2.50; Wed
ARCH D
GILBERT
In a
By STEPHENS
OSI MUSICAL SM to $3; Wed
- SYMPH
F
CKETS C
G. P SOUTH SEA
RAI
ECOU
MAR. 7,
W SP
MPTON
H. T. P.

SYMPHONY CONCERT

By PHILIP HILL Feb. 27/31
 The Boston Symphony Orchestra

gave its 17th concert of the season yesterday afternoon in Symphony hall. Dr. Koussevitzky conducted. Jascha Heifetz was the solo violinist. The program was as follows: Chabrier, prelude to act II of "Gwendoline"; Hill, symphony No. 26, major; Beethoven, violin concerto and overture to "Egmont."

The charming prelude of Chabrier's, an orchestral page of a much finer texture than the overture to the opera, was poetically played. Even the pause between this prelude and the symphony did not prevent late comers from bustling down the aisles between the first and second movements of the latter. It was not so long ago that when the concert began with a short piece, time was given for the belated to enter the hall during the following pause; and they were not allowed to enter after the symphony had begun until it was ended. Of late the entrance seems to be of the go-as-you-please order.

Mr. Hill's symphony was well received. He was present and bowed his acknowledgment of the applause. The work itself at this, the first hearing, did not seem to be of as pronounced musical interest as Mr. Hill's preceding venture in the symphonic field. One missed in this later work the melodic grace, the flowing line, the harmonic tints and colors, the pervading poetic spirit that have characterized much of his music. The themes in the second symphony have not the distinction of those in the earlier work, nor is the treatment of them so uniformly interesting. Mr. Hill has said that he has here kept to the traditional forms, thinking he has not had sufficient experience to experiment. He is too modest: he has experimented in the past and with pleasing results. If one says here is an instance of new wine in old bottles, it may also be said that the wine is too heady and not always clear. A large orchestra is employed to give authority to outbursts and climaxes. There is at times a violence, a fury that one does not associate with Mr. Hill's indisputable musical nature; there is an absence of the subtlety that is more eloquent than obvious storm and stress. Of the movements the Scherzo seems now to be the most spontaneous and interesting. It pleased at once—perhaps by its persistent, compelling rhythm and ingratiating chief musical idea. There was that stir in the audience that is a sign of glad acceptance.

Mr. Heifetz, always a welcome visitor, again played with the tonal beauty, the brilliant technic, the exquisite treatment of details, and the general aesthetic taste that have given him fame. Yet to some the second movement was performed at too slow a pace, too much ad libitum. There was at times an approach to lackadaisicalness. Will any violinist ever have the courage to omit the final movement? Not even Mr. Heifetz's delicate reading, an almost capricious reading of the chief theme, can disguise the intrinsic vulgarity of it; nor can consummate mastery in the performance reconcile one to the thematic hiccups that come from solo violin and orchestra. Dr. Koussevitzky and the orchestra gave Mr. Heifetz an accompaniment that was as noteworthy as the performance of the soloist; an accompaniment that was most sympathetic in support, and was itself a thing of beauty; but even the leader and the orchestra could not make the third movement music of great or even moderate worth.

The concert will be repeated tonight. Next week the orchestra will be out of town. The program of March 13-14 will be, i. e., is announced as follows: Haydn, Symphony, D major (B. & H. No. 10); A. L. Steinert, "Leggenda Sinfonica" (first time in the United States); Brahms, Violin Concerto and Two Hungarian Dances. Nathan Milstein will be the solo violinist.

Monitor Feb. 27/31
 Boston Symphony Orchestra

A new symphony, No. 2 in C major, by Edward Burlingame Hill, graced the program of the seventeenth pair of concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, scheduled for Feb. 27 and 28 in Symphony Hall, Boston. Besides boasting a definite tonality, this novelty had the added distinction of not having been written for the fiftieth anniversary of the orchestra.

"The second symphony, like the first," said the composer in a note contributed to the program book, "has no descriptive background, no literary quotations appended. I find myself in sympathy with those of the younger generation who feel that music has enough intrinsic problems of its own without adding those of other arts." And this professor of music in Harvard University adds: "I have kept to the traditional forms, thinking I had not had sufficient experience to experiment."

the violin. The Allegro gains in a gentle fervor of creation. The Larghetto the violin and the orchestra speak it one to another; the violin takes it to itself; carries it bird wings upward, through ineffable measures. The orchestra calls the violin to the light vigors finale; but through the interstices plays that beauty in another phase.

Whatever the music, this disem- beauty of sound, pellucid, un- finely measured, is the essence of Heifetz's violin-playing. Yesterday had only to join the beauty which nates to the kindred beauty which hoven would create. From first to last, the jointure was complete and broken, equally of the spirit with the tone without. Kreisler and Heifetz and Koussevitzky—twice twenty years Beethoven's Violin-Concerto has been Ariel's music of an en- air.

* It is the moment for an inter- about another rare performance. Introduction to the Second Act of brier's opera, "Gwendoline," began concert. On paper, it seemed a of- ience. For the congenitally tardy be served, lest their late and in- erate entrances disturb—as they d- terday—more important music. "Gwendoline" itself? One of the written in Paris when the exam- Wagner was potent upon the gene- of the eighties. Perhaps, the be- them; now fallen out of the rep- everywhere, preserved only by an- ture and this Introduction. To li- curtain upon an amorous second Chabrier wrote misty, longing, dre- measures; distributed them to the winds and the strings of a hushe- chestra; swelled them to climax; them droop and sigh and vanish- silence. Dr. Koussevitzky and his- played them with a diaph- beauty and a gentle intensity ren- and transfiguring Chabrier's pages. effect was momentary; but it vi- recollection with that of the Cor- itself.

Finally to the new Symphony of fessor Hill, in C major and the- pancy of four movements, playe- the first time, and in the applaud- ence of the composer. His fellow- folk do not forget his services in B- and Cambridge to the art of musi- that art liberalized and falling upon ears and minds. Before them of la- has proved his maturing quality as- pcer, excelling with the concentrat- full-furnished years the more des- adventures of younger days. If ap- plause yesterday seemed more he- than of old, the explanation is the- of this second Symphony.

For it seemed, in the casual impres- sions of first performance, a virtuoso- music. It is entirely self-contained. It addresses itself wholly to the creation of a musical substance and a musical move- ment that shall generate purely musical reactions. It abounds with ready re- source. It teems with adroit devices. A manifold craftsmanship never declines into routine or academic exercise, sus- taining momentum, keeping animation throughout. By the same token it is a Symphony of this immediate day, frankly but not calculatingly modernis- tic; neither mannered nor opinionated; preferring the play of sonorities, rhythms, timbres to emotionalized or poetized expression; a young man's Sym- phony, were youth to be blessed with the readiness and abundance of Mr. Hill at middle age.

The first movement passes swiftly, vividly—with inexhaustible rhythmic flexibility, quick changes of pace and mood, diversified and animated working of the musical material, spirited and pointed play of instrumental voices. Throughout go the modern freedoms, the modern vitalizing, upon orthodox form. The following scherzo is virtuoso- exercise with rhythmic figures, driven at high speed, whipped and colored with fancy; relaxing this tonal sport for brief lyric interludes; never reiterating, be- ing nothing out too thin. The succeeding slow movement develops and enriches a single musical thought; fore- goes rhythmic flexibility for rhythmic in- tensity; searches out darker timbres; ab- and flows sensitively; swells into broad and deep sonority. The finale re- turns to the rhythmic energy, the vitality, ing freedom, the animation and urgency of the beginning—to the end a quick- spirited, unflagging music, be the hand upon it vigorous or light.

A virtuoso-symphony—the listener re- peated to himself—peradventure a bril- liant symphony; such a symphony as- should go into European festivals of cou- temporary music to prove that an Ameri- can composer can do that sort of thing and do it notably well. Then came the reservations. By the evidence of those- very qualities, Mr. Hill has written a co- mopolitan Symphony that any composer of his abilities might have accomplished of his abilities might have accomplished environment and a soil; whereas Mr. Hill's first Symphony sounded out of New England; was seldom tuned to an eclectic modernism. Yet again—scarcely one of Mr. Hill's motifs in this Second Symphony lays immediate hold on the ear; individualizes itself to the listening mind. At first hearing, they sound as matter for treatment, and that treatment soon becomes everything. But a composer has unquestionable right to make a symphony in whatever mood and to whatever end may possess him.

H. T. P.

SYMPHONY CONCERT

Harold By PHILIP HALE Feb. 27/31
The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave its 17th concert of the season yesterday afternoon in Symphony hall. Dr. Koussevitzky conducted. Jascha Heifetz was the solo violinist. The program was as follows: Chabrier, prelude to act II of "Gwendoline"; Hill, symphony No. 26, major; Beethoven, violin concerto and overture to "Egmont."

The charming prelude of Chabrier's, an orchestral page of a much finer texture than the overture to the opera, was poetically played. Even the pause between this prelude and the symphony did not prevent late comers from bustling down the aisles between the first and second movements of the latter. It was not so long ago that when the concert began with a short piece, time was given for the belated to enter the hall during the following pause; and they were not allowed to enter after the symphony had begun until it was ended. Of late the entrance seems to be of the go-as-you-please order.

Mr. Hill's symphony was well re- ceived. He was present and bowed his acknowledgment of the applause. The work itself at this, the first hearing, did not seem to be of as pronounced musical interest as Mr. Hill's preceding venture in the symphonic field. One missed in this later work the melodic grace, the flowing line, the harmonic tints and colors, the pervading poetic spirit that have characterized much of his music. The themes in the second symphony have not the distinction of those in the earlier work, nor is the treatment of them so uniformly inter- esting. Mr. Hill has said that he has here kept to the traditional forms, thinking he has not had sufficient ex- perience to experiment. He is too modest: he has experimented in the past and with pleasing results. If one says here is an instance of new wine in old bottles, it may also be said that the wine is too heady and not always clear. A large orchestra is employed to give authority to outbursts and cli- maxes. There is at times a violence, a fury that one does not associate with Mr. Hill's indisputable musical nature; there is an absence of the subtlety that is more eloquent than obvious storm and stress. Of the movements the Scherzo seems now to be the most spontaneous and interesting. It pleased at once—perhaps by its persistent, com- piling rhythm and ingratiating chief musical idea. There was that stir in the audience that is a sign of glad acceptance.

Mr. Heifetz, always a welcome vis- itor, again played with the tonal beauty, the brilliant technic, the exquisite treat- ment of details, and the general aes- thetic taste that have given him fame. Yet to some the second movement was performed at too slow a pace, too much ad libitum. There was at times an ap- proach to lackadaisicalness. Will any violinist ever have the courage to omit the final movement? Not even Mr. Heifetz's delicate reading, an almost capricious reading of the chief theme, can disguise the intrinsic vulgarity of it; nor can consummate mastery in the performance reconcile one to the them- atic hiccups that come from solo violin and orchestra. Dr. Koussevitzky and the orchestra gave Mr. Heifetz an ac- companiment that was as noteworthy as the performance of the soloist; an accompaniment that was most sympa- thetic in support, and was itself a thing of beauty; but even the leader and the orchestra could not make the third movement music of great or even mod- erate worth.

The concert will be repeated tonight. Next week the orchestra will be out of town. The program of March 13-14 will be, i. e., is announced as follows: Haydn, Symphony, D major (B. & H. No. 10); A. L. Steinert, "Leggenda Sin- fonica" (first time in the United States); Brahms, Violin Concerto and Two Hungarian Dances. Nathan Mil- stein will be the solo violinist.

Boston Symphony Orchestra

A new symphony, No. 2 in C major, by Edward Burlingame Hill, graced the program of the seventeenth pair of concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, scheduled for Feb. 27 and 28 in Symphony Hall, Boston. Besides boasting a definite tonality, this nov- elty had the added distinction of not having been written for the fiftieth anniversary of the orchestra.

"The second symphony, like the first," said the composer in a note contributed to the program book, "has no descriptive background, no liter- ary quotations appended. I find my- self in sympathy with those of the younger generation who feel that music has enough intrinsic problems of its own without adding those of other arts." And this professor of music in Harvard University adds: "I have kept to the traditional forms, thinking I had not had sufficient ex- perience to experiment."

Mr. Hill's style is much the same whether he is setting down notes or words, except that musically he speaks mainly French. His new score, dedicated to his colleague, Prof. Walter R. Spalding, opens with a movement in sonata form in which the principal theme has the "feminine" quality usually associated with a second theme. Then comes a Scherzo with Trio. The third is the slow movement, marked "Maestoso ma non troppo lento." The Finale is an "Allegro energico." All is logical and orderly.

The musical ideas of the composer are characteristically his own, the idiom in which he conveys them that of the modern French school. This symphony therefore, though more considerable, is a companion piece to its author's Symphony in B flat and his "Lillacs," after Amy Lowell's poem. Rhythmic patterns are perhaps somewhat more complex than in the former works, but the influence of the modern Russians is slight. It is hardly necessary to add that in both composition and orchestration, the symphony is the work of a master hand. It was received with marked favor.

The other principal item of the program was the Beethoven Violin Concerto, with Jascha Heifetz as soloist. Probably any lingering trace of the notion that Heifetz is "cold" had been destroyed in the symphony audiences by this artist's performance of the Brahms Concerto two years ago. Certainly no one could have found coldness in the player's tone in the lovely melody of the slow movement in the concert under review. The performance was of course masterly throughout (including the orchestral accompaniment), and the ovation was prolonged until after the soloist had brought back Dr. Koussevitzky to share in it.

The program opened with the Prelude to Act II from Chabrier's "Gwendoline," a charming bit of lavender and old lace which the audience viewed apathetically. The final item was the "Egmont" Overture.

L. A. S.

MR. JASCHA HEIFETZ was born at Vilna, Russia, on February 2, 1901.* He began his musical studies at the age of three with his father, a violinist; at the age of five he entered the Royal School of Music at Vilna; when he was six he played Mendelssohn's concerto in public; the next year he was graduated. He then went to St. Petersburg (Leningrad), where he took lessons of Leopold Auer for two years. He gave recitals there, and soon afterwards played in seven concerts with the Odessa Symphony Orchestra. In 1911 he toured for the first time outside of Russia, playing in Berlin with orchestras led by Arthur Nikisch, in Vienna with an orchestra conducted by Safonov. Having played in other cities of Germany and Austria, he returned to Russia, where he gave concerts. The World War broke out. Mr. Heifetz toured in Denmark, Norway, and Sweden. In the winter of 1916-17 he gave many recitals in Leningrad. In September, 1917, he arrived at New York, coming from Russia by way of Siberia, across the Pacific Ocean. He made his first appearance in New York on October 27, 1917. He played in Boston for the first time on January 6, 1918. Since then he has given other recitals.

With the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Boston he played on January 3, 1919, Beethoven's concerto, Mr. Rabaud conductor; on March 15, 1929, Brahms's concerto, Dr. Koussevitzky conductor.

In 1925, Mr. Heifetz gave a concert hall to Jerusalem, Palestine. In 1926 he was made a Chevalier of the Legion of Honor.

Eighteenth Programme

FRIDAY AFTERNOON, MARCH 13, at 2.30 o'clock

SATURDAY EVENING, MARCH 14, at 8.15 o'clock

Haydn Symphony in D major (B. & H. No. 10)
I. Adagio; Allegro spiritoso.
II. Capriccio: Largo.
III. Minuetto.
IV. Finale.

Steinert Leggenda Sinfonica
(First performance in the United States)

Brahms Concerto for Violin in D major, Op. 77
I. Allegro non troppo.
II. Adagio.
III. Allegro giocoso, ma non troppo vivace.

Brahms Two Hungarian Dances
No. 2, in F major.
No. 1, in G minor.

SOLOIST
NATHAN MILSTEIN

There will be an intermission after Steinert's "Leggenda"

Original plans for Symphony Hall by Charles F. McKim are now to be seen in a central case of the exhibition in the first balcony foyer

Mr. Hill's style is much the same whether he is setting down notes or words, except that musically he speaks mainly French. His new score, dedicated to his colleague, Prof. Walter R. Spalding, opens with a movement in sonata form in which the principal theme has the "feminine" quality usually associated with a second theme. Then comes a Scherzo with Trio. The third is the slow movement, marked "Maestoso ma non troppo lento." The Finale is an "Allegro energico." All is logical and orderly.

The musical ideas of the composer are characteristically his own, the idiom in which he conveys them that of the modern French school. This symphony therefore, though more considerable, is a companion piece to its author's Symphony in B flat and his "Lilacs," after Amy Lowell's poem. Rhythmic patterns are perhaps somewhat more complex than in the former works, but the influence of the modern Russians is slight. It is hardly necessary to add that in both composition and orchestration, the symphony is the work of a master hand. It was received with marked favor.

The other principal item of the program was the Beethoven Violin Concerto, with Jascha Heifetz as soloist. Probably any lingering trace of the notion that Heifetz is "cold" had been destroyed in the symphony audiences by this artist's performance of the Brahms Concerto two years ago. Certainly no one could have found coldness in the player's tone in the lovely melody of the slow movement in the concert under review. The performance was of course masterly throughout (including the orchestral accompaniment), and the ovation was prolonged until after the soloist had brought back Dr. Koussevitzky to share in it.

The program opened with the Prelude to Act II from Chabrier's "Gwendoline," a charming bit of lavender and old lace which the audience viewed apathetically. The final item was the "Egmont" Overture.

L. A. S.

MR. JASCHA HEIFETZ was born at Vilna, Russia, on February 2, 1901.* He began his musical studies at the age of three with his father, a violinist; at the age of five he entered the Royal School of Music at Vilna; when he was six he played Mendelssohn's concerto in public; the next year he was graduated. He then went to St. Petersburg (Leningrad), where he took lessons of Leopold Auer for two years. He gave recitals there, and soon afterwards played in seven concerts with the Odessa Symphony Orchestra. In 1911 he toured for the first time outside of Russia, playing in Berlin with orchestras led by Arthur Nikisch, in Vienna with an orchestra conducted by Safonov. Having played in other cities of Germany and Austria, he returned to Russia, where he gave concerts. The World War broke out. Mr. Heifetz toured in Denmark, Norway, and Sweden. In the winter of 1916-17 he gave many recitals in Leningrad. In September, 1917, he arrived at New York, coming from Russia by way of Siberia, across the Pacific Ocean. He made his first appearance in New York on October 27, 1917. He played in Boston for the first time on January 6, 1918. Since then he has given other recitals.

With the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Boston he played on January 3, 1919, Beethoven's concerto, Mr. Rabaud conductor; on March 15, 1929, Brahms's concerto, Dr. Koussevitzky conductor.

In 1925, Mr. Heifetz gave a concert hall to Jerusalem, Palestine. In 1926 he was made a Chevalier of the Legion of Honor.

Eighteenth Programme

FRIDAY AFTERNOON, MARCH 13, at 2.30 o'clock

SATURDAY EVENING, MARCH 14, at 8.15 o'clock

Haydn Symphony in D major (B. & H. No. 10)
 I. Adagio; Allegro spiritoso.
 II. Capriccio: Largo.
 III. Minuetto.
 IV. Finale.

Steinert Leggenda Sinfonica
 (First performance in the United States)

Brahms Concerto for Violin in D major, Op. 77
 I. Allegro non troppo.
 II. Adagio.
 III. Allegro giocoso, ma non troppo vivace.

Brahms Two Hungarian Dances
 No. 2, in F major.
 No. 1, in G minor.

SOLOIST
 NATHAN MILSTEIN

There will be an intermission after Steinert's "Leggenda"

Original plans for Symphony Hall by Charles F. McKim are now to be seen in a central case of the exhibition in the first balcony foyer

Virtuoso

NATHAN MILSTEIN

SYMPHONY CONCERT

Herald By PHILIP HALE Mich. 14, 1931

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Koussevitzky, conductor, gave its 18th concert of the season yesterday afternoon in Symphony hall. The program was as follows: Haydn, Symphony in D major (B. and H. No. 10). Steiner's Leggenda Sinfonica (first performance in this country). Brahms, Violin Concerto and Hungarian Dances Nos 2 F major, and 1, G minor. Nathan Milstein, the solo violinist, played for the first time in Boston.

The symphony by Haydn, one of the six written for the Concert de la Loge Olympique, Paris, was no doubt unknown to the great majority of the assembled hearers. It was played in 1902 in the reign of Wilhelm Gericke, as another symphony in this set. The Bear, was introduced at these concerts by Arthur Nikisch in 1889. Its zoological companion The Hen is by no means familiar. The symphony played yesterday is fresh and blithe in spite of the formulas expected from every God-fearing composer at the end of the 18th century. It provokes what a speaker at the banquet reported by Athenaeus called "gentleman-like joy." The Parisian orchestra, which Haydn undoubtedly had in mind, was a large one—40 violins, 12 violoncellos, eight double basses—so that the composer could be sure of strong contrasts in performance by the string section. Fortunate composer—whose symphonies require no analysis—no remarks about chief and subsidiary themes: music that one can, sitting back, enjoy without inquiring into psychological intention or noting attempts at realism in musical seascapes and landscapes—music not inspired by book or picture—just music: now pompous, now merry, and in more serious moments, never too sad, but with a constant feeling for tonal grace and beauty.

The Symphonic Legend by Alexander Lang Steinert, dedicated to the Boston Symphony Orchestra on its 50th anniversary, was played for the first time at the Augusto in Rome on Dec. 14, 1930, when Howard Hanson conducted it. This Legend is a more important work as regards form, construction and contents, if less poetical, than Steinert's Southern Night played here under Dr. Koussevitzky, nearly five years ago. The Legend is the more mature composition, as is natural, for in the years between the composer has not been working and hearing. It is all very well for a composer to stay in his ivory tower lest by straying into concert halls he may be unduly influenced. While Mr. Steinert's teachers since 1923 have been leaders in the Parisian schools, his own music is not like the bean described by Gilbert as "too French." His own independence in musical thought and his natural taste have kept him from slavish imitation of some master either of the impressionistic, the realistic or the anarchistic school. It is not surprising then that this Legend is first of all honest music; there is no desire on the part of the composer to show the originality that is merely eccentricity or perverse in its worship of ugliness. There is a respect for the sound traditions, respect for that which is distinctively characteristic of the French school—we are not speaking of the dissenting or heterodox chapels—clarity, logical continuity, a sense of rhythmic and dynamic values; coloring that is appropriate to the musical thoughts and is neither pale nor gaudy. Although Mr. Steinert calls for a large and modern orchestra he uses it discreetly and does not find it necessary to employ all the instruments all the time or work them overtime. The Legend is the expression of a sensitive musician. It was received with more than the usual favor shown for an unfamiliar work. The composer bowed his acknowledgment.

Mr. Milstein is in his 27th year. There are some who think that a violinist should not attempt to play music by Johannes Brahms until his hair is silvered, his legs wobble and the state of his heart debars him from life insurance. Liszt said that youth is the time for virtuosity, but your true Brahmsite shudders if his "Master" and virtuosity are named in the same breath. After all, Johannes wrote for the fiddle music that demands full expression, and full expression does not come from the fiddle until the player is a virtuoso in the best sense of the word. "But," some say, "the music of Brahms demands thoughtfulness, gravity, a feeling for the eternal verities, a spiritual nature." There is no end to this pretty talk or balderdash, as you will. Surely Mr. Milstein's experiences in Russia until he made his escape gave him experience, gave him food for thought. Nor should the fact that he is an accomplished violinist preclude him from expounding the gospel according to St. Johannes. It is enough to say of his performance yesterday that technically, emotionally and "intellectually"—if any one insists on this feature of an interpretation—it was engrossing and admirable, a performance that by its compelling nature aroused genuine enthusiasm. It is needless to say that Dr. Koussevitzky and the orchestra gave an accompaniment that was not merely a support.

The concert ended with the exciting, fiery, paprika reminder of Hungary. For once the old saying that the music of Brahms is a gypsy woman trying to dance in a tight corset was forgotten.

The concert will be repeated tonight. Next week the usual Saturday night concert will take place on Thursday night. The Friday afternoon concert will still be on Friday. The program will comprise Mendelssohn's overture and Scherzo from the "Midsummer Night's Dream" music; Honegger's Symphony (played earlier in this season); Tchaikowsky's piano concerto No. 1 (Mr. Horowitz) and Salome's dance from Strauss's opera.

Music

Monitor — March 7, 1931

Boston Symphony Orchestra

A "Leggenda Sinfonica," by Alexander Lang Steinert, dedicated "to the Boston Symphony Orchestra on its fiftieth anniversary," was the novel piece set upon the program for the orchestra's eighteenth pair of concerts, in Symphony Hall, Boston, March 13 and 14. It had had a previous performance at the Augusteo, Rome.

Mr. Steinert, as the program informed us, is "at home in Paris, France." This information had already been conveyed by the composer's symphonic poem, "Southern Night," introduced by the Boston orchestra four seasons ago; and it was corroborated by the new score, which shows him still under the spell of Debussy and Ravel. An honorable tradition, which Mr. Steinert is carrying on with credit.

"Leggenda Sinfonica" is a title which seems to indicate a "program." As to this, the composer says only that the coda (which follows a dramatic pause) "suggests the narrator who has come to the close of a legendary tale." Probably the music would hold more appeal if the composer had confided to us the nature of this legendary tale. But he speaks merely of three themes, which pass through various phases of development and variation. The listener may detect the themes, and he may follow their treatment, with a certain sense of familiarity. As music, without the program.

aid of literary associations, this score may find some difficulty in justifying itself. We may hope that the composer's next work will display greater originality.

Dr. Koussevitzky had opened the program with a performance of a Haydn Symphony in D major (B. & H. No. 10) which had not been heard in Boston for nearly 30 years. It is the fifth of a series written for the Concert de la Loge Olympique of Paris. For some reason Dr. Koussevitzky, who of late has been employing a much reduced orchestra for Mozart, used for Haydn nearly his full complement of strings. We have a feeling that the symphony would have left a better impression if it had been uttered in a smaller voice.

The opening Adagio leads into an Allegro of normal form and rather workaday content. The slow movement, labeled "Capriccio," permits the composer some odd tricks of fancy, with violin figures scampering over Largo measures from the rest of the orchestra. It was here that one longed most for a smaller tone, and also for a lighter touch. There was, one felt, an attempt to put too much emotion into the melodies, and too heavy an accent on the chords. The Minuetto, however, had all the Haydnian jollity, and the Trio, of exceptional charm, was exquisitely played. The last movement, with a conspicuously salient principal theme, was likewise justly set forth.

The soloist was Nathan Milstein, young violinist, who with praiseworthy devotion to artistic ideals had chosen the Brahms Concerto for his first appearance in Boston. Of the virtuoso type, he had a prodigious success. The applause after the first movement was unusually prolonged, and at the close, stamping was mingled with the handclapping. Mr. Milstein has an excellent technique and makes evident his musical feeling. His ardor compensates somewhat for an undeniable lack of breadth in his tone. With greater maturity, doubtless, he will be able to penetrate more deeply into the musical heart of this master-concerto, whose technical demands he already meets dazzlingly.

The Hungarian Dance of Brahms (F major and G minor) closed the L. A. S.

MILSTEIN HEARD AT SYMPHONY CONCERT

Russian Violinist Makes Boston Debut

Nathan Milstein, a young Russian violinist who studied under the late Leopold Auer, made his first Boston appearance yesterday afternoon as soloist in the Brahms concerto at the Symphony concert. Mr. Milstein was applauded by orchestra and audience with unusual warmth for playing which deserved the much abused adjective "brilliant."

The novelty on Dr. Koussevitzky's program was a "Leggenda Sinfonica" by the young Bostonian composer Alexander Steinert. Mr. Steinert was called to the stage to bow repeatedly in response to prolonged applause. Dr. Koussevitzky, as is his invariable custom, made his own approval of Mr. Milstein and Mr. Steinert manifest by hearty handclapping. He is always anxious that young musicians should be encouraged by a hearty response to their efforts at the Symphony concerts.

The Brahms concerto is not essentially a show piece, nor has Mr. Milstein's quiet and sensible demeanor on the concert platform any hint of the ostentation of the old-fashioned "virtuoso" violinist. Yet his bold and spirited style of playing, the apparent ease with which he performed even the most intricate and technically difficult phrases, his big tone, his command of rhythmic and melodic effects, conquered the approval of Mr. Milstein's hearers.

He has at 26 already acquired an international reputation. His mastery of violin playing is indeed indisputable. But ought the Brahms concerto to sound quite as brilliant as he made it? Would not greater purity of tone and a less romantic interpretation be preferable? At least one listener yesterday thought so.

"Leggenda Sinfonica"

Mr. Steinert's "Leggenda Sinfonica," dedicated to the Boston Symphony

Orchestra "on its 50th anniversary," was first performed at Rome Dec 14, 1930. Yesterday's was merely the first performance in the United States. This work has no detailed program, merely the hint to the listener's imagination that the coda, following a moment of silence, "suggests the narrator who has come to the end of a legendary tale."

Mr. Steinert's score is an elaborate working out of three musical ideas, which are developed to a fortissimo climax. The themes and his treatment of them recall the work of Henry Hadley among the elder generation of living Americans, and of Howard Hanson among the younger contemporary Americans. He has escaped for the most part the all-pervading influence of Stravinsky. Though written with a markedly increased command of musical texture, this new piece lacks some of the harmonic color that was the chief charm of Mr. Steinert's earlier work. The performance was painstakingly eloquent.

Dr. Koussevitzky, wisely turning from the more familiar symphonies Haydn wrote for England, chose to open yesterday's concert with one in D major written in the 1780s for the "Concert de la Loge Olympique" in Paris, and unplayed here since the regime of Mr. Gericke. This symphony is one of Haydn's best, full of the melodic and rhythmic vitality that has insured immortality for his music, despite its obvious limitations. One hopes others like it may be resurrected from his complete works and played for our delectation.

Small Orchestra

For Mozart Dr. Koussevitzky now employs habitually a small orchestra, with about the quota of instruments for which the 18th century composers wrote as a rule, no more than 50 players at most. But in Paris there were by the 1780s orchestras almost as large as the present Boston Symphony, a fact doubtless held in mind by Haydn when writing the symphony played yesterday. It was therefore the right thing to do to use the full number of strings, as Dr. Koussevitzky wisely did. One felt that in so large a hall this procedure might be preferable even for Mozart.

Yesterday's performance was a spirited and delightful one, faithful to the spirit of Haydn's music, with no pedantic overemphasis on its letter. It was renewed evidence of the great progress made in recent seasons by conductor and orchestra.

P. R.

MILSTEIN SYMPHONY SOLOIST

Steinert's "Leggenda
Sinfonica" Well
Received

Post ———— Mon. 14. 1931
BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

The Symphony Concerts have suddenly "gone soloist." At the last pair there was Mr. Heifetz, scaling the heights in the Violin Concerto of Beethoven. Next week it will be a pianist, the phenomenally dexterous Mr. Horowitz. And yesterday yet another Russian, Nathan Milstein, spoken of with considerable justice as the most promising of the young violinists, made his bow to Boston, playing with warmth and easy mastery the Concerto of Brahms.

A NEGLECTED HAYDN

From first to last yesterday's was an enjoyable concert as regards both programme and performance. For the first number Dr. Koussevitzky's choice had fallen on a neglected and an attractive Symphony of Haydn, in D major, one of the six written for Paris in 1784. There followed a new and engaging "Leggenda Sinfonica" by Alexander Steinert, its Italianate ardor bearing out the language of its title. Finally, for the first time in a month of Symphony seasons, there came two of the Hungarian Dances of Brahms, generally relegated to the Pop Concerts, but heard gladly by a Symphony audience. This is not the first time that Dr. Koussevitzky has made a rewarding discovery among the hundred or more symphonies of the industrious Papa Haydn. The most distinctive movement of this D major Symphony proved to be the second, curiously titled "Capriccio: Largo," which displayed Haydn's muse in a richer, more imaginative guise than that which she commonly wore. Yet the other movements, though they lacked commanding thematic individuality, went their way by no means unagreeably.

Composer Steinert Present

It might be objected that Mr. Steinert's Legend is somewhat diffuse, not too well co-ordinated and not strikingly original. But it is heartening to find a young composer who is not afraid of melody and of a show of emotion. With Nabokov's Symphony of last fall, this Legend suggests a reaction from the cerebral abstractions, the calculated uglinesses, of the phase of modernism that seems happily to be passing.

Present in the audience yesterday, Mr. Steinert, who now spends most of his time in Europe, was cordially received by his former townsmen.

Applause for Milstein

The applause that followed the first movement of Brahms' Concerto showed that yesterday's audience was sensible of the fact that Mr. Milstein, who has been little heralded and who has not the advantage of a magnetic presence, is a violinist of remarkable attainments. The purist may complain that his tone yesterday was over-luscious for Brahms and that he played the music with more of outward fervor than of inward depth. But while one may still prefer Mr. Heifetz's Brahms of two seasons ago, it may not be gainsaid that Mr. Milstein decisively prevailed with the Concerto yesterday.

When he was done, orchestra as well as audience applauded him, and that applause was unusually long-continued.

Professor Hill for Cambridge Hearing With Dr. Koussevitzky and His Men to Play the New Symphony

SINCE this is the time of festivals and anniversaries, Dr. Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra went to Cambridge last evening to demonstrate that being festive is a matter of spirit as well as of dates. It was an evening of virtuoso composers and musicians. The audience, gaily responding to the mood, clapped at every turn. Mr. Hill's spirited new symphony produced the first round of hearty applause. The composer, rising to bow acknowledgment, was the recipient of an exceedingly cordial tribute. As he made his way to the platform at Dr. Koussevitzky's urging, the clapping was redoubled and prolonged, rising to a peak of enthusiasm as he touched hands with the conductor and continuing in force for some time after he had resumed his seat. Upon Dr. Koussevitzky and the orchestra were bestowed similar expressions of approval for an engrossing performance of the Prelude of Wagner's music-drama, "Tristan and Isolde," while the completion of Rimsky-Korsakov's "Spanish Caprice" was occasion for fresh enthusiasm, spontaneous and intense. After each of the numbers just mentioned, Dr. Koussevitzky signalled the musicians to rise in recognition of the unusually cordial reception which had been accorded them. Everyone had reason to be in a cheerful frame of mind upon leaving the hall.

The evening began with the Prelude to the Second Act of Chabrier's opera, "Gwendoline." As at the previous performance in Symphony Hall, the audience sat in charmed attentiveness. Though arousing no enthusiasm, it pleased the sensuous ear and gave free rein to fancy. Mystic melodies wove their spell; lightly tinted timbres played with images in tone. Woodwinds and strings wound their separate strands in delicate pattern. Not too familiar of recent years, it now serves to exemplify the keenness and accuracy which are distinguishing features of any performance of the Boston Symphony.

Attention had been gained and the composer accepted, Mr. Hill's symphony very interest. The listener quickly did not to look for programmatic meaning to expect no emotional stimulus would be the case in, say, a symphony of Tchaikovsky, a composer who represents an artistic conception which is an antithesis to that of Mr. Hill. Usually one was led to follow the new symphony as a stimulating intellectual stimulation; to follow pattern and balance, design, development and elaboration in its stripped purity; to observe mental adroitness; to thrill at unexpected turns of harmony and to feel fresh logic when once heard. At the same time, one noted the driving force of the piece which kept the listener constantly alert and refreshed. In a game of chess, the players obtain their exhilaration from their concentration; the musical mind derives a similar pleasure from Mr. Hill's new symphony, which is, in fact, an intellectual tour de force. Being likewise an instrument of force for the musicians, it is no wonder that it won such hearty applause.

Excerpts from the music-dramas of Wagner always have been in Dr. Koussevitzky's common repertory for the concert series of the Monday and Tuesday series as for supplementary concerts of the season. Not always is he so fortunate in his composer, particularly in the tempo, which is often too greatly retarded. The Prelude of "Tristan" last evening proved an exception. Accents uncommonly incisive; instrumental texture of poignant intensity. It was no wonder that Dr. Koussevitzky had found the real blood of this music in place of the usual semblance.

The exceeding brilliance of the performance of Rimsky-Korsakov's "Spanish Caprice" will remain for some time in the memory. The rhythms "got to the skin"; the instrumental colors were of poignant intensity. In the full joy of his virtuosity, Dr. Koussevitzky did not dip liberally into Rimsky's dazling instrumental basket. As fast as cornets leaped the scintillant fancies, the audience alike took huge delight.

N. M. J.

MILSTEIN SYMPHONY SOLOIST

Steinert's "Leggenda
Sinfonica" Well
Received

Post Mel. 14, 1931
BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

The Symphony Concerts have suddenly "gone soloist." At the last pair there was Mr. Heifetz, scaling the heights in the Violin Concerto of Beethoven. Next week it will be a pianist, the phenomenally dexterous Mr. Horowitz. And yesterday yet another Russian, Nathan Milstein, spoken of with considerable justice as the most promising of the young violinists, made his bow to Boston, playing with warmth and easy mastery the Concerto of Brahms.

A NEGLECTED HAYDN

From first to last yesterday's was an enjoyable concert as regards both programme and performance. For the first number Dr. Koussevitzky's choice had fallen on a neglected and an attractive Symphony of Haydn, in D major, one of the six written for Paris in 1784. There followed a new and engaging "Leggenda Sinfonica" by Alexander Steinert, its Italianate ardor bearing out the language of its title. Finally, for the first time in a month of Symphony seasons, there came two of the Hungarian Dances of Brahms, generally relegated to the Pop Concerts, but heard gladly by a Symphony audience. This is not the first time that Dr. Koussevitzky has made a rewarding discovery among the hundred or more symphonies of the industrious Papa Haydn. The most distinctive movement of this D major Symphony proved to be the second, curiously titled "Capriccio: Largo," which displayed Haydn's muse in a richer, more imaginative guise than that which she commonly wore. Yet the other movements, though they lacked commanding thematic individuality, went their way by no means unagreeably.

Composer Steinert Present

It might be objected that Mr. Steinert's Legend is somewhat diffuse, not too well co-ordinated and not strikingly original. But it is heartening to find a young composer who is not afraid of melody and of a show of emotion. With Nabokov's Symphony of last fall, this Legend suggests a reaction from the cerebral abstractions, the calculated uglinesses, of the phase of modernism that seems happily to be passing.

Present in the audience yesterday, Mr. Steinert, who now spends most of his time in Europe, was cordially received by his former townsmen.

Applause for Milstein

The applause that followed the first movement of Brahms' Concerto showed that yesterday's audience was sensible of the fact that Mr. Milstein, who has been little heralded and who has not the advantage of a magnetic presence, is a violinist of remarkable attainments. The purist may complain that his tone yesterday was over-luscious for Brahms and that he played the music with more of outward fervor than of inward depth. But while one may still prefer Mr. Heifetz's Brahms of two seasons ago, it may not be gainsaid that Mr. Milstein decisively prevailed with the Concerto yesterday.

When he was done, orchestra as well as audience applauded him, and that applause was unusually long-continued.

Professor Hill Cambridge

With Dr. Koussevitzky
His Men to New Sym

SINCE this is the time the b anniversaries, Dr. Koussevitzky
the Boston Symphony went to Cambridge last strate that being festive spirit as well as of d evening of virtuoso con flans. The audience, construc to the mood, clapped at Hill's spirited new sym
the first round of heart composer, rising to bow was the recipient of cordial tribute. As he the platform at Dr. K ing, the clapping was r longed, rising to a pe as he touched hands w and continuing in forc after he had resumed h Koussevitzky and the bestowed similar expre for an engrossing pe Prelude of Wagner's tan and Isolde," while Rimsky-Korsakov's was occasion for fresh taneous and intense.
numbers just mention
zky signalled the mu recognition of the un ception which had be Everyone had reason frame of mind upon
The evening began the Second Act of "Gwendoline." As at formance in Symphony sat in charmed atten arousing no enthusia sensuous ear and fancy. Mystic melodi lightly tinted timbres in tone. Woodwinds their separate strand tern. Not too famili

Dri
U G

bers of society
The S fairs, of Morris H in letter cratic le investiga with Rep ists as m
The lette in charg through that the verate,"
of the Bronx, elected Cardin Catholic recupera the foll

this piece now serves to exemplify the sensitiveness and accuracy which are distinguishing features of any performance by the Boston Symphony.

Once attention had been gained and the new idiom accepted, Mr. Hill's symphony won every interest. The listener quickly learned not to look for programmatic meaning and to expect no emotional stimulus as would be the case in, say, a symphony of Chaikovsky, a composer who represents an artistic conception which in exact antithesis to that of Mr. Hill. Gradually one was led to follow the new symphony as a stimulating intellectual occupation; to follow pattern and balanced design, development and elaboration in its stripped purity; to observe instrumental adroitness; to thrill at unexpected turns of harmony and to feel their fresh logic when once heard. At the same time, one noted the driving energy of the piece which kept the listening mind constantly alert and refreshed. In the game of chess, the players obtain a peculiar exhilaration from their concentration; the musical mind derives a similar pleasure from Mr. Hill's new symphony, which is, in fact, an intellectual tour de force. Being likewise an instrumental tour de force for the musicians, it is little wonder that it won such hearty approval.

Excerpts from the music-dramas of Wagner always have been in Dr. Koussevitzky's common repertory for the concerts of the Monday and Tuesday series as well as for supplementary concerts of all kinds. Not always is he so fortunate with this composer, particularly in the case of tempo, which is often too greatly retarded. The Prelude of "Tristan" last evening proved an exception. Accents were uncommonly incisive; instrumental tones were of poignant intensity. It was as if Dr. Koussevitzky had found the real flesh and blood of this music in place of its lifeless semblance.

The exceeding brilliance of the performance of Rimsky-Korsakov's "Spanish Caprice" will remain for some time an exciting memory. The rhythms "got under the skin"; the instrumental colors made the blood tingle. In the full joy of exuberant virtuosity, Dr. Koussevitzky invited the individual talents of the orchestra to dip liberally into Rimsky's dazzling instrumental basket. As fast as corn pops, up leaped the scintillant fancies. This was musical pleasure in which players and audience alike took huge delight.

N. M. J.

Mr. Steinert was graduated, magna cum laude, at Harvard University in 1922. He studied music at that University and with Charles Martin Loeffler. In 1923 he was admitted to Gedalge's class in counterpoint at the Paris Conservatory of Music, and had private lessons of d'Indy, Koecklin, and Gedalge. In Boston on March 27 and May 1, 1925, he played the piano part in Scriabin's "Prometheus: a Poem of Fire." In May, 1927, he was awarded the American Prix de Rome.

MR. NATHAN MILSTEIN, violinist, was born at Odessa on December 31, 1904. His first teacher was Stoliarski. The boy, at the age of ten, was taken to Leningrad to study with Leopold Auer at the (then) Imperial Conservatory, and he remained in Russia until 1925. He toured with Vladimir Horowitz, the pianist, but he finally escaped from Russia and arrived in Berlin, penniless, not even having a violin; but in that city he found a patron who aided him in his first recital.

During the last five years, Mr. Milstein has played in European countries and in South America. His first appearance with orchestra in the United States was at St. Louis on November 29, 1929, when he played Glazounov's concerto.

Peace Again at Symphony Hall.

A DESIRABLE change has come to pass at the Symphony Concerts, noticed, perhaps, only by those who repine under it or are soothed by it. The concerts of Friday and Saturday began with a symphony by Haydn no more than half an hour long. From first note to last, the doors were closed and kept closed. That is to say, no late-comers entered in the momentary pauses between the movements—no, not even when the conductor had lifted his hand to beat the initial measure. Through the other numbers the doors were as strictly guarded. For the first times, almost, in a season that has now run two-thirds of its course, both audiences listened undisturbed by the inept or careless admission of the tardy. Agreed that the task is considerable. There are forty-eight entrances to be watched—a surprising number; but as the event proved twice over, with a little discipline they can be watched effectively.

From October through February, breaches of the peace, and public or private complaint over them, had steadily increased. Especially on Friday afternoons, and even when performance tide, late-comers entered the let or hindrance; moved their chairs, not always near led themselves as audibly; and in particular perturbed mood. Worse still, at the ever brief, in a symphony, concerto, the doors opened another moved, "dignified to his or her place; while orchestra waited their pleasured hands or ready lips. It, the climax came when paused twice in her course the time of day with ac- while conductor, orchestra waited, in weary politeness, these greetings. complaint multiplied to the while the venerable sage am-book protested openly by "in the public prints." discipline is restored; the guarded; many are re- All of which is not to symphony Concerts, being pleasure, should be hide- use rules." It is to note audiences of prompt and eners should be protected who decline to be equally

Nineteenth Programme

THURSDAY EVENING, MARCH 19, at 8.15 o'clock

FRIDAY AFTERNOON, MARCH 20, at 2.30 o'clock

Mendelssohn Incidental Music to Shakespeare's
"A Midsummer Night's Dream"

- a. Overture.
- b. Scherzo.

Honegger Symphony

- I. Allegro marcato.
- II. Adagio.
- III. Presto.

Tchaikovsky Concerto for Pianoforte No. 1, in B-flat minor, Op. 23

- I. Allegro non troppo e molto maestoso; Allegro con spirito.
- II. Andantino semplice; Allegro vivace assai.
- III. Allegro con fuoco.

Strauss Salome's Dance from the Opera "Salome"

SOLOIST
VLADIMIR HOROWITZ

There will be an intermission after the symphony

Two free lectures on the Bach Festival:

Thursday, March 19, at 4:30—Bach's Choral Music (G. Wallace Woodworth)

Thursday, March 26, at 4:30—Instrumental works of the Festival (R. G. Appel)
(Lecture Hall, Boston Public Library)

Mr. Steinert was graduated, magna cum laude, at Harvard University in 1922. He studied music at that University and with Charles Martin Loeffler. In 1923 he was admitted to Gedalge's class in counterpoint at the Paris Conservatory of Music, and had private lessons of d'Indy, Koecklin, and Gedalge. In Boston on March 27 and May 1, 1925, he played the piano part in Scriabin's "Prometheus: a Poem of Fire." In May, 1927, he was awarded the American Prix de Rome.

MR. NATHAN MILSTEIN, violinist, was born at Odessa on December 31, 1904. His first teacher was Stoliarski. The boy, at the age of ten, was taken to Leningrad to study with Leopold Auer at the (then) Imperial Conservatory, and he remained in Russia until 1925. He toured with Vladimir Horowitz, the pianist, but he finally escaped from Russia and arrived in Berlin, penniless, not even having a violin; but in that city he found a patron who aided him in his first recital.

During the last five years, Mr. Milstein has played in European countries and in South America. His first appearance with orchestra in the United States was at St. Louis on November 29, 1929, when he played Glazounov's concerto.

Peace Again at Symphony Hall.

A DESIRABLE change has come to pass at the Symphony Concerts, noticed, perhaps, only by those who repine under it or are soothed by it. The concerts of Friday and Saturday began with a symphony by Haydn no more than half an hour long. From first note to last, the doors were closed and kept closed. That is to say, no late-comers entered in the momentary pauses between the movements—no, not even when the conductor had lifted his hand to beat the initial measure. Through the other numbers the doors were as strictly guarded. For the first times, almost, in a season that has now run two-thirds of its course, both audiences listened undisturbed by the inept or careless admission of the tardy. Agreed that the task is considerable. There are forty-eight entrances to be watched—a surprising number; but as the event proved twice over, with a little discipline they can be watched effectively.

From October through February, breaches of the peace, and public or private complaint over them, had steadily increased. Especially on Friday afternoons, and even when performance tide, late-comers entered the let or hindrance; moved their chairs, not always near led themselves as audibly; and in particular perturbed mood. Worse still, at the ever brief, in a symphony, concerto, the doors opened another moved, "dignified to his or her place; while orchestra waited their pleased hands or ready lips. If it, the climax came when paused twice in her course the time of day with a while conductor, orchestra waited, in weary politeness these greetings. complaint multiplied to the while the venerable sage um-book protested openly ly "in the public prints," discipline is restored; the ly guarded; many are re. All of which is not to symphony Concerts, being pleasure, should be hide-use rules." It is to note audiences of prompt and aners should be protected who decline to be equally

Nineteenth Programme

THURSDAY EVENING, MARCH 19, at 8.15 o'clock

FRIDAY AFTERNOON, MARCH 20, at 2.30 o'clock

Mendelssohn Incidental Music to Shakespeare's
"A Midsummer Night's Dream"

- a. Overture.
- b. Scherzo.

Honegger Symphony

- I. Allegro marcato.
- II. Adagio.
- III. Presto.

Tchaikovsky Concerto for Pianoforte No. 1, in B-flat minor, Op. 23

- I. Allegro non troppo e molto maestoso; Allegro con spirito.
- II. Andantino semplice; Allegro vivace assai.
- III. Allegro con fuoco.

Strauss Salome's Dance from the Opera "Salome"

SOLOIST
VLADIMIR HOROWITZ

There will be an intermission after the symphony

Two free lectures on the Bach Festival:

Thursday, March 19, at 4:30—Bach's Choral Music (G. Wallace Woodworth)
Thursday, March 26, at 4:30—Instrumental works of the Festival (R. G. Appel)
(Lecture Hall, Boston Public Library)

Mr. Steinert was graduated, magna cum laude, at Harvard University in 1922. He studied music at that University and with Charles Martin Loeffler. In 1923 he was admitted to Gedalge's class in counterpoint at the Paris Conservatory of Music, and had private lessons of d'Indy, Koecklin, and Gedalge. In Boston on March 27 and May 1, 1925, he played the piano part in Scriabin's "Prometheus: a Poem of Fire." In May, 1927, he was awarded the American Prix de Rome.

MR. NATHAN MILSTEIN, violinist, was born at Odessa on December 31, 1904. His first teacher was Stoliarski. The boy, at the age of ten, was taken to Leningrad to study with Leopold Auer at the (then) Imperial Conservatory, and he remained in Russia until 1925. He toured with Vladimir Horowitz, the pianist, but he finally escaped from Russia and arrived in Berlin, penniless, not even having a violin; but in that city he found a patron who aided him in his first recital.

During the last five years, Mr. Milstein has played in European countries and in South America. His first appearance with orchestra in the United States was at St. Louis on November 29, 1929, when he played Glazounov's concerto.

Peace Again at Symphony

A DESIRABLE change has once again passed at the Symphony Concerts, noticed, perhaps, only by those who remain under it or soothed by it. The concerts of Friday and Saturday began with a symphony no more than half an hour. From first note to last, the doors closed and kept closed. That is to no late-comers entered in the moment pauses between the movements—no even when the conductor had lifted hand to beat the initial measure. Through the other numbers the doors were strictly guarded. For the first time almost, in a season that has now two-thirds of its course, both audience listened undisturbed by the inept or less admission of the tardy. Agreed the task is considerable. There are eight entrances to be watched—a prising number: but as the event passes twice over, with a little discipline can be watched effectively.

From October through February breaches of the peace, and public private complaint over them, had steadily increased. Especially on Friday afternoons, and even when performing was in full tide, late-comers entered the hall without let or hindrance; moved leisurely to their chairs, not always near a door; settled themselves as audibly; in general and in particular perturbed the neighborhood. Worse still, at the pauses, however brief, in a symphony, a suite or a concerto, the doors opened and one or another moved, "dignified and stately," to his or her place; while conductor or orchestra waited their pleasure with uplifted hands or ready lips. As gossip had it, the climax came when one late-comer paused twice in her course to exchange the time of day with acquaintances; while conductor, orchestra and audience waited, in weary politeness, for the end of these greetings.

No wonder complaint multiplied to the management; while the venerable sage of the program-book protested openly and warrantably "in the public prints." Now, at last, discipline is restored; the doors are firmly guarded; many are returning thanks. All of which is not to say that the Symphony Concerts, being occasions for pleasure, should be little bound with "house rules." It is to note only that two audiences of prompt and considerate listeners should be protected against the few who decline to be equally considerate.

Nineteenth Programme

THURSDAY EVENING, MARCH 19, at 8.15 o'clock

FRIDAY AFTERNOON, MARCH 20, at 2.30 o'clock

Mendelssohn Incidental Music to Shakespeare's
"A Midsummer Night's Dream"
a. Overture.
b. Scherzo.

Honegger Symphony
I. Allegro marcato.
II. Adagio.
III. Presto.

Tchaikovsky Concerto for Pianoforte No. 1, in B-flat minor, Op. 23
I. Allegro non troppo e molto maestoso; Allegro con spirito.
II. Andantino semplice; Allegro vivace assai.
III. Allegro con fuoco.

Strauss Salome's Dance from the Opera "Salome"

SOLOIST
VLADIMIR HOROWITZ

There will be an intermission after the symphony

Two free lectures on the Bach Festival:
Thursday, March 19, at 4:30—Bach's Choral Music (G. Wallace Woodworth)
Thursday, March 26, at 4:30—Instrumental works of the Festival (R. G. Appel)
(Lecture Hall, Boston Public Library)

VLADIMIR HOROWITZ

SYMPHONY AT HEIGHT OF POWERS

Concert Last Night
Most Brilliant in Many Years

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

Whether or not there is some special virtue in performing a task at an unaccustomed time, it is a fact that the Symphony Concert, which, because of rehearsals for the impending Bach Festival, took place last evening instead of tomorrow evening as in regular course, was one of the most brilliant not merely of this season but of many seasons.

EXUBERANT VIRTUOSITY

From the very outset it was a stirring evening. First upon the programme stood the Overture and Scherzo out of Mendelssohn's music for Shakspeare's "A Midsummer Night's Dream," repertory pieces, both part of the routine of this orchestra as of every orchestra worthy the name. Yet, last evening, this music was played with a tonal finish, a mingling of lightness, speed and clarity, to which was added a certain exuberant virtuosity that was irresistible.

At the conclusion of the Scherzo the applauding audience was not satisfied until Dr. Koussevitzky had twice summoned the players to their feet, and twice made Mr. Laurent bow his acknowledgements of the plaudits that at least to some extent were prompted by his extraordinary fleet delivery of the measures for solo flute.

Honegger Again

On top of Mendelssohn, and on the score of having something to say and saying it without a superfluous syllable the juxtaposition was not flattering to the contemporary composer, there came a repetition of the Symphony of Honegger, one of the pieces commissioned for this 50 anniversary year of the Symphony Orchestra. Almost did Dr. Koussevitzky and his men persuade the sceptical listener last evening that after all this Symphony was more than the work of an able and resourceful craftsman who had a task to perform and in the performance of it relied more upon formulae than upon what is commonly called inspiration. But there are formulae in modern music, some of them the creation of Mr. Honegger himself, and in this Symphony they are duly paraded, occasionally to a sort of nervous excitement if not to anything more abiding.

The concert was to end with a performance of the Dance of Salome, from Strauss' opera of that name, that far and away eclipsed any performance of this music hitherto heard in Symphony Hall. But this, which might have been climax indeed for most concerts, could hardly be more than anti-climax to that which had immediately preceded it; Vladimir Horowitz, Dr. Koussevitzky and the orchestra carrying all before them in a performance of Tchaikovsky's B-flat minor Pianoforte Concerto that also for overpowering and intoxicating brilliance had no Bostonian precedent.

Horowitz the Master

It was with this Concerto that Mr. Horowitz swept from off its feet his first American audience, which heard him in a concert of the Philharmonic Orchestra in Carnegie Hall a few seasons ago. Then, as was the case last evening, the immediate excitant of the frenzied applause which could not wait for the last note to sound was the amazing, the almost incredible speed with which Mr. Horowitz delivered the celebrated passage in double octaves that occurs just before the end.

Yet, although this sort of super-virtuosity distinguished his playing of the Concerto from first to last, his performance was quite as notable for grace and delicacy, for musicianly phrasing, indeed for all the qualities that a well-rounded interpretation and performance of such a piece requires. Six times Mr. Horowitz was recalled to the stage by a stamping, clapping audience, that finally let him go only because the hour was late. And when Dr. Koussevitzky returned to the stage to lead the music of Strauss the applause deservedly broke out afresh.

278

By PHILIP HALE

The 19th concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra, Dr. Koussevitzky conductor, took place last night in Symphony hall. The program was as follows: Mendelssohn, Overture and Scherzo from the incidental music to "A Midsummer Night's Dream." Honegger, Symphony. Tchaikovsky, Piano Concerto No. 1 in B flat minor (Vladimir Horowitz, pianist). Strauss, Dance of The Seven Veils from the opera "Salome."

The fame of Mendelssohn has had its ups and downs and again its ups. It was natural that after the slobbering adoration of the English, there should be a reaction, but he did not deserve the contempt with which his amiable music was treated in certain quarters. Most surprising of all the shifting opinions is the favoring attitude of the wild-eyed members of the younger French school, who speak approvingly of him—in a somewhat patronizing manner—at the expense of Cesar Franck and his disciples, who, it is true, are more or less irritating in their sermonizing. The man that wrote the music for Shakespeare's comedy, the overture to "Fingal's Cave" and the "Walpurgis Night" is not to be ignored, even in 1931. Some might think that the overture was performed last night in a too heroic vein—as if there were profound "meaning" in the comedy and the music, but all would agree that the Scherzo was played delightfully; so delightfully that the audience insisted twice on the players standing with several recalls for the conductor.

Honegger's symphony was brought out for the second time this season. The first movement seemed again to be ineffectively ugly and impotently bombastic. The fine ideas in the slow movement are at times curiously perverted, and in a labored manner. In the Finale one finds Honegger at his best, and not only by reason of the lovely, peaceful final measures, the calm after the "sturm und drang," the roaring of the billows and the howling of the winds.

With every performance of Tchaikovsky's concerto the wonder grows that after the launching of his imposing, inspiring theme, he threw it aside carelessly as a little thing of his own, but not worthy of reappearance or development. The announcement, whether it is made by the orchestra or by the pianist, is a cruel blow to legitimate expectation of what will be done with this theme. Mr. Horowitz gave a remarkable virtuoso interpretation of the concerto, remarkable for brilliance and dash. An interpretation that excited admiration and tumultuous applause on account of the display of technical proficiency, whenever Tchaikovsky is emotional, whenever he puts on the poet's robe,

ARTHUR HONEGGER

Mr. Horowitz leaves us cold. He is an illustrious member of the school that regards the piano first of all as a huge percussion instrument. But one can sing emotionally as well as melodiously on a piano, and Mr. Horowitz, with all his technical proficiency, his strength, his fire, has not a singing tone. It is said that he more or less recently went to Berlin, where his impetuosity was somewhat chastened; but the pedagogues in that city are not the ones to turn a virtuoso—in the common meaning of that word—into an emotional or even a mildly poetic pianist. Dr. Koussevitzky and the orchestra gave an accompaniment that was marvelous, and when the composer called on them for song, they sang.

An engrossing performance of Salome's dance brought the end to an interesting concert that will be repeated this afternoon.

The programs of Friday afternoon, March 27, and Saturday evening, March 28, belong to the Bach festival in memory of Henry L. Higginson, the founder of the orchestra.

Friday afternoon Suite No. 3, D major; Concerto for two violins (Messrs. Burgin and Theodorowicz), and two cantatas, "Ich bin ein guter Hirt" and half of "O Ewigkeit, du Donnerwort" sung by the Bach Cantata Club. On Saturday night the program will comprise the Easter cantata, "Christ lag in Todesbanden," the Brandenburg concerto No. 5, preludes and fugues to be played by Mr. Borovsky, and the cantata "Ein feste Burg ist unser Gott." The solo singers will be Mmes. Evans and Matzenauer; Messrs. Crooks and Gange.

279

Modernisms, Mendelssohn And Horowitz

Chaikovsky's Piano-Concerto In the Grand Manner Evening of Styles

SUBSCRIBERS to the Symphony Concerts are a docile, understanding folk. Being told that the evening concert of this week would be shifted from Saturday to Thursday—to gain three clear days for preparation of the Bach Festival—they came to Symphony Hall, yesterday, in the usual numbers, if not in the usual sartorial splendor. In return for this good will they received a concert that pleased them much; that in one item quite transported them. It began with the Overture from Mendelssohn's music to Shakespeare's "A Midsummer Night's Dream." After a lengthy pause for the seating of the tardy, Dr. Koussevitzky went on to the Scherzo, which fills the first entr'acte in the comedy. His reason for the addition of this pendant was not too clear. It seemed, in fact, rather an anti-climax. Both pieces, however, won hearty applause—the more for the performance. Next followed a repetition of Honegger's Symphony, contributed to the jubilee year of the orchestra, first heard at a pair of concerts last month. If a considerable part of the audience no more than "bore with it," as many listened eagerly and clapped warmly. Perhaps Dr. Koussevitzky is of the same mind as was Theodore Thomas when he was introducing Wagner to American ears. "They do not like him?" he said tersely. "They shall hear him until they do." The dance of Salome from Strauss's like-named opera ended the concert. It is frequent and dependable item in the current repertory: was received accordingly.

Immediately before climax had come in the performance of Chaikovsky's Piano-Concerto in B-flat minor, with Mr. Horowitz as pianist. Through five seasons it has not been heard at Symphony Hall. Mr. Horowitz, in particular, ex-debut in the United States at New York. At each pause the audience outplaudits. At each pause the audience out-plaudits. At the end shouts and applause swelled them. The pianist lay long over the conductor's hand; the clapping orchestra; returned and again. Nor did Dr. Koussevitzky go unrewarded—and the orchestra with him—when he resumed his to begin Salome's dance. For the had been triply divided. Through-conductor, pianist and orchestra had the Concerto in the grand manner—layed above themselves. Some- in the departing crowd that it e last of such concertos to be writ- d to keep place in the repertory. ibering the half-century upon its wo that overheard tried to recall an- and failed.

Koussevitzky and Mr. Horowitz he Introduction broadly, intensive- orously. The pianist spaced out eeping melody; gave it ample con- sive rhythm, imperious march. riving chords rang. The stride c's gors of the orchestra matched ergies of the pianist. Together rained a truly Chaikovskian sus- at the transition into the Allegro. embarked upon it, pianist and com- passioned themselves for the con- tumultuous rhetoric; sang the melody not only "con spirito" but entimento." Mr. Horowitz added to feat in the manifold cadenza; Dr. Koussevitzky drove the final es fast and high to be climax to swelling whole. Twenty minutes orical magnificence. Both s eloquent as might be with the tune of the slow movement; but eady to turn to the badinage and ion of the pseudo-Scherzo.

accomplished with a light hand, ere free to wreak themselves upon nule, first in the repetitions and ons of the snapping folk-tune; n the crescendo upon crescendo itomize the concerto, and drive it end boiling in a whirlpool of ed sound. Ten, possibly fifteen, s more of rhetorical magnificence. the only way with Chaikovsky. im passionately, intensively, re- antly and this Piano-Concerto— of melody and rhetoric that it is, uel than symphony between piano hestra—exceeds its literal self. Dr. vitzky and Mr. Horowitz are per- believers. The grand style may still its wonders.

as, indeed, an evening for style. ide for the moment the unstaled ess and fancy of Mendelssohn's m- a and suggestion in the Overture Midsummer Night's Dream," and perfectly every measure is written!

By PHILIP HALE

The 19th concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra, Dr. Koussevitzky conductor, took place last night in Symphony hall. The program was as follows: Mendelssohn, Overture and Scherzo from the incidental music to "A Midsummer Night's Dream." Honegger, Symphony. Tchaikovsky, Piano Concerto No. 1 in B flat minor (Vladimir Horowitz, pianist). Strauss, Dance of The Seven Veils from the opera "Salome."

The fame of Mendelssohn has had its ups and downs and again its ups. It was natural that after the slobbering adoration of the English, there should be a reaction, but he did not deserve the contempt with which his amiable music was treated in certain quarters. Most surprising of all the shifting opinions is the favoring attitude of the wild-eyed members of the younger French school, who speak approvingly of him—in a somewhat patronizing manner—at the expense of Cesar Franck and his disciples, who, it is true, are more or less irritating in their sermonizing. The man that wrote the music for Shakespeare's comedy, the overture to "Fingal's Cave" and the "Walpurgis Night" is not to be ignored even in 1931. Some might think that the overture was performed last night in a too heroic vein—as if there were profound "meaning" in the comedy and the music, but all would agree that the Scherzo was played delightfully; so delightfully that the audience insisted twice on the players standing with several recalls for the conductor.

Honegger's symphony was brought out for the second time this season. The first movement seemed again to be ineffectively ugly and impotently bombastic. The fine ideas in the slow movement are at times curiously perverted, and in a labored manner. In the Finale one finds Honegger at his best, and not only by reason of the lovely, peaceful final measures, the calm after the "sturm and drang," the roaring of the billows and the howling of the winds.

With every performance of Tchaikovsky's concerto the wonder grows that after the launching of his imposing, inspiring theme, he threw it aside carelessly as a little thing of his own, but not worthy of reappearance or development. The announcement, whether it is made by the orchestra or by the pianist, is a cruel blow to legitimate expectation of what will be done with this theme. Mr. Horowitz gave a remarkable virtuoso interpretation of the concerto, remarkable for brilliance and dash. An interpretation that excited admiration and tumultuous applause on account of the display of technical proficiency, whenever Tchaikovsky is emotional, whenever he puts on the poet's robe,

ARTHUR HONEGGER

Mr. Horowitz leaves us cold. He is an illustrious member of the school that regards the piano first of all as a huge percussion instrument. But one can sing emotionally as well as melodiously on a piano, and Mr. Horowitz, with all his technical proficiency, his strength, his fire, has not a singing tone. It is said that he more or less recently went to Berlin, where his impetuosity was somewhat chastened; but the pedagogues in that city are not the ones to turn a virtuoso—in the common meaning of that word—into an emotional or even a mildly poetic pianist. Dr. Koussevitzky and the orchestra gave an accompaniment that was marvelous, and when the composer called on them for song, they sang.

An engrossing performance of Salome's dance brought the end to an interesting concert that will be repeated this afternoon.

The programs of Friday afternoon, March 27, and Saturday evening, March 28, belong to the Bach festival in memory of Henry L. Higginson, the founder of the orchestra.

Friday afternoon Suite No. 3, D major; Concerto for two violins (Messrs. Burgin and Theodorowicz), and two cantatas, "Ich bin ein guter Hirt" and half of "O Ewigkeit, du Donnerwort" sung by the Bach Cantata Club. On Saturday night the program will comprise the Easter cantata, "Christ lag in Todesbanden;" the Brandenburg concerto No. 5, preludes and fugues to be played by Mr. Borovsky, and the cantata "Ein feste Burg ist unser Gott." The solo singers will be Mmes. Evans and Matzenauer; Messrs. Crooks and Gange.

Modern Stil

Mend

Anc

Chaikovsky's

In the G

Evenin

SUBSCRIBER

Concerts are ing folk. Be- ing concert be shifted from Sa- to gain three clear- of the Bach Festi- phony Hall, yester- bers, if not in the- dor. In return fo- received a conce- much; that in one- them. It began w- Mendelssohn's m- fantasia, "A Midsu- After a lengthy pi- the tardy, Dr. Ko- the Scherzo, which- in the comedy. E- tion of this pend- It seemed, in fact- Both pieces, how- plause—the more- Next followed a m- Symphony, contr- year of the orch- pair of concerts to siderable part of or than "bore with it- uly and clapped id- Koussevitzky is on- Theodore Thomas- ing Wagner to A- not like him?" A- shall hear him ed- dance of Salome- named opera end- frequent and de- current repertory- ingly.

Immediately be- in the perform- Piano-Concerto in- Horowitz as pian- sons it has not b- Hall. Mr. Hor- debut in the n- York. At each number spoken beginn- George Standis- gess of- ly They- to last- bers w- that th- The wo- on this- gess su- number- the tim-

Will N

It w- votes t- ment, p- estimat- daily a- and 22- gether, notwith- active e- Wedne- believe-gas tu- borrow- prising- whenever- floor of-

It is- some lo- courage- against-

There- Means- on the- by Gove- erection- gency u- the hie- up. Al- beginn- ter, on- further- tive fac-

If the- through- report- of the

New York. At each pause the audience out-poured plaudits. At the end shouts and stamping swelled them. The pianist lingered long over the conductor's hand; saluted the clapping orchestra; returned again and again. Nor did Dr. Koussevitzky go unrewarded—and the orchestra with him—when he resumed his place to begin Salome's dance. For the merit had been triply divided. Throughout conductor, pianist and orchestra had taken the Concerto in the grand manner; played above themselves. Someone said in the departing crowd that it was the last of such concertos to be written and to keep place in the repertory. Remembering the half-century upon its head, two that overheard tried to recall another and failed.

Dr. Koussevitzky and Mr. Horovitz took the Introduction broadly, intensively, sonorously. The pianist spaced out the sweeping melody; gave it ample contours, incisive rhythm, imperious march. The driving chords rang. The stride and the vigor of the orchestra matched the energies of the pianist. Together they gained a truly Chaikovskian suspense at the transition into the Allegro. Once embarked upon it, pianist and conductor passioned themselves for the composer's tumultuous rhetoric; sang the second melody not only "con spirito" but "con sentimento." Mr. Horovitz added fervor to feat in the manifold cadenza; with Dr. Koussevitzky drove the final measures fast and high to be climax to the upswelling whole. Twenty minutes of rhetorical magnificence. Both were as eloquent as might be with the wistful tune of the slow movement; but quite ready to turn to the badinage and decoration of the pseudo-Scherzo.

This accomplished with a light hand, they were free to wreak themselves upon the Finale, first in the repetitions and variations of the snapping folk-tune; then in the crescendo upon crescendo that epitomize the concerto, and drive it to the end boiling in a whirlpool of rhythmed sound. Ten, possibly fifteen, minutes more of rhetorical magnificence. It is the only way with Chaikovsky. Play him passionately, intensively, reverberantly and this Piano-Concerto—tumult of melody and rhetoric that it is, more duel than symphony between piano and orchestra—exceeds its literal self. Dr. Koussevitzky and Mr. Horovitz are fervid believers. The grand style may still work its wonders.

It was, indeed, an evening for style. Set aside for the moment the unstaled freshness and fancy of Mendelssohn's invention and suggestion in the Overture to "A Midsummer Night's Dream," and how perfectly every measure is written!

To this day the chords for wind choir at the beginning and the end keep their loveliness. The text books on orchestration still cite them. The modern makers of light-footed, light-pointed Scherzi have not outdone this "fairv-music" of the eighteen-twenties. The main body of the Overture gains shape, volume and momentum; while we listeners forget the composer's skill in the interest of the progress. A turn of his finger and the charm of the sound takes us captive. Whether he had much or little to say, Mendelssohn had a most sensitive flair for wind instruments. (The flute-part in the Scherzo is crowning proof.) He laid as deft and fine a hand upon the strings. The brass was his discreet reserve.

Whatever the thought, the mood, the fleeting fancy, the passing humor, Mendelssohn gives it, through all this "Midsummer Night's Dream" music, the one and only tonal vesture. At such perfect expression time gnaws in vain. The musical fashions pass by and leave not a dent behind. In Overture and Scherzo, moreover, Mendelssohn had something to express. Likely enough, the more clownish Shakspearean humors evade him. It was not in him to imagine these "mechanicals" at their fooleries. But when the wood of the fairies and the lovers is the field, he outbids Shakspeare on his own ground. Oberon and Titania—and how well or ill the players look such personages. "I know a bank whereon the wild thyme grows" . . . the actor's diction may be faulty or pleasurable. For speech and speakers, for fairy princes and fairy troop Mendelssohn had the magic of musical sound and to this day it prevails.

And, by good fortune last evening, an orchestra and a conductor to renew that spell, save only when they overswelled the full-throated measures; so distorted proportion. An hour later, they were busy with Salome's Dance according to Strauss, with his six horns, five clarinets, four kettledrums, what not out of the orchestral store-closet. The dance sways languorously; swirls fiercely; sounds with the lust of the flesh, the dreams of desire, the weariness of impotent longing. The orchestral imagination, the orchestral manipulation, are masterly. The whole dance is superlative "theater." The final flourish sounds equally for the triumphant Strauss and the triumphant Salome. Around the year 2010 their dance will be as old as is now the Overture to "A Midsummer Night's Dream." Will orchestras still be playing it and audiences making response? Will it still keep lead of g and theatric force as arm of coerture now preserves proposition and formal perfection? sures to romers to Paradise will report th

the gove ing in these days about any. Aching ears and ot listen to reason. For modernisms leave only behind; worse still as those who profess, honest and won. In to the rich, Rabelaisian ie vigors, of the Finale rt that it is a vulgar to the gentle close in urns away and sighs nce, and they answer nny affectation. Re- e slow movement may

—A sharp, yet still excite and tions, comat there is a new mel- own in th old—and they recoil h 18 whethem that the restless On Mardnning are spur to the 4,548, a dm: that the dissonan- t. stimulating; that the ctions thives forward and up- tax collewould transmute into ly will lake brute-force of a t year. Northwith they descant ataled $55rituality of music. outed to tlsruer that Honegger eductions od and purpose; that t started accomplishment must is right, like every an increa: his own idiom—and morrow fat "the mark of the r the dat it is no sin to write e's time, that such

March inescapable—and the th to $19 for ivory towers. Yet 11,200,558 ir to hear Honegger's March. 193ok down Bromfield al year hadernist building that apared wit the prospect. It is ed of 193ade in its image deficit frofeel it. So may we March Honegger's Symphony. that dapurselves, gathering apared wiund figs of thistles. y last yea upon our tongues—

H. T. P.

lampshire

HOROWITZ HEARD AT SYMPHONY CONCERT

Russian Pianist Applauded in Tchaikovsky Concerto

Vladimir Horowitz, the Russian pianist, whose previous appearances in Boston have been sensationally successful, was applauded with unusual vehemence at yesterday's Boston Symphony concert for his remarkably brilliant performance in Tchaikovsky's B-flat minor concerto. The audience stamped and cheered, recalling him a number of times.

The rest of Dr Koussevitzky's program included the overture and scherzo from Mendelssohn's "Midsummer Night's Dream" music, a repetition of Honegger's new symphony, written for the Boston Symphony's anniversary, and first performed last month; and the dance of Salome, from Richard Strauss' opera.

Tchaikovsky's concerto is preeminently a show piece. It affords a virtuoso pianist and a first-rate orchestra a legitimate opportunity for the display of technique. Yet the music is neither dry nor dull in itself. Its melody may be banal, its rhythms may lack subtlety and refinement, but behind this music there is a composer whose emotions, if undisciplined, were far from rapid. Dr Koussevitzky excels in just such pieces as this. So does Mr Horowitz. Between them they gave an astonishing, even a magnificent interpretation, conveying the full frenzy of passion and conquering with apparent ease every difficulty. If such "stunts" as this are to be performed, they should always be done as superlatively as this one was yesterday.

Rhythmic Vitality

Honegger's symphony at a second hearing again impressed one by its rhythmic vitality and the audacities of its melody and harmony. This music is at times almost impudently unconventional. The composer still, perhaps, takes a boyish delight in startling the conservatives. But he has written with gusto, and with unflagging imaginative power. The finale is the weakest of the three movements. The adagio would gain by compression, though its rather short-breathed melodies are genuinely moving.

This symphony seems to be a masterpiece, though doubtless that word is too lightly used by reviewers these days. One imagines it has a chance of remaining in the standard orchestral repertory. The performance was clear and seemingly faithful to both the letter and the spirit of the score. Dr Koussevitzky has obviously, as is his wont with new music, spared no labor on preparing and rehearsing Honegger's music.

Of the two repertory pieces played, the dance from Strauss' "Salome" was the more brilliantly interpreted. What strikes one about this fragment torn from its operatic context is the astonishing brilliance of the scoring for orchestra, the complexities and sonorities of the music. One cannot hear in it the morbid passion of the daughter of Herodias. Like the play by Oscar Wilde, on which it is based, this "Salome" now seems the height of artifice rather than genuine art.

Beautiful Overture

Mendelssohn's beautiful overture, one of the works which prove him to be a great composer despite his detractors, was given a rather heavy handed and not perfectly accurate performance. From the opening chords of the wood wind, which the orchestra failed to attack cleanly, through a good deal of the piece the players were now and again not quite together. No doubt rehearsal time had been absorbed by the other numbers, and by the Bach festival in prospect.

The scherzo from "A Midsummer Night's Dream," played far more deftly and neatly than the overture, was very heartily applauded. Dr Koussevitzky bade the orchestra rise and bow at the end.

Next week's subscription concerts in the Friday and Saturday series are part of the Bach festival, though the general public cannot procure tickets. Hence the programs are devoted exclusively to the works of Bach, and the Saturday concert has a different set of pieces from those to be heard Friday.

P. R..

To this day the chords for wind and the beginning and the end keep loveliness. The text books on oration still cite them. The modern of light-footed, light-pointed Scherz not outdone this "fair-music" eighteen-twenties. The main body Overture gains shape, volume a momentum; while we listeners for composer's skill in the interest progress. A turn of his finger charm of the sound takes us. Whether he had much or little Mendelssohn had a most sensit for wind instruments. (The it in the Scherzo is crowning prod laid as deft and fine a hand up strings. The brass was his reserve.

Whatever the thought, the mo fleeting fancy, the passing humo delssohn gives it, through all th summer Night's Dream" music, and only tonal vesture. At such expression time gnaws in vain. T sical fashions pass by and leave dent behind. In Overture and S moreover, Mendelssohn had some express. Likely enough, the more ish Shakspearean humors evade it was not in him to imagine the symphonic sound the brute-force of a "chanicals" at their fooleries. Bu mechanistic age. Forthwith they descant the wood of the fairies and the lo on the inherent spirituality of music. the field, he outbids Shakspeare Little use to answer that Honegger own ground. Oberon and Titan was of another mood and purpose; that how well or ill the players look suby his design his accomplishment must sonages. "I know a bank where be judged. Urge his right, like every wild thyme grows" . . . the other composer, to his own idiom—and diction may be faulty or pleasurab the distressed call it "the mark of the speech and speakers, for fairy beast." Suggest that it is no sin to write and fairy troop Mendelssohn h in the spirit of one's time, that such magic of musical sound and to t time-spirit may be unescapable—and the scornful depart to their ivory towers. Yet some of us will prefer to hear Honegger's

And, by good fortune last e some of us will prefer to hear Honegger's an orchestra and a conductor to Symphony as we look down Bromfield that spell, save only when the Street toward the modernist building that swelled the full-throated measu now fills and crowns the prospect. It a distorted proportion. An hour of our time and made in its image. they were busy with Salome's. As such we see and feel it. So may we according to Strauss, with his six also hear and feel Honegger's Symphony. five clarinets, four kettledrums, w Perhaps we deceive ourselves, gathering out of the orchestral store-closet grapes from thorns and figs of thistles. dance sways languorously; swirls f But the savor is good upon our tongues— sounds with the lust of the fle and in our ears. H. T. P.

dreams of desire, the weariness potent longing. The orchestral imagination, the orchestral manipulation, are masterly. The whole dance is superlative "theater." The final flourish sounds equally for the triumphant Strauss and the triumphant Salome. Around the year 2010 their dance will be as old as is now the Overture to "A Midsummer Night's Dream." Will orchestras still be playing it and audiences making response? Will it still keep musical pungency and theatric force as Mendelssohn's overture now preserves freshness, fancy and formal perfection? Perhaps the newcomers to Paradise will remember.

There is no arguing in these days about Honegger's Symphony. Aching ears and racked spirits do not listen to reason. For such hearers his modernisms leave only blind resentment behind; worse still as blind a disbelief in those who profess, honestly enough, to be stirred and won. Invite the dissenters to the rich, Rabelaisian mood, the gamesome vigors, of the Finale and they will retort that it is a vulgar music. Bid them to the gentle close in which Honegger turns away and sighs his music into silence, and they answer that it is catch-penny affectation. Remind them that the slow movement may be acrid to the ear, yet still excite and deepen emotion; that there is a new melody as well as an old—and they recoil with disgust. Tell them that the restless rhythms of the beginning are spur to the listening imagination; that the dissonances are savory and stimulating; that the whole movement drives forward and upward as though it would transmute into symphonic sound the brute-force of a mechanistic age. Forthwith they descant on the inherent spirituality of music. Little use to answer that Honegger was of another mood and purpose; that his design his accomplishment must be judged. Urge his right, like every other composer, to his own idiom—and the distressed call it "the mark of the speech and speakers, for fairy beast." Suggest that it is no sin to write in the spirit of one's time, that such magic of musical sound and to time-spirit may be unescapable—and the scornful depart to their ivory towers. Yet some of us will prefer to hear Honegger's Symphony as we look down Bromfield Street toward the modernist building that now fills and crowns the prospect. It is a distorted proportion. An hour of our time and made in its image. As such we see and feel it. So may we also hear and feel Honegger's Symphony. Perhaps we deceive ourselves, gathering out of the orchestral store-closet grapes from thorns and figs of thistles. But the savor is good upon our tongues— and in our ears.

H. T. P.

HOROWITZ HEARD AT SYMPHONY CONCERT

Russian Pianist Applauded in Tchaikovsky Concerto

Vladimir Horowitz, the Russian pianist, whose previous appearances in Boston have been sensationally successful, was applauded with unusual vehemence at yesterday's Boston Symphony concert for his remarkably brilliant performance in Tchaikovsky's B-flat minor concerto. The audience stamped and cheered, recalling him a number of times.

The rest of Dr Koussevitzky's program included the overture and scherzo from Mendelssohn's "Midsummer Night's Dream" music, a repetition of Honegger's new symphony, written for the Boston Symphony's anniversary, and first performed last month; and the dance of Salome, from Richard Strauss' opera.

Tchaikovsky's concerto is preeminently a show piece. It affords a virtuoso pianist and a first-rate orchestra a legitimate opportunity for the display of technique. Yet the music is neither dry nor dull in itself. Its melody may be banal, its rhythms may lack subtlety and refinement, but behind this music there is a composer whose emotions, if undisciplined, were far from rapid. Dr Koussevitzky excels in just such pieces as this. So does Mr Horowitz. Between them they gave an astonishing, even a magnificent interpretation, conveying the full frenzy of passion and conquering with apparent ease every difficulty. If such "stunts" as this are to be performed, they should always be done as superlatively as this one was yesterday.

Rhythmic Vitality

Honegger's symphony at a second hearing again impressed one by its rhythmic vitality and the audacities of its melody and harmony. This music is at times almost impudently unconventional. The composer still, perhaps, takes a boyish delight in startling the conservatives. But he has written with gusto, and with unflagging imaginative power. The finale is the weakest of the three movements. The adagio would gain by compression, though its rather short-breathed melodies are genuinely moving.

This symphony seems to be a masterpiece, though doubtless that word is too lightly used by reviewers these days. One imagines it has a chance of remaining in the standard orchestral repertory. The performance was clear and seemingly faithful to both the letter and the spirit of the score. Dr Koussevitzky has obviously, as is his wont with new music, spared no labor on preparing and rehearsing Honegger's music.

Of the two repertory pieces played, the dance from Strauss' "Salome" was the more brilliantly interpreted. What strikes one about this fragment torn from its operatic context is the astonishing brilliance of the scoring for orchestra, the complexities and sonarities of the music. One cannot hear in it the morbid passion of the daughter of Herodias. Like the play by Oscar Wilde, on which it is based, this "Salome" now seems the height of artifice rather than genuine art.

Beautiful Overture

Mendelssohn's beautiful overture, one of the works which prove him to be a great composer despite his detractors, was given a rather heavy handed and not perfectly accurate performance. From the opening chords of the wood wind, which the orchestra failed to attack cleanly, through a good deal of the piece the players were now and again not quite together. No doubt rehearsal time had been absorbed by the other numbers, and by the Bach festival in prospect.

The scherzo from "A Midsummer Night's Dream," played far more deftly and neatly than the overture, was very heartily applauded. Dr Koussevitzky bade the orchestra rise and bow at the end.

Next week's subscription concerts in the Friday and Saturday series are part of the Bach festival, though the general public cannot procure tickets. Hence the programs are devoted exclusively to the works of Bach, and the Saturday concert has a different set of pieces from those to be heard Friday.

P. R.

Boston Symphony Orchestra

Last night in Symphony Hall, the Boston Symphony Orchestra gave, by exception, the first of its regular weekly pair of concerts. The second concert will take place as usual tomorrow afternoon. The soloist this week is Vladimir Horowitz, pianist, and the program comprises the Incidental Music to Shakespeare's "Midsummer Night's Dream" by Mendelssohn; the Symphony written by Honegger for the anniversary of this orchestra and repeated at this pair of concerts; the Tchaikovsky Piano Concerto No. 1, in B flat minor, Op. 23, and Salome's Dance from the Opera "Salome" by Richard Strauss.

Once in a long time the reviewer of concerts may find it difficult to write with sufficient restraint about that which is heard. The program under immediate review presents itself as one of those occasions. Cleverly contrived, it offered a galaxy of musical delights. It would seem that the Mendelssohn work had no surprises in store for the listener, yet last night's performance amply demonstrated what a discerning mind may accomplish with overfamiliar material, granted, of course, that the instrument for conveying sprightly ideas be as dexterous as our Boston orchestra. Dr. Koussevitzky achieved a triumph for himself, the orchestra and the composer, for seldom does it come the way of a Boston audience to hear this music proclaimed as last night. With a roar of applause the audience greeted the final measure, and before Dr. Koussevitzky had left the podium he "stood" his men, not once but twice. The audience would have it so.

The Honegger Symphony has been so recently reviewed in these columns that little may be said in addition. Obviously, music such as this requires a special technique in listening—a technique which too few listeners seem inclined to cultivate. Although this composer, in common with others of the so-called modern school, appears to delight in shattering a consonant atmosphere, he nevertheless observes

the traditions in his musical structures, evidently believing that some good may be salvaged from the discard heap of some of his contemporaries. Naturally the result is of more than passing interest, especially as Mr. Honegger is not above injecting into his music a definite and at times very beautiful melodic line, together with quite unmodern but beautiful harmony. The performance last night may hardly be overpraised.

With Mr. Horowitz, however, came the peak of enthusiasm both in the auditorium and on the platform. Repeating our opening sentence, we reaffirm that "once in a long time" comes a demonstration at a symphony concert comparable to that which took place last night. Mr. Horowitz has never played better. His alertness in taking advantage of the potent opportunities offered by the piano of today was never more in evidence; he appears to draw from the instrument that tremendous volume of tone which, for instance, came in the opening measures of the concerto. He never belabors his instrument, yet roll upon roll of tone proceeds from it, cutting through the rich orchestration of the accompaniment. We counted five reappearances of this master pianist after the concerto; then we lost count.

Anything which followed the Tchaikovsky concerto must have been in the nature of an anticlimax, yet upon his appearance such a storm of applause greeted Dr. Koussevitzky that before he proceeded to "Salome's Dance" he again brought his men to their feet for a delayed tribute to their superb accompaniment to the concerto. And then, to music already familiar, he brought a performance which fittingly closed in memorable manner the nineteenth program of this season.

G. M. S.

SYMPHONY HALL, BOSTON

50th SEASON, 1930-1931

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

(110 Musicians)

Dr. SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY, Conductor

Opening Concert of the Monday Series
MONDAY EVENING, NOVEMBER 10, AT 8.15

PROGRAMME

Bach	Two Preludes (Arranged for String Orchestra by Pick-Mangiagalli)
Respighi	Metamorphoseon, Modi XII
Beethoven	Symphony No. 7 in A major

Boston Symphony Orchestra

Last night in Symphony Hall, the Boston Symphony Orchestra gave, by exception, the first of its regular weekly pair of concerts. The second concert will take place as usual tomorrow afternoon. The soloist this week is Vladimir Horowitz, pianist, and the program comprises the Incidental Music to Shakespeare's "Midsummer Night's Dream" by Mendelssohn; the Symphony written by Honegger for the anniversary of this orchestra and repeated at this pair of concerts; the Tchaikovsky Piano Concerto No. 1, in B flat minor, Op. 23, and Salome's Dance from the Opera "Salome" by Richard Strauss.

Once in a long time the reviewer of concerts may find it difficult to write with sufficient restraint about that which is heard. The program under immediate review presents itself as one of those occasions. Cleverly contrived, it offered a galaxy of musical delights. It would seem that the Mendelssohn work had no surprises in store for the listener, yet last night's performance amply demonstrated what a discerning mind may accomplish with overfamiliar material, granted, of course, that the instrument for conveying sprightly ideas be as dexterous as our Boston orchestra. Dr. Koussevitzky achieved a triumph for himself, the orchestra and the composer, for seldom does it come the way of a Boston audience to hear this music proclaimed as last night. With a roar of applause the audience greeted the final measure, and before Dr. Koussevitzky had left the podium he "stood" his men, not once but twice. The audience would have it so.

The Honegger Symphony has been so recently reviewed in these columns that little may be said in addition. Obviously, music such as this requires a special technique in listening—a technique which too few listeners seem inclined to cultivate. Although this composer, in common with others of the so-called modern school, appears to delight in shattering a consonant atmosphere, he nevertheless observes

the traditions in his musical structures, evidently believing that some good may be salvaged from the discard heap of some of his contemporaries. Naturally the result is of more than passing interest, especially as Mr. Honegger is not above injecting into his music a definite and at times very beautiful melodic line, together with quite unmodern but beautiful harmony. The performance last night may hardly be overpraised.

With Mr. Horowitz, however, came the peak of enthusiasm both in the auditorium and on the platform. Repeating our opening sentence, we reaffirm that "once in a long time" comes a demonstration at a symphony concert comparable to that which took place last night. Mr. Horowitz has never played better. His alertness in taking advantage of the potent opportunities offered by the piano of today was never more in evidence; he appears to draw from the instrument that tremendous volume of tone which, for instance, came in the opening measures of the concerto. He never belabors his instrument, yet roll upon roll of tone proceeds from it, cutting through the rich orchestration of the accompaniment. We counted five reappearances of this master pianist after the concerto; then we lost count.

Anything which followed the Tchaikovsky concerto must have been in the nature of an anticlimax, yet upon his appearance such a storm of applause greeted Dr. Koussevitzky that before he proceeded to "Salome's Dance" he again brought his men to their feet for a delayed tribute to their superb accompaniment to the concerto. And then, to music already familiar, he brought a performance which fittingly closed in memorable manner the nineteenth program of this season. G. M. S.

SYMPHONY HALL, BOSTON

50th SEASON, 1930-1931

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

(110 Musicians)

Dr. SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY, Conductor

Opening Concert of the Monday Series
MONDAY EVENING, NOVEMBER 10, AT 8.15

PROGRAMME

Bach	Two Preludes (Arranged for String Orchestra by Pick-Mangiagalli)
Respighi	Metamorphoseon, Modi XII
Beethoven	Symphony No. 7 in A major

MONDAY SYMPHONY CONCERT

The second of this season's series of Monday evening concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra took place last night in the presence of an audience that filled Symphony hall. The amended program of the concert was as follows: Handel, concerto grosso in B minor for string orchestra, No. 12; Mozart, concerto in A major, No. 5 (K.219) for violin and orchestra; Brahms, symphony No. 2 in D major, op. 73. The soloist in Mozart's violin concerto was Anton Witek, former concert master of the orchestra. Its present concert master, Richard Burgin, conducted in the absence, due to indisposition, of Dr. Koussevitzky.

The central event of this concert was, of course, the reappearance as soloist of the man who occupied the concert master's desk under Dr. Muck. Mr. Witek was greeted with cordiality by last night's great audience, though it is probable that a very large proportion of those present had no personal experience of that epoch of the orchestra's history which Mr. Witek represents. His performance of the graceful A major concerto of Mozart had all the good taste and judicious musicianship that were to be expected; the tone he drew from his instrument was light and pure—admirably suited to Mozart's music. He was most pleasing in the flowing melody of the Adagio, and in the daintily-turned phrases of the final Tempo di Menuetto. He was very warmly applauded.

Mr. Burgin, as conductor, acquitted himself excellently in the concerto Grosso of Handel, with its impressive opening Largo, its Allegros full of character and contrapuntal interest, in the serene beauty of its lovely intermediate Larghetto and Largo. The contrasted character of the movements was emphasized without recourse to exaggeration; individually they were played with sensitive feeling for style and without mannerism. To the concerto he provided an admirable accompaniment.

Still better was the orchestra's performance, under his direction, of the D major symphony of Brahms. Much rancorous argument has lately arisen concerning the character, lyrical or dramatic, of this symphony. Mr. Burgin, however, seems to approach it without prejudice. Lyric charm was not wanting in his performance, yet he did not try to make of it a piece of Viennese cafe music. Depth and solidity, organic unity, a vigorous sense of progress and climax, gave meaning and dramatic force to the first movement. The slow movement had movingly expressive beauty, the allegretto a charming grace. The final movement was impressive and brilliant. Conductor and orchestra were rewarded with applause that was unusually and deservedly enthusiastic. S. S.

31
b. pkg. 29c
pkg. 10c pd 25c

CKINGS

lb box 10c oz pkg 9c
8 bars 25c
8 pkgs 25c
2 cans 25c

Comp
how

A&P

Lob

Horm

Toma's Wine Je

Grape Mince Me

Blue

nd Butter

Seasoning

Alino Cherri

Salad

Assorted Flavor

Peanuts

ait Oake

on's Mint

eel

Orange

figs

gs

California

ed Dates

R least you.

with Stravinsky

for the Fun of It

Feb. 14, 1931

no follow the Monday con-the Boston Symphony Or-looked twice at yesterday's ore they were ready to beey saw. The startling name ky. Usually the Monday con-conservative: Mozart, Beet-ikovsky and Wagner serve
The name most assiduously Stravinsky. Yet the evening ly and the heavens did not is more, Monday's audience apped the new Caprice for Orchestra and appeared to ud the exuberant
of the program, Strauss's phonia Domestica" elicited the loud-most prolonged applause, while introduction and Allegro for Orchestra had to be content with approval.

piece, which began the concert, most in its first pages. These measures of imposing breadth dignity. One imagined one felt in the sturdiness of British charac-Stately periods in unison and harvertical progression outlined repressive musical proposition cor-ending, in a way, to the introduction spoken oration. Then, lines joined;
ments grew to developed form: the plete statement rounded the case. It in the middle sections partaking of working-out" character that the ear ended, with slackening interest the power's scholarly processes. Perhaps and Mrs. Average Listener, familiar rally and community programs, exed some honest and obvious melodi-after the manner of "Pomp and umstance," and were disappointed.
by the end of the concert, Dr. Kousdelicate sense of program was apparent. Balance may d in instrumental effect as well and style. The "Symphonia
" for the full panoplied or-Stravinsky's Caprice for indirtuosity; Elgar's Introduction
ro for the sheen of the strings.
gs, indeed, gave an excellent of themselves in a performance lary precision, unanimity and tone. It is a peculiar joy to n play together with such uni-and expressiveness.

sky's Caprice has been received ue solemnity in its few perforoutside of Boston. It is doubtful composer intended to be taken so Last evening it sounded as written for the pure sport of it.
n cheek, it makes play with hythms and tonal poses. The g woodwinds and chirping piano ly satirical slant. Questions and quips and cranks, mock glovigor of the opening theme is not sonorities chortle

e. No one less than Stravinsky
a reign to irre-
nificant" materi-
of the term, it seriousness and re its motivating
er has called it a
is. As a conces-is wit would have had Stravinsky's
a half. Nothing
thy. Aside from nromá's brilliant no part won inrauss is solid and er who does not a Domestica" and ud the exuberant
with humanity;
universal musical remains the supon previous oc-
tzky's interpreta-nplified anew his lyrical and the sic itself reveals unexcelled among
s, so Dr. Kousse-ormance disclosed
stic dramatist of
N. M. J.

sonorities chortle
e. No one less than Stravinsky
a reign to irre-
nificant" materi-
of the term, it seriousness and
re its motivating
er has called it a
is. As a conces-
is wit would have had Stravinsky's
a half. Nothing
thy. Aside from nromá's brilliant
no part won in-

rauss is solid and er who does not
a Domestica" and ud the exuberant
with humanity;
universal musical remains the su-
pon previous oc-
tzky's interpreta-
nplified anew his lyrical and the
sic itself reveals unexcelled among
s, so Dr. Kousse-
ormance disclosed
stic dramatist of
N. M. J.

ONY CONCERT

the current series concerts of the Orchestra, which
Dr. Koussevitzky
following program:
and allegro for 47; Stravinsky,
o and orchestra
Sanroma); Strauss,
ca, op. 53. The large.
dignified figure of looks like a re-ted and half-for-background of con-music. English intervals revive the ess and deplore the orchestras to per-
Edward J. Dent, earned of English en went so far as trait in full court
as frontispiece to Adolf Weissmann's
of Modern Music."

to think of any se work is more reblems than that of
of Brahms. At is moments of vigor his melody, ex-ven quality, reveals dual and recogniz-Enigma Variations"
ner; the "Introducplayed yesterday is Elgar draws a rich string orchestra for written. But the

herent interest; the hat forms its princi-vincing and of poor
ment to which the s treated has little e or beauty; the ical and dry, but hat the manner in d—uniformly loud, ination between the subsidiary strands
ure—was not such it or to any other al music.

the orchestra ben excellent perfor-
y's "Capriccio"—a n a year old. The
is rich in "Capric-
m deserve the title
Stravinsky's. Not astic rhythms and noods is it capri-multuous movement;
ironical conglom-
musical styles and nd jumbled togethllusions and imita-erg and Johann
of the present day.
ng and somewhat ironic intent is

nia Domestica" was
y Dr. Koussevitzky
It was a perfor-passed that given concerts of the Friday and Sat-Orchestra, which was possible to enughly both as a ment—the product of an unsurpassed sman in sound—utiful and almost ing piece of mu-been so possible ction that this is he composer. The adly nthusiastic.
1931. S. S.

The second of the Monday evening concert by the Symphony Orchestra last night in the presence of a large audience that filled Symphony Hall was a program of the following: Handel, concerto for string orchestra; Mozart, concerto in A major for violin and orchestra; Beethoven, symphony No. 2 in D major; soloist in Mozart's "Don Giovanni," Anton Witek, former soloist of the orchestra. The concertmaster, Richard B. Lewis, was in the absence, due to illness, of Koussevitzky.

The central event of course, the reappearance of the man who occupies master's desk under Witek was greeted last night's great applause. It is probable that a veritable host of those present had evidence of that epochal history which Mr. His performance of a major concerto of good taste and judgment that were to be expected from his instrument—admirably successful. He was moving melody of the daintily-turned Tempo di Menuett warmly applauded.

Mr. Burgin, as himself excellently Grosso of Handel, opening Largo, its character and contrapuntal serene beauty of its Larghetto and Largo character of the emphasized without r tion; individually with sensitive feeling without mannerism he provided an a ment.

Still better was performance, under his major symphony rancorous argument concerning the dramatic, of this again, however, set without prejudice not wanting in his did not try to make Viennese cafe solidity, organic of progress and and dramatic form ment. The slowly ingly expressive but charming grace. was impressive and or and orchestra applause that was served enthusiastically

UNEXPECTEDLY the second concert of the Monday series of symphony concerts last evening proceeded under the guidance of Richard Burgin, exactly as had those of Friday and Saturday and the one at Cambridge on Thursday. On Saturday evening it was thought that Mr. Burgin would conduct, as he did. On Sunday afternoon Dr. Koussevitzky sent word to Symphony Hall that he would be ready to proceed with rehearsals and concerts on Monday, as was reported in these columns last evening. Monday morning, however, found him with that lassitude which often follows a severe cold; and rather than risk taking a fresh cold while still in somewhat weakened condition the conductor decided to use the day for a final rest before resuming his duties. And so Mr. Burgin once more filled the breach.

Under his leadership the orchestra played Handel's Concerto Grosso in B minor, No. 12, for string orchestra; the songful second symphony, in D major, of Brahms. As guest appeared Mr. Anton Witek, concert master of the orchestra in Dr. Muck's regime. Mr. Witek played Mozart's fifth violin concerto in A major. Of this concert, as of those of the week-end, a chief theme must therefore be Mr. Burgin's progress in the ways of a conductor. For one found him again last evening as forceful with his energies as he was apt and persuasive with his melodies, discriminating in his distribution of light and shade, adept in his balancing of the various choirs, adept in his search for euphony. Not always has Mr. Burgin conducted in this manner. Within a year he has "found himself."

Thus a Monday audience heard the sonorities and the breadths of a Handel the sound of strings deep and full, high and shining, the rhythms forward marching as only Handel knew how to make them march, the progress and the unfolding of melody to delight the ear and warm the heart. Thus also this audience of Monday heard the songfulness of Brahms as four movements of a symphony bring it. One was particularly impressed by the manner in which the symphony makes its way when merely to run its natural course. Mr. Burgin's reading was not a "personal reading; it was not a reading which emphasized here and pointed there, which manipulated rhythms and piled climaxes; in short it was not a reading in which conductorial virtuosity played a part. To such Mr. Burgin does not need not aspire. His reading was that of an able musician, who, from restraint and knowing well of music, allows that music to flow in its own way. It was a "natural reading. And few symphonies (or composers) there are which would come so well with this essentially simple

Feb. 17, 1931

R
least you.

NBC Christie Fanc

Wildmer's Wine Je

Friend's Mince Me

Bread and Butter

Bell's Seasoning

Maraschino Cherri

Fruit for Salad

Sparkle assorted flavors

Salted Peanuts

NBC Fruit Cake

Richardson's Mints

Citron Peel

Lemon or Orange

Smyrna Figs

Fancy Figs

Not Started Date

sonorities chortle
e. No one less than Stravinsky
e a reign to irre-
nificant" materi-
of the term, it seriousness and
re its motivating
er has called it a
is. As a conces-its wit would have had Stravinsky's
a half. Nothing gthy. Aside from anromá's brilliant no part won in-

pauss is solid and er who does not
a Domestica" and ud the exuberant
a with humanity:
universal musical
remains the su-
pon previous oc-
tzky's interpreta-
nplified anew his lyrical and the-
sic itself reveals unexcelled among
s, so Dr. Kousse-rformance discloses estic dramatist of

N. M. J.

ONY CONCERT
the current series
concerts of the Orchestra, which
Dr. Koussevitzky
following program:
p. 47; Stravinsky,
o and orchestra
Sanroma); Strauss,
ca, op. 53. The
ial, large,
dignified figure of looms like a re-ted and half-for-

background of con-
music. English intervals revive the
ess and deplore the orchestras to per-
Edward J. Dent, learned of English ten went so far as trait in full court
as frontispiece to Adolf Weissmann's
of Modern Music," tt to think of any se work is more re-
blems than that of r of Brahms. At his moments of vigor
; his melody, ex-
ven quality, reveals tual and recogniz-Enigma Variations"
ner; the "Introduc-
played yesterday is Elgar draws a rich
tring orchestra for written. But the ing theme is not herent interest; the hat forms its princi-

vincing and of poor
ment to which the s treated has little
e or beauty; the nical and dry, but that the manner in ed—uniformly loud,
ination between the
subsidiary strands
ure—was not such
it or to any other
al music.

the orchestra ben excellent perfor-
y's "Capriccio"—a n a year old. The
is rich in "Capric-
m deserve the title
Stravinsky's. Not
istic rhythms and oods is it capri-cultous movement;
ironical conglom-
musical styles and d jumbled togethllusions and imita-
erg and Johann
of the present day.
ng and somewhat ironic intent is

nia Domestica" was by Dr. Koussevitzky. It was a performance that given Friday and Saturday was possible to enjoy—both as a concert—the product of an unsurpassed man in sound—beautiful and almost a piece of music—so possible a creation that this is the composer. The edly enthusiastic.

MONDAY SYMPHONY

The second of the Monday evening concert series of the Boston Symphony Orchestra took place last night in the presence of a large audience that filled Symphony Hall. The program of the evening was a most interesting one, with the following: Handel, concerto in A minor for string orchestra; Mozart, concerto in A major for violin and orchestra; Beethoven, symphony No. 2 in D major; and Anton Witek, former soloist in Mozart's concerto for violin and orchestra. Its master, Richard Burgin, was in the absence, due to illness, of Dr. Koussevitzky.

The central event of the evening, of course, the reappearance of the man who occupied the master's desk under the baton of Dr. Koussevitzky last night's great performance, was greeted with a great deal of interest. It is probable that a very large number of those present had never before seen the conductor of that epoch-making performance which Mr. Koussevitzky's performance of the major concerto of Mozart, of good taste and judgment, that were to be expected from his instrument—admirably suited to the occasion. He was most flowing melody of the daintily-turned Tempo di Menuetto warmly applauded.

Mr. Burgin, as conductor, was excellent. He opened the evening with the opening Largo, its character and contrapuntal serenity and beauty of its Larghetto and Largo character of the movement; individually, with sensitive feeling, without mannerism, he provided an admirable performance of Monday's program.

Still better was the performance, under his baton, of the major symphony of Beethoven, a magnificent argument concerning the character of this symphony, however, seems without prejudice. He did not try to make the Viennese cafe music solidly, organically, of progress and climatic and dramatic force. The slow movement, charmingly expressive and beautiful, was impressive and beautiful, and the orchestra was warmly applauded.

Witek Returns

UNEXPECTED

Anton Witek, former soloist in Mozart's concerto for violin and orchestra, was in the absence, due to illness, of Dr. Koussevitzky. The central event of the evening, of course, the reappearance of the man who occupied the master's desk under the baton of Dr. Koussevitzky last night's great performance, was greeted with a great deal of interest. It is probable that a very large number of those present had never before seen the conductor of that epoch-making performance which Mr. Koussevitzky's performance of the major concerto of Mozart, of good taste and judgment, that were to be expected from his instrument—admirably suited to the occasion. He was most flowing melody of the daintily-turned Tempo di Menuetto warmly applauded.

Mr. Burgin, as conductor, was excellent. He opened the evening with the opening Largo, its character and contrapuntal serenity and beauty of its Larghetto and Largo character of the movement; individually, with sensitive feeling, without mannerism, he provided an admirable performance of Monday's program.

Still better was the performance, under his baton, of the major symphony of Beethoven, a magnificent argument concerning the character of this symphony, however, seems without prejudice. He did not try to make the Viennese cafe music solidly, organically, of progress and climatic and dramatic force. The slow movement, charmingly expressive and beautiful, was impressive and beautiful, and the orchestra was warmly applauded.

Still better was the performance, under his baton, of the major symphony of Beethoven, a magnificent argument concerning the character of this symphony, however, seems without prejudice. He did not try to make the Viennese cafe music solidly, organically, of progress and climatic and dramatic force. The slow movement, charmingly expressive and beautiful, was impressive and beautiful, and the orchestra was warmly applauded.

of treatment. Like a Schubert song this symphony sings its way into the heart if and when it is free to run its course.

Had Mr. Witek played on a Friday or a Saturday he would have had many old friends among his listeners. As it was, this new Monday audience must have heard him freshly, must have received a new pleasure from his playing. For the few in the audience who knew him, recollection must have come of the remembered tone, of the technique large, ample, fluent. He played his Mozart in the essentially classical manner—phrases beautifully polished, well balanced, built up into larger wholes perfectly proportioned, and Mozartean simplicity and elegance in the bargain. The few slips of intonation—one grants such even to a Kreisler. Mr. Burgin, with the diminished orchestra which has now become standard for Mozart at Symphony Hall, gave not only support but spun the fine gossamer web of tone, provided the leap-giving, elastic rhythms, against which Mr. Witek might ply his arts, and which in themselves played not a small part in this Mozartean Mozart.

A. H. M.

After Washington

A week ago last Saturday Dr. Koussevitzky and the Symphony Orchestra engaged the four concerts of their Beethoven Festival in Washington. The aftermath has been considerable. Here, for example, are two paragraphs from a letter written to the conductor by Mr. Charles Moore, Chairman of the Commission of Fine Arts in the District of Columbia:

Writing on behalf of those who are deeply concerned with the amenities of the national capital as well as the physical appearance of the city of Washington, I thank you for the important contribution you have just made by carrying out your desire to give the Beethoven Festival here. The immediate response must have gratified you; but the lasting impression made by such a series of concerts cannot be over-estimated.

Washington is indeed the political, scientific and social center of this country. It has still far to go in recognition of the Fine Arts as an essential element in civilization. Your efforts, therefore, are appreciated as largely contributing to this end. Once enlisted in this task we hope that you will be encouraged to continue.

And here also is a paragraph of a private letter written from Washington to a member of the Transcript's staff: "You should have come down for the Beethoven Festival. . . . We lived through unforgettable days of musical joy and enthusiasm. For a few days Washington seemed completely changed. People forgot their usual diplomatic ways and attitude of condescension towards artists. . . . For once they were enthusiastic, just as ordinary people are."

S. S.

With Stravinsky For the Fun of It

Trans. — Feb. 14, 1931

THOSE who follow the Monday concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra looked twice at yesterday's program before they were ready to believe what they saw. The startling name was Stravinsky. Usually the Monday concert is conservative: Mozart, Beethoven, Chaikovsky and Wagner serve the day. The name most assiduously avoided is Stravinsky. Yet the evening passed safely and the heavens did not fall. What is more, Monday's audience actually clapped the new Caprice for Piano and Orchestra and appeared to have found it entertaining. As for the remainder of the program, Strauss's "Symphonia Domestica" elicited the loudest and most prolonged applause, while Elgar's Introduction and Allegro for String Orchestra had to be content with mild approval.

Elgar's piece, which began the concert, pleased most in its first pages. These provided measures of imposing breadth and dignity. One imagined one felt in them the sturdiness of British character. Stately periods in unison and harmonies in vertical progression outlined an impressive musical proposition corresponding, in a way, to the introduction of a spoken oration. Then, lines joined; arguments grew to developed form; the complete statement rounded the case. It was in the middle sections partaking of a "working-out" character that the ear attended with slackening interest the composer's scholarly processes. Perhaps Mr. and Mrs. Average Listener, familiar with radio and community programs, expected some honest and obvious melodiousness after the manner of "Pomp and Circumstance," and were disappointed. Yet by the end of the concert, Dr. Koussevitzky's delicate sense of program symmetry was apparent. Balance may be obtained in instrumental effect as well as in mood and style. The "Symphonia Domestica" for the full panoply of orchestra; Stravinsky's Caprice for individual virtuosity; Elgar's Introduction and Allegro for the sheen of the strings. The strings, indeed, gave an excellent account of themselves in a performance of exemplary precision, unanimity and beauty of tone. It is a peculiar joy to hear them play together with such uniformity and expressiveness.

Stravinsky's Caprice has been received with undue solemnity in its few performances outside of Boston. It is doubtful if the composer intended to be taken seriously. Last evening it sounded as music written for the pure sport of it. Tongue-in-cheek, it makes play with familiar rhythms and tonal poses. The chattering woodwinds and chirping piano have a sly satirical slant. Questions and answers, quips and cranks, mock solemnity of the opening theme is not

sonorities chortle

No one less than Stravinsky has a reign to irreverent interest; the hat forms its principle of poor ment to which the s treated has little e or beauty; the nical and dry, but d—the manner in d—uniformly loud, ination between the subsidiary strands ure—was not such it or to any other al music.

the orchestra be- n excellent perfor- y's "Capriccio"—a n a year old. The is rich in "Capric- m deserve the title Stravinsky's. Not- istic rhythms and noods is it capri- nulous movement; ironical conglom- musical styles and ad jumbled togeth- llusions and imita- sic itself reveals erg and Johann unexcelled among of the present day. s, so Dr. Kousse- ng and somewhat ormanace disclosed: ironic intent is stic dramatist of

N. M. J.

ONLY CONCERT

It was a performance that passed that given concerts of the f Friday and Saturday Orchestra, which was possible to en- Dr. Koussevitzky oughly both as a ment—the product of an unsurpassed 47; Stravinsky, sman in sound— o and orchestra, utiful and almost Sanroma); Strauss, ing piece of mu- ca, op. 53. The been so possible ction that this is he composer. The edly nthusiastic.

1931 S. S.

background of con- music. English intervals revive the ss and deplore the orchestras to per- Edward J. Dent, earned of English ven went so far as trait in full court as frontispiece to Adolf Weissmann's of Modern Music," it to think of any se work is more re- blems than that of

of Brahms. At as moments of vigor his melody, ex- ven quality, reveals dual and recogniz- Enigma Variations" mer; the "Introduc- played yesterday is Elgar draws a rich string orchestra for written. But the vigor of the opening theme is not

MONDAY SYMPHONY

The second of the Monday evening concert of the Symphony Orchestra took place last night in the presence of an audience that filled Symphony Hall. The program of the evening was as follows: Handel, concerto in A minor for string orchestra; Mozart, concerto in A major for violin and orchestra; Brahms, symphony No. 2 in D major; and Anton Witek, former soloist in Mozart's "Don Giovanni" with the orchestra. Its master, Richard Burgin, was in the absence, due to illness, of Koussevitzky.

The central event of the evening was the performance of the man who occupies the master's desk under Witek was greeted last night's great applause. It is probable that a number of those present had never heard of that epochal history which Mr. Witek's performance of the major concerto of Mozart's "Don Giovanni" drew from his instrument—admirably suited to the flowing melody of the daintily-turned Tempo di Menuetto warmly applauded.

Mr. Burgin, as conductor, has Mr. Burgin Grosso of Handel, viceroy of the opening Largo, its character and contrapuntal serenity of its Larghetto and Largo character of the music emphasized without receding; individually, with sensitive feeling without mannerism, he provided an admirable performance of Monday's program.

Still better was the performance, under his direction, of the major symphony of Brahms, a rancorous argument concerning the character of this symphony, however, seems without prejudice. Mr. Burgin, however, seems not wanting in his performance, did not try to make a Viennese cafe music of progress and climaxes, and dramatic force of the slow movement. The slow movement, ingly expressive beauty, charming grace. The performance was impressive and brilliant, and orchestra well applauded that was served by enthusiastic.

Witek Returns

UNEXPECTEDLY

cert of the phony conductor under the Burgin, exactly on Thursday. It was thought that he would proceed with rehearsal of the phony Hall that Monday, as was usual last evening, however, found which often followed rather than risked while still in so of intonation—one grants such a day for a final rehearsal of the duties. And so filled the breach. Under his leadership, played Handel's minor, No. 12, for Witek might ply his arts, of Brahms. As ton Witek, conductor in Dr. Muehl played Mozart's A major. Of the week-end, therefore be Mr. Witek, who has been considerable. Here, him again last evening, his energies as his distribution his balancing of his search for himself excellently has Mr. Burgin

Grosso of Handel, viceroy of the opening Largo, its character and contrapuntal serenity of its Larghetto and Largo character of the music emphasized without receding; individually, with sensitive feeling without mannerism, he provided an admirable performance of Monday's program.

Still better was the performance, under his direction, of the major symphony of Brahms, a rancorous argument concerning the character of this symphony, however, seems without prejudice. Mr. Burgin, however, seems not wanting in his performance, did not try to make a Viennese cafe music of progress and climaxes, and dramatic force of the slow movement. The slow movement, ingly expressive beauty, charming grace. The performance was impressive and brilliant, and orchestra well applauded that was served by enthusiastic.

of treatment. Like a Schubert symphony sings its way in if and when it is free to run.

Had Mr. Witek played on a Saturday he would have had friends among his listeners. This new Monday audience heard him freshly, must have new pleasure from his play, few in the audience who knew the collection must have come of a bered tone, of the technique, fluent. He played his Mozart essentially classical manner, beautifully polished, well balanced, ing up into larger wholes, portioned, and Mozartean elegance in the bargain. The of intonation—one grants such a day for a final rehearsal of the duties. And so filled the breach. Under his leadership, played Handel's minor, No. 12, for Witek might ply his arts, of Brahms. As ton Witek, conductor in Dr. Muehl

After Washington

A week ago last Saturday, Witek and the Symphony Orchestra gave the four concerts of the Festival in Washington. Here, the ways of a composer, are two paragraphs written to the conductor by Moore, Chairman of the Fine Arts in the District of Columbia.

Writing on behalf of the deeply concerned with the physical appearance of the national capital in Washington, I thank you for your important contribution made by carrying out the Beethoven. The immediate response gratified you; but the sion made by such a cert cannot be over-

Washington is indeed a scientific and social country. It has still a recognition of the Fine Arts, efforts, therefore, are largely contributing to the enlistment in this task you will be encouraged.

And here also is a paragraph written from a member of the Transcendentalist movement. To such a reading of an act from restraint music, allows the in its own way got their usual diploma of condescension to posers) there are so well with this ordinary people are."

Shed Bo

our choice of Fresh, S

oulders

or corned are

Ribs

25^c

P F

serf was not a chattel, he as well as a man.

Relative Status of Serfdom

There is another difference important, in the speaker's Roman law the rights of a status, if one had any rights lawyers say, a right "in that law, as under the modern slavery wherever the institution the status of servitude, as opposite status of freedom."

emnities and lugubrious sonorities chortle an inward kind of glee. No one less adroit and independent than Stravinsky could have given so free a reign to irresponsible fancy. Of "significant" material in the serious sense of the term, it is disarmingly barren; seriousness and significance scarcely were its motivating influences. The composer has called it a "Caprice," and such it is. As a concession, let it be admitted its wit would have been twice as pointed had Stravinsky's inventions been cut in half. Nothing humorous should be lengthy. Aside from the piece itself, Mr. Sanromá's brilliant performance of the piano part won instant delight.

Beside Stravinsky, Strauss is solid and satisfactory. The listener who does not warm to the "Symphonia Domestica" and feel a desire to sing aloud the exuberant melodies has lost touch with humanity; is friendless to the universal musical idiom of which Strauss remains the supreme master. As upon previous occasions, Dr. Koussevitzky's interpretation of this work exemplified anew his combined sense of the lyrical and the dramatic. As the music itself reveals a constructive ability unexcelled among contemporary composers, so Dr. Koussevitzky's orchestral performance disclosed the successful and artistic dramatist of musical tone.

MONDAY SYMPHONY CONCERT

For the fourth of the current series of Monday evening concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which took place yesterday, Dr. Koussevitzky had chosen the following program: Elgar, introduction and allegro for string orchestra, op. 47; Stravinsky, capriccio for piano and orchestra (soloist, Jesus Maria Sanroma); Strauss, Symphonia Domestica, op. 53. The audience was, as usual, large.

The courtly and dignified figure of Sir Edward Elgar looms like a respected but neglected and half-forgotten ghost in the background of contemporary English music. English critics at regular intervals revive the legend of his greatness and deplore the failure of English orchestras to perform his symphonies. Edward J. Dent, one of the most learned of English writers on music, even went so far as to allow Elgar's portrait in full court dress to be printed as frontispiece to his translation of Adolf Weissmann's book, "The Problems of Modern Music," though it is difficult to think of any living composer whose work is more remote from those problems than that of this belated follower of Brahms. At its best his music has moments of vigor and mellow dignity; his melody, extraordinarily of uneven quality, reveals traces of an individual and recognizable idiom. The "Enigma Variations" are in his best manner; the "Introduction and Allegro" played yesterday is merely well meant. Elgar draws a rich sonority from the string orchestra for which the piece is written. But the vigor of the opening theme is not herent interest; the hat forms its principle of poor ment to which the s treated has little e or beauty; the unical and dry, but that the manner in d—uniformly loud, ination between the subsidiary strands ure—was not such it or to any other al music.

the orchestra be an excellent performer's "Capriccio"—a n a year old. The is rich in "Capriccio" deserve the title Stravinsky's. Not astic rhythms and moods is it capricious movement; ironical conglomer musical styles and ad jumbled together illusions and imitations erg and Johann of the present day, ng and somewhat ironic intent is nia Domestica" was y Dr. Koussevitzky It was a performance that given f Friday and Saturday, which was possible to en-ughly both as a nent—the product of an unsurpassed string orchestra, op. 47; Stravinsky, sman in sound—utiful and almost ing piece of music been so possible ction that this is he composer. The edly nthusiastic. 193. S. S.

MONDAY SYMPHONY

The second of the Monday evening concert by the Symphony Orchestra took place last night in the presence of a large audience that filled the hall. The program of the evening was as follows: Handel, concerto for string orchestra, No. 2 in D minor; Mozart, concerto for violin and orchestra, No. 2 in D major; Anton Witek, former soloist in the orchestra, master, Richard Burgin, due to the absence of Koussevitzky.

The central event of the evening was, of course, the reappearance of the man who occupied the master's desk under Witek's guidance last night's great affair. It is probable that a very large number of those present had heard of that epoch-making history which Mr. Witek's performance of the major concerto of Mozart, with its good taste and judgment that were to be expected from his instrument—admirably suited to the occasion. He was most flowing melody of the daintily-turned Tempo di Menuetto warmly applauded.

Mr. Burgin, as conductor, has himself excellently played the opening Largo, its character and contrapuntal serenity of its Larghetto and Largo character of the music emphasized without repetition; individually with sensitive feeling without mannerism, he provided an admirable performance.

Still better was the performance, under his direction, of the major symphony of Brahms, concerning the character of this symphony, however, seems without prejudice, not wanting in his performance, did not try to make Viennese cafe music, solidly, organic unity of progress and climatic and dramatic force. The slow movement, charmingly expressive beauty, was impressive and brilliant, and orchestra well served by the enthusiastic.

Witek Returns

UNEXPECTED

cert of the phony conductor under the direction of Burgin, exactly as he did. Dr. Koussevitzky, who had been expected to proceed with the concert on Monday, as was announced last evening, however, found himself unable to do so, and the concert was postponed to Tuesday. The conductor, Dr. Koussevitzky, who had been expected to proceed with the concert on Monday, as was announced last evening, however, found himself unable to do so, and the concert was postponed to Tuesday.

of treatment. Like a Schubert symphony sings its way in and when it is free to run.

Had Mr. Witek played on a Saturday he would have had a large audience. This new Monday audience heard him freshly, must have been a new pleasure from his playing. A few in the audience who knew the selection must have come of the tone, of the technique, of the essentially classical manner. He played his music beautifully polished, well balanced, and proportioned, and Mozartean in its intonation—one grants such a quality to the orchestra which has not been standard for Mozart at Symphony.

Under his leadership, the orchestra gave not only support but a gossamer web of tone, provided with elastic rhythms, against which Witek might ply his arts, and themselves played not a bad Mozartean Mozart.

After Washington

A week ago last Saturday

the four concerts of the Festival in Washington.

There has been considerable

ple, are two paragraphs written to the conductor by

Moore, Chairman of the Fine Arts in the District of Writing on behalf of the deeply concerned with

of the national capital physical appearance of Washington, I thank you important contribution

made by carrying out

give the Beethoven

The immediate response gratified you; but the

sion made by such certs cannot be over-

Washington is indescientific and social country. It has still ognition of the Fine

tial element in civi-efforts, therefore, are largely contributing enlisted in this task

you will be encoura-

And here also is a letter written from member of the Trans-

should have come do-ven Festival.

unforgettable days of thusiasm. For a few seemed completely

got their usual diplom-

tude of condescension posers) there are

For once they were ordinary people are."

S. S.

serf was not a

as well as a ma

Relative Status

There is another important, in the Roman law the status, if one had lawyers say, a that law, as un-slavery wherever the status of se-

opposite status of

The S

of the Wom

One of Our

She had planned

husband had a

Monday evening

table for Tuesd

Robbed in Wal

Frank G. O'Connor, for at the Curtis ground school at Massachusetts Institute and proprietor of the Sky

School in Cambridge, was point and robbed of $80 in the rear of his home at 39

Watertown, about 1.45 o'clock

ing.

According to O'Connor's

police, he had just put his garage and was about to when a man holding a hand suddenly appeared back into the garage. An appeared and searched O'Connor taking the money, which relation fees from students at school. A third man, Mr.

drove up about this time

ear, which the two men escaped in the direction of

GORGONZO

product of Milan, made in 20th loaves. In curing green mold fungus need our choice ould for corner bare Ribs

25
P

The S

of the Wom
One of Our

She had planned husband had a Monday evening
table for Tuesd

balanced by its inherent interest; the pseudo-Welsh tune that forms its principal subject is unconvincing and of poor quality; the development to which the thematic material is treated has little musical significance or beauty; the fugato seems mechanical and dry, but is only fair to say that the manner in which it was played—uniformly loud, and without discrimination between the important and the subsidiary strands of its musical texture—was not such as to do justice to it or to any other piece of contrapuntal music.

Mr. Sanroma and the orchestra between them gave an excellent performance of Stravinsky's "Capriccio"—a work little more than a year old. The literature of music is rich in "Capriccios," but few of them deserve the title so utterly as does Stravinsky's. Not merely by its fantastic rhythms and abruptly changing moods is it capricious; nor by its tumultuous movement; but still more by its ironical conglomeration of outmoded musical styles and fashions, parodied and jumbled together in fragmentary allusions and imitations, from Thalberg and Johann Strauss to the jazz of the present day. The effect is dazzling and somewhat confusing until the ironic intent is guessed.

Strauss's "Symphonia Domestica" was performed superbly by Dr. Koussevitzky and his orchestra. It was a performance that far surpassed that given recently at a pair of Friday and Saturday concerts. It was possible to enjoy the work thoroughly both as a prodigious divertissement—the product of the lighter moods of an unsurpassed and whimsical craftsman in sound—and as a richly beautiful and almost inexhaustibly interesting piece of music. Rarely has it been so possible to forget one's conviction that this is an inferior work of the composer. The applause was deservedly enthusiastic.

Herald 17, 1931. S. S.

236 Boston Symphony Orchestra Opens Anniversary Celebration

Beethoven Festival in Constitution Hall, Washington, Draws 2500 Music Lovers, Who Accord Dr. Koussevitzy and Organization Great Reception

Dec 3 1930 -

SPECIAL FROM THE CHRISTIAN SCIENCE MONITOR BUREAU

WASHINGTON—A brilliant audience greeted the opening, Dec. 2, of the four-day Beethoven Festival in celebration of the fiftieth anniversary of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Constitution Hall, the huge annex of the national headquarters of the Daughters of the American Revolution, held approximately 2500 music lovers who gave Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, his orchestra and Myra Hess, the soloist of the first performance, a reception that at times became an ovation.

Many nationally known figures were in the boxes about the auditorium. Because of a Cabinet dinner at the White House, Mrs. Hoover, one of the box-holders in the Beethoven fête, was not present on the opening night, but will attend later performances, with the wives and members of the Cabinet.

Mr. and Mrs. George W. Wickersham, Senator and Mrs. Lawrence Phipps (R.) of Colorado and many other members of Congress and dignitaries in the judicial and executive branches of the Government were present, including a large sprinkling of former residents of Boston and Massachusetts, come to do honor to the celebrated orchestra, which in half a century has come to be ranked as equal with the nation's best.

Among the box-holders for the ceremony, besides Mrs. Hoover, were Mrs. William Butterworth, Mrs. William Crozier, and Mrs. Lowell Fletcher Hobart. Among the guarantors of the fête were Mrs. Frederick Delano, Mrs.

Demarest Lloyd, and Mrs. Lawrence Phipps.

Unlike Symphony Hall, the Boston home of the orchestra, the new Constitution Hall has no balconies, but the seats on the sides swing up from the central amphitheater in huge tiers, with a horseshoe of boxes between the floor and the sweep of the ascent. The gala event brought forth a conspicuous display of colorful gowns and fine apparel.

The program books contained the familiar notes of Philip Hale, whose synopses of musical works have so long been identified with the Boston orchestra. Bostonians would not have recognized the exterior of the concert programs, which departed from the somber salmon color so familiar in Symphony Hall, Boston, and emerged in bright hues of the ordinary theater program.

The modern arrangement of the hall furthermore gave even poorer seats better vantage than the second balcony of Symphony Hall, Boston, and decidedly better than the famous 25-cent seats in Memorial Hall, Cambridge, directly over the orchestra.

The program consisted of the "Egmont" Overture, the "Eroica" Symphony and the Fourth Piano Concerto. Long applause greeted Dr. Koussevitzky at the outset, and again at the conclusion, till the conductor motioned his orchestra to rise in response. Miss Hess was repeatedly recalled.

CONSTITUTION HALL, WASHINGTON, D. C.

237 BEETHOVEN FESTIVAL

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

Dr. SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY, Conductor

FIRST PROGRAMME, Tuesday Evening, December 2

Overture to Goethe's "Egmont," Op. 84
Pianoforte Concerto No. 4 in G major

Symphony No. 3 in E-flat major, "Eroica," Op. 53
Soloist, MYRA HESS

SECOND PROGRAMME, Wednesday Evening, December 3

Overture to "Leonore" No. 3, Op. 72
Violin Concerto in D major, Op. 61

Symphony No. 5 in C minor, Op. 67
Soloist, EFREM ZIMBALIST

THIRD PROGRAMME, Friday Evening, December 5

Overture to "Coriolanus," Op. 62
Pianoforte Concerto No. 5 in E-flat major

Symphony No. 7 in A major, Op. 92
Soloist, JOSEF HOFMANN

FOURTH PROGRAMME, Saturday Afternoon, December 6

Symphony No. 1 in C major, Op. 21

Symphony No. 9 in D minor, with final chorus on Schiller's "Ode to Joy," Op. 125
Chorus of 200, trained by Albert W. Harned

Soloists
JEANNETTE VREELAND
DAN GRIDLEY

NEVADA VAN DER VEER
FRASER GANGE

Under the auspices of the Music Division of the Library of Congress, Philip Hale will give an address, and the Burgin String Quartet will play chamber music of Beethoven in the Library Auditorium on Thursday Afternoon, December 4.

Boston Symphony Orchestra Opens Anniversary Celebration

*Beethoven Festival in Constitution Hall, Washington,
Draws 2500 Music Lovers, Who Accord Dr. Kous-
sevitzy and Organization Great Reception*

Dec 3 1930 -

SPECIAL FROM THE CHRISTIAN SCIENCE MONITOR BUREAU

WASHINGTON—A brilliant audience greeted the opening, Dec. 2, of the four-day Beethoven Festival in celebration of the fiftieth anniversary of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Constitution Hall, the huge annex of the national headquarters of the Daughters of the American Revolution, held approximately 2500 music lovers who gave Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, his orchestra and Myra Hess, the soloist of the first performance, a reception that at times became an ovation.

Many nationally known figures were in the boxes about the auditorium. Because of a Cabinet dinner at the White House, Mrs. Hoover, one of the box-holders in the Beethoven fête, was not present on the opening night, but will attend later performances, with the wives and members of the Cabinet.

Mr. and Mrs. George W. Wickersham, Senator and Mrs. Lawrence Phipps (R.) of Colorado and many other members of Congress and dignitaries in the judicial and executive branches of the Government were present, including a large sprinkling of former residents of Boston and Massachusetts, come to do honor to the celebrated orchestra, which in half a century has come to be ranked as equal with the nation's best.

Among the box-holders for the ceremony, besides Mrs. Hoover, were Mrs. William Butterworth, Mrs. William Crozier, and Mrs. Lowell Fletcher Hobart. Among the guarantors of the fête were Mrs. Frederick Delano, Mrs.

Demarest Lloyd, and Mrs. Lawrence Phipps.

Unlike Symphony Hall, the Boston home of the orchestra, the new Constitution Hall has no balconies, but the seats on the sides swing up from the central amphitheater in huge tiers, with a horseshoe of boxes between the floor and the sweep of the ascent. The gala event brought forth a conspicuous display of colorful gowns and fine apparel.

The program books contained the familiar notes of Philip Hale, whose synopses of musical works have so long been identified with the Boston orchestra. Bostonians would not have recognized the exterior of the concert programs, which departed from the sallow salmon color so familiar in Symphony Hall, Boston, and emerged in bright hues of the ordinary theater program.

The modern arrangement of the hall furthermore gave even poorer seats better vantage than the second balcony of Symphony Hall, Boston, and decidedly better than the famous 25-cent seats in Memorial Hall, Cambridge, directly over the orchestra.

The program consisted of the "Egmont" Overture, the "Eroica" Symphony and the Fourth Piano Concerto. Long applause greeted Dr. Koussevitzky at the outset, and again at the conclusion, till the conductor motioned his orchestra to rise in response. Miss Hess was repeatedly recalled.

CONSTITUTION HALL, WASHINGTON, D. C.

BEETHOVEN FESTIVAL

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

Dr. SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY, Conductor

FIRST PROGRAMME, Tuesday Evening, December 2

Overture to Goethe's "Egmont," Op. 84
Pianoforte Concerto No. 4 in G major

Symphony No. 3 in E-flat major, "Eroica," Op. 53
Soloist, MYRA HESS

SECOND PROGRAMME, Wednesday Evening, December 3

Overture to "Leonore" No. 3, Op. 72
Violin Concerto in D major, Op. 61

Symphony No. 5 in C minor, Op. 67
Soloist, EFREM ZIMBALIST

THIRD PROGRAMME, Friday Evening, December 5

Overture to "Coriolanus," Op. 62
Pianoforte Concerto No. 5 in E-flat major

Symphony No. 7 in A major, Op. 92
Soloist, JOSEF HOFMANN

FOURTH PROGRAMME, Saturday Afternoon, December 6

Symphony No. 1 in C major, Op. 21

Symphony No. 9 in D minor, with final chorus on Schiller's "Ode to Joy," Op. 125
Chorus of 200, trained by Albert W. Harned

Soloists
JEANNETTE VREELAND
DAN GRIDLEY

NEVADA VAN DER VEER
FRASER GANGE

Under the auspices of the Music Division of the Library of Congress, Philip Hale will give an address, and the Burgin String Quartet will play chamber music of Beethoven in the Library Auditorium on Thursday Afternoon, December 4.

Efrem Zimbalist

Efrem Zimbalist

The Boston Symphony Orchestra returned from Washington, D. C., last Sunday morning. The Beethoven Festival incited enthusiasm. Many in the large audiences expressed a wish for a series of a similar nature next season—a Brahms Festival, for example, or a series of concerts devoted to French, German, Russian composers and those of other nations. The soloists last week were Myra Hess and Messrs. Zimbalist and Hofmann. The symphonies performed were the first, third, fifth, seventh and ninth, the overtures were the "Egmont," "Coriolanus" and "Lenore" No. 3. Constitution hall, a large auditorium, was well fitted for the earlier concerts; completely filled on Friday and Saturday. A local chorus assisted in the performance of the ninth symphony. This chorus, composed of good material, had been insufficiently prepared. If it had not been for extra rehearsals under the direction of Dr. Koussevitzky and Arthur Fiedler, it is doubtful whether the symphony could have been performed. Through their efforts the performance was of a high order.

Dr. Koussevitzky, naturally tired by the week's work, returning, caught cold. While his indisposition is not serious, it is thought advisable for him to refrain from conducting the concert tonight at Cambridge and those of the week in Symphony hall. The program announced for tomorrow and Saturday has necessarily been changed. Mr. Burgin will conduct in Symphony hall Krenek's "Little" symphony and the first symphony of Sibelius. Bruce Simonds will play Mozart's piano concerto in A major.

Ernest Krenek, of Czechoslovakian origin, was born at Vienna in 1900; he now lives in Berlin. A pupil of Schoenberg, he was at first of the extreme left wing as a composer. He is now said to be more of a romantic than a "linear" contrapuntist. A voluminous composer, he is known in this country chiefly by his opera, "Yonny spielt Auf," a jazz opera with a negro hero which has been performed at the Metropolitan Opera house. The "Little" symphony, a recent work, was brought out in New York last month by the Philharmonic-Symphony Society, conducted by Erich Kleiber.

The program that had been announced for this week will be that of Dec. 19-20. Dec 11, 1930 Fran

After Washington

A week ago last Saturday Dr. Koussevitzky and the Symphony Orchestra ended the four concerts of their Beethoven Festival in Washington. The aftermath has been considerable. Here, for example, are two paragraphs from a letter written to the conductor by Mr. Charles Moore, Chairman of the Commission of Fine Arts in the District of Columbia:

Writing on behalf of those who are deeply concerned with the amenities of the national capital as well as the physical appearance of the city of Washington, I thank you for the important contribution you have just made by carrying out your desire to give the Beethoven Festival here. The immediate response must have gratified you; but the lasting impression made by such a series of concerts cannot be over-estimated.

Washington is indeed the political, scientific and social center of this country. It has still far to go in recognition of the Fine Arts as an essential element in civilization. Your efforts, therefore, are appreciated as largely contributing to this end. Once enlisted in this task we hope that you will be encouraged to continue.

And here also is a paragraph of a private letter written from Washington to a member of the Transcript's staff: "You should have come down for the Beethoven Festival. . . . We lived through unforgettable days of musical joy and enthusiasm. For a few days Washington seemed completely changed. People forgot their usual diplomatic ways and attitude of condescension towards artists. . . . For once they were enthusiastic, just as ordinary people are." Dec 16, 1930 Ha

Mar 25 '31

Fiftieth Season

1881 — 1931

The Trustees and the Conductor of the

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

request your presence

at Symphony Hall, Boston

on the Evening of Wednesday, March 25, at 8.30

when the memory of

HENRY L. HIGGINSON

will be honored

on the fiftieth anniversary

of the orchestra which he founded

An answer is requested

240

The Boston Symphony Orchestra returned from Washington, D. C., last Sunday morning. The Beethoven Festival incited enthusiasm. Many in the large audiences expressed a wish for a series of a similar nature next season—a Brahms Festival, for example, or a series of concerts devoted to French, German, Russian composers and those of other nations. The soloists last week were Myra Hess and Messrs. Zimbalist and Hofmann. The symphonies performed were the first, third, fifth, seventh and ninth, the overtures were the "Egmont," "Coriolanus" and "Lenore" No. 3. Constitution hall, a large auditorium, was well fitted for the earlier concerts; completely filled on Friday and Saturday. A local chorus assisted in the performance of the ninth symphony. This chorus, composed of good material, had been insufficiently prepared. If it had not been for the extra rehearsals under the direction of Dr. Koussevitzky and Arthur Fiedler, it is doubtful whether the symphony could have been performed. Through their efforts the performance was of a high order.

Dr. Koussevitzky, naturally tired by the week's work, returning, caught cold. While his indisposition is not serious, it is thought advisable for him to refrain from conducting the concert tonight at Cambridge and those of the week in Symphony hall. The program announced for tomorrow and Saturday has necessarily been changed. Mr. Burgin will conduct in Symphony hall Krenek's "Little" symphony and the first symphony of Sibelius. Bruce Simonds will play Mozart's piano concerto in A major.

Ernest Krenek, of Czechoslovakian origin, was born at Vienna in 1900; he now lives in Berlin. A pupil of Schoenberg, he was at first of the extreme left wing as a composer. He is now said to be more of a romantic than a "linear" contrapuntist. A voluminous composer, he is known in this country chiefly by his opera, "Yonny spielt Auf," a jazz opera with a negro hero which has been performed at the Metropolitan Opera house. The "Little" symphony, a recent work, was brought out in New York last month by the Philharmonic-Symphony Society, conducted by Erich Kleiber.

The program that had been announced for this week will be that of Dec. 19-20. Dec 19/1930 ran

After Washington

A week ago last Saturday Dr. Koussevitzky and the Symphony Orchestra ended the four concerts of their Beethoven Festival in Washington. The aftermath has been considerable. Here, for example, are two paragraphs from a letter written to the conductor by Mr. Charles Moore, Chairman of the Commission of Fine Arts in the District of Columbia:

Writing on behalf of those who are deeply concerned with the amenities of the national capital as well as the physical appearance of the city of Washington, I thank you for the important contribution you have just made by carrying out your desire to give the Beethoven Festival here. The immediate response must have gratified you; but the lasting impression made by such a series of concerts cannot be over-estimated.

Washington is indeed the political, scientific and social center of this country. It has still far to go in recognition of the Fine Arts as an essential element in civilization. Your efforts, therefore, are appreciated as largely contributing to this end. Once enlisted in this task we hope that you will be encouraged to continue.

And here also is a paragraph of a private letter written from Washington to a member of the Transcript's staff: "You should have come down for the Beethoven Festival. . . . We lived through unforgettable days of musical joy and enthusiasm. For a few days Washington seemed completely changed. People forgot their usual diplomatic ways and attitude of condescension towards artists. . . . For once they were enthusiastic, just as ordinary people are." Dec 19/1930 ran

Fiftieth Season

1881 — 1931

The Trustees and the Conductor of the BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

request your presence

at Symphony Hall, Boston

on the Evening of Wednesday, March 25, at 8.30

when the memory of

HENRY L. HIGGINSON

will be honored

on the fiftieth anniversary

of the orchestra which he founded

An answer is requested

WEDNESDAY EVENING, MARCH 25, 1931

at 8.30

Prelude for Organ - - - - - Bach
(WALLACE GOODRICH)

ADDRESS:

"HENRY L. HIGGINSON"
(BLISS PERRY)

Prelude and Fugue in C minor }
Fantasia No. 3 } - - - Bach
Italian Concerto }
(Harpsichord: Mme. PATORNI-CASADESUS)

Toccata for Organ - - - - - Bach
(WALLACE GOODRICH)

(This will be the second evening of a Bach Festival to be given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, Conductor, on March 24, 25, 26, 27, 28, 29, 1931).

When Major Henry L. Higginson founded the Boston Symphony Orchestra in 1881, he realized the first dream and aspiration of his life—to give America an orchestra of permanent standing, and of quality comparable to the best in Europe. The eminence which the Orchestra attained was due to his judgment, and his generosity in supporting it alone through thirty-seven years.

In observing the Boston Symphony Orchestra's fiftieth season with a festival of the music of Bach, its present sponsors and patrons turn to the memory of the man who, in his unexampled way, made this orchestra possible.

Twentieth Programme

FRIDAY AFTERNOON, MARCH 27, at 2.30 o'clock

Johann Sebastian Bach

SUITE for Orchestra No. 3, in D major

- I. Overture.
- II. Air.
- III. Gavotte I; Gavotte II.
- IV. Bourrée.
- V. Gigue.

CONCERTO in D minor for two Violins and String Orchestra

- I. Vivace.
- II. Largo.
- III. Allegro.

Richard Burgin Julius Theodorowicz

INTERMISSION

CANTATA No. 85 "Ich bin ein Guter Hirt"

- I. Arioso: Bass.
- II. Aria: Alto.
- III. Chorale: Soprano.
- IV. Recitative: Tenor.
- V. Aria: Tenor.
- VI. Chorale.

CANTATA No. 20 "O Ewigkeit, du Donnerwort"

- I. Chorus.
- II. Recitative: Tenor.
- III. Aria: Tenor.
- IV. Recitative: Bass.
- V. Aria: Bass.
- VI. Aria: Alto
- VII. Chorale.

BACH CANTATA CLUB, G. Wallace Woodworth, Conductor.

SOLOISTS

AMY EVANS, Soprano

MARGARET MATZENAUER, Contralto

RICHARD CROOKS, Tenor

FRASER GANGE, Bass

(This concert is a part of the Bach Festival)

Pleyel Harpsichord loaned by John Wanamaker New York

Twentieth Programme

SATURDAY EVENING, MARCH 28, at 8.15 o'clock

Johann Sebastian Bach

EASTER CANTATA, No. 4 "Christ lag in Todesbanden"

- I. Sinfonia; Verse 1: Chorus.
- II. Verse 2: Soprano and Alto.
- III. Verse 3: Tenor.
- IV. Verse 4: Chorus.
- V. Verse 5: Bass.
- VI. Verse 6: Soprano and Tenor.
- VII. Verse 7: Chorale.

BRANDENBURG CONCERTO No. 5

- I. Allegro.
- II. Adagio affetuoso.
- III. Allegro.

Solo Piano, Alexander Borovsky; Violin, Richard Burgin; Flute, Georges Laurent

INTERMISSION

PRELUDES AND FUGUES from the "Well Tempered Clavichord"

- Prelude and Fugue in G minor, No. 16
- Prelude and Fugue in D major, No. 5
- Prelude and Fugue in B-flat minor, No. 22
- Prelude and Fugue in C-sharp major, No. 3

Alexander Borovsky

CANTATA No. 80 "Ein feste Burg ist unser Gott"

- I. Chorus.
- II. Duet: Soprano and Bass.
- III. Recitative: Bass.
- IV. Aria: Soprano.
- V. Chorale.
- VI. Recitative: Tenor.
- VII. Duet: Alto and Tenor.
- VIII. Chorale.

BACH CANTATA CLUB, G. Wallace Woodworth, Conductor

AMY EVANS, Soprano

MARGARET MATZENAUER, Contralto

RICHARD CROOKS, Tenor

FRASER GANGE, Bass

(This concert is a part of the Bach Festival)

BECHSTEIN PIANO

Pleyel Harpsichord loaned by John Wanamaker New York

Alexander Borovsky

BACH CANTATAS AT SYMPHONY CONCERT

Concerto for Two Violins and D Major Suite Heard

The program of yesterday afternoon's concert in the Friday subscription series of the Boston Symphony Orchestra was part of the current Bach Festival, though, except for the few sadly diminished number of rush seats, only season subscribers could hear the chosen numbers. These were the Suite in D major which includes the air arranged and often played for the G string; the concerto for two violins; and two of the church cantatas, Nos. 85 and 20.

The solo violinists were Richard Kohn and Julius Theodorowicz. The chorus was drawn from the Bach Cantata Club, G. Wallace Woodworth conductor, a group of recent graduates of Harvard and Radcliffe, brought up in the Davisonian tradition of choral singing. The solo singers were as at most of the festival concerts Mmes. Matzenauer and Matzenauer, Messrs Crooks and Gange.

The Suite in D major, with which the concert began, was eloquently and faintly performed. Dr Koussevitzky, as usual, proved an emotional and dramatic one. The great use of tone from the strings, the thickened melodic line, the emphatic rhythmic stresses were characteristic of his method of interpreting merely the music of Bach but that of the 17th and 18th century composers, Mozart alone excepted. Some prefer a lighter, more delicate playing this old music. Its tone is perhaps thinner, its elegance perhaps greater than Dr Koussevitzky believes. But there is something the effectiveness of such a tone as yesterday's, even when voices were sometimes obscured by the tonal and Mr Theodorowicz themselves by their able playing of the solo concerto for two violins. Known to all musicians as the most melodious and emotional Bach wrote, greatly ever, one wondered whether a more restrained, a chaster style than Dr Koussevitzky's might not be preferable. The two allegro movements, performed with great gusto and fluency, seemed hardly less delightful than the famous largo, if less obviously appealing.

Playing

The two church cantatas, "Ich bin ein Guter Hirt," No. 85; and "O Ewigkeit," No. 20, are proofs of the inexhaustible fertility of Bach's imagination. His position at Leipzig demanded the composition and the performance of hundreds of such works. Yet they never drop to the level of perfunctory routine work, and occasionally approach the sublimities of the "Matthew Passion" and the B minor Mass.

Yesterday, however, these cantatas made much less impression than the purely instrumental portion of the program. Only the chorales at the end, sung with admirable simplicity and sincerity by the Bach Cantata Club, redeemed them from a hint of perfunctoriness, even of dullness.

Perhaps the splendors of the Magnificat and the B minor mass, performed at earlier concerts in the Bach Festival, obscured the less potent appeal of these humbler choral pieces. But what one felt in listening was that the solo singers to whom most of the numbers in these cantatas are allotted, were not nearly as able as the instrumentalists in the orchestra.

Fine Tenor Voice

Mme Matzenauer was not yesterday in good voice. She had outdone herself in the B minor Mass and the Magnificat, and neither her tones nor her interpretations yesterday proved to have the memorable fervor she showed on those two recent occasions.

Miss Evans, whose voice is not of great volume, and whose style lacks distinction, sang many of her measures agreeably enough. Mr Gange suggested, as before, the baritone of the usual male quartet, or mixed quartet.

Only Mr Crooks of the four soloists did really well yesterday. He used his fine tenor voice with an admirable restraint, and, better than at the earlier concerts, conveyed the imaginative significance of his numbers.

It is a pity that a quartet of singers of an even and high level of excellence could not have been assembled for this festival. But where could such a group be found in America today?

The program for tonight's Symphony concert, also part of the Bach Festival, differs, by exception from that given yesterday. It includes the Fifth Brandenburg concerto; a group of piano solos to be played by Mr Borovsky, and two cantatas, "Christus lag in Todesbanden," and "Ein Feste Burg." The Festival ends with tomorrow's repetition of the B minor Mass.

P. R.

Alexander Borovsky

BACH CANTATAS AT SYMPHONY CONCERT

Concerto for Two Violins and D Major Suite Heard

The program of yesterday afternoon's concert in the Friday subscription series of the Boston Symphony Orchestra was part of the current Bach Festival, though, except for the now sadly diminished number of rush seats, only season subscribers could hear the chosen numbers. These were the Suite in D major which includes the air arranged and often played "For the G string;" the concerto for two violins, and two of the church cantatas, Nos. 85 and 20.

The solo violinists were Richard Burgin and Julius Theodorowicz. The chorus was drawn from the Bach Cantata Club, G. Wallace Woodworth conductor, a group of recent graduates of Harvard and Radcliffe, brought up in the Davisonian tradition of choral singing. The solo singers were as at the rest of the festival concerts Mmes Evans and Matzenauer, Messrs Crooks and Gange.

The Suite in D major, with which the concert began, was eloquently and brilliantly performed. Dr Koussevitzky's reading, as usual, proved an emotional and dramatic one. The great volume of tone from the strings, the rather thickened melodic line, the emphatic rhythmic stresses were characteristic of his method of interpreting not merely the music of Bach but that of other 17th and 18th century composers, Mozart alone excepted. Some might prefer a lighter, more delicate way of playing this old music. Its texture is perhaps thinner, its elegance of manner perhaps greater than Dr Koussevitzky believes. But there is no denying the effectiveness of such a performance as yesterday's, even though inner voices were sometimes blurred or obscured by the tonal mass.

Admirable Playing

Mr Burgin and Mr Theodorowicz distinguished themselves by their wholly admirable playing of the solo parts in the concerto for two violins. The largo, known to all musicians as one of the most melodious and emotional things Bach wrote, greatly pleased the audience. Here again, however, one wondered whether a more restrained, a chaster style than Dr Koussevitzky's might not be preferable. The two allegro movements, performed with great gusto and fluency, seemed hardly less delightful than the famous largo, if less obviously appealing.

The two church cantatas, "Ich bin ein Guter Hirt," No. 85; and "O Ewigkeit," No. 20, are proofs of the inexhaustible fertility of Bach's imagination. His position at Leipzig demanded the composition and the performance of hundreds of such works. Yet they never drop to the level of perfunctory routine work, and occasionally approach the sublimities of the "Matthew Passion" and the B minor Mass.

Yesterday, however, these cantatas made much less impression than the purely instrumental portion of the program. Only the chorales at the end, sung with admirable simplicity and sincerity by the Bach Cantata Club, redeemed them from a hint of perfunctoriness, even of dullness.

Perhaps the splendors of the Magnificat and the B minor mass, performed at earlier concerts in the Bach Festival, obscured the less potent appeal of these humbler choral pieces. But what one felt in listening was that the solo singers to whom most of the numbers in these cantatas are allotted, were not nearly as able as the instrumentalists in the orchestra.

Fine Tenor Voice

Mme Matzenauer was not yesterday in good voice. She had outdone herself in the B minor Mass and the Magnificat, and neither her tones nor her interpretations yesterday proved to have the memorable fervor she showed on those two recent occasions.

Miss Evans, whose voice is not of great volume, and whose style lacks distinction, sang many of her measures agreeably enough. Mr Gange suggested, as before, the baritone of the usual male quartet, or mixed quartet.

Only Mr Crooks of the four soloists did really well yesterday. He used his fine tenor voice with an admirable restraint, and, better than at the earlier concerts, conveyed the imaginative significance of his numbers.

It is a pity that a quartet of singers of an even and high level of excellence could not have been assembled for this festival. But where could such a group be found in America today?

The program for tonight's Symphony concert, also part of the Bach Festival, differs, by exception from that given yesterday. It includes the Fifth Brandenburg concerto; a group of piano solos to be played by Mr Borovsky, and two cantatas, "Christus lag in Todesbanden," and "Ein Feste Burg." The Festival ends with tomorrow's repetition of the B minor Mass.

P. R.

Boston's Bach Festival

By L. A. SLOPER

March 28, 1931

MUSIC of Johann Sebastian Bach filled the programs of the festival (March 24-29) in celebration of the fiftieth season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and in honor of its founder, Henry L. Higginson. Dr. Serge Koussevitzky had selected choral and instrumental compositions to comprise six concerts in the home of the orchestra, Symphony Hall, Boston.

The great Mass in B minor filled the first program, and was scheduled for repetition, for the benefit of the orchestra's pension fund, at the final concert. Other choral music included the Magnificat, the Easter Cantata, No. 4, and the Cantatas numbered 20, 80 and 85. The Brandenburg Concertos No. 2 (violin, flute, oboe and trumpet) and No. 5 (piano, violin and flute), the Pianoforte Concerto in D minor, the Concerto for two violins and the Suite No. 3 were the orchestral items. Organ solos, harpsichord pieces and selections from the "Well-Tempered Clavichord" were listed. Prof. Bliss Perry of Harvard College gave an address on Major Higginson.

The orchestra was assisted by the Harvard Glee Club, Dr. Archibald T. Davison, conductor, and by the Radcliffe Choral Society and the Bach Cantata Club, G. Wallace Woodworth, conductor. The soloists were Amy Evans and Adelle Alberts, sopranos; Margaret Matzenauer, contralto; Richard Crooks, tenor; Fraser Gange, baritone; Alexander Borovsky, piano; Mme. Patorni-Casadésus, harpsichord; Wallace Goodrich, organ, and the following members of the orchestra: Richard Burgin, concertmaster; Julius Theodorowicz, violin; Georges Laurent, flute; Fernand Gillet, oboe; Georges Mager, trumpet; Albert Snow, organ, and Louis Speyer and Jean Devergie, oboe d'amore.

The B Minor Mass

The B minor Mass, which had not been heard in its entirety in Boston for nearly 30 years, was naturally a central feature, and its performance was one of the high points of the festival. In the performance of this sort of music there is much to be said for using such fresh and eager young voices as those of the Harvard and Radcliffe undergraduates. Nor is it necessary to say in this instance that they made up in enthusiasm what they lacked in training. For they had been rehearsed for more than a year in this difficult music by Dr. Davison and Mr. Woodworth, and under the vital baton of Dr. Koussevitzky they were revealed as an interpretive medium of extraordinary expressiveness. The balance of the choir was sensitively maintained; the altos were equal partners with the others. Tonal quality was good, and phrasing and dynamics were subtle and musical. There was no dependence upon mere volume of sound. The "Crucifixus" was no less impressive than the opening "Kyrie," and the "Dona nobis pacem" was delivered with significant emotional values.

The chorus of course was the principal actor in the Mass, yet certain items in the solo work made a deep impression. Mme. Matzenauer in particular distinguished herself in the "Qui sedes" and the "Agnus Dei." Mme. Evans, if with less authority, sang with intelligence, and Mr. Crooks and Mr. Gange were satisfying. At the end of the opening performance the audience lingered for prolonged applause in which the unusual manifestations of cheers and stamping of feet were conspicuously included.

A similar triumph was achieved by the same forces (with Mme. Alberts added to the soloists) in the Magnificat on the evening of March 26. This work is even less familiar to Boston than the B minor Mass; for apparently it had not been heard before in that capital of music for more than half a century. Its power immediately conquered the audience of 1931. Here again Mme. Matzenauer stood out for the quality of her art in her solo parts.

At the same concert Mr. Borovsky played the D minor Concerto with a beauty of tone, a legato and a musicality worthy of all commendation. This concert had opened with a performance of the Second Brandenburg Concerto which, besides reminding us that it is one of the loveliest things in all music, raised also a question of Dr. Koussevitzky's judgment in an instrumental problem. In his desire to employ as far as possible the instruments of Bach's time, he had required Mr. Mager to use through the festival a small trumpet of high range with which to follow the florid flights which the composer gave to this instrument.

As everybody knows, the modern trumpet cannot play these passages except by dropping an octave now and then. Unfortunately, the timbre of this high trumpet consorted very badly with the other instrumental voices. Wherever it entered, it rose shrilly above the orchestral ensemble and the chorus too. This fault of course became uncomfortably noticeable in the Second Brandenburg Concerto—to the extent of marring an otherwise exquisite performance. It is possible to indulge too far a taste for the archaic. And it is no reply to say that presumably those sounds were what Bach heard. We should hear more beautiful sounds today, and above all, sounds from the trumpet that accord with those of the other instruments.

The Cantatas

For the cantatas, the more mature voices of the Bach Cantata Club were substituted for those of the college choir, while the original quartet of soloists was retained. The cantatas do not uniformly offer the opportunities provided by the Mass and the Magnificat; it cannot be maintained that every measure in every one of them resulted from the master's highest inspiration. Nevertheless they contain some beautiful music, none of it perhaps more beautiful than the tenor aria in the Cantata No. 85, sung sympathetically by Mr. Crooks at the concert on the afternoon of March 27, which incidentally was the twentieth in the Friday subscription series. In this work and in Cantata No. 20, "O Ewigkeit, du Donnerwort," the club chorus responded with a will, if not always with tonal perfection, to the exhortations of Dr. Koussevitzky.

At this concert also the orchestra gave a brilliant performance of the Suite in D major, which was warmly received, and not alone because it contains the famous Air; and Messrs. Burgin and Theodorowicz contributed much to the pleasure of the reunion by their rendition of the Concerto for two violins.

And in 1932?

Dr. Koussevitzky has again earned laurels by an ambitious undertaking and by the mastery with which he has carried it through. He sees Bach, as he sees other composers, through his own dramatic temperament, and his tempi sometimes cause shaking of heads. But the notion that Bach is quite emotionless has by now been discouraged, and Dr. Koussevitzky does not forget that his music always is a pattern of sound; indeed, as it flows from the Boston Symphony Orchestra, of particularly beautiful sound.

Speculation is already heard as to what composer will be honored by Dr. Koussevitzky next season; for it is assumed that the annual festival plan will be continued. Beethoven, Brahms, Schubert, Bach—not many composers remain whose musical output would pass this test. Mozart, Strauss, Stravinsky? Perhaps Stravinsky is most likely to be favored, not merely because he is a Russian, but because his numerous styles offer sufficient variety for festival purposes, and because it would not be necessary to repair to the opera house in order to give him a fair representation.

SYMPHONY CONCERT

By PHILIP HALE

The 20th concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra, Dr. Koussevitzky, conductor, took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony hall. It was the fourth concert in the Bach festival. The orchestra was assisted by Amy Evans, soprano; Margaret Matzenauer, contralto; Richard Crooks, tenor and Fraser Gange, bass; also by the Bach Cantata Club which had been trained by G. Wallace Woodworth, its conductor. The program was as follows: Suite for Orchestra No. 3, D major; Concerto in D minor for two violins (Messrs. Richard Burgin and Julius Theodorowicz) and string orchestra; Cantata No. 85, "Ich bin ein Guter Hirt" and Cantata No. 20 "O Ewigkeit, du Donnerwort."

Bach the writer for instruments outvied yesterday, Bach the writer for human voices. The first part of the concert was the more pleasing to the audience; the more creditable to the composer. For Bach, like Mozart and Beethoven, was not always inspired; the three could write as dull and barren music as the humblest of their now forgotten contemporaries.

Perhaps the choice of the cantatas was unfortunate. The chorus had little to do; what was given to it was well performed. The cantatas were sung in the German text. And the arias, the dreary, sandy stretches; arias with endless repetitions of musically insignificant phrases; arias, some with interminable roulades; only one or two with any sympathetic relation to the text; only one or two of a spiritual nature, and then inciting contemplation of a religious nature through the interpretation by Mr. Crooks, the one singer of the quartet who was favored by the composer. Miss Evans had little to do; Mme. Matzenauer for once lost control of her tones and seldom sustained them; Mr. Gange, singing in a straightforward manner, could not vitalize dead matter. Take the opening of "I Am a Good Shepherd"—"Ich bin ein Guter Hirt." As far as there is any pastoral suggestion in the music of the aria, the text might as well have read "Ich bin ein guter Wirt." What pastoral significance was given was by repeated figures for oboes, repetitions that finally with their acidity and without relief fretted the ear and rasped the nerves. One could not help thinking of how Handel would have treated the text of this cantata. But Handel was one of the world's greatest melodists as well as a master of choral writing.

Take the other cantata, "Eternity, thou Thunder-word," containing speculations as to the number of years the damned would be tortured in hell—a cantata for a "Brimstone Corner" service in years, happily, gone by. Here was opportunity for a dramatic recitative. The good Bach could not in his heart avail himself of it. Mr. Crooks appreciated the errors of the text, and made the most of them; Bach gave him no suggestions, no encouragement in the music itself. Only in the opening chorus, "Eternity," did Bach give emphasis to words, to the solemnity of the thought, and here the chorus did full justice to the music.

The orchestral suite and the sonata for two violins—that was another story. The famous air in the former was played superbly by the rich, sonorous strings; and Dr. Koussevitzky did not allow the beauty of the melody to be ruined by the incongruous prettiness or the mushy sentimentalism often noted when some violinist or violoncellist plays it "with great expression." The overture was nobly given; the liveliness of the dances was not a rush, a scramble, with coarse thumps in marking time; there were nuances and contrasts—an eloquent interpretation, an admirable performance, as was that of the concerto played by Messrs. Burgin and Theodorowicz, whose tone and art enlivened and gave interest to the quick movements; whose sympathetic ensemble increased the loveliness of the Largo, "pure, beautiful melody."

The program of the concert tonight comprises the Easter cantata, "Christ lag in Todesbanden"; the Brandenburg concerto, No. 5, for orchestra (Mr. Borovsky, solo piano; Mr. Burgin, violin; Mr. Laurent flute); the well-tempered Clavichord: Prelude and Fugue, G minor, No. 16; D major, No. 5; B flat minor, No. 22; C sharp major, No. 3 (Mr. Borovsky, pianist). Cantata "Ein feste Burg ist unser Gott." The cantatas will be sung in English. The Bach festival will close tomorrow with a repetition of the Mass in B minor.

Alternately, First Beauty, Then Tedium

The Symphony Concert Becomes Fifth Episode in The Bach Festival

IT WAS the twentieth matinée in the fiftieth series of Symphony Concerts. It was also the fifth concert in the first Bach Festival of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The twain met yesterday at Symphony Hall, but did not quite synchronize. The discrepancy came about in this wise. "Rush-seats" and two "guest-seats" aside, every place on a Friday is taken by subscription. Nowadays there are few "rush-seats" and the waiting line soon exhausts them. Often the "guest-seats" are bespoken long in advance. Consequently the management has at disposal only such sitings as subscribers may give up by return of their tickets. On an occasion like yesterday they were bound to be few. Yet strangers to these conditions had come from New York, Washington and other cities resolved to attend the whole Bach Festival, disappointed if they missed so much as a single concert. They asked first politely, then insistently, for any available places. No explaining of the manners and customs of the Symphony Concerts would appease them. A courteous management distributed aid and comfort as best it might. Every one who had room to spare proffered it. At the end, few (as the psychologists say) were mal-adjusted. Just how calm succeeded confusion might make a pleasing footnote to the anniversary chapter in the forthcoming history of the Symphony Orchestra.

Even Bach, in his tomb through more than a century and three-quarters, did not escape the divisions of the day. In the first half of the concert he was commander for courts; in the second, commander for churches. The orchestral Suite in D major—the Suite of the celebrated and hackneyed air—began the afternoon. The Concerto in D minor for two violins with string orchestra followed. The venerable and learned compiler of the program-book affirmed that both "belonged happy Cöthen period." That is to say were written in the years when Bach, still a youngish man, actor, composer and performer of the little court of the young of Anhalt-Cöthen. . . . After his death and from a later day came the Church Cantatas, written for St. Matthew and St. Nicholas's at Leipzig. "Ich bin ein gute Hirt" (No. 85), for the festival between Easter and Ascension, Jesus as the good Shepherd. The "O Ewigkeit" (No. 20), recited the tortures of the damned; bade death-sinners turn, while there was yet time for salvation. Never before (some of the Church Cantatas of Bach been at a Symphony Concert. With two exceptions to be heard this evening, they comprise the festival epitome of the com-

gh the devotees of Bach may receive suggestion, possibly the Church Cantatas—save here and there the exceptions that prove the rule—are not for the sake of his other music gladly. they are, and when they are not, of genius, they were written for the services of Sundays and days in the Leipzig churches, with of no other place, time or purpose. Archæologists have reconstructed the Cantatas for us; but to throw back into a deal of historical imagination. The Cantatas must, indeed, take the nineteenth-century must, indeed, take the nineteenth-century Cantatas as the nineteenth-century find them. Two hundred years of pieties of many a text wear an air. Bach, pressed with work, not have been fastidious about in his devout self found the spur of composition. Usually the "sacred" is pedestrian; the pious imagery commonplace. Sticky sentimentalities. A morbid preoccupation recurs death and judgment, salvation and eternal punishment and fear. In these different days, the of "O Ewigkeit, du Donnerwort," the tortures of hell, would be were it not grotesque; while the old-New-England adjective, "wishy-washy," precisely describes the verses of "gute Hirt." To some of us the Cantatas often affront the religious the believing heart, the visioning of the tone-poet of the Passions, the music in which Bach clothed the Church Cantatas live on to the latter days. Yet to some of us, that music is not altogether blameless at all times poignant, ecstatic, often incessant and prescribed formalizes it. The current has centred about the choral

the German text. And the arias, the dreary, sandy stretches; arias with endless repetitions of musically insignificant phrases; arias, some with interminable roulades; only one or two with any sympathetic relation to the text; only one or two of a spiritual nature, and then inciting contemplation of a religious nature through the interpretation by Mr. Crooks, the one singer of the quartet who was favored by the composer. Miss Evans had little to do; Mme. Matzenauer for once lost control of her tones and seldom sustained them; Mr. Gange, singing in a straightforward manner, could not vitalize dead matter. Take the opening of "I Am a Good Shepherd"—"Ich bin ein Guter Hirt." As far as there is any pastoral suggestion in the music of the aria, the text might as well have read "Ich bin ein guter Wirt." What pastoral significance was given was by repeated figures for oboes, repetitions that finally with their acidity and without relief fretted the ear and rasped the nerves. One could not help thinking of how Handel would have treated the text of this cantata. But Handel was one of the world's greatest melodists as well as a master of choral writing.

Take the other cantata, "Eternity, thou Thunder-word," containing speculations as to the number of years the damned would be tortured in hell—a cantata for a "Brimstone Corner" service in years, happily, gone by. Here was opportunity for a dramatic recitative. The good Bach could not in his heart avail himself of it. Mr. Crooks appreciated the errors of the text, and made the most of them; Bach gave him no suggestions, no encouragement in the music itself. Only in the opening chorus, "Eternity," did Bach give emphasis to words, to the solemnity of the thought, and here the chorus did full justice to the music.

The orchestral suite and the sonata for two violins—that was another story. The famous air in the former was played superbly by the rich, sonorous strings; and Dr. Koussevitzky did not allow the beauty of the melody to be ruined by the incongruous prettiness or the mushy sentimentalism often noted when some violinist or violoncellist plays it "with great expression." The overture was nobly given; the liveliness of the dances was not a rush, a scramble, with coarse thumps in marking time; there were nuances and contrasts—an eloquent interpretation, an admirable performance, as was that of the concerto played by Messrs. Burgin and Theodorowicz, whose tone and art enlivened and gave interest to the quick movements; whose sympathetic ensemble increased the loveliness of the Largo, "pure, beautiful melody."

The program of the concert tonight comprises the Easter cantata, "Christ lag in Todesbanden"; the Brandenburg concerto, No. 5, for orchestra (Mr. Borovsky, solo piano; Mr. Burgin, violin; Mr. Laurent flute); the well-tempered Clavichord: Prelude and Fugue, G minor, No. 16; D major, No. 5; B flat minor, No. 22; C sharp major, No. 3 (Mr. Borovsky, pianist). Cantata "Ein feste Burg ist unser Gott." The cantatas will be sung in English. The Bach festival will close tomorrow with a repetition of the Mass in B minor.

Altern

First The

The Symph comes Fif The Ba

IT WAS the twentieth series. It was also the first Bach Festival. The Symphony Orchestra yesterday at Symphonies quite synchronizing about in this way: two "guest-seats" a Friday is taken today there are the waiting line. Often the "guests" long in advance. (agement has at dealings as subscribers turn of their tickets yesterday they were Yet strangers to come from New York other cities resolve Bach Festival, missed so much. They asked first for any available of the manners of phony Concerts. A courteous aid and comfort one who had ro At the end, few were mal-adjusted footnote to the the forthcoming Orchestra. Even Bach, than a century not escape the first half of noser for composer for choral in D major—and and hackneyed The Concerto with string ensemble and gram-book

so	Sale	Sto
8	Phil
13	Phil
2	Pie
15	Pie
8	Phi
2	Pee
21	Pro
4	Pro
18	Pro
2	Pro
15	P
3	P
2	P
9	P
60	Put
32	Put
1	PS
2	Re
90	Re
8	St
40	Sal
125	Sal
1	Se
12	Se
9	Se
70	Sh
12	Sh
54	Sh
95	Sh
2	So
32	So
4	So
7	Sh
10	Sil
16	Sn
60	S'e
9	S'r
30	S'n
13	S'n
10	S'n
2	S'n
2	S'n
145	S'n
29	S'n
9	S'w
30	S'w
29	S'w
24	S'w
10	S'w
58	StGa
7	Star
20	Std
50	Std
32	Std
1	Std Im
16	Std Im
65	Std P
1	Straus
4	Stutz

to the happy Cöthen period." That is to say, they were written in the years (1717-23) when Bach, still a youngish man, was director, composer and performer of the music at the little court of the young Prince of Anhalt-Cöthen. . . . After intermission and from a later day came two Church Cantatas, written for St. Thomas's and St. Nicholas's at Leipzig. One, "Ich bin ein gute Hirt (No. 85), for a Sunday between Easter and Ascension, praised Jesus as the good Shepherd. The other, "O Ewigkeit" (No. 20), recited the eternal tortures of the damned; bade death-haunted sinners turn, while there was yet time, to salvation. Never before (some said) had Church Cantatas of Bach been sung at a Symphony Concert. With two more, to be heard this evening, they completed the festival epitome of the composer.

Though the devotees of Bach may represent the suggestion, possibly the Church Cantatas—save here and there the exceptions that prove the rule—are not for all who hear his other music gladly. When they are, and when they are not, works of genius, they were written equally for the services of Sundays and Feast-days in the Leipzig churches, with thought of no other place, time or purpose. Archaeologists have reconstructed the ritual for us; but to throw back into it exacts a deal of historical imagination. The nineteen-thirties must, indeed, take the Church Cantatas as the nineteen-thirties find them. Two hundred years on, the pieties of many a text wear an unlovely air. Bach, pressed with work, could not have been fastidious about them; in his devout self found the spur to composition. Usually the "sacred poetry" is pedestrian: the pious imagery commonplace. Sticky sentimentalities abound. A morbid preoccupation recurs—with death and judgment, salvation and damnation, eternal punishment and eternal fear. In these different days, the "poem" of "O Ewigkeit, du Donnerwort," depicting the tortures of hell, would be hideous were it not grotesque; while the good old New-England adjective, "wishy-washy," precisely describes the verses of "Ein gute Hirt." To some of us the Cantata-texts often affront the religious mind, the believing heart, the visioning spirit of the tone-poet of the Passions, the Magnificat and the Mass.

By the music in which Bach clothed them, the Church Cantatas live on to these latter days. Yet to some of us, declining the full lengths of the Bachian cult, that music is not altogether blameless, or at all times poignant, ecstatic, exalted. Often incessant and prescribed production formalizes it. The current festival has centred about the choral Bach of the Mass and the Magnificat. There are choral Cantatas, to be sure. But the capable chorus of the Bach Cantata Club had small share in the Cantatas of yesterday—three numbers out of thirteen; while those numbers were hardly deep-tinged with the contemplative or the apocalyptic Bach. Both "Eln gute Hirt" and "O Ewigkeit" were essentially music of recitatives and airs. Often the recitatives were conceived and written on the grand scale; swept forward spaciouly and sonorously; exemplified Bach's ability to distill from a pale word graphic or rich or poignant musical delineation. The homely images of "The Good Shepherd" prompt him to contemplative airs for the alto and the tenor voice. His own pure pieties prompt as well, and he writes a music, for the tenor's "See what love has done" of an ineffable and changeless beauty. The alto air lags not too far behind.

Again, in "O Ewigkeit," the bass voice sings with both the humanity and the majesty of Bach visioning between time and eternity, warning mortality. Elsewhere the unbridgable gulf re-opens between the ears of the nineteen-thirties and the Bachian air as stylistic formula. Much too often one finds one's self listening to the incipient or vivid delineation of the orchestral part, even when Mme. Matzenauer, Mr. Crooks or Mr. Gange is singing—and the two men-singers, yesterday, were remarkable. No doubt, these "solo" Cantatas were chosen as contrast to the choral masterpieces that had gone before. They were indeed of another quality, texture, inspiration. Inevitably they made less impression; left far less residue behind. There were even departures from the congregation—a forbidden thing at St. Thomas's or St. Nicholas's.

So it was that the Bach of the "happy Cöthen period" more prevailed yesterday afternoon—the Bach who composed for a little court, who, when the impulse came, wrote his virtuoso-pieces, between two quick movements setting a slow song charged with changeless beauty. For the frequenters of the whole festival, it was as though they had gone on from the Brandenburg Concerto and the Piano-Concerto of Thursday evening to the orchestral Suite in D major and the Double Concerto of Friday afternoon. The Suite was familiar stuff, but the stuff that repetition warms anew. In a sense the air that has tempted so many arrangers still surprises when it is heard in place and in integrity between the overture and the dance-movements. Yes: Bach really wrote it and the freshness of these young and happy years exhales from it. Though ished the string take the Suite in priorities that might "residenz" at lively rhythms; those sharp, sud- Low Sale Chant with Bach seem n. Hearing the since might have tone was beauty their bows, their as sensitive as

95	95
78%	78%
73%	73%
77%	77%
86%	86%
83	83
99%	99%
88	88
95%	95%
105	105
104%	104%
107%	107%
106%	106%
80	80
99%	99%
36	36
102%	102%
101%	101%
104%	104%
108	108
102%	102%
82	82
79	79
86%	86%
93%	93%
102	102
100%	100%
102%	102%
99%	99%
93	93
64	64
103	103
106%	106%
19	19
4	4
62%	62%
54	54
103%	103%
91	91
66	66
101	101

Mr. Theodoro- at the first desk the Double Con- the other strings, er, orchestra, ac- applause of fa- and regard wel- plause of warm gh merit re-dis- m. The quick ag and end are ach. The meet- solo violins with s, the blendings the violins with s music-spinning lative craft. He a game, expert, ae two violinists as Bach sets the r and in alterna- ource; while the rmurous back- ech begins low- the form into ty that knows range nor fash- serene and ex- musical sound motion in itself. 2iolinists; it glo- For the while all the church night go hang. H. T. P.

ANOTHER SESSION OF BACH

Symphony Plays Suite and Concerto—Can- tatas Sung

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

The Symphony concert of yester- day afternoon, as will that of this evening with a wholly different pro- gramme, formed part of the Bach Festival now in progress at Sym- phony Hall. And since an entire aft- ernoon or evening of Bach's instru- mental music might easily result in monotony, Dr. Koussevitzky placed upon each programme two of the seldom-heard Church cantatas, with the Bach Cantata Club of Boston, G. Wallace Woodworth, conductor, and the regular soloists of the Fes- tival to sing them.

FOR TWO VIOLINS

Yesterday the cantatas formed the second half of the programme. To the first fell the Suite for orchestra in D major, that from which comes the so- called Air for the G string, perhaps the best known of all Bach's instrumental pieces, and the less frequently heard Concerto in D minor for two violins and string orchestra, with Messrs. Burgin and Theodorowicz to bear the solo parts.

The D major Suite is, and justly, the best liked of all Bach's larger instru- mental works, and not only because of the celebrated Air, generally heard out- side the suite in transposition a tone lower. The Overture displays in turn agreeable pomp and bustle; the two Gavottes, the Bourree and the Gigue are charming; while the Air, it need hardly be said, is one of Bach's noblest melodies.

Pure, Beautiful Melody

As that devoted disciple of Bach, Sir Charles Hubert Parry, himself admit- ted, the slow movement of the D minor Concerto is "by a very long way the most attractive feature of the work," and he goes on to say that "it is quite possible that it stands absolutely in the front rank of all Bach's movements whose reason for existence is pure beautiful melody."

Perhaps Sir Charles has overstated the case, but that this Largo is beauti- ful none can deny, and it was beauti- fully played yesterday by the two soloists. Admirable, too, was their per- formance of the other movements, but in these, as in so many of Bach's Al- legros, there comes the feeling that the performers are caught in the toils of a sort of musical treadmill.

Lovely Air, Expressively Sung

It was a disappointment that the Bach Cantata Club, which proved itself yes- terday a most excellent chorus, had not fuller opportunity in the two cantatas selected for that programme, No. 35, "Ich bin ein guter Hirt," and No. 20, "O Ewigkeit, du Donnerwort." The Chorale that ends the first of these and that with which what was given of the second concluded, are of the Bach of whom one cannot hear too much. As we have been rediscovering since Tues- day, Bach was not at his happiest in writing for solo voice. There are, of course, notable exceptions, and one of them came yesterday in the lovely and touching air, "The hirelings may sleep," so expressively sung by Richard Crooks. Here the accompaniment for muted strings is as pleasing as the song itself, and Bach's accompaniments to the airs in his choral works are too often dis- tractingly and obtrusively contrapuntal, frequently marred by an over-promi- nence of a ready oboe tone which, as they say of inharmonious colors, "fights" with the voice. The other soloists yesterday were Mmes. Evans and Matzenauer and Mr. Gange, but to no one of them came on this occasion flattering opportunity.

Bach of the Mass and the Mass. There are choral Cantatas, to be sung by the capable chorus of the Cantata Club had small share of thirteen; while those number hardly deep-tinged with the color of the apocalyptic Bach. Both "gute Hirt" and "O Ewigkeit" were essentially music of recitatives and often the recitatives were conceived written on the grand scale; swelled spacious and sonorously; defined Bach's ability to distill from word graphic or rich or poignant delineation. The homely images of "Good Shepherd" prompt him to plaintive airs for the alto and the voice. His own pure pieties prove well, and he writes a music, for the "See what love has done" of an air and changeless beauty. The alto is not too far behind.

Again, in "O Ewigkeit," the voice sings with both the human and the majesty of Bach visioning time and eternity, warning me. Elsewhere the unbridgable gap opens between the ears of the thirties and the Bachian air as formula. Much too often one finds self listening to the incipient delineation of the orchestral part when Mme. Matzenauer, Mr. Crook, Mr. Gange is singing—and the two singers, yesterday, were remarkable doubt, these "solo" Cantatas were as contrast to the choral master that had gone before. They were of another quality, texture, inspiration. Inevitably they made less impression, left far less residue behind. Their even departures from the congregation a forbidden thing at St. Thomas's Nicholas's.

So it was that the Bach of the Cöthen period more prevailed yesterday afternoon—the Bach who composed little court, who, when the impulse wrote his virtuoso-pieces, between two quick movements setting a slow song charged with changeless beauty. For the frequenters of the whole festival, it was as though they had gone on from the Brandenburg Concerto and the Piano-Concerto of Thursday evening to the orchestral Suite in D major and the Double Concerto of Friday afternoon. The Suite was familiar stuff, but the stuff that repetition warms anew. In a sense the air that has tempted so many arrangers still surprises when it is heard in place and in integrity between the overture and the dance-movements. Yes; Bach really wrote it and the freshness of these young and happy years exhales from it. Though

Dr. Koussevitzky diminished the string choir, it pleased him to take the Suite in the grand style, with sonorities that might have shaken the little "residenz" at Cöthen; with stately or lively rhythms; with firm emphasis, with those sharp, sudden contrasts of pace that with Bach seem his recurring temptation. Hearing the strings, Bach and his Prince might have blessed the day. Their tone was beauty not to be challenged. Their bows, their fingers, their ears, were as sensitive as unanimous.

Next Mr. Burgin and Mr. Theodorowicz rose in their places at the first desk of the violins; played the Double Concerto in D minor, while the other strings, diminished to a chamber orchestra, accompanied them. The applause of familiar acquaintance and regard welcomed them. The applause of warm pleasure received and high merit rediscovered dismissed them. The quick movements for beginning and end are music of the virtuoso-Bach. The meetings and partings of the solo violins with the surrounding strings, the blendings and the contrastings of the violins with each other, interested his music-spinning mind, invited his manipulative craft. He writes as one who plays a game, expert, engrossed, in spirits. The two violinists took him at his word.

Between these exercises Bach sets the slow movement. Together and in alternation, the two violins discourse; while the other strings set in murmurous background. The double speech begins low; broadens, deepens, melts the form into itself; rises to the beauty that knows neither time nor place, change nor fashion, shapen yet bodyless, serene and exciting both; the beauty of musical sound that it is a poetry and an emotion in itself. It transfigured the two violinists; it glorified their instruments. For the while all the singing voices and all the church cantatas, the world over, might go hang.

H. T. P.

ANOTHER SESSION OF BACH

Symphony Plays Suite and Concerto—Cantatas Sung

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

The Symphony concert of yesterday afternoon, as will that of this evening with a wholly different programme, formed part of the Bach Festival now in progress at Symphony Hall. And since an entire afternoon or evening of Bach's instrumental music might easily result in monotony, Dr. Koussevitzky placed upon each programme two of the seldom-heard Church cantatas, with the Bach Cantata Club of Boston, G. Wallace Woodworth, conductor, and the regular soloists of the Festival to sing them.

FOR TWO VIOLINS

Yesterday the cantatas formed the second half of the programme. To the first fell the Suite for orchestra in D major, that from which comes the so-called Air for the G string, perhaps the best known of all Bach's instrumental pieces, and the less frequently heard Concerto in D minor for two violins and string orchestra, with Messrs. Burgin and Theodorowicz to bear the solo parts.

The D major Suite is, and justly, the best liked of all Bach's larger instrumental works, and not only because of the celebrated Air, generally heard outside the suite in transposition a tone lower. The Overture displays in turn agreeable pomp and bustle; the two Gavottes, the Bourree and the Gigue are charming; while the Air, it need hardly be said, is one of Bach's noblest melodies.

Pure, Beautiful Melody

As that devoted disciple of Bach, Sir Charles Hubert Parry, himself admitted, the slow movement of the D minor Concerto is "by a very long way the most attractive feature of the work," and he goes on to say that "it is quite possible that it stands absolutely in the front rank of all Bach's movements whose reason for existence is pure beautiful melody."

Perhaps Sir Charles has overstated the case, but that this Largo is beautiful none can deny, and it was beautifully played yesterday by the two soloists. Admirable, too, was their performance of the other movements, but in these, as in so many of Bach's Allegros, there comes the feeling that the performers are caught in the toils of a sort of musical treadmill.

Lovely Air, Expressively Sung

It was a disappointment that the Bach Cantata Club, which proved itself yesterday a most excellent chorus, had not fuller opportunity in the two cantatas selected for that programme, No. 85, "Ich bin ein guter Hirt," and No. 20, "O Ewigkeit, du Donnerwort." The Chorale that ends the first of these and that with which what was given of the second concluded, are of the Bach of whom one cannot hear too much. As we have been rediscovering since Tuesday, Bach was not at his happiest in writing for solo voice. There are, of course, notable exceptions, and one of them came yesterday in the lovely and touching air, "The hirelings may sleep," so expressively sung by Richard Crooks. Here the accompaniment for muted strings is as pleasing as the song itself, and Bach's accompaniments to the airs in his choral works are too often distractingly and obtrusively contrapuntal, frequently marred by an over-prominence of a ready oboe tone which, as they say of inharmonious colors, "fights" with the voice.

The other soloists yesterday were Mmes. Evans and Matzenauer and Mr. Gange, but to no one of them came on this occasion flattering opportunity.

THE BACH FESTIVAL

The Boston symphony orchestra, under the stimulating leadership of Dr. Koussevitzky, has undertaken in other years special performances of the works of the greater composers. There was a Beethoven festival and more recently a Brahms festival. During this week the orchestra, assisted by the Harvard glee club, the Radcliffe choral society, and distinguished soloists, has been devoting itself to the major compositions of the most talented of the Bachs, John Sebastian.

Successful and important musically as the concerts have been—the B minor mass had not been sung in Boston since 1901—the memory of Bach has been overshadowed by remembrances of the man who, fifty years ago, created the orchestra. Bach is one of the immortals and as such has the recognition of the world, but Boston can be pardoned if it chooses to honor the name of Henry L. Higginson, a citizen who “made one vast field of beauty accessible to persons having little other enjoyment . . . ‘who leading gray lives, have needed this sunshine.’”

To many persons the most enjoyable and most moving part of the festival came on Wednesday evening when the orchestra, its board of trustees, and its friends formally observed the fiftieth anniversary. Most happy was the choice of Bliss Perry as the principal speaker. With nothing of the perfunctory eulogist, but with much of kindly insight and friendly comment, he told the story of Maj. Higginson's dream and its fulfilment. To his hearers the figure of the founder walked again. Let us quote Mr. Perry's closing words:

The men and women of his own generation are nearly gone. The Boston of his youth and manhood has changed beyond recognition. A new race of music-lovers has succeeded to the old. Fresh conceptions of the fine arts are molding the imaginations of a new era. Yet beauty and truth do not go out of fashion any more than old Johann Sebastian Bach goes out of fashion. They are forever being re-created; and whatever new and rich pleasures come to the patrons of the orchestra in the next fifty years, they can never quite forget the noble gentleman who first lighted the fire on this hearth.

Twenty-first Programme

FRIDAY AFTERNOON, APRIL 3, at 2.30 o'clock

SATURDAY EVENING, APRIL 4, at 8.15 o'clock

Rimsky-Korsakov “The Russian Easter,” Overture on Themes of the Russian Church, Op. 36

Wagner Prelude to “Parsifal”

Hindemith Konzertmusik for String and Brass Instruments
I. Mässig schnell, mit Kraft.
II. Lebhaft; langsam; lebhaft.

First Performance: Composed for the Fiftieth Anniversary of the Boston Symphony Orchestra

Brahms Symphony No. 1 in C minor, Op. 68
I. Un poco sostenuto; allegro.
II. Andante sostenuto.
III. Un poco allegretto e grazioso.
IV. Adagio; Allegro non troppo, ma con brio.

There will be an intermission before the symphony.

Original plans for Symphony Hall by Charles F. McKim are now to be seen in a central case of the exhibition in the first balcony foyer

THE BACH FESTIVAL

The Boston symphony orchestra, under the stimulating leadership of Dr. Koussevitzky, has undertaken in other years special performances of the works of the greater composers. There was a Beethoven festival and more recently a Brahms festival. During this week the orchestra, assisted by the Harvard glee club, the Radcliffe choral society, and distinguished soloists, has been devoting itself to the major compositions of the most talented of the Bachs, John Sebastian.

Successful and important musically as the concerts have been—the B minor mass had not been sung in Boston since 1901—the memory of Bach has been overshadowed by remembrances of the man who, fifty years ago, created the orchestra. Bach is one of the immortals and as such has the recognition of the world, but Boston can be pardoned if it chooses to honor the name of Henry L. Higginson, a citizen who “made one vast field of beauty accessible to persons having little other enjoyment . . . ‘who leading gray lives, have needed this sunshine.’”

To many persons the most enjoyable and most moving part of the festival came on Wednesday evening when the orchestra, its board of trustees, and its friends formally observed the fiftieth anniversary. Most happy was the choice of Bliss Perry as the principal speaker. With nothing of the perfunctory eulogist, but with much of kindly insight and friendly comment, he told the story of Maj. Higginson's dream and its fulfilment. To his hearers the figure of the founder walked again. Let us quote Mr. Perry's closing words:

The men and women of his own generation are nearly gone. The Boston of his youth and manhood has changed beyond recognition. A new race of music-lovers has succeeded to the old. Fresh conceptions of the fine arts are molding the imaginations of a new era. Yet beauty and truth do not go out of fashion any more than old Johann Sebastian Bach goes out of fashion. They are forever being re-created; and whatever new and rich pleasures come to the patrons of the orchestra in the next fifty years, they can never quite forget the noble gentleman who first lighted the fire on this hearth.

Twenty-first Programme

FRIDAY AFTERNOON, APRIL 3, at 2.30 o'clock

SATURDAY EVENING, APRIL 4, at 8.15 o'clock

Rimsky-Korsakov “The Russian Easter,” Overture on Themes of the Russian Church, Op. 36

Wagner Prelude to “Parsifal”

Hindemith Konzertmusik for String and Brass Instruments

I. Mässig schnell, mit Kraft.

II. Lebhaft; langsam; lebhaft.

First Performance: Composed for the Fiftieth Anniversary of the Boston Symphony Orchestra

Brahms Symphony No. 1 in C minor, Op. 68

I. Un poco sostenuto; allegro.

II. Andante sostenuto.

III. Un poco allegretto e grazioso.

IV. Adagio; Allegro non troppo, ma con brio.

There will be an intermission before the symphony.

Original plans for Symphony Hall by Charles F. McKim are now to be seen in a central case of the exhibition in the first balcony foyer

As Virtuoso of the Viola

Paul Hindemith

Composer of One More Anniversary Piece—To be Played Tomorrow and Saturday—for the Symphony Concerts

SYMPHONY CONCERT

By PHILIP HALE

The 21st concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra, Dr. Koussevitzky, conductor, took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony hall. The program was as follows: Rimsky-Korsakov, "The Russian Easter"; Wagner, Prelude to "Parsifal"; Hindemith, Konzertmusik for string and brass instruments; Brahms, Symphony No. 1, C minor.

There have of late been many "explanations" of Hindemith: why he is what he is. Some apologize for him by saying that as he has journeyed much as a viola virtuoso and a member of a string quartet, observing the rhythm of railway trains, he, as a composer, is interested chiefly in rhythmic combinations and invention. The conservatives have, justly or unjustly, classed him with contemporaneous composers who, though they have talent, are nevertheless to be avoided; the conservatives have put Hindemith on the list of those who never would be missed; but he has the fertility of a rabbit: one work breathlessly follows another. But he is a composer not to be carelessly put aside.

He often disappoints those who would give him more than respect for his technical acquirements. Take the composition for the 50th anniversary of the Boston Symphony orchestra, performed yesterday for the first time. Hindemith likes to experiment with groups of instruments. In this Konzertmusik the brass choir, in the first section punctuates what the strings have to say in a dry manner with growls and snorts. The opening of a long cantilena for strings, at first alone, gives the hope of melodic beauty. But the music of Hindemith is not sensuous. Did the Muses endow him with the melodic gift? We doubt it. Nor can one justly characterize his musical nature as emotional. Writing for a festival occasion, one would have anticipated sonorous pomp, stately declamation, or at least tumultuous rejoicing; but this music was not even laboriously ugly. There can be ugliness that at the same time may be impressive; but the "Konzertmusik" is for the most part worse than ugly—it is dull, nor does the display of technical ingenuity save it.

Perhaps the fairest criticism of the new work was heard in the corridor: "Not so bad as I expected."

Rimsky-Korsakov's "Russian Easter," aside from the use made of Russian ecclesiastical themes, is noteworthy for its gorgeous instrumentation. It is picturesque music, suggestive of the crowded cathedral, the chanting priests, the devout worshippers of old Russia.

One might have gladly heard the "Good Friday Spell" from "Parsifal"

instead of the Prelude to that opera, as more appropriate to the season and the more beautiful music. The Prelude is best heard in the theatre where the opera was first produced. There with the hidden orchestra—the brass section not so boisterous—the faithful in the audience—say rather the congregation—this prelude seems at the time a mystical preparation for the unfolding of the mystery to come. (We are speaking of the old Bayreuth with Wagner in the theatre; not of the commercialized show-place that draws to it the curious, and all tourists under the protecting wing of good Thomas Cook and Company.) In the ordinary concert hall the Prelude has little or no significance. It is merely music by Wagner; by Wagner not at his best.

Dr. Koussevitzky gave an unusually eloquent interpretation of the symphony; surpassing even former performances conducted by this admirer of Brahms, who has been singularly fortunate in revealing the poetic and dramatic side of a composer whose music led by other conductors, otherwise worthy men, has often seemed only pedantic, dry, oppressively respectable. Even at the risk of being called a blasphemer, one wishes that Brahms had lived up to the magnificent introduction to the Finale of the symphony. After the exposition of the chief theme of the Allegro, Johannes is seen as one condemned to hard labor.

The concert will be repeated tonight. The orchestra will give concerts in New York and Brooklyn next week. The program of April 17, 18 will comprise Schumann's overture to "Manfred"; his cello concerto (Gregor Piatigorsky), and his symphony in B flat major No. 1. No other composer need apply.

Boston Symphony

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, Commander of the Finnish Order of the White Cross, directed on the afternoon of April 3 the twenty-first Friday concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, in Symphony Hall, Boston. Notified the day before of his new aggrandizement, he released a program on which the music of Finland was not represented. During his Boston caliphate, however, he has honored Jan Sibelius by performing six of his seven symphonies, besides numerous other of his compositions.

The concert was distinguished by the initial realization of another of the many compositions written for the orchestra's fiftieth season. This, a Konzertmusik for string and brass instruments, by Paul Hindemith, proved to be by no means the least considerable of the anniversary salutations. Herr Hindemith's weakness has been his facility. A thorough musical scholar, he is also a lover of bohemian life. He is said to be as well known in dance halls as in concert rooms. His Concerto for orchestra suffers from this proficiency.

The opening of this new piece—which is in two movements—gave little hope of greater profundity. "Moderately quick, with power," the section is marked, and on hearing the opening measures one groaned inwardly and thought: "Just another machine-made product." But gradually it became apparent that Hindemith here was not merely experimenting with odd combinations of instruments, nor parroting a mechanical civilization. The entrance of the main theme in the brass brought interest, and thereafter admiration grew with the masterly development. The conclusion of this movement, which was ably led up to, really had "power." The other movement, marked "Vivacious," lived up to its label. There is a rapid, attractive theme, which is treated fugally with remarkable inventiveness and with instrumental brilliance. This work, which was rather coolly received, merits further hearing.

As a seasonal gesture, Dr. Koussevitzky opened the program with Rimsky-Korsakoff's guileless "Russian Easter" Overture, which would have been sufficient without the protracted ecstasies of the Prelude to "Parsifal" which followed it. There was consolation in the thought that we were not to sit through the opera as well.

The concert closed with a superb performance of the First Symphony of Brahms. Only such a vivid and penetrating imagination as Dr. Koussevitzky's can so release the reluctant beauties of a Brahms score. And even he would be balked without the aid of such virtuosi as constitute the Boston band. Certain episodes—notably the famous theme given to the horn and then to the flute in the last movement—attained an eloquence of utterance we do not recall hearing equaled even in the Brahms Festival.

L. A. S.

HINDEMITH PIECE AT SYMPHONY CONCERT

First Performance of New 'Konzertmusik'

A new piece by the young German composer, Paul Hindemith, entitled simply "Konzertmusik," for string and brass instruments, and written for the anniversary, was performed for the first time anywhere at yesterday's Symphony concert. It proved unusually interesting and impressive. The rest of Dr. Koussevitzky's program included Rimsky-Korsakov's overture, "A Russian Easter" and the prelude to Wagner's "Parsifal," chosen, no doubt because of the date of the concert; and Brahms' C minor Symphony.

The program yesterday contained, by exception, no description or explanation of Hindemith's "Konzertmusik" beyond the title and the indication that there are two movements, an allegro moderato; and an allegro with a slow middle section. The second movement is a fugue, in three voices, with a long and expressive episode in the middle of it. The first movement is also essentially polyphonic. In the instrumentation the strings and brass are often used as independent choirs, and not blended constantly as is so frequently done by present-day writers for orchestra.

Jumble of Tone

Other works of Hindemith heard here in the past had given one the impression that he was the typical clever young musical radical, bent above all on shocking conventionally minded listeners. Did he not end one of his compositions in no less than 10 keys at once, according to the analysis in the program? What one heard on that former occasion was, of course, not 10 keys, but a meaningless jumble of tone. Descriptions of his numerous compositions had confirmed one's notion that he was to be grouped with Erik Satie, with Milhaud, or with Lord Berners. Hence it was astonishing to hear yesterday music wholly serious and somber, with no calculated audacities of manner.

This Konzertmusik in spirit might be the work of a 20th century Brahms. It is the first work by a German of the younger generation to be played in Boston which seems to continue the traditions of the 19th century German music without imitating any 19th century master. One thought of Richard Strauss and of Reger and Mahler, as well as of Brahms, in listening. Yet there were no reminiscences of the style or substance of any one composer.

No young composer of genius would write in 1930 as men of genius wrote in the past century, or even as they wrote in 1910. Hindemith in this Konzertmusik expresses the mood of post-war Germany and expresses it in the musical language of his own generation. Of his contemporaries in other countries Honegger (German-Swiss by origin, French only by accident) is the nearest in tone and style to his work.

There is in the best of Honegger the same moral earnestness, the same predilection for contrapuntal style, the same taste for somber tone color. This Konzertmusik should be heard again. It seemed yesterday to be a masterpiece. The performance, though eloquent, might have had greater clarity and greater restraint of mood to advantage.

Effective Reading

Dr. Koussevitzky did much to convey the suggestion of Russian liturgical music in Rimsky-Korsakov's overture, with its many churchly themes. The piece is too prolix, and not profoundly enough imagined, but it sounded yesterday more effective than it has at previous hearings.

His reading of the "Parsifal" prelude was also deeply emotional. The orchestra gave out a magnificent sonority of tone. But some of the nobility of style Dr. Muck used to impart to this music was missing. One suspects that Muck used to make it finer than it actually is. Yesterday there were suggestions of shallowness, of theatricality.

As usual, the Brahms symphony was impressively performed, its beauties stressed, its occasional aridities disguised. There was very hearty applause for everything on the program except the unfamiliar Hindemith, which deserved far more plaudits than greeted it.

P. R.

SYMPHONY IN MUSIC FOR EASTER

Hindemith's "Concert Music" Creates Good Impression

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

As originally planned, the programme for the Symphony Concerts of this week paid no heed to the fact that one concert fell on Good Friday and the other on Easter eve. On second thought, Dr. Koussevitzky discarded those peculiarly pagan items, the suite from Ravel's "Daphnis and Chloe" and Debussy's "Prelude to 'The Afternoon of a Fawn,'" and put in their places Rimsky-Korsakov's overture, "The Russian Easter," and the Prelude to Wagner's "Parsifal."

OVERTURE WELL PLACED

So far as their external significance was concerned the "Parsifal" Prelude should have preceded, not followed, Rimsky's overture on themes from the Russian Liturgy, but so far as effective programme-making was concerned they were better placed as yesterday's list arranged them. It is in the exotic flavor of the so-called Church modes and in the richly varied and, at the end, dazzlingly brilliant instrumentation that the chief interest in the "Russian

"Easter" now lies. But in any event the piece was altogether appropriate to the season, and after a week of Bach, in which the orchestra quite decidedly played second fiddle to choruses, it was good to hear once more the full glory of orchestral tone.

If in a different sense, the orchestra shone again in the "Parsifal" Prelude, played by Dr. Koussevitzky at a pace that emphasized its inherent solemnity and with full realization of the poignancy of those measures at the climax that have to do with the anguish of the Saviour.

Hindemith's Tribute

These Easter and Good Friday rites once celebrated, conductor and orchestra yesterday turned their attention to the novelty of the afternoon, Paul Hindemith's "Concert Music" for stringed and brass instruments, composed for the 50th anniversary of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and publicly played yesterday for the first time anywhere.

To record a purely personal opinion, this latest music of Hindemith is the strongest and the soundest of the many pieces thus far heard that have been written especially for this jubilee year of our orchestra. More than any of those whose music has preceded his does Hindemith seem to have written in obedience to a purely musical impulse. Less does he seem to have relied upon mannerisms and formulae, on echoes of his own music or that of others. In certain technical aspects Hindemith's "Concert Music" is of our own day, though it is far from drastically modernistic. Essentially, however, it is as classic in its spirit as a Concerto of Bach, as free from external suggestion, as logically developed out of itself. And Hindemith, for all his protesting against Romanticism, cannot, Teuton that he is, resist the temptation to express himself in long-breathed melody. No doubt this element in his work surprised many in yesterday's audience.

The younger Hindemith who wrote the admirable Concerto already twice heard at these concerts could more completely resist the impulse to lyrical expression than could the maturer author of this "Konzertmusik."

There was applause for Hindemith's piece yesterday, although it was not so fervent as that with which the Prelude to "Parsifal" was received nor so enthusiastic as that lavished upon the performance of Brahms' First Symphony, with which the concert ended.

ern, ussian, Classics

Last Net
Sale Change

8 1/2 - 1/2
9 1/2 - 1/2
3 - 1/2
92 1/2 - 1/2
27 1/2 - 1/2
100 1/2 - 1/2

mer Yoked to Hindemith, formance appeared at the Concert yesterday vadays he comes

m. Brahms also ng more substanthan the Hungafew weeks ago.
ussel, Stravinsky
h contributor of a
The string choir
ude to "Parsifal."
ion of the Sym-nce more stirred few pedants are

) The orchestra,
ercussion, played Music" as vigor-it was written.
s a spirited and en, after the la-al, routine might

A thoroughbred the end of the conductor may when the end of ath away.

s Rimsky-Korsa-overture. It be-lived the usual

remained the sequences, tonal ed sonorities and always been. If the old regime and suggestion is Christian. In it

displayful, quasiurchly chant at ely followed by o-violin, is suffi-

is by no means fuse a cathedral

nave with a theater. The devout sometimes smell incense and altar-candles in the Overture. The unregenerate prefer "the perfumes of Araby" as they exhale from "Scheherazade." And if we must have Rimsky as orchestral virtuoso, by all means give us the "Spanish Caprice," even though it is as scantily Spanish as the "Easter" overture is scantily spiritual.

The Prelude to "Parsifal" belongs in the category of Dr. Koussevitzky's "good Wagner." Approaching it, he does not try to dramatize anew what is already dramatic. Nor do obsessions of pace and accent come upon him, unaccountable to the lay mind, as they have been known to do when other excerpts from Wagner are in hand. In the meditated, meticulous music of his final opera, Wagner set upon the staves precisely what he would say. The conductor, like Dr.
Koussevitzky yesterday, has only to give it releasing and radiating voice.
In the process the orchestra was signal aid. Its string choir excites the admiring wonder of practised Europeans. Nobody, in these days, compares it, deprecatingly, with the Philadelphians. It is now as remarkable as they. In the Prelude to "Parsifal" it excelled itself in plangent tone and poignant accent, whenever it sounded the measures of sinful agony. The brass choir forsook its piercing modernisms to proclaim the measures of faith in grave, deep, sustained sonorities. The wood-winds gained the ethereal note which is Wagner's final touch upon his measures of ecstasy and adoration.

Dr. Koussevitzky gave all three cue in his scaling of the Prelude. He so proportioned tone that the whole music sounded as it sounds from the covered pit for which Wagner shaped and balanced it. If it was penetrated with agony, or a-quiver and a-whisper with celestial vision, or full voiced with faith, it remained also remote and austere. Away drifted Wagner's romantic fable of sin, sorcery, sacrifice, salvation. Instead suffering, solace, faith and hope, in a poetry of tones of and for humankind. For once that poetry was distilled into its essence; detached from the paint and paste of the theater, which, perhaps, is the function of the concert-hall when it takes over music of the opera house.
Usually when the Prelude to "Parsifal" is played at Symphony Hall, the ghost of Dr. Muck, who had it from Wagner himself, steals upon the conductor's stand.
Yesterday it was absent.

Every generation finds its own version of the classics of music and drama. They remain classics because they keep their submit to the time-eighteenth century

ording to Garrick;
ng to the Kembles entleth, rather being for its own enough, Brahms, ement of his Sym-d little or no notion e nineteen-twenties than half a cenmatize it into tense calm and contrast again. No more that they would set a beauty of a slow ary, resigned; that e, intermezzo with they would hold the spense until it out-triumphant deliver-on the whole Sym-no less than self-ey enhance the con-m key to key. Upon the horn-call across he finale, or the re-otif," they ply their tion.

blem how much is phony in C minor,
a sub-conscious com-generations to draw to its temper; for rs to seize upon, individuality. Per-music are one of our what lirks us in the epen that relief we brahms emotionally voiced and as fullsibly be. Believably, either uncharacters h him in this First ars it on such a the multiplied and the finale becomes old charm in the in-sounds through a spite of temptations, not linger over the slow movement, nor nor sentimentalize elf-pity.

the rugged, striding, through the strug-nning. This first back toward Beet-in Brahms to write
ry and heroic frenzy.
Usually when the
with noble ardors,
ves. His orchestra first upward sweep
the last pulse of the e way it readily re-

adows or fine tracer-aster of his creative sing will before he

Symphony,
aster of his

Concert Music"

Hindemith" ew piece is sterful comon that does moreover, in direct line of technically;

olly self-con-and rounds eek we were Bach (1685-and contin-95 and "still hunique with contrapuntal which—the tom. He is experiment.

Bach for elect ladies
m key to key. Upon n his quick of classic

ces he is roament and He invents akin is the in slow

Of course modernist he does it. For

If-expressive cteristic and n the Sym-Prelude that e "Concert

ings; treats as a single s and percus-s brass—horns,
s fertile and play of tim-vivid, puny, abundant hythms, flow-

l. Invention r lapses. To exhilarated

7. In a slow ich and full, material, re-large-voiced ere is pause

a lithe, keen, id-go, readi-quality. It

nto the large Hindemith re-climax and nify, he has
H. T. P.

Easter" now lies. But in any event, the piece was altogether appropriate for the season, and after a week of which the orchestra quite displayed second fiddle to chorus was good to hear once more the glory of orchestral tone.

If in a different sense, the orchestra shone again in the "Parsifal" played by Dr. Koussevitzky at that emphasized its inherent solemnity and with full realization of the anxiety of those measures at the end that have to do with the anguish of the Saviour.

Hindemith's Tribute

These Easter and Good Friday concerts, celebrated, conductor and orchestra yesterday turned their attention to the novelty of the afternoon, Hindemith's "Concert Music" for stringed and brass instruments, composed for the 50th anniversary of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and played yesterday for the first time anywhere.

To record a purely personal opinion, this latest music of Hindemith is the strongest and the soundest of the pieces thus far heard that have been written especially for this jubilee of our orchestra. More than a dozen whose music has preceded his, Hindemith seem to have written with obedience to a purely musical instinct, less does he seem to have relied on mannerisms and formulae, on either his own music or that of other composers. Certain technical aspects of Hindemith's "Concert Music" is of our own time, though it is far from drastically modernistic. Essentially, however, as classic in its spirit as a Concerto by Bach, as free from external suggestion as logically developed out of itself. Hindemith, for all his protesting against Romanticism, cannot, Teuton that he is, resist the temptation to express himself in long-breathed melody. Doubt this element in his work has been prized many in yesterday's audience.

The younger Hindemith who wrote the admirable Concerto already twice at these concerts could more easily resist the impulse to lyrical expression than could the maturer author of this "Konzertmusik."

There was applause for Hindemith's piece yesterday, although it was as fervent as that with which the orchestra to "Parsifal" was received, not so enthusiastic as that lavished upon the performance of Brahms' First Symphony with which the concert ended.

One Modern, One Russian, Two Classics

Brahms and Wagner Yoked to The Maturing Hindemith, Notable Performance

WAGNER re-appeared at the Symphony Concert yesterday—and nowadays he comes back seldom. Brahms also returned with something more substantial and characteristic than the Hungarian Dances heard a few weeks ago. Hindemith joined Roussel, Stravinsky and Honegger as fourth contributor of a notable jubilee-piece. The string choir outdid itself in the Prelude to "Parsifal."

Dr. Koussevitzky's version of the Symphony in C minor once more stirred most that heard. (A few pedants are now the only dissenters.) The orchestra, less woodwinds and percussion, played Hindemith's "Concert Music" as vigorously or as warmly as it was written. The triple outcome was a spirited and distinctive matinee when, after the labors of the Bach Festival, routine might have been excusable. A thoroughbred often runs its best at the end of the course. Orchestra and conductor may also put by weariness when the end of the season is only a month away.

The single lapse was Rimsky-Korsakov's "Russian Easter" overture. It began the concert; received the usual quantum of applause; remained the patchwork of liturgical sequences, tonal pageantries, highly colored sonorities and repetitions that it has always been. If this and that Russian of the old régime is believable, the flavor and suggestion is pagan as often as it is Christian. In itself it is a desultory, displayful, quasi-pictorial music. The churchly chant at the beginning, immediately followed by ornate measures for solo-violin, is sufficiently typical. Rimsky is by no means the first composer to confuse a cathedral nave with a theater. The devout sometimes smell incense and altar-candles in the Overture. The unregenerate prefer "the perfumes of Araby" as they exhale from "Scheherazade." And if we must have Rimsky as orchestral virtuoso, by all means give us the "Spanish Caprice," even though it is as scantily Spanish as the "Easter" overture is scantily spiritual.

The Prelude to "Parsifal" belongs in the category of Dr. Koussevitzky's "good Wagner." Approaching it, he does not try to dramatize anew what is already dramatic. Nor do obsessions of pace and accent come upon him, unaccountable to the lay mind, as they have been known to do when other excerpts from Wagner are in hand. In the meditated, meticulous music of his final opera, Wagner set upon the staves precisely what he would say. The conductor, like Dr. Koussevitzky yesterday, has only to give it releasing and radiating voice. In the process the orchestra was signal aid. Its string choir excites the admiring wonder of practised Europeans. Nobody, in these days, compares it, deprecatingly, with the Philadelphia. It is now as remarkable as they. In the Prelude to "Parsifal" it excelled itself in plangent tone and poignant accent, whenever it sounded the measures of sinful agony. The brass choir forsook its piercing modernisms to proclaim the measures of faith in grave, deep, sustained sonorities. The woodwinds gained the ethereal note which is Wagner's final touch upon his measures of ecstasy and adoration.

Dr. Koussevitzky gave all three cues in his scaling of the Prelude. He so proportioned tone that the whole music sounded as it sounds from the covered pit for which Wagner shaped and balanced it. If it was penetrated with agony, or a quiver and a whisper with celestial vision, or full voiced with faith, it remained also remote and austere. Away drifted Wagner's romantic fable of sin, sorcery, sacrifice, salvation. Instead suffering, solace, faith and hope, in a poetry of tones of and for humankind. For once that poetry was distilled into its essence; detached from the paint and paste of the theater, which, perhaps, is the function of the concert-hall when it takes over music of the opera house. Usually when the Prelude to "Parsifal" is played at Symphony Hall, the ghost of Dr. Muck, who had it from Wagner himself, steals upon the conductor's stand. Yesterday it was absent.

Every generation finds its own version of the classics of music and drama. They remain classics because they keep their submit to the time-spirit of the eighteenth century according to Garrick; according to the Kembles, rather being for its own sake, enough, Brahms, element of his Symphony a little or no notion of the nineteenth-century than half a century ago. No more that they would set the beauty of a slow, resigned; that they would hold the suspense until it out-triumphant deliver on the whole Symphony no less than self-ly enhance the common key to key. Upon the horn-call across the finale, or the re-otif," they ply their tion. He invents how much is in the phony in C minor, sub-conscious generations to draw to its temper; for to seize upon, individuality. Per-music are one of our what irks us in the deepen that relief we Brahms emotionally voiced and as full-sibly be. Believably, either uncharacters in him in this First ars it on such a the multiplied and the finale becomes old charm in the in-sounds through ay, spite of temptations, not linger over the slow movement, nor nor sentimentalize self-pity.

the rugged, striding, through the struggling. This first back toward Beethoven in Brahms to write a heroic frenzy. with noble ardors, rves. His orchestra first upward sweep the last pulse of the e way it readily re-adows or fine tracer-aster of his creative sing will before he Symphony, aster of his "Concert Music" Hindemith's new piece is a sterling composition that does moreover, in direct line of technicality; fully self-contained and rounds seek we were Bach (1685-1750) and continuous with his unique contrapuntal which—the tom. He is experiment. Bach for elect ladies in his quick of classic res he is ro-rament and He invents skin is the in slow Of course modernist he does it. For lf-expressive teristic and n the Sym- Prelude that e "Concert ings; treats as a single s and percus-brass—horns, s fertile and play of tim-vivid, pun-abundant ythms, flow- Invention r lapses. To exhilarated 7. In a slow ich and full. material, re- large-voiced ere is pause a lithe, keen, id-go, "readi- quality. It nto the large Hindemith re-climax and nify, he has H. T. P.

Easter" now lies. But in any event, the piece was altogether appropriate for the season, and after a week of which the orchestra quite displayed second fiddle to chorus was good to hear once more the glory of orchestral tone.

If in a different sense, the orchestra shone again in the "Parsifal" played by Dr. Koussevitzky at that emphasized its inherent solidity and with full realization of the anxiety of those measures at the end that have to do with the anguished Saviour.

Hindemith's Tribute

These Easter and Good Friday concerts, once celebrated, conductor and orchestra yesterday turned their attention to the novelty of the afternoon, Hindemith's "Concert Music" for stringed and brass instruments, composed for the 50th anniversary of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and which was played yesterday for the first time anywhere.

To record a purely personal opinion, this latest music of Hindemith is the strongest and the soundest of the pieces thus far heard that have been written especially for this jubilee of our orchestra. More than those whose music has preceded him, Hindemith seems to have written with obedience to a purely musical instinct, less does he seem to have relied on mannerisms and formulae, on either his own music or that of other composers. Certain technical aspects of Hindemith's "Concert Music" is of our own, though it is far from dramatic or modernistic. Essentially, however, as classic in its spirit as a Concerto by Bach, as free from external suggestion as logically developed out of itself. Hindemith, for all his protesting against Romanticism, cannot, Teuton that he is, resist the temptation to express himself in long-breathed melody. Doubt this element in his work surprised many in yesterday's audience.

The younger Hindemith who wrote the admirable Concerto already twice at these concerts could more easily resist the impulse to lyrical expression than could the maturer author of this "Konzertmusik."

There was applause for Hindemith's piece yesterday, although it was as fervent as that with which the orchestra to "Parsifal" was received, nor was it as enthusiastic as that lavished upon the performance of Brahms' First Symphony with which the concert ended.

One Modern, One Russian Two Classics

Brahms and Wagner Yoked to The Maturing Hindemith, Notable Performance

WAGNER re-appeared at the Symphony Concert yesterday—and nowadays he comes back seldom. Brahms also returned with something more substantial and characteristic than the Hungarian Dances heard a few weeks ago. Hindemith joined Roussel, Stravinsky and Honegger as fourth contributor of a notable jubilee-piece. The string choir outdid itself in the Prelude to "Parsifal." Dr. Koussevitzky's version of the Symphony in C minor once more stirred most that heard. (A few pedants are now the only dissenters.) The orchestra, less woodwinds and percussion, played Hindemith's "Concert Music" as vigorously or as warmly as it was written. The triple outcome was a spirited and distinctive matinee when, after the labors of the Bach Festival, routine might have been excusable. A thoroughbred, often runs its best at the end of the course. Orchestra and conductor were also put by weariness when the end of the season is only a month away.

The single lapse was Rimsky-Korsakov's "Russian Easter" overture. It began the concert; received the usual quantum of applause; remained a patchwork of liturgical sequences, pageantries, highly colored sonorities and repetitions that it has always been. This and that Russian of the old school is believable, the flavor and suggestion pagan as often as it is Christian. In itself it is a desultory, displayful, pictorial music. The churchly chant at the beginning, immediately followed by ornate measures for solo-violin, is sufficiently typical. Rimsky is by no means the first composer to confuse a cathedral

Domestic

- 1 Abbott's Dai 6s.100
- 108 Ala Pr 4 1/2s. 90
- 13 Ala Pr 5s. 101
- 49 Alum Co Am 5s.103
- 30 Alum Ltd 5s.100
- 15 Am Com'th Pr 6s 78
- 81 Am G&E 5s.100
- 8 Am G&Pr 6s. 87
- 40 Am Pr&Lt 6s.107
- 5 Am Radiat 4 1/2s.102
- 20 Am Roll Mil 4 1/2s 97
- 13 Am Roll Mil 5s 99
- 6 Am Seating 6s. 68
- 52 Appalac El Pr 5s.103
- 158 Appalac Gas 6s 87
- 229 Appalac Gas 6sB 69
- 150 Ark Pr&Lt 5s.100
- 240 As El 4 1/2s'53. 92
- 20 A G&E 4 1/2s'48xw 72
- 115 A G&E 4 1/2s'49e 70
- 114 As G&E 5s50. 77
- 161 As G&E 5s68. 77
- 27 As G&E 5 1/2s'38 71
- 21 As G&E 5 1/2s'77 89
- 52 Ass Rayon '50. 60
- 12 Birm El 4 1/2s. 95
- 1 Bene Ind 6s'46. 98
- 33 B & M 4 1/2s. 99
- 15 Baldwin 5 1/2s.101
- 61 As T & T 5 1/2sA 89
- 51 AsTel Util 5 1/2sC 92
- 8 Bea Oil 6s'36 ww 95
- 9 Bell T C 5sA'55 106
- 14 Bell T C 5sB'57 106
- 9 Bell T C 5sC60.106
- 4 Brimling G 5s'59 99
- 5 Bos & M 6s'33.102
- 5 Brk Bor G 5sA.100
- 77 Can Nat 4 1/2s'56.100
- 30 Can Nat 7sE35.108
- 5 Can Nat SS 5s'55.101
- 85 Cen III E&G3s. 95
- 380 Cen P Ser 5 1/2s 80
- 20 Cen III PS4 1/2sF 93
- 8 Cen P&L 5s. 96
- 11 Capl Ad 5sA'53 85
- 44 Caro P&L 5s'56.103
- 108 Caterp Tr 5s'35 100
- 24 Cen St El 5s'48 68
- 80 Cen StEl 5 1/2s'54 75
- 20 Cn StP&L 5 1/2s'53 85
- 96 Chi DE14 1/2sA'70 94
- 8 Chi DE15 1/2s'35.102
- 1 Chi PnT15 1/2s'42 89
- 10 Chi Ry 5s'27. 68
- 40 Clg SR5 1/2sA'49 72
- 3 Cin StR5 1/2sA'52 87
- 7 Cin StR 6sB'55 92
- 845 Clt Ser 5s'50. 79
- 25 Clt Ser 5s'66. 78
- 25 Clt Ser G5 1/2s'42 77
- 9 Clt S GPL6s'43 86
- 35 Clt SP&L 5 1/2s'52 83
- 3 Cen III 5sG. 100
- 1 Clev El III 5s39. 104
- 1 Clev El III 5s54.103
- 2 Clev El III 5sB61.107

integrity while they submit to the time-spirit. The English eighteenth century played Shakspeare according to Garrick; the nineteenth according to the Kembles and Irving; the twentieth, rather belatedly, is still searching for its own way. . . . Likely enough, Brahms, writing the first movement of his Symphony in C minor, had little or no notion that conductors of the nineteen-twenties and thirties, no more than half a century away, would dramatize it into tense conflict, relaxing into calm and contrast only to drive upward again. No more might he anticipate that they would set beside this power the beauty of a slow movement, spent, weary, resigned; that they would infuse the intermezzo with musing graces; that they would hold the finale in glowing suspense until it outpoured its song of triumphant deliverance. They insist upon the whole Symphony as expressive no less than self-contained music. They enhance the contrasts and ascents from key to key. Upon such "moments" as the horn-call across the introduction to the finale, or the returns of the "Fate Motif," they ply their intensifying imagination.

It is a pretty problem how much is latent in this Symphony in C minor, wrought there by the sub-conscious composer for succeeding generations to draw out, each according to its temper; for succeeding conductors to seize upon, each according to his individuality. Perhaps the classics of music are one of our present refuges from what lirks us in the world around. To deepen that relief we would have our Brahms emotionally magnified, as many-voiced and as full-voiced as he may plausibly be. Believably, Dr. Koussevitzky neither uncharacteristically nor over-exceeds with him in this First Symphony. He rears it on such a grandiose scale that the multiplied and proclaiming brass of the finale becomes a necessity. He would charm in the intermezzo; but it sounds through a Brahms-like haze. In spite of temptations, the conductor does not linger over the long vistas of the slow movement, nor soften the gravities, nor sentimentalize the weariness into self-pity.

And he is all for the rugged, striding, up-thrusting Brahms through the struggle of the beginning. This first Symphony may look back toward Beethoven; but it was not in Brahms to write a music of wild outcry and heroic frenzy. Romantic he is, but with noble ardors, not over-excited nerves. His orchestra speaks out from the first upward sweep of the introduction to the last pulse of the finale; but along the way it readily retreats into dusky shadows or fine traceries. Brahms was master of his creative passion and composing will before he

Symphony, master of his

concert Music"

Hindemith" few piece is sterful com- on that does moreover, in direct line of technically; ally self-con- and rounds seek we were Bach (1685- and contin- 95 and "still hnique with contrapuntal which—the tom. He is experiment. Bach for elect ladies on his quick of classic res he is ro- tament and He invents akin is the in /slow Of course modernist he does it. For If-expressive cteristic and n the Sym- Prelude that e "Concert

ings: treats as a single s and percus- brass—horns, s fertile and play of tim- vivid, pun- abundant ythms, flow- l. Invention r lapses. To exhilarated 7. In a slow lch and full. material, re- large-voiced ere is pause a little, keep- ad-go, readi- quality. It into the large Hindemith re- climax and nify, he has H. T. P.

Easter" now lies. But in any event, the piece was altogether appropriate for the season, and after a week of which the orchestra quite displayed second fiddle to chorus was good to hear once more the glory of orchestral tone.

If in a different sense, the orchestra shone again in the "Parsifal" played by Dr. Koussevitzky at that emphasized its inherent sol and with full realization of the any of those measures at the that have to do with the ang the Saviour.

Hindemith's Tribute

These Easter and Good Friday once celebrated, conductor and orchestra yesterday turned their attention to the novelty of the afternoon, Hindemith's "Concert Music" stringed and brass instruments, posed for the 50th anniversary Boston Symphony Orchestra and lily played yesterday for the first anywhere.

To record a purely personal opinion, this latest music of Hindemith is the strongest and the soundest of the pieces thus far heard that have been written especially for this jubilee of our orchestra. More than those whose music has preceded him, Hindemith seem to have written obedience to a purely musical ideal, less does he seem to have relied on mannerisms and formulae, on each his own music or that of other certain technical aspects Hindemith's "Concert Music" is of our own though it is far from dramatic and modernistic. Essentially, however, as classic in its spirit as a Concerto by Bach, as free from external suggestion as logically developed out of itself. Hindemith, for all his protesting against Romanticism, cannot, Teuton that he is, resist the temptation to express self in long-breathed, melody. Doubt this element in his work surprised many in yesterday's audience.

The younger Hindemith who wrote the admirable Concerto already twice at these concerts could more easily resist the impulse to lyrical expression than could the maturer author of this "Konzertmusik."

There was applause for Hindemith's piece yesterday, although it was fervent as that with which the orchestra to "Parsifal" was received nor as enthusiastic as that lavished upon the performance of Brahms' First Symphony with which the concert ended.

One Modern, One Russian Two Classics

Brahms and Wagner Yoked to The Maturing Hindemith, Notable Performance

WAGNER re-appeared at the Symphony Concert yesterday—and nowadays he comes back seldom. Brahms returned with something more substantial and characteristic than the "Parsifal" Dances heard a few weeks ago. Hindemith joined Roussel, Stravinsky and Honegger as fourth contributor to this notable jubilee-piece. The string quartet outdid itself in the Prelude to "Parsifal." Dr. Koussevitzky's version of the symphony in C minor once more was the most that heard. (A few people now the only dissenters.) The orchestra, less woodwinds and percussion, played Hindemith's "Concert Music" as vigorously or as warmly as it was possible. The triple outcome was a distinctive matinee when the orchestra, bors of the Bach Festival, have been excusable. The orchestra often runs its best at these concerts. Orchestra and conductor also put by weariness with the season is only a month away.

The single lapse was in the concert; the Russian's "Russian Easter" was a patchwork of liturgical pageantries, highly colored repetitions that it had this and that Russian is believable, the flavor of pagan as often as it is itself it is a desultory pictorial music. The beginning, immediate, ornate measures for solo-violin, is by no means typical. Rimsky is by no means the first composer to confuse a cathedral short-term paper, yields obtainable on already highly liquid, purchasing bonds and disposing of some of their short-term investments would bring in additional earning power without impairing their ability to meet all normal demands. With liquidity even now much higher than in 1922 and with a large portion of many banks' assets to yield only about 4 per cent, it would appear that the problem of low bank earning power could be best worked out through the purchase of sound bonds at present attractive yields.

wrote. Playing the First Symphony, Dr. Koussevitzky is also master of his own temperament.

The Hindemith of the "Concert Music" is no longer "the promising Hindemith" of many a phrase. The new piece is work of a maturing and masterful composer, spurred by a commission that does him honor. It is music, moreover, in what the wise men call the direct line of progress. It is interesting technically; well-shaped formally; is wholly self-contained; upsprings, advances and rounds alive and inevitable. Last week we were all praising these qualities in Bach (1685-1750). They are as laudable and continuing in Hindemith born in 1895 and "still living." He enriches his technique with the harmonic devices and contrapuntal procedures of his own time, which—the records say—was Bach's custom. He is free in form and disposed to experiment. The town-council reproached Bach for like inclinations, even as our elect ladies now reproach Hindemith. In his quick movements he is plainly of classic descent. In his slow measures he is romantic by German temperament and nineteenth-century heritage. He invents his motifs individually. Akin is the unmistakable melody that in slow movements they germinate. Of course, Hindemith writes in the modernist idiom of dissonance; but he does not affect or exaggerate it. For him, it is natural, honest, self-expressive speech, as genuine and characteristic and unescapable as Brahms's in the Symphony or Wagner's in the Prelude that yesterday companioned the "Concert Music."

Hindemith masses his strings; treats the first and second violins as a single choir; silences the woodwinds and percussion; assembles the usual brass—horns, trumpets, trombones, tuba; is fertile and graphic in contrasts or interplay of timbres. Throughout they are vivid, pungent. He begins in lively, abundant fashion; strikes out sharp rhythms, flowing figures, massed strength. Invention never flags; continuity never lapses. To hear is to be intent and exhilarated. There is clear modern melody. In a slow division it expands warm, rich and full. Hindemith re-marshals his material, readjusts his choirs; ascends to large-voiced and firm-rounded climax. There is pause for breath, and straightway a lithe, keen, spirited fugue, all touch-and-go, readiness, resource and individual quality. It halts for another expansion into the large curve of sonorous song. Hindemith resumes the fugue, whips it to climax and is done. If sounds still signify, he has made music and it is alive. H. T. P.

Next week the orchestra will give concerts in New York and Brooklyn. The next regular pair of concerts will take place on April seventeenth and eighteenth

Twenty-Second Programme

FRIDAY AFTERNOON, APRIL 17, at 2.30 o'clock

SATURDAY EVENING, APRIL 18, at 8.15 o'clock

Schumann Overture to Byron's "Manfred," Op. 115

Schumann Concerto for Violoncello in A minor, Op. 129
Nicht zu schnell—Langsam—Sehr lebhaft.

Schumann Symphony No. 1 in B-flat major, Op. 38
I. Andante un poco maestoso; Allegro molto vivace.
II. Larghetto.
III. Scherzo: Molto vivace. Trio: Molto più vivace; Trio II.
IV. Allegro animato e grazioso.

SOLOIST
GREGOR PIATIGORSKY

There will be an intermission before the symphony

A lecture on this programme will be given on Thursday, April 16, at 5.15 o'clock in the Lecture Hall, Boston Public Library

The works to be played at these concerts may be seen in the Allen A. Brown Music Collection of the Boston Public Library one week before the concert

WAGNER

FIFTIETH SEASON, NINETEEN HUNDRED THIRTY AND THIRTY-ONE

Next week the orchestra will give concerts in New York and Brooklyn. The next regular pair of concerts will take place on April seventeenth and eighteenth

Twenty-Second Programme

FRIDAY AFTERNOON, APRIL 17, at 2.30 o'clock

SATURDAY EVENING, APRIL 18, at 8.15 o'clock

Schumann Overture to Byron's "Manfred," Op. 115

Schumann Concerto for Violoncello in A minor, Op. 129
Nicht zu schnell—Langsam—Sehr lebhaft.

Schumann Symphony No. 1 in B-flat major, Op. 38
I. Andante un poco maestoso; Allegro molto vivace.
II. Larghetto.
III. Scherzo: Molto vivace. Trio: Molto più vivace; Trio II.
IV. Allegro animato e grazioso.

SOLOIST
GREGOR PIATIGORSKY

There will be an intermission before the symphony

A lecture on this programme will be given on Thursday, April 16, at 5.15 o'clock in the Lecture Hall, Boston Public Library

The works to be played at these concerts may be seen in the Allen A. Brown Music Collection of the Boston Public Library one week before the concert

Gregor Piatigorsky

Violoncellist of the New Generation, Playing at the Symphony Concerts on Friday and Saturday

Afternoon Stranger Schumann

Signal Debut, Overture and Symphony

Apr. 18, 1941

untamable friend of this ent, has a theory about convioloncello. As he admits, ever be put into practice;
invented it, he believes it of these concertos—he con-creating or even musical Somewhere or other they terle exercise by the comrituous or both. But each single movement that com-cordingly, Ixe would assem-nating jury. Before it the concertos should be set in n's, Boccherini's, Schuak's, Lalo's, Saint-Saëns's, often played, like Delius's might also be included.
he jury should choose the ng Allegro, the most song-ement, the most agreeable osen fragments would then "musicality." The three lved both scrutinies would joined together and profwaiting virtuosi as a Syno for Violoncello, suitable ions. It might—Ixe agrees divergences in substance, yle, but it would gain sus-and desirable "musicality." ductors as program-makers cellists as performers could then.

Ixe is turning into his own facetious theorizing has an impregnable fact. Exits of the instrument and the composer, no concerto in the current repertory ident, self-contained exist-ges or it withers as utility its. According as it is interest and gives pleas-er is, or should be, more he piece. Therefore when agreed to Schumann's debut yesterday after-phony Concert, his potential his reported distinctions as violoncellist rather than any quality in the Concerto itself.

mann wrote it in his final years to ual wifely admiration. It has not en-among his major works. It has rarely played at Symphony Hall, for an anniversary, after a twenty-interval. When Schumann is busy-himself with passage-work, as the cal term goes; with more or less ful measures, with the music and strument in quick or abrupt motion, not more fortunate than his fellow-sers for violoncello and orchestra, nventive and neat-handed than Wiser on this score than the ad-Clara, he writes as few such pages sible; at every opportunity prefers hed and flowing song. There, when a violoncellist as Mr. Piatigorsky him, he emerges as the Schumann rm melody, poetic fancy and ro-vision, capable of finely touch-d nies between solo-instrument and tra; felicitous, as always, when matter and manner do not over-m.

Piatigorsky, moreover, is a master-cellist. His tall figure and welled features arrest the eye as he to his place. Seated and address-himself to his task, he does not wear serene, exalted air, say, of Mr.
in prime. His bends over his in-ent; his shoulders sway, his head
as one absorbed and enkindled.
lick and semi-displayful measures, ws from the submissive violoncello of remarkable lightness and flexi-keeps it in motion with as rare a

Under his hand arabesques twine endrills about the main stem. Into ge-work" he infuses elegance.
tained song, Mr. Piatigorsky neither ns, darkens nor deadens tone. He for musical beauty and musical g, both unsentimentalized. He is without dryness; rich-toned with-near or blur. He molds phrases like sitive singer upon his instrument.
adept with graduation and transi-His hand and ear are quick to the hest of euphonies. His rhythm proke an inner force, neither driving nor sagging weak.

a musician, as distinct from a "soloist," shades and curves a y with double sense of its intrinsic
y and of the quality of the violon-is transmitting, characterizing voice.
ense of style releases the mood of tic reverry that is often source of ann's song. Across a great con-om he keeps it wistful and inti-revelation. Yet how wary is Mr.
orsky of that slight excess which turn it into platitudinous, quasitic sentiment! After this poise and re, the magnificent sonorities, the us periods, the rhapsodic ardor of idenza toward the end. Through-he musician glorified the virtuoso;

Gregor Piatigorsky

Violoncellist of the New Generation, Playing at

An Afternoon Of a Stranger And Schumann

Piatigorsky's Signal Debut, Concerto, Overture and "Spring" Symphony

Trans. — Apr. 18, 1906

IXE, the untamable friend of this department, has a theory about concertos for violoncello. As he admits, it will never be put into practice; but, since he invented it, he believes it valid. None of these concertos—he contends—is interesting or even musical throughout. Somewhere or other they decline into sterile exercise by the composer, the virtuoso or both. But each may have a single movement that commends it. Accordingly, Ixe would assemble a discriminating jury. Before it the repertory concertos should be set in array—Haydn's, Boccherini's, Schumann's, Dvorák's, Lalo's, Saint-Saëns's. Others, less often played, like Delius's or Elgar's, might also be included. From these the jury should choose the most interesting Allegro, the most songful slow movement, the most agreeable finale. The chosen fragments would then be tested for "musicality." The three that best survived both scrutinies would forthwith be joined together and proffered to the waiting virtuosi as a Synthetic Concerto for Violoncello, suitable for most occasions. It might—Ixe agrees—exhibit some divergences in substance, texture and style; but it would gain sustained interest and desirable "musicality." If only the conductors as program-makers and the violoncellists as performers could be persuaded, then. . . .

By this time Ixe is turning into his own door; but his facetious theorizing has played about an impregnable fact. Except to students of the instrument and to devotees of the composer, no concerto for violoncello in the current repertory has an independent, self-contained existence. It flourishes or it withers as utility for violoncellists. According as it is played, it stirs interest and gives pleasure. The player is, or should be, more engaging than the piece. Therefore when Mr. Piatigorsky agreed to Schumann's Concerto for his debut yesterday afternoon at the Symphony Concert, his potential listeners recalled his reported distinctions as violoncellist rather than any quality in the Concerto itself.

Schumann wrote it in his final years to equal wifely admiration. It has not en- among his major works. It has rarely played at Symphony Hall, for an anniversary, after a twenty-interval. When Schumann is busy himself with passage-work, as the cal term goes; with more or less ful measures, with the music and trument in quick or abrupt motion, not more fortunate than his fellow- gers for violoncello and orchestra, inventive and neat-handed than Clara, he writes as few such pages sible; at every opportunity prefers ed and flowing song. There, when a violoncellist as Mr. Piatigorsky him, he emerges as the Schumann rm melody, poetic fancy and ro- vision, capable of finely touch-d nies between solo-instrument and tra; felicitous, as always, when matter and manner do not over- m.

Piatigorsky, moreover, is a master-cellist. His tall figure and well- ed features arrest the eye as he to his place. Seated and address- himself to his task, he does not wear serene, exalted air, say, of Mr. in prime. His bends over his in- ent; his shoulders sway, his head as one absorbed and enkindled. ick and semi-displayful measures, ws from the submissive violoncello of remarkable lightness and flexi- keeps it in motion with as rare a Under his hand arabesques twine ndrills about the main stem. Into ge-work" he infuses elegance. tained song, Mr. Piatigorsky neither ns, darkens nor deadens tone. He for musical beauty and musical g, both unsentimentalized. He is without dryness; rich-toned with- pear or blur. He molds phrases like sitive singer upon his instrument. adept with graduation and trans- His hand and ear are quick to the best of euphonies. His rhythm pro- ke an inner force, neither driving nor sagging weak.

a musician, as distinct from a "soloist," shades and curves a y with double sense of its intrinsic y and of the quality of the violon- is transmitting, characterizing voice. ense of style releases the mood of tic reverie that is often source of ann's song. Across a great con- om he keeps it wistful and inti- revelation. Yet how wary is Mr. orsky of that slight excess which urn it into platitudinous, quasi- ic sentiment! After this poise and re, the magnificent sonorities, the us periods, the rhapsodic ardor of idenza toward the end. Through- he musician glorified the virtuoso;

Gregor Piatigorsky

Violoncellist of the New Generation, Playing at

An After Of a And S

Piatigorsky's Concerto, "Spring" Isant.

IXE, the untan department, ha certos for viol: it will never l but, since he inven valid. None of the tends—is interest throughout. Somev decline into sterile poser, the virtuoso may have a single mends it. According ble a discriminating repertory concertos array—Haydn's, mann's, Dvorák's, Others, less often or Elgar's, might From these the ju most interesting Al ful slow movement finale. The chosen be tested for "mu that best survived forthwith be joined fered to the waitir thetic Concerto for for most occasions. —exhibit some div texture and style; tained interest and If only the conduct and the violoncellis be persuaded, then. By this time Ixe door; but his fac played about an l cept to students to devotees of the for violoncello in has an independe ence. It flourishes for violoncellists. played, it stirs in ure. The player engaging than the Mr. Piatigorsky Concerto for his noon at the Symp tial listeners reca tions as violonc quality in the C

Schumann wrote it in his final years to the usual wifely admiration. It has not endured among his major works. It has been rarely played at Symphony Hall, once, for an anniversary, after a twenty-year interval. When Schumann is busy-ing himself with passage-work, as the technical term goes; with more or less displayful measures, with the music and the instrument in quick or abrupt motion, he is not more fortunate than his fellow-composers for violoncello and orchestra, less inventive and neat-handed than some. Wiser on this score than the admiring Clara, he writes as few such pages as possible; at every opportunity prefers sustained and flowing song. There, when such a violoncellist as Mr. Piatigorsky plays him, he emerges as the Schumann of warm melody, poetic fancy and romantic vision, capable of finely touched euphonies between solo-instrument and orchestra; felicitous, as always, when form, matter and manner do not over-tax him.

Mr. Piatigorsky, moreover, is a master-violoncellist. His tall figure and well-chiselled features arrest the eye as he walks to his place. Seated and addressing himself to his task, he does not wear the serene, exalted air, say, of Mr. Casals in prime. His bends over his instrument; his shoulders sway, his head tosses, as one absorbed and enkindled. In quick and semi-displayful measures, he draws from the submissive violoncello a tone of remarkable lightness and flexibility; keeps it in motion with as rare a grace. Under his hand arabesques twine like tendrils about the main stem. Into "passage-work" he infuses elegance. In sustained song, Mr. Piatigorsky neither thickens, darkens nor deadens tone. He is all for musical beauty and musical feeling, both unsentimentalized. He is clear without dryness; rich-toned without smear or blur. He molds phrases like a sensitive singer upon his instrument. He is adept with graduation and transition. His hand and ear are quick to the smoothest of euphonies. His rhythm propels like an inner force, neither driving hard nor sagging weak.

Such a musician, as distinct from a mere "soloist," shades and curves a melody with double sense of its intrinsic quality and of the quality of the violoncello as transmitting, characterizing voice. His sense of style releases the mood of romantic reverie that is often source of Schumann's song. Across a great concert-room he keeps it wistful and intimate revelation. Yet how wary is Mr. Piatigorsky of that slight excess which may turn it into platitudinous, quasi-Teutonic sentiment! After this poise and measure, the magnificent sonorities, the spacious periods, the rhapsodic ardor of the cadenza toward the end. Throughout, the musician glorified the virtuoso;

the tone-poet released the poetry of the instrument and, such as it is, of the concerto. As there are new pianists, so there is a new violoncellist risen.

Dr. Koussevitzky fitted Mr. Piatigorsky's concerto into an "All-Schumann" program. The conductor blends many temperaments into the single one that, whatever the momentary east, prevails in the concert-hall. Like other modernists with Mendelssohn, he believes in Schumann warmly, plays him as an act of faith. From October into April he had overlooked him; now for these large amends. It is custom to deprecate "one-composer" programs; unless a festival gives them warrant. In ordinary courses Bach or Brahms, Beethoven or Wagner—to say nothing of the audience—may hardly bear the strain. Schumann, next to never, is invited to endure it. Some, indeed, came into Symphony Hall on Friday prepared to say that it was beyond his strength or their patience. To each listener his particular re-action; but it is only the truth to say that the audience, by and large, gave not a sign of boredom. The impending holiday did not lessen its numbers; it listened intently, applauded heartily, stayed to the end. Which is not to say that Dr. Koussevitzky should be encouraged in his latent ambition to play all of Schumann's symphonies in a single season. Better a revival of the best of his choral scenes from "Faust"—say Part III—which some believe an unjustly neglected music.

The objection, if any, to yesterday's program was its preference for Schumann's later work; whereas twentieth-century inclination tends toward his earlier music. The concerto for violoncello is dated 1850; the overture to Byron's "Manfred," 1848. Time and fashion set against the romantic Englishman's "dramatic poem"; in degree against the German's romantic overture. Most of us had rather read about Byron in Monsieur Maurois's two volumes than dip into him in twice as many more. We have lost our relish for "his fancy drapery," and in those trappings the very personal "Manfred" is lavishly clothed. Even the program-book did not expatiate upon the drama, leaving us to listen to the overture as so much music. It lost nothing and gained not a little by Dr. Koussevitzky's "reading." By sympathetic imagination, by the orchestral instrument upon which he played, he wrung the utmost out of every period; yet steadily kept the whole firm-shaped and in motion.

The overture began and ended sombre and despairing. There were measures of passion and frenzy and calm, gloomy, haunted. The gentler theme of Astarte ran restless and pathetic course. Skep-

52 - 1 not hear uninter-
6 1/2 - 3/4 out the suspicion us of 1931 Schuthrough the ro-course, for himself
they were genuine se that he writes
edom of maturity.
us, lurks the pa-
22 + 1 touches our sensi-
6 - 1/2 a romantic mood
3 1/4 - 1/4 It also dims the 28 1/2 in 1931 can feel 8 1/4 - 1/4 Schumann would 10 1/2 e and change are 5 1/2 + 1/4 fred" overture. It 54 1/4 - 1/2 ver and splendor
22 1/4 + 4 ven's "Leonora";
4 hat keeps alive
the fate-hunted

94 + 1 1/4 time and change
14 - 1 mphony" out of 21 1/4 - 1/4 ars is sounding?
14 1/4 - 1 1/2 turn of spring is 14 - 1 1/2 npetus. It is the 16 1/2 + 1/2 miracle—the great-106 1/2 enge. Out of that 54 - 1/2 in B-flat was born
35 1/2 - 1/2 rresistible. There 60 1/2 - 1/2 in the orchestral
8 zky's sympathetic
6 and vigorous will 9-16 them. Even the 6 1/2 of surpassing rich-43 - 1 yent, glowing with 12 1/4 - 1/4 y measures of the 13 1/2 + 1 1/2 id—may not hide
23 - 1 1/2 But though the 41 1/2 - 2 1/4 spring-like fresh-8 1/2 - 1/2 eauty musing and 3 1/2 - 1/2 y. Out of twenty 96 - 1 1/2 g within him into 3 umann made one 31 1/2 - 1/2 nic tune. It is 5 arthy and fanciful,
1 the happy Schu-
10 - 1/2 lk, of the Rhine
4 1/4 - 1/2 renewed. Spring
2 1/4 - 1/2 is one written in
H. T. P.

th it played onal League s paid their
it is against the memory
t Barry ex gress. Tha row's gam
k. Another et a colleg onday whe for the fir ve Barry a tchers some en have bee kely to be en the gam

SCHUMANN DAY WITH SYMPHONY

Piatigorsky, Cellist, Plays the Concerto

Post April 18, 1931.
BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

That orchestral rarity, an all-Schumann programme, made the Symphony Concert of yesterday afternoon. In order of performance, though not of interest, the pieces were the "Overture" to "Manfred," the Concerto for Violoncello, with Gregor Piatigorsky as soloist, and the First Symphony.

THE "SPRING" SYMPHONY

It is possible to read that the "Manfred" Overture is the finest, the most successful of Schumann's orchestra pieces. Yet in yesterday's performance it was overshadowed by the Symphony, written seven years before. To be sure, this "Spring" Symphony is one of Dr. Koussevitzky's happiest ventures. At his hands the work undergoes a veritable re-creation; other conductors do not make of it all that he makes of it.

But for the matter of that, Dr. Koussevitzky directed yesterday a singularly sympathetic performance of the Overture, which heretofore he had led only at a Tuesday afternoon concert. There was abundant realization of the music's poetic content, its romantic ardor. No, it is not a matter of interpretation, but of orchestration. The scoring of the Overture is thick and monotonous; the strings are employed too constantly, the wind instruments, when they appear, are ineffectively handled. Virtually all of the important thematic material is assigned to the first violins. And as a result Schumann's intrinsically appealing ideas fail to make their rightful effect.

Of Mr. Piatigorsky, a young Russian giant who displays an uncommon mastery over the 'cello, reviewers in New York, where he was heard last season, have written ecstatically. The more the pity, then, that he chose as the vehicle for his Boston debut so unrewarding a work as this Concerto of Schumann, which is saved from utter and complete dullness only by the expressive slow division. From his playing yesterday it was chiefly to be gathered that Mr. Piatigorsky is an excellent musician, that he has an admirable control of the 'cello's often treacherous tone and that his technique was more than adequate to any demands that Schumann's piece laid upon him. He was warmly received by an audience that, in turn, lavished applause upon infinitely fresher music of the Symphony.

SYMPHONY HAS

NEW SOLOIST

The waning concert season finds Dr. Koussevitzky and the orchestra still at the peak of perfection they attained earlier in the season, when an auspicious opening heralded the 50th anniversary of Boston's orchestra. Yesterday afternoon at Symphony hall the 22d of the season's orchestra concerts found renewed interest in an all Schumann program and a soloist new to Boston, Gregor Piatigorsky, who contributed a masterly performance of the great musical romanticist's A minor concerto for violoncello.

Mr. Piatigorsky, with an instrument all too seldom heard in solo performance, wrought magic with his music and his instrument, lending to the work a majesty and dignity that was most impressive. With soloists at the violin and the piano we have had striking examples during this and previous seasons. Yet the A minor concerto emerged yesterday afternoon as something all too seldom presented to lovers of the good old German school of melody. Schumann, perhaps of all the German school, was endowed with an extraordinary and perhaps an abnormal imagination for the musical age in which he lived, and not until time had softened the blow of his radicalism were his compositions accepted with the glorious approbation they deserve.

Together with the stirring overture to "Manfred," which opened the program, Mr. Piatigorsky's performance was a tribute to the quality of the great music. He was cordially received by his audience and recalled to the platform several times.

the tone-poet released the poetry instrument and, such as it is, concerto. As there are new plans there is a new violoncellist risen.

Dr. Koussevitzky fitted Mr. Piatigorsky's concerto into an "All-Schumann" program. The conductor blends major elements into the single one that ever the momentary cast, prevail in concert-hall. Like other moderns with Mendelssohn, he believes in Schumann warmly, plays him as an faithful. From October into April overlooked him; now for these amends. It is custom to deprecate composer's programs; unless a gives them warrant. In ordinary Bach or Brahms, Beethoven or Wagner—to say nothing of the audience may hardly bear the strain. Schumann, next to never, is invited to it. Some, indeed, came into Symphony Hall on Friday prepared to say was beyond his strength or their. To each listener his particular but it is only the truth to say audience; by and large, gave no of boredom. The impending holiday not lessen its numbers; it listened, applauded heartily, stayed to. Which is not to say that Dr. Koussevitzky should be encouraged latent ambition to play all of Schumann's symphonies in a single season. revival of the best of his choral from "Faust"—say Part III—will believe an unjustly neglected music.

The objection, if any, to yes program was its preference for Schumann's later work; whereas two century inclination tends toward earlier music. The concerto for cello is dated 1850; the overture Ron's "Manfred," 1848. Time and set against the romantic English "dramatic poem"; in degree against German's romantic overture. More had rather read about Byron than Monsieur Maurois's two volumes thrust into him in twice as many months have lost our relish for "his fancy," and in those trappings the personal "Manfred" is lavishly. Even the program-book did not escape upon the drama, leaving us to let the overture as so much music. nothing and gained not a little Koussevitzky's "reading." By thetic imagination, by the orchestra instrument upon which he played wrung the utmost out of every yet steadily kept the whole firm and in motion.

The overture began and ended and despairing. There were moments of passion and frenzy and calm, haunted. The gentler theme of ran restless and pathetic course.

tical listeners could not hear uninterested, unimpressed; but the suspicion also intruded that for us of 1931 Schumann was also going through the romantic motions. Of course, for himself and his generation they were genuine and stirring—so intense that he writes with the force and freedom of maturity. But within them, for us, lurks the pathos of distance. It touches our sensibilities with regret for a romantic mood that we cannot regain. It also dims the composer's fires. Who in 1931 can feel Byronically even when Schumann would light the flame? Time and change are devitalizing this "Manfred" overture. It lacks the musical power and splendor that preserve Beethoven's "Leonora"; the theater-quality that keeps alive Wagner's overture to the fate-hunted "Dutchman."

Yet who thinks of time and change when the "Spring Symphony" out of Schumann's earlier years is sounding? For most of us the return of spring is everlasting romantic impetus. It is the annual, not the daily, miracle—the greater for its rarer occurrence. Out of that impetus the Symphony in B-flat was born to be perdurable and irresistible. There are faults and lapses in the orchestral texture. Dr. Koussevitzky's sympathetic insight, skillful hand and vigorous will may not always abate them. Even the tone of the orchestra—of surpassing richness in the slow movement, glowing with life in the proclamatory measures of the beginning and the end—may not hide all the inadvertencies. But though the whole symphony runs a spring-like freshness and ardor to set beauty musing and to call fantasy into play. Out of twenty vernal impulses stirring within him into as many melodies, Schumann made one all-embracing symphonic tune. It is poetical and homely, earthy and fanciful, local and universal, of the happy Schumanns and of the folk, of the Rhine Country and the world renewed. Spring poems indeed! Here is one written in tones, and near a century alive, young and true. H. T. P.

The Chicago Orchestra has recalled the music and the memory of Chadwick with performances last Friday and Saturday of his Overture, "Melpomene," work of his early prime. . . . The Boston Orchestra, for its part, will include his "Symphonic Sketches" in the supplementary matinée of next Tuesday. It is Chadwick's most characteristic work. . . . New York takes no notice.

SCHUMANN DAY WITH SYMPHONY

Piatigorsky, Cellist,
Plays the Concerto

Post April 18, 1931.
BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

That orchestral rarity, an all-Schumann programme, made the Symphony Concert of yesterday afternoon. In order of performance, though not of interest, the pieces were the "Overture" to "Manfred," the Concerto for Violon-cello, with Gregor Piatigorsky as soloist, and the First Symphony.

THE "SPRING" SYMPHONY

It is possible to read that the "Manfred" Overture is the finest, the most successful of Schumann's orchestral pieces. Yet in yesterday's performance it was overshadowed by the Symphony, written seven years before. To be sure, this "Spring" Symphony is one of Dr. Koussevitzky's happiest ventures. At his hands the work undergoes a veritable re-creation; other conductors do not make of it all that he makes of it.

But for the matter of that, Dr. Koussevitzky directed yesterday a singularly sympathetic performance of the Overture, which heretofore he had led only at a Tuesday afternoon concert. There was abundant realization of the music's poetic content, its romantic ardor. No, it is not a matter of interpretation, but of orchestration. The scoring of the Overture is thick and monotonous; the strings are employed too constantly, the wind instruments, when they appear, are ineffectively handled. Virtually all of the important thematic material is assigned to the first violins. And as a result Schumann's intrinsically appealing ideas fail to make their rightful effect.

Of Mr. Piatigorsky, a young Russian giant who displays an uncommon mastery over the 'cello, reviewers in New York, where he was heard last season, have written ecstatically. The more the pity, then, that he chose as the vehicle for his Boston debut so unrewarding a work as this Concerto of Schumann, which is saved from utter and complete dullness only by the expressive slow division. From his playing yesterday it was chiefly to be gathered that Mr. Piatigorsky is an excellent musician, that he has an admirable control of the 'cello's often treacherous tone and that his technique was more than adequate to any demands that Schumann's piece laid upon him. He was warmly received by an audience that, in turn, lavished applause upon infinitely fresher music of the Symphony.

SYMPHONY HAS

NEW SOLOIST

The waning concert season finds Dr. Koussevitzky and the orchestra still at the peak of perfection they attained earlier in the season, when an auspicious opening heralded the 50th anniversary of Boston's orchestra. Yesterday afternoon at Symphony hall the 22d of the season's orchestra concerts found renewed interest in an all Schumann program and a soloist new to Boston, Gregor Piatigorsky, who contributed a masterly performance of the great musical romanticist's A minor concerto for violoncello.

Mr. Piatigorsky, with an instrument all too seldom heard in solo performance, wrought magic with his music and his instrument, lending to the work a majesty and dignity that was most impressive. With soloists at the violin and the piano we have had striking examples during this and previous seasons. Yet the A minor concerto emerged yesterday afternoon as something all too seldom presented to lovers of the good old German school of melody. Schumann, perhaps of all the German school, was endowed with an extraordinary and perhaps an abnormal imagination for the musical age in which he lived, and not until time had softened the blow of his radicalism were his compositions accepted with the glorious approbation they deserve.

Together with the stirring overture to "Manfred," which opened the program, Mr. Piatigorsky's performance was a tribute to the quality of the great music. He was cordially received by his audience and recalled to the platform several times.

Despite the excellence of his performance, the Schumann first symphony in B-flat major, which closed the program was, perhaps, the epitome of the perfection. Taking the opening andante at a brisk tempo, the so-called "Spring" symphony was brought to an inspired and inspiring performance. This larghetto was serene and impressive, while the buoyant swing of the scherzo and trios, the exuberance and vivacity of the finale were distinctly Schumannesque in conception and reading. Not for many long seasons have we had the treat of so decidedly melodic a program. On the contrary, this has been the season when new compositions, of interest perhaps, but falling upon unresponsive ears, have been offered by an alert and astute conductor. For those who deplore the dissonance and strangeness of the musical moderns, yesterday afternoon's program came as a welcome relief.

The program will be repeated this evening, while next Friday and Saturday, the last but one of the concert season, will hold the Schubert C major Symphony, "The Pleasure Dome of Kubla Khan," by Griffes, and Stravinsky's familiar "Fire-bird" suite.

J. D.

SYMPHONY HALL Sole April 18, 1931 Boston Symphony Orchestra

Dr Koussevitzky chose a Schumann program for this week's Symphony concerts, an honor seldom awarded these days to that composer's music. The "Manfred" overture, the concerto for violoncello, and the First Symphony adequately represent Schumann's work for orchestra. Thanks to the admirable playing of Gregor Piatigorsky, who made his first Boston appearance yesterday afternoon, the concerto was the most heartily applauded of the three pieces.

Mr Piatigorsky is a Russian, still in his 20s. He has served as first cellist in the Berlin Philharmonic Orchestra under Furtwängler, and toured extensively in Europe and America as a virtuoso. Yesterday's performance proved him a cellist of the first rank and a musician of eminence. The fine taste and the unobtrusive but very remarkable technical skill he showed were notable.

Between them he and Dr Koussevitzky conveyed to the audience the full emotional warmth of Schumann's music. The many recalls for the soloist were richly deserved. Dr Koussevitzky, as is his custom, refrained from sharing Mr Piatigorsky's plaudits, though there was no doubt that many in the audience wished to clap conductor and orchestra as well as the soloist.

Schuman's Music

Schumann's music is less admired

nowadays by musicians than it was 50 years ago. To his contemporaries, brought up on Haydn and Beethoven, his work seemed daringly original, but the greater daring and the more powerful originality of Wagner soon ranked Schumann with the musical conservatives.

That Schumann never learned to write effectively for orchestra is a commonplace of musical criticism. That his best work is to be found among his short pieces for piano, such as those in his opus 12; and among the songs, is now universally recognized. Nothing on yesterday's program is to be ranked with the "Aufschwung" for piano, or such songs as "Mondnacht," both of them masterpieces still deservedly beloved of concertgoers.

Much of the "Manfred" overture sounds labored and conventional to a generation which loves in Byron only the short lyrics and the satirical "Don Juan." Much of the concerto for violoncello seems crabbed and formless to ears attuned to the rigorous style of Stravinsky or the elegance of Debussy. Even the B flat Symphony, for all the splendid vitality of its nobler passages contains much that seems repetitious and clumsy today. Nineteenth century German romanticism, in short, out of fashion.

Yet there is no denying the imaginative power back of Schumann's music. He is one of the great lyricists of music, incapable of the epic grandeur of Bach, the nobility of Beethoven, the dramatic intensity of Wagner, but unsurpassed in his own twilight realm of day dream and fantasy, of short-breathed shouts of exultation, of musing languors.

A Triumph

Dr Koussevitzky's readings of Schumann are invariably eloquent, always emotional, always dramatic. But they do not do full justice to his moodiness, his waywardness, his peculiar personal imagination. There is always a hint of strangeness, even of madness, in Schumann's music. It has neither the essential sanity nor the solidity of the work of his disciple Brahms. It is this romantic strangeness that one misses in such readings of Schumann as those given us yesterday.

The orchestra sounded magnificently yesterday. The strings, in particular, had a glowing intensity, a richness that struck even ears familiar with the excellences of the Boston Symphony. It was a triumph to make music so ill written for orchestra sound so well.

The program for next week includes Schubert's C major Symphony, Griffes' "Kubla Khan," and the suite from Stravinsky's "Firebird."

P. R.

GREGOR PLATIGORSKY, violoncellist, was born in Ekaterinoslav, Russia, in 1903. As a child he studied the violin with his father, but soon showed a mastery of the instrument by which he is now known. Migrating to Berlin after the war, he became first violoncellist of the Berlin Philharmonic Orchestra under Wilhelm Furtwängler. Soon he found his field as a virtuoso. Besides appearing with the leading orchestras of Berlin, Leipsic, Hamburg, Frankfort, Cologne, Dresden, Amsterdam, etc., he has appeared with orchestras in the United States from New York to Los Angeles.

He sojourned in the United States for a short time in the season of 1929-30. On December 29, 1929, he played with the Philharmonic-Symphony Society of New York, Dvořák's concerto in B minor, under Willem Mengelberg.

Boston Symphony Monitor — April 18, 1931 Boston Symphony Orchestra

For the twenty-second pair of Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts, in Symphony Hall, Boston, April 17 and 18, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky prepared a program calculated to smooth any musical feathers that might have been ruffled by a fiftieth season made somewhat cacophonous by a long list of anniversary salutations from contemporary composers. What composer could be better suited to the purpose than Schumann, who besides had not been represented on previous programs of the season? Hence a list consisting of the "Manfred" Overture, the Violoncello Concerto and the Symphony in B flat.

It would be a mistake to suppose that this program was soporific. Schumann was perhaps not the greatest of symphonic composers, nor one of those whose compositions best support the test of an entire program. But he is by no means to be forbidden the concert hall because he was not a past master of orchestration; and no modernist can deny his sense of structural order, his rhythmic ingenuity, nor above all his gift of melody. This program, moreover, was cunningly devised to display him at his best.

The "Manfred" Overture, which many consider his greatest symphonic work, had a brilliant performance which was received apathetically by the Friday subscribers. Dramatically conceived and eloquently executed, this interpretation was remarkable for its elucidation of content, form and poetic values.

The Concerto, no doubt the weakest of the three items, was reinforced by the virtuosity and musicality of Gregor Piatigorsky in the solo part. Not only in the lovely slow movement, but throughout the work he stirred admiration for his beautiful tone, his technical mastery, his expressive phrasing and his musical taste. This was his first appearance in Boston, and he was rapturously received.

The "Spring" Symphony, one of Dr. Koussevitzky's favored repertory pieces, again came engagingly alive. It is possible to feel that at the opening a less vehement vernal proclamation might suffice to set the sap running, and that the melody of the Larghetto would be more lyric if it did not drag. But the Scherzo and the Finale were captivatingly set forth. Under a heavier hand this Scherzo may become extremely tedious. Dr. Koussevitzky, by the imagination with which he brings out its varieties, makes it unceasingly fresh. And the last movement becomes actually "animato e grazioso" through his witty reading and the subtle responsiveness of his players.

L. A. S.

SCHUMANN

The 22d concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra, Dr. Koussevitzky, conductor, took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony hall. The program, composed of works by Schumann, was as follows: Overture to Byron's "Manfred," concerto for violoncello in A minor, op. 129 (Gregor Piatigorsky, soloist) and Symphony No. 1 in B flat major, op. 38.

Yesterday afternoon's music served to dispel two platitudes: One, that the violoncello is inclined to be monotonous, to lack variety in tonal color; the other, that Schumann employs the idiom of the piano, when writing for other instruments, to such a degree that his compositions for orchestra are not effective. Mr. Piatigorsky quickly disproved the first. In his hands the violoncello vies with the violin in versatility. The depth and richness of its tone combined with its remarkable range make sharper contrasts possible, give it a character, while predominantly a melodic instrument, of being more than that. As for the second—if Schumann's orchestration is not of the best, what does it matter! Despite the fact, he composed music overflowing with exquisite melody, spiced with varied rhythms and touches of humor.

Mr. Piatigorsky is light and agile in his bowing; his intonation is fine. He is a virtuoso in the highest sense of the word for he is interested in his technical skill only as the docile servant of music. The music commands and he obeys; he lets himself go with it. Taste that is flawless saves him from becoming sentimental. His instrument sings, richly sonorous, nicely turned phrases. Not only as soloist Mr. Piatigorsky excels but also in ensemble. His regard for the other players, his ability to dovetail the phrase he is playing with that played by one or other instruments in the orchestra—for there is a constant interplay of themes between the two—proves his fine musicianship perhaps better than any other of his qualities.

"Beauty truly blest" was the result, for Dr. Koussevitzky's sensitive accompaniment left nothing to be desired.

The Symphony was brilliantly played. In it the spirit of spring was embodied, then loosened sweeping everything before. It is effervescent as champagne, of changeful mood and varied humor. A definite plot, as it were, does not run through its movements—one theme germinating from another, making a closely knit whole. Rather one episode follows hard upon another, each almost complete in itself, beautiful for its intrinsic values more than for its bearing on the whole.

The concert opened with a stirring performance of the dramatic overture to Byron's "Manfred."

A large audience applauded enthusiastically.

The concert will be repeated tonight. The program of next week will be as follows: Schubert, Symphony in C major, No. 7; Griffes, "The Pleasure Dome of Kubla Khan" (after the poem of S. T. Coleridge); Stravinsky, Suite from "L'Oiseau de Feu" ("The Fire-Bird"), a danced legend.

Twenty-third Programme

FRIDAY AFTERNOON, APRIL 24, at 2.30 o'clock

SATURDAY EVENING, APRIL 25, at 8.15 o'clock

Schubert Symphony in C major, No. 7

- I. Andante; Allegro non troppo.
- II. Andante con moto.
- III. Scherzo; Allegro vivace; Trio.
- IV. Finale: Allegro vivace.

Griffes "The Pleasure Dome of Kubla Khan"
(After the Poem of S. T. Coleridge)

Lambert . . . "The Rio Grande," for Chorus, Orchestra and Solo Pianoforte
(Poem by Sacheverell Sitwell)

Piano Solo: JESÚS MARÍA SANROMÁ
(First time in Boston)

Stravinsky Suite from "L'Oiseau de Feu" ("The Fire-Bird")
A Danced Legend

- I. Introduction: Katschei's Enchanted Garden and Dance of the Fire-Bird.
- II. Supplication of the Fire-Bird.
- III. The Princesses Play with the Golden Apples.
- IV. Dance of the Princess.
- V. Infernal Dance of all the Subjects of Katschei.

Chorus of the Cecilia Society, Arthur Fiedler, Conductor

STEINWAY PIANO

There will be an intermission after the symphony.

Announcement of the new book "THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA:
1881-1931," on page 1611.

SCHUMANN

The 22d concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra, Dr. Koussevitzky, conductor, took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony hall. The program, composed of works by Schumann, was as follows: Overture to Byron's "Manfred," concerto for violoncello in A minor, op. 129 (Gregor Piatigorsky, soloist) and Symphony No. 1 in B flat major, op. 38.

Yesterday afternoon's music served to dispel two platitudes: One, that the violoncello is inclined to be monotonous, to lack variety in tonal color; the other, that Schumann employs the idiom of the piano, when writing for other instruments, to such a degree that his compositions for orchestra are not effective. Mr. Piatigorsky quickly disproved the first. In his hands the violoncello vies with the violin in versatility. The depth and richness of its tone combined with its remarkable range make sharper contrasts possible, give it a character, while predominantly a melodic instrument, of being more than that. As for the second—if Schumann's orchestration is not of the best, what does it matter! Despite the fact, he composed music overflowing with exquisite melody, spiced with varied rhythms and touches of humor.

Mr. Piatigorsky is light and agile in his bowing; his intonation is fine. He is a virtuoso in the highest sense of the word for he is interested in his technical skill only as the docile servant of music. The music commands and he obeys; he lets himself go with it. Taste that is flawless saves him from becoming sentimental. His instrument sings, richly sonorous, nicely turned phrases. Not only as soloist Mr. Piatigorsky excels but also in ensemble. His regard for the other players, his ability to dovetail the phrase he is playing with that played by one or other instruments in the orchestra—for there is a constant interplay of themes between the two—proves his fine musicianship perhaps better than any other of his qualities. "Beauty truly blest" was the result, for Dr. Koussevitzky's sensitive accompaniment left nothing to be desired.

The Symphony was brilliantly played. In it the spirit of spring was embodied, then loosened sweeping everything before. It is effervescent as champagne, of changeable mood and varied humor. A definite plot, as it were, does not run through its movements—one theme germinating from another, making a closely knit whole. Rather one episode follows hard upon another, each almost complete in itself, beautiful for its intrinsic values more than for its bearing on the whole.

The concert opened with a stirring performance of the dramatic overture to Byron's "Manfred."

A large audience applauded enthusiastically.

The concert will be repeated tonight. The program of next week will be as follows: Schubert, Symphony in C major, No. 7; Griffes, "The Pleasure Dome of Kubla Khan" (after the poem of S. T. Coleridge); Stravinsky, Suite from "L'Oiseau de Feu" ("The Fire-Bird"), a danced legend.

Twenty-third Programme

FRIDAY AFTERNOON, APRIL 24, at 2.30 o'clock

SATURDAY EVENING, APRIL 25, at 8.15 o'clock

Schubert Symphony in C major, No. 7
 I. Andante; Allegro non troppo.
 II. Andante con moto.
 III. Scherzo; Allegro vivace; Trio.
 IV. Finale: Allegro vivace.

Griffes "The Pleasure Dome of Kubla Khan"
 (After the Poem of S. T. Coleridge)

Lambert . . . "The Rio Grande," for Chorus, Orchestra and Solo Pianoforte
 (Poem by Sacheverell Sitwell)
 Piano Solo: JESÚS MARÍA SANROMÁ
 (First time in Boston)

Stravinsky . . . Suite from "L'Oiseau de Feu" ("The Fire-Bird")
 A Danced Legend
 I. Introduction: Katschei's Enchanted Garden and Dance of the Fire-Bird.
 II. Supplication of the Fire-Bird.
 III. The Princesses Play with the Golden Apples.
 IV. Dance of the Princess.
 V. Infernal Dance of all the Subjects of Katschei.

Chorus of the Cecilia Society, Arthur Fiedler, Conductor

STEINWAY PIANO

There will be an intermission after the symphony.

Announcement of the new book "THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA:
 1881-1931," on page 1611.

American Remembered

(Colby—Transcript)

Charles Tomlinson Griffes (1884-1920)

Whose Tone-Poem, "The Pleasure-Dome of Kubla Khan" Will Be Revived at the Symphony Concerts of Friday and Saturday. . . . "A Rare and Original Talent—One of the Finer, More Sensitive and Fastidious Musical Natures that the United States has Produced."

MUSIC

SYMPHONY CONCERT

By PHILIP HALE

The 23d concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra, Dr. Koussevitzky conductor, took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony hall. The program was as follows: Schubert, Symphony, C major, No. 7. Griffes, "The Pleasure Dome of Kubla Khan." Lambert, "The Rio Grande," for chorus, orchestra and solo pianoforte (Mr. Sanroma, pianist; first time in Boston). Stravinsky, suite from the ballet "The Fire-Bird." The Japanese visitors sat in an improvised box in the first balcony on the right-hand side, facing the stage. As they entered the orchestra and audience rose in respectful greeting.

Dr. Koussevitzky is to be thanked heartily for introducing Lambert's "Rio Grande," and with the assistance of the valiant Cecilia Society that had been thoroughly trained by Mr. Fiedler, and with the brilliant Mr. Sanroma, giving a performance that must be reckoned as one of this season's chief events. Not that "The Rio Grande" is "a chef d'oeuvre for the highest"; not that it is "epoch-making," a term that is applied to almost every new and unusual composition that excites the rhetorical flow of our young friends writing for the New York newspapers; but this music is first of all joyous and exhilarating. We all have been taught to take music too seriously. We have listened this season to some composers who "sitting in doleful dumps, have wailed lugubriously and discordantly; to others who have endeavored to give rhythmical expression to the inexpressible, or sought the perfect flower of beauty on the muck-heap of atonality. It is so easy to be "original" in saying nothing. Too many heathen have furiously raged; too many of the people, makers of music and hearers of the younger generation, have imagined a vain thing.

But here comes young Mr. Lambert who, taking a charming poem by Sacher-Mascheron as a source of inspiration, does not attempt to give an interlinear translation into tones. The words, the scenes evoked by the poet feed the composer's fancy, quicken his imagination, which is not sluggish, much less, lacking. Mr. Lambert has both fancy and imagination to which he gives free rein for his orchestra and for the pianist's cadenza. It is true there are words for the chorus to sing, and the singers are neither ignored nor slighted, but the effect of the whole, the one constant impact—that's the thing. Mr. Lambert is delightfully extravagant, but not as Thomas Heywood's madman beating a drum. He is an appreciator and a utilizer of the finer qualities of jazz, but not a slave to it—not finding it a strength and refuge in time of doubt and trouble. His extravagance and recklessness are more to be applauded than the smug, academic conservatism of the timid, the sticklers for approved form, the writing for safety and the approbation of any owl professor.

Mr. Lambert's "Rio Grande" is not only full of life that is contagious; it brings near far-off scenes, and this without the borrowing of real or spurious "folk-songs". No one knows what "isle joyeuse" Debussy had in mind when he wrote his piano piece. This "Rio Grande" flows through a country as undefined, and empties into a harbor unsounded, unknown to any pilot. Therefore the audacity of Mr. Lambert's fancy makes captive the hearer. Seldom in Symphony hall has there been so instant, spontaneous, so prolonged, so tumultuous recognition of an unfamiliar composition signed with an unfamiliar name.

The interpretation of the symphony was eloquently musical. It would be interesting to know just what that excellent musician, Mr. Stock, did to the orchestration of "Kubla Kahn"—the impression made yesterday was not so vivid as that made by the first performance a dozen years ago. Are the wings of the "Fire-Bird" drooping? Are its feathers no longer of dazzling gold? Is there too much of Rimsky-Korsakov in the suite and not enough of the Stravinsky of "Patrouchka" and other later works? The Princesses still disport themselves in a charming manner, but Katschei's subjects are only "infernal" in their dance by courtesy of the composer.

The concert will be repeated tonight. The program of the concerts next week, the last of the 50th season, will be as follows: Wagner, prelude to "The Mastersingers;" Debussy prelude to "The Afternoon of a Faun;" Strauss "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks;" Beethoven symphony C minor, No. 5.

SYMPHONY DISPLAYS SCHUBERT

Lambert's "The Rio Grande" Heard for First Time Here

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

The presence of the visiting Japanese royalty served to make of the Symphony Concert of yesterday afternoon something of an occasion. And occasions are good for the Symphony Concerts, they put audiences on edge and conductor and orchestra on their mettle.

SCHUBERT'S C MAJOR

There was, for the matter of that, more than usual interest in the programme itself. If the suite from Stravinsky's "Fire-Bird," music that is more surface than substance, and wearing thin with the years, seemed superfluous at the end of a concert already long, it at least served further to display the orchestra's silken sheen of tone, its remarkable virtuosity.

Never before, on Friday afternoon, had Dr. Koussevitzky conducted the C major Symphony of Schubert; a single performance had come on a Saturday evening when the orchestra was marking the 100th anniversary of the composer's death. One of the few symphonies since Beethoven to deserve unqualifiedly the title of masterpiece, it is nevertheless, by reason of its length and repetitiousness, a searching test of a conductor's skill. Yesterday the listener's interest never flagged; the music was continuously engrossing, and it had the sweep and spaciousness, the rhythmic drive that set this symphony apart from other works of its kind.

SCHUBERT
Brown's Pictures—Miniature—92

Griffes' Tone Poem

In reviving Griffes' tone-poem, "The Pleasure Dome of Kubla Khan," unheard here for 11 years, Dr. Koussevitzky was well-advised.

Well-advised, too, was Dr. Koussevitzky in placing on yesterday's programme, Constant Lambert's "The Rio Grande," for chorus and orchestra, which was to have had its Boston premiere next Monday evening.

This setting, by one of the most promising of the younger English composers of a fantastic poem of Sacheverell Sitwell, is on the whole uneven. Pages that are brilliant, tremendously vital or insinuatingly seductive, are offset by some that are flat and commonplace. Some of Mr. Lambert's jazz, of which the English reviewers made so much, seems to American ears merely tawdry. He is happier with his Spanish rhythms, though the long and difficult cadenza for piano and percussion instruments is a noteworthy achievement. It was notably played yesterday by Mr. Sanroma, and the chorus of the Cecilia Society sang with a dash and fire as well as with a sensuousness of tone that bore testimony to the progress that it is making under the guidance of Arthur Fiedler. Yesterday's audience received the new work with enthusiasm and lavished applause upon the performers.

An Afternoon Of Composers Caught Young

Lambert and Beatified Jazz, Griffes and His Visions,
Schubert, Stravinsky

THERE is no better friend to the music of American composers than Serge Koussevitzky, conductor. He welcomes new matter from the elder and established men; brings it to thorough and sympathetic performance; meanwhile keeps their enduring work in the public ear and mind. He is as well disposed to youthful and little known Americans. He examines their manuscripts. If he finds on their staves promise, performance and reflections of their own time, he makes room for them at the Symphony Concerts, to present hearing adds encouragement for the future. Yesterday he found a new channel for these honorable offices. He revived the master-work of a dead American composer whose music in recent years has fallen into strange neglect.

In the seasons of 1919 and 1920 Mr. Monteux and the Boston Orchestra played for the first times, and four times over, "The Pleasure-Dome of Kubla Khan," tone-poem by C. T. Griffes. It disclosed, in music of fine texture and ample dimensions, a composer of individuality and imagination, skillful in his medium, following a logic of his own, into tones conjuring rare visions. Four months later, when conductors were hastening to discover and play his pieces, hateful Death cut off Griffes in the young prime of the thirties. There was public and private lament. There were renewed performances. Yet in a few years all his work was put by and forgotten. Pressed by classics and conservatives on the one side, by "novelties" and innovators on the other, a lone man in an unabating flood, the conductor's perpetual problem is to remember, repeat and revive the music, lately new, that also deserves to endure. The fate of composers may hang on such returns.

Koussevitzky is also the friend of composers, the seeker for new music, the cultivator of his own music. Whatever their race or their age, watches for them, spies them out, gives them opportunity, would have them as eager as he. For him the conductor's obligation is not only as he may compass the tested, the familiar. The old, the tried, the experimental, the new, the untried, the individual adventure in the immediate future. And to such music, again, he has his audience as alert as he. He repeats Constant Lambert's "The Rio Grande," made stir in London a year ago, and yesterday he did.

Little Mr. Lambert "sets" a poem by Koussevitzky timely recollected, or discovered, Griffes and "The Pleasure-Dome of Kubla Khan." At the performance yesterday, their music of American composition was renewed and re-assured. In Coleridge's poem of phantasmagoria touched Griffes's musical imagination. He visioned the caverns of ice, the endless sea; the pleasure-house, and smiling. He heard the revelries. He felt the chill mockery of the waves. He wrought these visions into a music rich and with suggestion. The susceptible knows and feels the imaginings of word-poet and the tone-poet. He is in their atmosphere of phantasmagoria. And first and last a performance finely sensitized as the music or rarefied his every impression.

Griffes has written a piece of music that sustains itself as such. The motifs are arresting and significant. From them the music expands flexible and firm. Propulsive gives it movement and vitality. Harmonic and instrumental color incessantly, shadowed or transparent in the web of atmosphere. Griffes writes in a Russian idiom; but as one who has absorbed it; who gives it forth in a new speech; who does not merely imitate a phantasmagoria in tones lays nothing common mars; nothing weakens. Imagery, means, expression are equally sensitive and harmonic. The presence of an individual is pervasive and unmistakable. A phantasmagoria in tones lays nothing common mars; nothing weakens. Imagery, means, expression are equally sensitive and harmonic.

SYMPHONY DISPLAYS SCHUBERT

Lambert's "The Rio Grande" Heard for First Time Here

BY WARREN STOREY SMITH

The presence of the visiting Japanese royalty served to make of the Symphony Concert of yesterday afternoon something of an occasion. And occasions are good for the Symphony Concerts, they put audiences on edge and conductor and orchestra on their mettle.

SCHUBERT'S C MAJOR

There was, for the matter of that, more than usual interest in the programme itself. If the suite from Stravinsky's "Fire-Bird," music that is more surface than substance, and wearing thin with the years, seemed superfluous at the end of a concert already long, it at least served further to display the orchestra's silken sheen of tone, its remarkable virtuosity.

Never before, on Friday afternoon, had Dr. Koussevitzky conducted the C major Symphony of Schubert; a single performance had come on a Saturday evening when the orchestra was marking the 100th anniversary of the composer's death. One of the few symphonies since Beethoven to deserve unqualifiedly the title of masterpiece, it is nevertheless, by reason of its length and repetitiousness, a searching test of a conductor's skill. Yesterday the listener's interest never flagged; the music was continuously engrossing, and it had the sweep and spaciousness, the rhythmic drive that set this symphony apart from other works of its kind.

SCHUBERT
Brown's Pictures—Miniature—92

Griffes' Tone Poem

In reviving Griffes' tone-poem, "The Pleasure Dome of Kubla Khan," unheard here for 11 years, Dr. Koussevitzky was well-advised.

Well-advised, too, was Dr. Koussevitzky in placing on yesterday's programme, Constant Lambert's "The Rio Grande," for chorus and orchestra, which was to have had its Boston premiere next Monday evening.

This setting, by one of the most promising of the younger English composers of a fantastic poem of Sacheverell Sitwell, is on the whole uneven. Pages that are brilliant, tremendously vital or insinuatingly seductive, are offset by some that are flat and commonplace. Some of Mr. Lambert's jazz, of which the English reviewers made so much, seems to American ears merely tawdry. He is happier with his Spanish rhythms, though the long and difficult cadenza for piano and percussion instruments is a noteworthy achievement. It was notably played yesterday by Mr. Sanroma, and the chorus of the Cecilia Society sang with a dash and fire as well as with a sensuousness of tone that bore testimony to the progress that it is making under the guidance of Arthur Fiedler. Yesterday's audience received the new work with enthusiasm and lavished applause upon the performers.

An Afternoon Of Concert Caucasian

Lambert and Griffes at Schubert

THERE is music of a different kind than that of the elder Schubert. He brings it to the performance; meaning during work in the He is as well as little known American manuscripts staves promise, portions of their own for them at the present hearing a the future. Yesterday channel for these revived the master can composer who years has fallen

In the seasons Montoux and the played for the first over, "The Pleasure Dome of Kubla Khan," tone-poem disclosed, in music ample dimensions, vividness and imagination, following into tones conjured. Four months later, hastening to discover pieces, hateful Debussy the young prime of the public and private were renewed performance all his work gotten. Pressed by lives on the one side innovators on the other unabating flood, the perpetual problem is also to revive the music also deserves to end the composers may hang on

Dr. Koussevitzky timely recollected, or timely discovered, Griffes and "The Pleasure-Dome of Kubla Khan." At the end of the performance yesterday, their place in the music of American composers was renewed and re-assured. Lines in Coleridge's poem of phantasmagoria touched Griffes's musical imagination. He visioned the caverns of ice, the sunless sea; the pleasure-house, lordly and smiling. He heard the revelries within. He felt the chill mockery of the river-caves. He wrought these visions and sensations into a music rich and potent with suggestion. The susceptible listener knows and feels the imaginings of the word-poet and the tone-poet. He also bathes in their atmosphere of phantasmagoria. And first and last a performance as finely sensitized as the music deepened or rarefied his every impression.

No less Griffes has written a piece of music that sustains itself as such. The germinating motifs are arresting and significant. From them the music expands itself, flexible and firm. Propulsive rhythm gives it movement and vitality. Over it harmonic and instrumental color plays incessantly, shadowed or transparent. The musical progress, the poetized suggestion, go hand in hand. There is no rent in the web of atmosphere. It is quite true that Griffes writes in the Debussyan idiom; but as one who has absorbed it; who gives it forth in his own speech; who does not merely imitate. A clear design proceeds to completion. A phantasmagoria in tones lays its spell. Nothing common mars; nothing trite weakens. Imagery, means, expression are equally sensitive and harmonious. The presence of an individual beauty is pervasive and unmistakable. One orchestral work, and Griffes had enriched American music with the tone-poetry in which it is meager.

Dr. Koussevitzky is also the friend of youthful composers, the seeker for new abilities, the cultivator of his own musical time. Whatever their race or their city, he watches for them, spies them out, gives them opportunity, would have his audiences as eager as he. For him the conductor's obligation is not only as perfect performance as he may compass of the old, the tested, the familiar. The conductor is also bound to make room for what is new, untried, experimental, for individual adventure in the immediate hour. And to such music, again, he would have his audience as alert as he. When Constant Lambert's "The Rio Grande" made stir in London a year ago, Dr. Koussevitzky was sure to bring it to Boston and yesterday he did.

By title Mr. Lambert "sets" a poem by Sacheverell Sitwell. In the setting he writes an exacting and pungent piano-part that twice over is displayful solo. With it Mr. Sanromá, modernist by instinct, faith and practice, distinguished himself. Mr. Lambert asks the voices of not too large a chorus. The Cecilia supplied them, thanks to Mr. Fiedler's training and an inspiring music, with newfound precision, certainty, freedom and flavor. Miss Mae Murray sang incidental measures. Her alto tones set them glowing. Adapting his orchestra to his design, Mr. Lambert discards woodwinds and horns; adds cornets to trumpets, trombones and tuba; assembles the usual strings; crowds the percussion-corner. There the virtuosi he would have did not yesterday fail him. In turn, the whole orchestra was on its mettle. After his habit Dr. Koussevitzky led as one who has found a brave new thing. Last January in New York, from the Schola Cantorum, "The Rio Grande" was a failure with the audience. Yesterday, as in London and in Manchester, it won many ears and many hands. Within belief there was a difference in performance.

"The Rio Grande" is a brave new thing. In the beginning is Mr. Sitwell's poem. Of course it is in free verse, and also mannered. Otherwise no Sitwell—of the modernist three—Osbert, Sacheverell, and their sister—would have signed it. There are broken lengths; a curious rhythm winding and voluptuous; gentle rhymes in near or distant impact; copious verbiage; unexpected adjectives. Underneath this vesture and procedure is unmistakable romantic mood, in the temper of the present day. Lines droop with sensuous languor; sound full or sharp; teem with high-colored images; sink again into sensuous haze. Mr. Lambert has not treated these verses as a text to be followed delineatively. No more has he regarded them as so many words for the chorus and the solo-voice to sing, though they usefully meet that need. Rather he has sought the musical equivalent for the images, the moods, the atmosphere—a decanting from one medium into another.

Mr. Lambert works out his design as a child of his time and surroundings. To him jazz is a natural and congenial speech. He has heard the light music of the theater and not always found it insipid, sterile or cheap. He has listened compassionately to jazz-songs. Brilliant mechanics, the technical mastery and flare of virtuosity, stir him. He is also a composer of skill, resource, imagination and invention, to whom the thing to be expressed and the expressive tones may become as one. There are sensuous languors in Mr. Sitwell's word-picturing, and the winding, voluptuous rhythm. There it and rhythms. Jazz is the Mr. Lambert jazz of musical suggestion. A casual interest. Its equivalent theater, but tired, imagination's poem is a it, as it were, rated, another

Lambert accom- s jazz-rhythms n and a light rdinary practi- zz-instrumenta- it in his brass up, but again ng, quick darts a jazz becomes nd fancy. It copates gaily; hints of a new- e. . . . The l pauses. The ts; the pianist t puts jazz at head, brilliance so-fingers. He dazzling. The s him of his agful interludes ess. Mr. Lam- ervors; with a ying. A musi- ansfiguring the s of jazz-songs They begin to aligic haze. The e the final evo- Brazilian vista s. . . . The plause rings.

music of Griffes shed between a entlieth-century was Schubert's played for the ssevitzy on a libly, the con- tize the first e of the con- . Certainly he so brisk as to ths" may bear t and through owing song of at heard. We , no doubt, un- r shame and aphony of more ness, of more orchestral skill ncy. But the ra clothed the slow movement in a luscious beauty of sound; while the scherzo and the trio may pass for heaven-sent melodies. No doubt the Cambridge boy overdid the matter when he prattled about a "bird-song" symphony, but it is permissible to be soon sated with it.

The Suite from Stravinsky's first ballet, "The Fire Bird," brought up the rear. Under Dr. Koussevitzky it has become the delicate and adroit show-piece of a virtuoso orchestra. Those who shiver and shrink before the "rough stuff," as they call it, of "The Rite of Spring," "Noces," "Cedipus" and the "Psalms-Symphony," take their pleasure of the great Igor innocent of greatness, light, fanciful, glamorous, giving no more than two or three hints of the composer that is to be. But the fate that steadily pursues him has overtaken even this early "Fire-Bird." He writes for the stage and in the sifting of time the music becomes concert-piece. Who now thinks of the ballet that the Russians used to dance and even Boston once saw?

H. T. P.

Boston Symphony

Interest in the penultimate Friday concert of the symphony season in Boston (April 24) was divided between Their Imperial Highnesses, the Prince and Princess Takamatsu, of Japan, who were present as guests, and the program which had been arranged by Dr. Serge Koussevitzky. The present chronicle, however, must be restricted to the musical aspect of the occasion, which was embodied in this list: Schubert, Symphony in C major, No. 7; Griffes, "The Pleasure Dome of Kubla Khan"; Lambert, "The Rio Grande"; Stravinsky, Suite from "The Fire-Bird."

Constant Lambert's piece, which at the concert under review had its first Boston performance, won a prodigious popular success; a success which undoubtedly was well deserved by reason of the composer's cleverness in combining jazz with romantic lyricism. Many persons like both modern dance music and the ballads which lend such a pleasing quality of sentiment to operetta; surely there are few who do not care for either. The united forms, then, especially when presented in a dazzling instrumental dress, can hardly fail of their effect. The composer really ought to cable his thanks to Dr. Koussevitzky for the way in which his work was introduced to Boston. The piano part was played with great skill by J. M. Sanromá, and the chorus of the Cecilia Society, trained by Arthur Fiedler, intoned the lines of Sacheverell Sitwell with remarkable precision and expression.

Charles T. Griffes's tone poem, first heard nearly 12 years ago under Monteux, was worthy of its revival. It is undoubtedly one of the most attractive of modern compositions by Americans; though of course in style it has nothing distinctively American about it, but is in direct descent from the French impressionists. At the concert under discussion Dr. Koussevitzky used the score as revised, after a consultation with the composer, by Frederick A. Stock, conductor of the Chicago Symphony Orchestra. Mr. Stock expected that with his "changes and amplifications" the orchestration would "sound" more readily. After an interval of a dozen years, one's memory can hardly be trusted for a reliable comparison. One can only record that the work seemed more salient on the former occasion than on the present. The difference in the impression, dear Brutus, may lie in the lapse of time, in Mr. Stock's "amplifications"—or in ourselves.

When the so-called heavenly lengths of Schubert's C major Symphony had at last been traversed there was much applause. Whether this manifestation of pleasure was aroused by the music or by the fact that it was over, we cannot say; though we do know our own feelings in the matter. For many long years we have been trying to understand how the composer of the "Rosamunde" music, the B minor Symphony and the greatest of the songs could be also the author of this symphony, whose obvious virtues are so vitiated by its garrulousness and its rhythmic ponderosity. How could the composer write those lovely melodies for the woodwind in the second movement, and then crush them with clumsy chords? And have the London Philharmonic players of 1844 deserved the bitter contempt they have received because of their lack of reverence for those triplets? Our heart goes out to those musicians.

L. A. S.

Sacheverell Sitwell. In the set-writes an exacting and pungent part that twice over is displayed.
With it Mr. Sanromá, modernist stinct, faith and practice, distinct himself. Mr. Lambert asks the of not too large a chorus. The supplied them, thanks to Mr. I. training and an inspiring music newfound precision, certainty, and flavor. Miss Mae Murra incidental measures. Her alto to them glowing. Adapting his o to his design, Mr. Lambert discard winds and horns; adds cornets to ets, trombones and tuba; assem usual strings; crowds the percuss ner. There the virtuosi he would did not yesterday fall him. In t whole orchestra was on its mettle his habit Dr. Koussevitzky led who has found a brave new thing January in New York, from the Cantorum, "The Rio Grande" was ure with the audience. Yesterday London and in Manchester, it we ears and many hands. Within bell was a difference in performance

"The Rio Grande" is a bra thing. In the beginning is Mr. poem. Of course it is in free ve also mannered. Otherwise no S of the modernist three—Osbert, verell, and their sister—would signed it. There are broken let a curious rhythm winding and vol gentle rhymes in near or distant the copious verbiage; unexpected ad Underneath this vesture and prand is unmistakable romantic mood, swim the temper of the present day. Line with sensuous languor; sound cation sharp; teem with high-colored fades;
sink again into sensuous haz spell Lambert has not treated these v a text to be followed delineative more has he regarded them as s words for the chorus and the s to sing, though they usefully m need. Rather he has sought the equivalent for the images, the mo atmosphere—a decanting from c dium into another.

Mr. Lambert works out his des child of his time and surroundin him jazz is a natural and c speech. He has heard the light id, sterile or cheap. He has lister passionately to jazz-songs, Brill chanics, the technical mastery a of virtuosity, stir him. He is als poser of skill, resource, imaginat invention, to whom the thing to pressed and the expressive tones come as one. There are sensu guors in Mr. Sitwell's word-pictur the winding, voluptuous rhythm

is also sound that is not soft and rhythms that beat strong. Obviously jazz is the tonal equivalent; but since Mr. Lambert is a musician, a beatified jazz of musical texture and imaginative suggestion. A lyric sweetness makes occasional interlude in Mr. Sitwell's poem. Its equivalent is this light stuff of the theater, but again beatified, new-textured, imaginatively warmed. Mr. Sitwell's poem is a virtuoso-feat. Musicalizing it, as it were, give the pianist one elaborated, another lesser cadenza.

The musician in Mr. Lambert accomplishes this design. He plies jazz-rhythms but with a plastic freedom and a light vigor unknown to the ordinary practitioner. He remembers jazz-instrumentation and makes play with it in his brass choir and percussion group, but again with light hand, fine shading, quick darts and flashes of color. Such jazz becomes a music of suggestion and fancy. It sighs languorously; syncopates gaily; dins with wit; may carry hints of a newfound poetry and picture. . . . The cadenzas for the piano fill pauses. The course of the music halts; the pianist rhapsodizes. Mr. Lambert puts jazz at the back of his virtuoso-head, brilliance on the tips of his virtuoso-fingers. He is languorous and he is dazzling. The percussion-corner reminds him of his rhythms. . . . The songful interludes keep the prevailing lightness. Mr. Lambert writes in gentle fervors; with a sweetness that is not cloying. A musician is tempering and transfiguring the sentimental commonplaces of jazz-songs and of the musical plays. They begin to swim in Mr. Sitwell's nostalgic haze. The measures for solo voice are the final evocation of that mood. The Brazilian vista fades; the music stills. . . . The spell lingers until the applause rings.

This new and original music of Griffes and Lambert was sandwiched between a nineteenth and a twentieth-century classic. The forepiece was Schubert's Symphony in C major, played for the first time under Dr. Koussevitzky on a Friday afternoon. Possibly, the conductor tended to dramatize the first movement at the expense of the contentedly songful Schubert. Certainly he took the finale at a pace so brisk as to hint that "heavenly lengths" may bear a speedy end. First, last and through forty-five minutes, the flowing song of Schubert delighted most that heard. We dissenters, a beggarly and, no doubt, un-musical minority, hid our shame and repined inwardly for a symphony of more substance and less sweetness, of more shadow and less light, of orchestral skill as well as melodious fluency. But the woodwinds of the orchestra clothed the slow movement in a luscious beauty of sound; while the scherzo and the trio may pass for heaven-sent melodies. No doubt the Cambridge boy overdid the matter when he prattled about a "birdsong" symphony, but it is permissible to be soon sated with it.

The Suite from Stravinsky's first ballet,
"The Fire Bird," brought up the rear.
Under Dr. Koussevitzky it has become the delicate and adroit show-piece of a virtuoso orchestra. Those who shiver and shrink before the "rough stuff," as they call it, of "The Rite of Spring,"
"Noces," "Oedipus" and the "Psalms-Symphony," take their pleasure of the great Igor innocent of greatness, light, fanciful, glamorous, giving no more than two or three hints of the composer that is to be. But the fate that steadily pursues him has overtaken even this early "Fire-Bird." He writes for the stage and in the sifting of time the music becomes concert-piece. Who now thinks of the ballet that the Russians used to dance and even Boston once saw?

H. T. P.

Boston Symphony

Interest in the penultimate Friday concert of the symphony season in Boston (April 24) was divided between Their Imperial Highnesses, the Prince and Princess Takamatsu, of Japan, who were present as guests, and the program which had been arranged by Dr. Serge Koussevitzky.
The present chronicle, however, must be restricted to the musical aspect of the occasion, which was embodied in this list: Schubert, Symphony in C major, No. 7; Griffes, "The Pleasure Dome of Kubla Khan"; Lambert, "The Rio Grande"; Stravinsky, Suite from
"The Fire-Bird."

Constant Lambert's piece, which at the concert under review had its first Boston performance, won a prodigious popular success; a success which undoubtedly was well deserved by reason of the composer's cleverness in combining jazz with romantic lyricism.
Many persons like both modern dance music and the ballads which lend such a pleasing quality of sentiment to operetta; surely there are few who do not care for either. The united forms, then, especially when presented in a dazzling instrumental dress, can hardly fail of their effect. The composer really ought to cable his thanks to Dr. Koussevitzky for the way in which his work was introduced to Boston. The piano part was played with great skill by J. M. Sanromá, and the chorus of the Cecilia Society, trained by Arthur Fiedler, intoned the lines of Sacheverell Sitwell with remarkable precision and expression.

Charles T. Griffes's tone poem, first heard nearly 12 years ago under Monteux, was worthy of its revival. It is undoubtedly one of the most attractive of modern compositions by Americans; though of course in style it has nothing distinctively American about it, but is in direct descent from the French impressionists. At the concert under discussion Dr. Koussevitzky used the score as revised, after a consultation with the composer, by Frederick A. Stock, conductor of the Chicago Symphony Orchestra. Mr.
Stock expected that with his "changes and amplifications" the orchestration would "sound" more readily. After an interval of a dozen years, one's memory can hardly be trusted for a reliable comparison. One can only record that the work seemed more salient on the former occasion than on the present.
The difference in the impression, dear
Brutus, may lie in the lapse of time, in Mr. Stock's "amplifications"—or in ourselves.

When the so-called heavenly lengths of Schubert's C major Symphony had at last been traversed there was much applause. Whether this manifestation of pleasure was aroused by the music or by the fact that it was over, we cannot say; though we do know our own feelings in the matter. For many long years we have been trying to understand how the composer of the "Rosa-munde" music, the B minor Symphony and the greatest of the songs could be also the author of this symphony, whose obvious virtues are so vitiated by its garrulousness and its rhythmic ponderosity. How could the composer write those lovely melodies for the woodwind in the second movement, and then crush them with clumsy chords? And have the London Philharmonic players of 1844 deserved the bitter contempt they have received because of their lack of reverence for those triplets? Our heart goes out to those musicians.

L. A. S.

Constant Lambert

(Brown Music Library)

Whose Tone-Poem, "The Rio Grande," Will be Heard for the First Times in Boston at the Symphony Concerts of Friday and Saturday. . . .
 "Here Is an Unusually Good and Genuinely Musical Mind with a Remarkably Clear Sense of What It Wants to Say and of the One Right Way of Saying It."

Twenty-fourth Programme

FRIDAY AFTERNOON, MAY 1, at 2.30 o'clock

SATURDAY EVENING, MAY 2, at 8.15 o'clock

Wagner Prelude to "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg"

Debussy "Prelude to the Afternoon of a Faun
 (Eclogue by S. Mallarmé)"

Strauss "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks, after the Old-fashioned, Roguish Manner," in
 Rondo Form, Op. 28

Beethoven Symphony No. 5 in C minor, Op. 67
 I. Allegro con brio.
 II. Andante con moto.
 III. Allegro; Trio.
 IV. Allegro.

There will be an intermission before the symphony

The new book "THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA: 1881-1931," is now obtainable (see page 1693).

Constant Lambert

(Brown Music Library)

Whose Tone-Poem, "The Rio Grande," Will be Heard for the First Times in Boston at the Symphony Concerts of Friday and Saturday. . . . "Here Is an Unusually Good and Genuinely Musical Mind with a Remarkably Clear Sense of What It Wants to Say and of the One Right Way of Saying It."

Twenty-fourth Programme

FRIDAY AFTERNOON, MAY 1, at 2.30 o'clock

SATURDAY EVENING, MAY 2, at 8.15 o'clock

Wagner Prelude to "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg"

Debussy "Prelude to the Afternoon of a Faun
(Eclogue by S. Mallarmé)"

Strauss "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks, after the Old-fashioned, Roguish Manner," in
Rondo Form, Op. 28

Beethoven Symphony No. 5 in C minor, Op. 67
I. Allegro con brio.
II. Andante con moto.
III. Allegro; Trio.
IV. Allegro.

There will be an intermission before the symphony

The new book "THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA: 1881-1931,"
is now obtainable (see page 1693).

RICHARD STRAUSS, noted musician and composer, photographed on a sunny morning in Venice, where he was directing a series of concerts at the Venice theatre. (Boston Herald-Wide World)

SYMPHONY CONCERT

By PHILIP HALE

The 24th and last Friday afternoon concert of the 50th season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, conductor, took place yesterday in Symphony hall. The program was as follows: Wagner, Prelude to "The Mastersingers of Nuremberg"; Debussy, Prelude to Mallarmé's "Afternoon of a Faun"; Strauss, "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks"; Beethoven, Symphony No. 5, C Minor.

The concert will be repeated tonight. The 51st season, Dr. Koussevitzky, conductor, will open on Oct. 9.

There is little to be said of the works chosen for this concert; little that would be pertinent, for Dr. Koussevitzky, unlike some other conductors, does not pride himself on discovering or inventing "hidden" passages of beauty or grandeur that have escaped the notice of even illustrious predecessors. It is enough for him to give admirable performances of works as they exist; not as this or that conductor thinks they should have been written, and is eager to supply the deficiencies, the oversights, the carelessness of the composer. Dr. Koussevitzky, having poetic and dramatic imagination, also that indefinable quality which for lack of a better word is called "magnetism," interprets a symphony, suite, symphonic poem, with due respect for the composer's text. He supplies what the composer could not indicate: the vivifying spirit. Music does not exist until it is performed. There are the notes, but they have no significance until the conductor sees in them so many aids in the revealing the composer's spiritual, dramatic, noble, lyrical or passionately sensuous thoughts as they found musical expression.

It is enough to say of the performance yesterday that it was of the finest virtuoso order in which there was full artistic appreciation of the different qualities that have given each composition its commanding place in the literature of music. The audience was enthusiastic. It rose in greeting Dr. Koussevitzky; it saw with unfeigned regret the end of the season; it rejoiced in the announcement that the conductor would again direct the superb, incomparable orchestra of brilliant musicians; the orchestra that he has formed and shaped.

It is customary to say a few words about a season brought to an end. The 50th was of an anniversary nature; conspicuous also for the Bach Festival. Musicians of European countries and of the United States were invited to enlarge the importance of the anniversary by their contribution of compositions. A piece d'occasion is too often only an expression of good will and honorable intention. Of all the more important contributions to the 50th anniversary Roussel's Symphony and Stravinsky's Symphonie de Psaumes were easily the first in rank. It seemed as if Prokofiev had taken his task too easily, hurriedly. His symphony was not worthy of him. The conductor and the audience had a right to expect from Respighi something better than his "Metamorphoseon"; a theme and variations in which variegated instrumentation clothed a poorly nourished body. These were the two conspicuous failures to seize the opportunity.

There has been some ill-considered talk about the undue prominence given to the works of the radical left wing; about the neglect of composers classed as orthodox. Bach was represented by 17 compositions at the regular concerts of the season; Beethoven by seven; Brahms by five; Mozart, Strauss, Wagner, each by four; Haydn by three; Schumann by three; Debussy, Handel, Loeffler, Ravel, Schubert, Sibelius, Tchaikovsky, each by two.

It is true that there were a few works by unfamiliar composers that were as the abomination of desolation; Lourie's "Sonate Liturgique" for example; but Nabokov's "Symphonie Lyrique" was not wholly negligible; Krenek's "Little Symphony" was pleasing, as were Pick-Mangiagalli's transcriptions of Bach; Pilati's pretty suite, while Lambert's "Rio Grande" was stormily applauded.

Nor were Americans neglected, shabbily treated. Griffes, Hadley, Hanson, Hill, Loeffler, McKinley, Steinert.

It was a graceful act to invite Sir George Henschel to conduct the first concert. Mr. Arbos is always a welcome visitor. Mr. Hadley showed routine ability as a conductor and had the pleasure of presenting two of his own works. Mr. Burgin gave an engrossing, highly dramatic interpretation of Sibelius's first symphony.

The list of soloists included two who made their first appearance in Boston; surely not their last if the pleasure of the audience has any weight with them: Mr. Milstein, the violinist; Mr. Piatigorsky, the violoncellist. Among the pianists were Messrs. Gieseking and Horowitz; and although Mr. Sanroma was not billed as a soloist, his playing the piano part of Stravinsky's Capriccio and of Lambert's "Rio Grande" was a marked feature of the season.

SYMPHONY HALL

Boston Symphony Orchestra

The Boston Symphony Orchestra

gave the final program of its 50th season yesterday afternoon. The Friday subscribers applauded Dr Koussevitzky and the players very cordially at every opportunity. Wagner's prelude to "Die Meistersinger," Debussy's "Afternoon of a Faun," Richard Strauss' "Till Eulenspiegel" and Beethoven's Fifth Symphony were the chosen numbers. It has been customary in the past to end each season with such a program as this, made up entirely of masterpieces generally familiar and generally beloved.

No season of the entire 50 has been more warmly applauded than the one that ends tonight with the usual repetition of yesterday's program. Dr Koussevitzky's unflagging energy, the remarkable series of works commissioned by the orchestra from a number of the foremost living composers, and the monumental Bach festival in March, in honor of the orchestra's founder have made this a memorable year. The repetition, under Sir George Henschel of the initial program of the first season, was not the least notable feature of the anniversary celebration. To the players, the trustees and the contributors toward the annual deficit the public is also deeply indebted. But the prime mover in everything has been Dr Koussevitzky, to whom honor and gratitude are chiefly due.

Compelling Interpretations

Yesterday's concert showed the conductor at the height of his powers. His vividly-imagined and eloquently-carried-through interpretations of masterpieces were as compelling as ever. His increased mastery of the details of orchestral technique and the superlative excellence as a group of the present orchestra enabled Dr Koussevitzky to surpass yesterday his former achievement in each of the chosen pieces. Nobody sensitive to music could listen unmoved to this concert.

But for perfection in orchestral performances of such a list of masterpieces as yesterday's, something more than eloquence and emotional intensity is needed. Dr Koussevitzky's limitations as a conductor are as marked as his abilities. He does not even now invariably secure from the players the absolute precision of attack, the perfect balance of tone, the uniform clarity of musical texture one expects, and seldom in vain, to find in the work of the greatest conductors, such as Muck or Toscanini.

Inner voices are sometimes obscured by the tonal mass, choirs do not make their entrances absolutely at the same instant; even first desk soloists sometimes come in a moment too soon or too late. Great as has been the improvement in all these respects in Dr Koussevitzky's conducting, perfection is not yet attained.

Graver than these limitations of orchestral technique are certain clearly-marked limitations of imaginative intuition, or emotional sympathy. Here one is, of course, on more controversial ground. If the orchestra is momentarily not quite together that is a plain and indisputable fact. If one feels, as one felt yesterday in the C-minor Symphony, that Dr Koussevitzky's Beethoven is not the true Beethoven, that is a matter of opinion. It is clear that his tempo for the andante con moto is slower than that indicated by Beethoven's metronome marking. It is less demonstrable that he does not fully understand the nobility and serenity that underlie this music.

An Ethical Idealist

Its romanticism is superficial. At heart Beethoven was a classicist and an ethical idealist, not a stormy soul like Tchaikovsky, or, to pick a fairer comparison, Wagner. Dr Muck, with no more guidance from tradition and from the printed text than Dr Koussevitzky can command, could by the sheer force of interpretive genius come closer to the heart of Beethoven's mystery. At least, so one listener yesterday firmly believes.

Dr Koussevitzky's reading of "Till Eulenspiegel" yesterday was, on the other hand, the best one recalls from anyone. The whimsicality, the daredevil, irrepressible energy, the half mocking, half sentimental interludes of lyricism in this tone poem have never been more clearly revealed.

The programs carried the first announcement of the 51st season of Boston Symphony concerts, to begin Oct 9 and 10, with Dr Koussevitzky as conductor.

The renewal privilege of this year's subscribers is about to expire, but the very long waiting list will absorb most, if not all, of the few places released by those who fail to renew their season subscriptions. P. R.

Spring Rites For a Season Now Closing

Leave-Taking, Music and Other Incidents Bestrewing the Symphonic Friday

May 2, 1931.

THE CONCERT itself shall be example and excuse for the reviewer. Perhaps it was the return of spring weather which made some of us see all things green and count spats a useless and deplorable human invention. Perhaps it was the thirty pages of tables, lists, summaries, indices, that filled more than half the program-book—the annual orgy, on such a May Day more than usually indecent. Perhaps it was the chronological record—the final matinee of the fiftieth year of the Symphony Concerts. Whatever the cause, the occasion wore a relaxed air—the indomitable Koussevitzky and his equally indomitable orchestra always expected. They persevered to the end. For the rest of us the present seemed more engaging than the past in spite of the editor's monstrosity of statistics; the future, in turn, more beguiling than the present.

True, we listened not only politely but intently. True again, the last matinee audience of the symphonic year was altogether coughless. Yet were our minds as firm-fixed as our ears upon music and performance? There was the Prelude to "Die Meistersinger," for instance, with which the concert began. It had not changed as masterful piece of flowing counterpoint. But it was pleasanter to think of the banks of the Rhine—the river flowing between—when the train skirts them en route to Munich, most agreeable of summer cities. Soon Debussy's Faun was peering, tonally, out of his bosky shelter. By the same token, upon the chestnut-trees will be in bloom in Paris and the Seine slip under the bridges gold-sheeted from the westerling sun.

Between whiles, too, our tongues would run away from the music in presence, since familiar numbers, all in high favor, filled the program, there was no one to Penstock, I suppose you liked stuff," as they do after new or new Honegger. At this seat-mates protest their de-Beethoven's Fifth—possibly subconscious suspicion that at both their heads is a sup-are to flee that hackneyed mas-Much more in tune with the he mood were exchanges of re-takings and summer plans, by swift little excursions into cription Office to discover ext year's seats were certainly for on Friday afternoon, Oct. turday evening, Oct. 10, the eason of the Boston Symphony -Dr. Serge Koussevitzky con-h begin.

the relaxing mood seeped also applause; while in such things, frequenter of Symphony Hall matinee audience is law and to itself. At the first pause ven in C minor, it began to ay. Not even a bit of cere- the five-months' parting with and orchestra could stay it, st Beethoven was weary of re- s final chords. It summoned tra to its feet; called back the once and twice; clapped out ed out farewell. But its col- nd, as usual, was on the door ar, the taxi and the traffic. as usual, could it agree to niously or to sit collectively as clapping. Dr. Koussevitzky's pce. For the standing posture, and some will not, whether a panese Prince or a familiar is the occasion. Whoever the re should be an end to these atinée "homages."

of fact the only flood of the afternoon through, fol- the Prelude to "Die Meistersinger." was torrential, alike for the of the music and the passion formance. So eager and per- ere these plaudits that they the rites of the day. In the ty-minutes of the concert, the Mr. Burgin at handshaking; the back of the stage to the he auditorium everybody was upon everyone else. A bright noon does not invite to amateur naking. Yet the Prelude might better placed at the end of the

In itself it is an irresistible performance yesterday drove sonorous and striding, tense at moments overmuch so er's flood of golden tone and

SYMPHONY HALL

Boston Symphony Orchestra

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave the final program of its 50th season yesterday afternoon. The Friday subscribers applauded Dr Koussevitzky and the players very cordially at every opportunity. Wagner's prelude to "Die Meistersinger," Debussy's "Afternoon of a Faun," Richard Strauss' "Till Eulenspiegel" and Beethoven's Fifth Symphony were the chosen numbers. It has been customary in the past to end each season with such a program as this, made up entirely of masterpieces generally familiar and generally beloved.

No season of the entire 50 has been more warmly applauded than the one that ends tonight with the usual repetition of yesterday's program. Dr Koussevitzky's unflagging energy, the remarkable series of works commissioned by the orchestra from a number of the foremost living composers, and the monumental Bach festival in March, in honor of the orchestra's founder have made this a memorable year. The repetition, under Sir George Henschel of the initial program of the first season, was not the least notable feature of the anniversary celebration. To the players, the trustees and the contributors toward the annual deficit the public is also deeply indebted. But the prime mover in everything has been Dr Koussevitzky, to whom honor and gratitude are chiefly due.

Compelling Interpretations

Yesterday's concert showed the conductor at the height of his powers. His vividly-imagined and eloquently-carried-through interpretations of masterpieces were as compelling as ever. His increased mastery of the details of orchestral technique and the superlative excellence as a group of the present orchestra enabled Dr Koussevitzky to surpass yesterday his former achievement in each of the chosen pieces. Nobody sensitive to music could listen unmoved to this concert.

But for perfection in orchestral performances of such a list of masterpieces as yesterday's, something more than eloquence and emotional intensity is needed. Dr Koussevitzky's limitations as a conductor are as marked as his abilities. He does not even now invariably secure from the players the absolute precision of attack, the perfect balance of tone, the uniform clarity of musical texture one expects, and seldom in vain, to find in the work of the greatest conductors, such as Muck or Toscanini.

Inner voices are sometimes obscured by the tonal mass, choirs do not make their entrances absolutely at the same instant; even first desk soloists sometimes come in a moment too soon or too late. Great as has been the improvement in all these respects in Dr Koussevitzky's conducting, perfection is not yet attained.

Graver than these limitations of orchestral technique are certain clearly-marked limitations of imaginative intuition, or emotional sympathy. Here one is, of course, on more controversial ground. If the orchestra is momentarily not quite together that is a plain and indisputable fact. If one feels, as one felt yesterday in the C-minor Symphony, that Dr Koussevitzky's Beethoven is not the true Beethoven, that is a matter of opinion. It is clear that his tempo for the andante con moto is slower than that indicated by Beethoven's metronome marking. It is less demonstrable that he does not fully understand the nobility and serenity that underlie this music.

An Ethical Idealist

Its romanticism is superficial. At heart Beethoven was a classicist and an ethical idealist, not a stormy soul like Tchaikovsky, or, to pick a fairer comparison, Wagner. Dr Muck, with no more guidance from tradition and from the printed text than Dr Koussevitzky can command, could by the sheer force of interpretive genius come closer to the heart of Beethoven's mystery. At least, so one listener yesterday firmly believes.

Dr Koussevitzky's reading of "Till Eulenspiegel" yesterday was, on the other hand, the best one recalls from anyone. The whimsicality, the daredevil, irrepressible energy, the half mocking, half sentimental interludes of lyricism in this tone poem have never been more clearly revealed.

The programs carried the first announcement of the 51st season of Boston Symphony concerts, to begin Oct 9 and 10, with Dr Koussevitzky as conductor.

The renewal privilege of this year's subscribers is about to expire, but the very long waiting list will absorb most, if not all, of the few places released by those who fail to renew their season subscriptions. P. R.

Spring For a No

Leave-Taking Incidents I Sympho

Dr. Koussevitzky

THE CONCERT

ample and... Perhaps it... spring wea... of us see all thi... spats a useless a... invention. Perhap... pages of tables, list... that filled more th... book—the annual... Day more than us... haps it was the... the final matinée... the Symphony Co... cause, the occasion... the indomitable... equally indomitable... cepted. They per... for the rest of u... more engaging tha... the editor's monst... future, in turn, m... present.

True, we listened... tently. True as... audience of the sy... together coughless... as firm-fixed as ou... performance? The... "Die Meistersinger... which the concert... changed as maste... counterpoint. Bu... think of the banl... river flowing betw... skirts them en re... agreeable of sum... ussy's Faun was... his bosky shelter... soon the chestnut... in Paris and the... bridges gold-sheete... sun.

Between whiles, run away from ti... Since familiar num... filled the program.

ash has r... the centr... than thr... ed. Mo... und ligh... a nota say "Well! Penstock, I suppose you liked that awful stuff," as they do after new Hindemith or new Honegger. At this late day no seat-mates protest their devotion to Beethoven's Fifth—possibly from the subconscious suspicion that at the back of both their heads is a suppressed desire to flee that hackneyed masterpiece. Much more in tune with the day and the mood were exchanges of spring leave-takings and summer plans, diversified by swift little excursions into the Subscription Office to discover whether next year's seats were certainly booked. For on Friday afternoon, Oct. 9, and Saturday evening, Oct. 10, the fifty-first season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra—Dr. Serge Koussevitzky conductor—will begin.

Perhaps the relaxing mood seeped also into the applause; while in such things, as every frequenter of Symphony Hall knows, the matinée audience is law and custom unto itself. At the first pause in Beethoven in C minor, it began to dribble away. Not even a bit of ceremony for the five-months' parting with conductor and orchestra could stay it, when at last Beethoven was weary of repeating his final chords. It summoned the orchestra to its feet; called back the conductor once and twice; clapped out and stamped out farewell. But its collective mind, as usual, was on the door and the car, the taxi and the traffic. Nor, as usual, could it agree to stand unanimously or to sit collectively when it was clapping. Dr. Koussevitzky's first entrance. For the standing posture, some will and some will not, whether a passing Japanese Prince or a familiar conductor is the occasion. Whoever the object, there should be an end to these scraggly matinée "homages."

In point of fact the only flood of applause, the afternoon through, followed the Prelude to "Die Meistersinger." Then it was torrential, alike for the splendor of the music and the passion of the performance. So eager and persistent were these plaudits that they hastened the rites of the day. In the first twenty-minutes of the concert, the orchestra was on its feet. Dr. Koussevitzky and Mr. Burgin at handshaking; while from the back of the stage to the back of the auditorium everybody was beaming upon everyone else. A bright May afternoon does not invite to amateur program-making. Yet the Prelude might have been better placed at the end of the concert. In itself it is an irresistible music. The performance yesterday drove forward, sonorous and striding, tense and climactic, at moments overmuch so for Wagner's flood of golden tone and the songful waves into which it often breaks. The Prelude not only suits a festive occasion; it teems with the zest of living and doing and pleasuring. At the sound of it romance cries in the street and purges our souls, though we may be as heavy with the years and the flesh and our natural vanities as those self-same burghers of Nuremberg. Some of us breathe the freer; hold our heads the higher, for the hearing of it. It signalled the beginning, it should have crowned the end, of this semi-centennial year at Symphony Hall.

There were other incidents to be noted and at leisure pondered. To scan the "rush seats" in the second balcony was to note a few unoccupied. What say to that with a program of familiar classics—"Die Meistersinger" and "The Faun," "Till Eulenspiegel" and the Fifth Symphony—when a quasi-modernist list will usually fill every chair? And what again for the scant applause after Debussy's Prelude? It is an acknowledged and untarnished masterpiece. Conductor and orchestra evoke and excel in it. Seldom have they been more in the mood and the atmosphere than when Mr. Laurent sounded his flute, Mr. Gillet his oboe, Mr. Polatschek his clarinet, Mr. Zighera his harp, Mr. Böttcher and his companions their horns. Yet the reward was thin and lukewarm. "The Faun," most undeservedly, may be going out of matinee fashion. More probably, the audience takes piece and performance for granted, which state of mind is one of the pitfalls to perfection at the Symphony Concerts.

From Strauss's "Till" and Beethoven's Fifth, the reviewer, reminding his readers of the mood of the day, confidently claims exemption and excuse. With this stroke of his pen he agrees to all that has been said in praise of Strauss's etching in tones, of a comic characterization hardly to be matched within the forms and the means of symphonic music. But as the years accumulate upon his head and "Till's"—to say nothing of the composer's—he is coming to believe that conductors, keen for the details with which Strauss invariably tempts them, take "Till" too little in the vein of folk-tale and broad humor. The folk-tale is unmistakable at the beginning and the end. Till's tonal exercises in the market-place and the court-room hardly accord with the wit and the irony of which we used to hear so much. To the contrary they are good comic stuff to tickle the ribs as well as the ears of hearers. Dr. Koussevitzky steers a middle course. He does well with the measures of folk-tale; but in the clowneries the superlative skill of orchestra persuades. By all the legends of Strauss's pages

Dr. Koussevitzky re- the Fifth Symphony an eminently direct high heroic none the with the sonorities the orchestra. Its indeed, were timely movement that con- bethovenish common- the rest let the re- sure of a concert for ; for once a man and God save the mark"— es it, at season's end. H. T. P.

will keep the health S. Grew. es. "We ations if ur work

Massa- as assets and build- n endow- hospital of which estments, saving a be made

we start- spect the To bal- dent that ust deny of poor he situa- employment nts than able to y which ur going d I wish the wil- to help." ately at Report t Thurs- 2, which mpaign. ner Gov- y chair- k at one ax ate

Rites ason's End

phony Concert, den Circlet

oussevitzky

May 4, 1931

of Saturday at the certs does better by s not in haste to be he company on Fri- ms to share the be- wers that the high t is the end. It is more eager and ex- certed action unani- lay, for example, it a woman when Dr. first to the stage; orchestra in hearty l the Prelude to "Die pleasure rather than "The Afternoon of a denied it on Friday; st applause for "Till pping piece and per- ho and bringing the t, it also testified to tor's most individual Coussevitzky take the etly the same way. eceives some new im- onveys it to the or- s it to more sensi- l hearers. Twice last and on a Thursday, Symphony in C minor. on both occasions ces in the readings— ch, but in comparison April, at the subscrip- imilarly with "Till"

though the two performances were only a day apart. On Friday the conductor tended to be virtuoso-like with the tonal clowneries. On Saturday he took them more heartily, with the comic gusto of the folk-tale and of Strauss's music. Almost before the eye as well as the ear Till strutted the market-place; pranked it with the women; thumbed his nose by and large.

At the end of Beethoven's Fifth Symphony, the farewell rites began in usual course. Unitedly the audience rose again, unitedly applauded conductor and orchestra, hardly noticing that Judge Cabot was on his way to the stage, a leathern case in his hand. He had scarcely mounted it before Dr. Koussevitzky turned to go. A louder clapping soon recalled him. Before him Judge Cabot opened the case; disclosed the golden wreath, pictured elsewhere on this page; laid it, finally, on the music-stand. Subscribers to the Friday, Saturday, Monday and Tuesday series had made it ready, at the end of this anniversary year, as token of the regard in which his audiences hold the conductor who has brought the Symphony Concerts again to acme.

Judge Cabot spoke briefly in short, warm sentences that avoided the commonplace of such occasions. Dr. Koussevitzky replied as one who struggles less with a strange language than with deep emotion. The audience added a commotion of cheers and clapping; the orchestra swelled the acclaim. The conductor shook whatever hands were within easy reach; waved grateful and excited arms; finally departed, bearing his wreath before him. . . . The dispersal was slow. In the corridors many lingered—with an event on their tongues. . . . "The orchestra that Henry Higginson created half a century ago has stood unswervingly for those esthetic virtues. . . . which reflect honor upon the public whose spirit they reveal and express."

H. T. P.

The Trustees of the Symphony Orchestra have ordered the designing and the striking of a medal to mark this semi-centennial year. Each member of the orchestra will receive one.

The subscribers to the Symphony Concerts who bestowed a golden wreath upon Dr. Koussevitzky, having money still in hand, have added a golden clock for the conductor's study.

It; and that duty lies upon every individual citizen.

York Laurels In Boston Wreath

ilman Adds His Chaplet the Garlands for the ymphony Orchestra

May 5, 1931

ER the caption, "Fifty Years of Great Orchestra," Lawrence Gilman wrote last Sunday in the New Herald Tribune: "It is half a century that resolute and intelligent s, Henry L. Higginson, aroused tens of Boston by issuing a state- which he set forth in detail his supplying the capital of Massa- with a permanent symphony a. His intention, he announced, hire an orchestra of sixty men conductor [there were seventy- the opening concert of Oct. 22, saying them all by the year,' re- to himself 'the right to all their ed for rehearsals and for con- and allowing them to give lessons ey had time.' The orchestra was in Boston as many serious con- classical music as were wanted, to give at other times, and more y in the summer, concerts of a kind of music, in which should be good dance music; to do the neighboring towns and cities as practicable, but certainly to give University all that she needs in, to keep the prices low always, sially where the lighter concerts question, because to them may e poorer people; fifty cents and ve cents being the measure of [Saturday] night in Boston the a of which Henry L. Higginson, which he brought into being, e developed and cherished for an a generation, concluded its eason. The great Mr. Higginson, have been present in the flesh t bow from the platform of Sym- all with Mr. Koussevitzky, might en pardoned for feeling satisfied e issue of his labors and his He would have been justified ; himself (though it is difficult to s doing so) that he had been a gent in the accomplishment of l which he exposed in the earlier the orchestra's existence when "The Civil War taught a great n that if we were to have a coun- hy of the name we must work d educate it, as well as fight for the songful waves into which breaks. The Prelude not only festive occasion; it teems with of living and doing and pleasure the sound of it romance cries street and purges our souls, though may be as heavy with the years flesh and our natural vanities self-same burghers of Nuremberg of us breathe the freer; hold on the higher, for the hearing of it called the beginning, it should crowned the end, of this semi-century year at Symphony Hall.

There were other incidents to and at leisure pondered. To "rush seats" in the second balcony to note a few unoccupied. What that with a program of familiar "Die Meistersinger" and "The Till Eulenspiegel" and the Fifth symphony—when a quasi-modernist usually fill every chair? A again for the scant applause after the symphony's Prelude? It is an acknowledged masterpiece. Conductors orchestra evoke and excel in it. Have they been more in the atmosphere than when Mr. Gillet sounded his flute, Mr. Ziegler his clarinet, Mr. Ziegler his harp, Mr. Büttcher and his corn their horns. Yet the reward and lukewarm. "The Faun," deservedly, may be going out in fashion. More probably, it takes piece and performance granted, which state of mind is the pitfalls to perfection at the Symphony Concerts.

From Strauss's "Till" and Beethoven's Fifth, the reviewer, reminding us of the mood of the day, claims exemption and excuse. With stroke of his pen he agrees to what has been said in praise of Strauss in tones, of a comic character hardly to be matched within the and the means of symphonic music as the years accumulate upon it and "Till's"—to say nothing of the poser's—he is coming to believe that conductors, keen for the details with Strauss invariably tempts them "Till" too little in the vein of and broad humor. The folk-tale is mistakable at the beginning and Till's tonal exercises in the market and the court-room hardly account the wit and the irony of which to hear so much. To the contrary are good comic stuff to tickle the well as the ears of hearers. Dr. Koussevitzky steers a middle course. Well with the measures of folk-tale the clowneries the superlative

Strauss and his own orchestra persuades him to over-refinement. By all the legends and on more than one of Strauss's pages "Till" is brash.

Almost always Dr. Koussevitzky renews Beethoven. In the Fifth Symphony he gains his end by an eminently direct and simple version, high heroic none the less; so makes play with the sonorities and the accents of the orchestra. Its tone and his pains, indeed, were timely covering to a slow movement that contains not a little Beethovenish commonplace. . . . For the rest let the reviewer take his pleasure of a concert for its own sake and his; for once a man and a brother and not—God save the mark!—an oracle. He deserves it, at season's end. H. T. P.

Wreathed Rites For Season's End

The Final Symphony Concert, With a Golden Circlet For Dr. Koussevitzky

Trans. — May 4, 1931
THE AUDIENCE of Saturday at the Symphony Concerts does better by farewells. It is not in haste to be off and away like the company on Friday, which often seems to share the belief of sated reviewers that the high point of any concert is the end. It is less self-conscious, more eager and expansive; in any concerted action unanimous. Last Saturday, for example, it rose to a man and a woman when Dr. Koussevitzky came first to the stage; joined the standing orchestra in hearty plaudits. It received the Prelude to "Die Meistersinger" with pleasure rather than excitement; restored "The Afternoon of a Faun" to the favor denied it on Friday; reserved its warmest applause for "Till Eulenspiegel." Clapping piece and performance to the echo and bringing the orchestra to its feet, it also testified to one of the conductor's most individual characteristics.

Seldom does Dr. Koussevitzky take the same piece in exactly the same way. Almost always he receives some new impression from it; conveys it to the orchestra; so imparts it to more sensitive and accustomed hearers. Twice last week, on a Monday and on a Thursday, he led in Brahms's Symphony in C minor. By reliable report, on both occasions there were differences in the readings—not only each to each, but in comparison with that, early in April, at the subscription concerts. Similarly with "Till"

though the two performances were only a day apart. On Friday the conductor tended to be virtuoso-like with the tonal clowneries. On Saturday he took them more heartily, with the comic gusto of the folk-tale and of Strauss's music. Almost bristled the eye as well as the ear Till strutted the market-place; pranked it with the women; thumbed his nose by and large.

At the end of Beethoven's Fifth Symphony, the farewell rites began in usual course. Unitedly the audience rose again, unitedly applauded conductor and orchestra, hardly noticing that Judge Cabot was on his way to the stage, a leathern case in his hand. He had scarcely mounted it before Dr. Koussevitzky turned to go. A louder clapping soon recalled him. Before him Judge Cabot opened the case; disclosed the golden wreath, pictured elsewhere on this page; laid it, finally, on the music-stand. Subscribers to the Friday, Saturday, Monday and Tuesday series had made it ready, at the end of this anniversary year, as token of the regard in which his audiences hold the conductor who has brought the Symphony Concerts again to acme.

Judge Cabot spoke briefly in short, warm sentences that avoided the commonplace of such occasions. Dr. Koussevitzky replied as one who struggles less with a strange language than with deep emotion. The audience added a commotion of cheers and clapping; the orchestra swelled the acclaim. The conductor shook whatever hands were within easy reach; waved grateful and excited arms; finally departed, bearing his wreath before him. . . . The dispersal was slow. In the corridors many lingered—with an event on their tongues. . . . "The orchestra that Henry Higginson created half a century ago has stood unswervingly for those esthetic virtues. . . . which reflect honor upon the public whose spirit they reveal and express."

H. T. P.

The Trustees of the Symphony Orchestra have ordered the designing and the striking of a medal to mark this semi-centennial year. Each member of the orchestra will receive one.

The subscribers to the Symphony Concerts who bestowed a golden wreath upon Dr. Koussevitzky, having money still in hand, have added a golden clock for the conductor's study.

It; and that duty lies upon every individual citizen.

York Laurels In Boston Wreath

Gilman Adds His Chaplet to the Garlands for the Symphony Orchestra

May 5, 1931
Under the caption, "Fifty Years of the Great Orchestra," Lawrence Gilman wrote last Sunday in the New York Herald Tribune: "It is half a century that resolute and intelligent Henry L. Higginson, aroused the citizens of Boston by issuing a statement which he set forth in detail his supplying the capital of Massachusetts with a permanent symphony orchestra. His intention, he announced, was to hire an orchestra of sixty men and a conductor [there were seventy-five in the opening concert of Oct. 22, 1881]—paying them all by the year, 'to give to himself the right to all their rehearsal and for conducting and allowing them to give lessons as they had time.' The orchestra was in Boston as many serious classical music as were wanted, to give at other times, and more in the summer, concerts of a kind of music, in which should be good dance music; to do the neighboring towns and cities as practicable, but certainly to give the University all that she needs in music, to keep the prices low always, especially where the lighter concerts were in question, because to them may be poorer people; fifty cents and fifty cents being the measure of the songful waves into which breaks. The Prelude not only festive occasion; it teems with of living and doing and pleasure the sound of it romance cries street and purges our souls, though may be as heavy with the years flesh and our natural vanities self-same burghers of Nuremberg of us breathe the freer; hold of the higher, for the hearing of it called the beginning, it should crowned the end, of this semi-century year at Symphony Hall.

[Saturday] night in Boston the orchestra of which Henry L. Higginson, which he brought into being, was developed and cherished for half a century, concluded its season. The great Mr. Higginson, who has been present in the flesh and bow from the platform of Symphony Hall with Mr. Koussevitzky, might be pardoned for feeling satisfied with the issue of his labors and his life. He would have been justified in himself (though it is difficult to say so) that he had been a agent in the accomplishment of which he exposed in the earlier years the orchestra's existence when 'The Civil War taught a great lesson that if we were to have a country of the name we must work to educate it, as well as fight for it; and that duty lies upon every individual citizen.'

There were other incidents to and at leisure pondered. To "rush seats" in the second balcony to note a few unoccupied. What that with a program of familiar "Die Meistersinger" and "The Till Eulenspiegel" and the Fifth Symphony—when a quasi-modernist usually fill every chair? Again for the scant applause after the Prelude? It is an acknowledgment of an untarnished masterpiece. Conductors orchestra evoke and excel in it, have they been more in the atmosphere than when Mr. Gilman sounded his flute, Mr. Gillet his Polatschek his clarinet, Mr. Ziegler his harp, Mr. Böttcher and his corn their horns. Yet the reward and lukewarm. "The Faun," deservedly, may be going out in fashion. More probably, the audience takes piece and performance granted, which state of mind is the pitfalls to perfection at the Symphony Concerts.

From Strauss's "Till" and Beethoven's Fifth, the reviewer, reminding of the mood of the day, claims exemption and excuse. A stroke of his pen he agrees to has been said in praise of Strauss in tones, of a comic character hardly to be matched within the and the means of symphonic music as the years accumulate upon it and "Till's"—to say nothing of the poser's—he is coming to believe the conductors, keen for the details with Strauss invariably tempts them "Till" too little in the vein of and broad humor. The folk-tale mistakable at the beginning and Till's tonal exercises in the mark and the court-room hardly account the wit and the irony of which to hear so much. To the contrary are good comic stuff to tickle the well as the ears of hearers. Dr. Koussevitzky steers a middle course. well with the measures of folk-tale the clowneries the superlative

Strauss and his own orchestra persuades him to over-refinement. By all the legends and on more than one of Strauss's pages "Till" is brash.

Almost always Dr. Koussevitzky renews Beethoven. In the Fifth Symphony he gains his end by an eminently direct and simple version, high heroic none the less; so makes play with the sonorities and the accents of the orchestra. Its tone and his pains, indeed, were timely covering to a slow movement that contains not a little Beethovenish commonplace. . . . For the rest let the reviewer take his pleasure of a concert for its own sake and his; for once a man and a brother and not—God save the mark—an oracle. He deserves it, at season's end. H. T. P.

Wreathed Rites For Season's End

The Final Symphony Concert, With a Golden Circlet For Dr. Koussevitzky

Trans. — May 4, 1931
THE AUDIENCE of Saturday at the Symphony Concerts does better by farewells. It is not in haste to be off and away like the company on Friday, which often seems to share the belief of sated reviewers that the high point of any concert is the end. It is less self-conscious, more eager and expansive; in any concerted action unanimous. Last Saturday, for example, it rose to a man and a woman when Dr. Koussevitzky came first to the stage; joined the standing orchestra in hearty plaudits. It received the Prelude to "Die Meistersinger" with pleasure rather than excitement; restored "The Afternoon of a Faun" to the favor denied it on Friday; reserved its warmest applause for "Till Eulenspiegel." Clapping piece and performance to the echo and bringing the orchestra to its feet, it also testified to one of the conductor's most individual characteristics.

Seldom does Dr. Koussevitzky take the same piece in exactly the same way. Almost always he receives some new impression from it; conveys it to the orchestra; so imparts it to more sensitive and accustomed hearers. Twice last week, on a Monday and on a Thursday, he led in Brahms's Symphony in C minor. By reliable report, on both occasions there were differences in the readings—not only each to each, but in comparison with that, early in April, at the subscription concerts. Similarly with "Till"

though the two a day apart. O tended to be virt clowneries. On more heartily, v the folk-tale ar Almost before th

Till strutted th it with the womingly small and large.

At the end of Mr. Baker he phony, the fareytune, take t course. Unitedlyday of death unitedly applauties. At the chestra, hardlyMr. Baker's Cabot was on lal Bank re leathern case $190,000,000. scarcely mountearound $75,000. vitsky turned tmeans a "le soon recalled hsomething m Cabot opened State, the la golden wreath, tax rate. N this page; laid itthe amount stand. Subscrib$10,000,000. day, Monday aits share of made it ready, have taken t versary year, afor taxes pa which his audie Value Reduc again to acme. Like the Judge Cabot Baker's 87,000 warm sentence;Steel commo monplace of phone and Koussevitzky stocks credit struggles less his son, Geo than with deeptuated. Stee added a commo261 at one t ping; the orch:Saturday at The conductor Mr. Baker were within eaStreet today and excited armmast on p ing his wreath There was ne persal was slowBaker's First lingered—with ness was tra . . . "The orch and quiet t son created hal were lowered unswervingly fgan & Co., th . . . which refkTrust, Nation whose spirit thbanking hou

Morgan's De
The Trustees proved Captain Orchestra have manufact signing and th Szekeley medal to mark at 78 mil of 90 mil nial year. Each is 750 t orchestra will r range is The subscriber gasoline, an hour. phony Concerts The Li golden wreath 1 and has vitzky, having 15,000 fee hand, have adde is less th for the conducto at a cost and all

New York Laurels In Boston Wreath

Mr. Gilman Adds His Chaplet To the Garlands for the Symphony Orchestra

Trans. — May 5, 1931
UNDER the caption, "Fifty Years of a Great Orchestra," Lawrence Gilman wrote last Sunday in the New York Herald Tribune: "It is half a century since that resolute and intelligent Mæcenas, Henry L. Higginson, aroused the citizens of Boston by issuing a statement in which he set forth in detail his plan for supplying the capital of Massachusetts with a permanent symphony orchestra. His intention, he announced, was 'to hire an orchestra of sixty men and a conductor [there were seventy-four at the opening concert of Oct. 22, 1881] paying them all by the year,' reserving to himself 'the right to all their time needed for rehearsals and for concerts, and allowing them to give lessons when they had time.' The orchestra was 'to give in Boston as many serious concerts of classical music as were wanted, and also to give at other times, and more especially in the summer, concerts of a lighter kind of music, in which should be included good dance music; to do the same in neighboring towns and cities as far as is practicable, but certainly to give Harvard University all that she needs in this line, to keep the prices low always, and especially where the lighter concerts are in question, because to them may come the poorer people; fifty cents and twenty-five cents being the measure of prices.'"

"Last [Saturday] night in Boston the orchestra of which Henry L. Higginson dreamed, which he brought into being, which he developed and cherished for more than a generation, concluded its fiftieth season. The great Mr. Higginson, could he have been present in the flesh to take a bow from the platform of Symphony Hall with Mr. Koussevitzky, might have been pardoned for feeling satisfied with the issue of his labors and his dreams. He would have been justified in telling himself (though it is difficult to fancy his doing so) that he had been a prime agent in the accomplishment of that ideal which he exposed in the earlier days of the orchestra's existence when he said: 'The Civil War taught a great many men that if we were to have a country worthy of the name we must work for it and educate it, as well as fight for it; and that duty lies upon every individual citizen.'"

"That duty, no one more devotedly than Henry Higginson. 'I have had my day,' he wrote, shortly before his death, to his friend Judge Cabot, 'and have had great comfort from the orchestra.' One can believe that, as he added, the burden had become 'almost intolerable.' It must indeed have seemed so in the tragic spring of 1918; but one likes to fancy that before he came to his end, a year and a half later, the comfort had begun to seem more memorable than the burden.

"The orchestra that Henry Higginson created half a century ago has stood unswervingly throughout its existence for those esthetic virtues which not only contribute to the glory of musical art, but which reflect honor upon the public whose spirit they reveal and express. Other makers of music amongst us, other musical institutions—certain of them august and prententious and, alas, unashamed—have sometimes lowered their standards, have compromised with expediency; merchants have occasionally trafficked in their souls. We recall no instance of such lapses or perversions in the history of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The prodigious effort made and sustained by Higginson was, as he expressed it, 'simply in the interest of good music.' The orchestra has had no other aim throughout its half-century of existence. . . .

"A constant recognition of the truth that a great orchestra is obliged to function unceasingly not alone as a custodian but as a herald and a prophet, has guided the activities of the Boston organization from the start. Obedient to the more dangerous clause of this obligation, Henschel brought forward Brahms Gericke ventured Bruckner and Strauss (during the first performance of the latter's 'Aus Italien' the auditors 'walked out in platoons'); Muck presented 'La Mer' of Debussy—though he is known to have no love for that composer—and the even less accessible 'Five Orchestral Pieces' of Schönberg. Monteux exhibited Stravinsky's 'Petrushka' and 'Sacre du Printemps' in the days before they had become accepted modern classics. As for Dr. Koussevitzky, he has been sleeplessly on the trail of the significant and the innovating, indifferent to the certainty that thy would affront inhospitable ears, disregarding the indignant subscriber who wrote to a newspaper, 'I refuse to pay more than a nickel for subway noises.'

"The orchestra continues in its triumphant present what Mr. M. A. De Wolfe Howe in the admirable new edition of his chronicle so felicitously calls 'the old story of the instruction of the unwilling—the gradual and difficult direction of increase observed before, and it is granted observe again, that the Orchestra has from its birth as a singularly congenial and esthetic rectitude and dignity of attitude toward the public and the experimental success and stimulated its reward. It is a creation which justifies however, that nature and perfect-ness has to make increasingly illment pi those for whom such spirit outlast the drums a half century of ma-

of Wol-bridge. ne of the Boston Orchestra has stretched. When the Prince of honor, s Takamatsu were present American ing Boston in their resolved to hear and of ts. The Princess musician, fond of ces. The Prince tentedly.

Museum alumni afternoon, they at the will be guests of with the students' the Orchestra at school gal- l. Normally the outside of the house; but by criticism f various subscri- continue ats together have en daily them. Originally Monday, ty had arranged a gs from horus and orches- of the coming of ed guests, he right- they would prefer hestra unassisted.

or ployee

Walsh, e remade the pro- e Schubert's Sym- major; Griffes's of Kubla Khan," om an American ulte from Stravin- he Fire-Bird." . . . Europeans Boston by its orchestra nk than by any hin it. To these now the corres- se.

on, Fred- ers, Mrs. and Mrs. Apr. 21, 1931.

Koussevitzky In These Days Of Full Prime

The Symphony Concerts at the End of His Seventh Year of Ripening

Trans. — May 1, 1931

CONSIDER, through the turn of a column, the obligations of the conductor of a symphony orchestra of the first rank and of international note, standing as Dr. Koussevitzky does today and tomorrow at the end of a seventh year before the same public. Consider those obligations severally—the holding of the orchestra in discipline yet at the top of individual and collective bent; the maintaining through sixty-odd concerts in seven months of a high level of performance; the arranging and the re-arranging of eighty or ninety or a hundred pieces through those sixty-odd programs; the choosing of those pieces out of past and present, from the established, the novel, the neglected, the innovating, from many composers of many periods working in diverse manners; the humoring—for it must be done—of predilection and prejudice in audiences; the safeguarding of health and spirits without which good work is impossible; the preserving—at the back of the head, without pretense or ostentation, yet in all the daily round—of the ambition, the standards, the devotion to a profession and an art that are a conductor's honor; the infusing of an inexhaustible vitality into the chosen music, the accomplished performance, the reactions of the audience. Consider these obligations. Then test Dr. Koussevitzky by his fulfillment of them.

By common consent the Boston Orchestra has returned to the first rank. Mr. Monteux began the return. Dr. Koussevitzky continued, achieved and assured it. The prestige of the orchestra at home and abroad is at highest. In the concert-hall the numbers, applause, interest and loyalty of audiences attest it. In print, reviewers, chroniclers, essayists, bear witness to it. Visiting Europeans confirm it. There are Japanese aware of it. Perhaps we Bostonians inclined to take it for granted; that it was gained through years of unrelaxing ambition, paid work; that even slight recess-stage or in auditorium will en-mpathy Concerts, as repositories enjoy a like note. There is none them in range, variety, liberal-teenth-century masters may programs; Americans of the generation fill middle place; a of the nineteenth century round There is room for composers period, nationality, style, so their music keeps vitality. The is fostered—because the compos- music is a continuous art infused life of the time; a pursuit of ter, methods, means and free- revelation of newfound, ripen- individualized abilities. Yet propor- needed; while along with it goes the pleasuring of a diversified generalities pass to particulars. Orchestra is composed of players in either unripened nor over-rou- heard in chamber-concerts or in outside Symphony Hall, rela- minor members of the choirs sur- fineness of individual quality. ed on their own stage, for no e they unready; while none over- abilities—often to the surprise niration of visiting composers at-conductors. Changes are now or the most part, they are the of a new and remarkable talent. Polatschek as first clarinet, or cher as first horn, or Mr. San- pianist. By association the play- e come to feel and know each feel, know and work in image onductor. Wherever a hundred less sensitive men work together ie, highly sensitive; wherever dis- s the first essential to achieve- ere are flashes of irritation. They manwise; while the reciprocating evalls and endures.

the merits of a string choir precision and plasticity are un- who command every finesse and energy of tone, passing at will psuous beauty to striding power; sensibility and unanimity serve the composer's and conductor's beside it sits a woodwind choir hed virtuosity with their several ents, of unfailing musical intelli- as quick and manifold as the in response to the music before p the conductor's purpose. It is inction of the brass choir that it at will from mellow nineteenth- sonority to piercing twentieth-

"That duty, no one more devotedly than Henry D. Higginson. 'I have had my day,' he said shortly before his death, to his credit, and have had great comfort from the orchestra.' One can believe that, as he added, the burden had become 'almost intolerable.' It is a deed which has immensely enriched the musical life of America and stimulated its receptiveness. We have observed before, and it is pertinent to observe again, that the Boston Symphony Orchestra has from its beginnings combined a singularly constant ideal of æsthetic rectitude and dignity with a liberality of attitude toward the unorthodox and the experimental which has enriched the musical life of America and stimulated its receptiveness."

"Great is the Orchestra's reward. It is half later, the comfort had begun honored as an institution which justifies more memorable than the burden the civilization that nurtured and perfected it. May it live to make increasingly created half a century ago has glad the hearts of those for whom such swervingly throughout its existence triumphs of the spirit outlast the drums those æsthetic virtues which stand trappings of a half century of material conquests."

The just fame of the Boston Symphony Orchestra has stretched as far as Japan. When the Prince and the Princess Takamatsu were planning their present American tour and including Boston in their itinerary, they resolved to hear one of its concerts. The Princess is a practised musician, fond of symphonic pieces. The Prince hears them contentedly. Next Friday afternoon, they and their suite will be guests of the Trustees of the Orchestra at Symphony Hall. Normally the audience fills the house; but by the courtesy of various subscribers, eleven seats together have been found for them. Originally Dr. Koussevitzky had arranged a program for chorus and orchestra. Informed of the coming of musically minded guests, he rightly inferred that they would prefer to hear the orchestra unassisted. Accordingly, he remade the program to include Schubert's Symphony in C major; Griffes's "Pleasure-Dome of Kubla Khan," for a piece from an American composer; the Suite from Stravinsky's ballet, "The Fire-Bird." . . .

To cultivated Europeans Boston is better known by its orchestra of the first rank than by any other thing within it. To these Europeans add now the corresponding Japanese. Trans. Apr. 21, 1931.

"The orchestra continues in its phantom present what Mr. M. A. De Howe in the admirable new edition of his chronicle so felicitously calls 'the story of the instruction of the un—the gradual and difficult direct desire. We have observed before, and it is pertinent to observe again, that the Boston Symphony Orchestra has from its beginnings combined a singularly constant ideal of æsthetic rectitude and dignity with a liberality of attitude toward the unorthodox and the experimental which has enriched the musical life of America and stimulated its receptiveness."

"Great is the Orchestra's reward. It is half later, the comfort had begun honored as an institution which justifies more memorable than the burden the civilization that nurtured and perfected it. May it live to make increasingly created half a century ago has glad the hearts of those for whom such swervingly throughout its existence triumphs of the spirit outlast the drums those æsthetic virtues which stand trappings of a half century of material conquests."

The just fame of the Boston Symphony Orchestra has stretched as far as Japan. When the Prince and the Princess Takamatsu were planning their present American tour and including Boston in their itinerary, they resolved to hear one of its concerts. The Princess is a practised musician, fond of symphonic pieces. The Prince hears them contentedly. Next Friday afternoon, they and their suite will be guests of the Trustees of the Orchestra at Symphony Hall. Normally the audience fills the house; but by the courtesy of various subscribers, eleven seats together have been found for them. Originally Dr. Koussevitzky had arranged a program for chorus and orchestra. Informed of the coming of musically minded guests, he rightly inferred that they would prefer to hear the orchestra unassisted. Accordingly, he remade the program to include Schubert's Symphony in C major; Griffes's "Pleasure-Dome of Kubla Khan," for a piece from an American composer; the Suite from Stravinsky's ballet, "The Fire-Bird." . . .

To cultivated Europeans Boston is better known by its orchestra of the first rank than by any other thing within it. To these Europeans add now the corresponding Japanese. Trans. Apr. 21, 1931.

"The orchestra continues in its phantom present what Mr. M. A. De Howe in the admirable new edition of his chronicle so felicitously calls 'the story of the instruction of the un—the gradual and difficult direct

Trans. Apr. 21, 1931.

Koussevitzky In These Days Of Full Prime

The Symphony Concerts at the End of His Seventh Year of Ripening

Trans. — May 1, 1931

CONSIDER, through the turn of a column, the obligations of the conductor of a symphony orchestra of the first rank and of international note, standing as Dr. Koussevitzky does today and tomorrow at the end of a seventh year before the same public. Consider those obligations severally—the holding of the orchestra in discipline yet at the top of individual and collective bent; the maintaining through sixty-odd concerts in seven months of a high level of performance; the arranging and the rearranging of eighty or ninety or a hundred pieces through those sixty-odd programs; the choosing of those pieces out of past and present, from the established, the novel, the neglected, the innovating, from many composers of many periods working in diverse manners; the humoring—of predilection and prejudice in audiences; the safeguarding of health and spirits without which good work is impossible; the preserving—at the back of the head, without pretense or ostentation, yet in all the daily round—of the ambition, the standards, the devotion to a profession and an art that are a conductor's honor; the infusing of an inexhaustible vitality into the chosen music, the accomplished performance, the reactions of the audience. Consider these obligations. Then test Dr. Koussevitzky by his fulfillment of them.

By common consent the Boston Orchestra has returned to the first rank. Mr. Monteux began the return. Dr. Koussevitzky continued, achieved and assured it. The prestige of the orchestra at home and abroad is at highest. In the concert-hall the numbers, applause, interest and loyalty of audiences attest it. In print, reviewers, chroniclers, essayists, bear witness to it. Visiting Europeans confirm it. There are Japanese aware of it. Perhaps we Bostonians inclined to take it for granted; that it was gained through years of unrelaxing ambition, patient work; that even slight recession or in auditorium will en-symphony Concerts, as repositories enjoy a like note. There is none of them in range, variety, liberal-teenth-century masters may programs; Americans of the generation fill middle place; a of the nineteenth century round. There is room for composers period, nationality, style, so their music keeps vitality. The is fostered—because the composition is a continuous art infused life of the time; a pursuit of better, methods, means and free-revelation of newfound, ripened, individualized abilities. Yet proportioned; while along with it goes the pleasuring of a diversified generalities pass to particulars. The orchestra is composed of players in either unripened nor over-ripe heard in chamber-concerts or in outside Symphony Hall, relation members of the choirs sur-fineness of individual quality. ed on their own stage, for no they unready; while none over-abilities—often to the surprise niration of visiting composers t-conductors. Changes are now or the most part, they are the of a new and remarkable talent. Polatschek as first clarinet, or cher as first horn, or Mr. San-planist. By association the play- come to feel and know each feel, know and work in image onductor. Wherever a hundred less sensitive men work together he, highly sensitive; wherever dis- the first essential to achieve- ere are flashes of irritation. They manwise; while the reciprocating evalls and endures.

the merits of a string choir precision and plasticity are un- who command every finesse and energy of tone, passing at will nsuous beauty to striding power; sensibility and unanimity serve the composer's and conductor's beside it sits a woodwind choir hed virtuosity with their several ents, of unfailing musical intelli- as quick and manifold as the in response to the music before the conductor's purpose. It is inction of the brass choir that it at will from mellow nineteenth-sonority to piercing twentieth-

"That duty, no one more devoted desire." We have observed before, and it is unperturbedly discharged than Her is pertinent to observe again, that the ginson. "I have had my day," h Boston Symphony Orchestra has from its shortly before his death, to hi beginnings combined a singularly constant ideal of æsthetic rectitude and dignity with a liberality of attitude toward the unorthodox and the experimental which has immensely enriched the musical life of America and stimulated its receptiveness.

fore he came to his end, a year "Great is the Orchestra's reward. It is half later, the comfort had begun honored as an institution which justifies more memorable than the burden the civilization that nurtured and perfected.

"The orchestra that Henry Hied it. May it live to make increasingly created half a century ago has siglad the hearts of those for whom such swervingly throughout its existetriumphs of the spirit outlast the drums those æsthetic virtues which nand trappings of a half century of material conquests."

but which reflect honor upon the whose spirit they reveal and Other makers of music among other musical institutions—cert them august and prententious an unashamed—have sometimes their standards, have compromise expediency; merchants have occa trafficked in their souls. We re instance of such lapses or pervers the history of the Boston Symph orchestra. The prodigious effort ma sustained by Higginson was, as pressed it, 'simply in the interest music.' The orchestra has had n aim throughout its half-century o ence. . . .

"A constant recognition of the that a great orchestra is obliged t tion unceasingly not alone as a dian but as a herald and a proph guided the activities of the Bost ganization from the start. Obed the more dangerous clause of th gation, Henschel brought f Brahms Gericke ventured Bruckn Strauss (during the first perform the latter's 'Aus Italien' the a 'walked out in platoons'); Muck pr 'La Mer' of Debussy—though he is to have no love for that compose the even less accessible 'Five Orc Piece' of Schönberg. Monteux ex Stravinsky's 'Petrushka' and 'Sa Printemps' in the days before the become accepted modern classics. Dr. Koussevitzky, he has been sle ly on the trail of the significant a innovating, indifferent to the ce hat thy woud affront inhospitable disregarding the indignant sub who wrote to a newspaper, I ref pay more than a nickel for s noises."

"The orchestra continues in its phant present what Mr. M. A. De Howe in the admirable new edit his chronicle so felicitously calls ' story of the instruction of the un —the gradual and difficult direct

The just fame of the Boston Symphony Orchestra has stretched as far as Japan. When the Prince and the Princess Takamatsu were planning their present American tour and including Boston in their itinerary, they resolved to hear one of its concerts. The Princess is a practised musician, fond of symphonic pieces. The Prince hears them contentedly.

Next Friday afternoon, they and their suite will be guests of the Trustees of the Orchestra at Symphony Hall. Normally the audience fills the house; but by the courtesy of various subscribers, eleven seats together have been found for them. Originally Dr. Koussevitzky had arranged a program for chorus and orchestra. Informed of the coming of musically minded guests, he rightly inferred that they would prefer to hear the orchestra unassisted. Accordingly, he remade the program to include Schubert's Symphony in C major; Griffes's "Pleasure-Dome of Kubla Khan," for a piece from an American composer; the Suite from Stravinsky's ballet, "The Fire-Bird." . . .

To cultivated Europeans Boston is better known by its orchestra of the first rank than by any other thing within it. To these Europeans add now the corresponding Japanese.

Trans. Apr. 21, 1931.

Koussevitzky In The Of P

The Symphony End of Hi of I

Trans.

CONSIDER, column, conductor tra of the national note, Koussevitzky do throw at the er before the sa those obligations of the orchestra top of individual maintaining thro in seven months formance; the ar ranging of eighty pieces through th the choosing of and present, fro novel, the neglect many composers ing in diverse m for it must be de prejudice in aud ing of health and good work is imp at the back of tense or ostentat round—of the a the devotion to a that are a conduc of an inexhaust chosen music, the ance, the reaction sider these obligi Koussevitzky by

By common of chestra has retu Mr. Monteux be Koussevitzky con sured it. The pr at home and ab the concert-hall interest and loya it. In print, essayists, bear v Europeans confir ese aware of it.

are now inclined to take it for granted; to forget that it was gained through seven years of unrelaxing ambition, patience and work; that even slight recession on stage or in auditorium will endanger it.

The Symphony Concerts, as repositories of music, enjoy a like note. There is none to excel them in range, variety, liberality. Eighteenth-century masters may begin programs; Americans of the younger generation fill middle place; a classic of the nineteenth century round the list. There is room for composers of every period, nationality, style, so long as their music keeps vitality. The present is fostered—because the composition of music is a continuous art infused with the life of the time; a pursuit of new matter, methods, means and freedoms; a revelation of newfound, ripening, individualized abilities. Yet proportion is heeded; while along with it goes care for the pleasuring of a diversified audience.

From generalities pass to particulars. The orchestra is composed of players in prime, neither unripened nor over-routined. Heard in chamber-concerts or in solo-pieces outside Symphony Hall, relatively minor members of the choirs surprise by fineness of individual quality. Assembled on their own stage, for no music are they unready; while none overtaxes their abilities—often to the surprise and admiration of visiting composers and guest-conductors. Changes are now few. For the most part, they are the entrance of a new and remarkable talent, like Mr. Polatschek as first clarinet, or Mr. Böttcher as first horn, or Mr. Sanromá as pianist. By association the players have come to feel and know each other; to feel, know and work in image of the conductor. Wherever a hundred more or less sensitive men work together under one, highly sensitive; wherever discipline is the first essential to achievement, there are flashes of irritation. They pass humanwise; while the reciprocating spirit prevails and endures.

Hence the merits of a string choir whose precision and plasticity are unexcelled; who command every finesse and every energy of tone, passing at will from sensuous beauty to striding power; whose sensibility and unanimity serve equally the composer's and conductor's will. Beside it sits a woodwind choir of matched virtuosity with their several instruments, of unfailing musical intelligence, as quick and manifold as the strings in response to the music before them, to the conductor's purpose. It is the distinction of the brass choir that it ranges at will from mellow nineteenth-century sonority to piercing twentietherature or look own day. If removed bodi certs, many t cess of them the gap. After seven years o

of the Symp easily be turn years of Symp the conductor no faction in t tive or radical his power. Con selves most for classics to model sion themselves will give ear to mediate day. C passions, like Dr
the balance true

For at bottom resolves itself in tion. By the ev through seven y has not neglected restored the comp century to just p Concerts. He has ven and Brahms them. No conduc given Mendelssohn Schumann more sy ears he has re-cre is intrinsically a c house. Dr. Kousse like most conducto prefers to leave f
There have been popular favor for Saint-Saëns, Dvorák

To pass to establi own day, Debussy a Sibelius, have ran through the progra
To them Chalkov
Rimsky-Korsakov
Mahler and Bruckn ered. Hardly an ous promise or pro been overlooked.
discarded romantic time—the court banished the world hall. These thin tainly are, may n
the young men room? To whom write as they ch vitzky have distr of this anniversa
aside, not few w those who cannot conductor and tr
sible to their im
will.

century plangency. No modernist rhythming or coloring has yet overtaxed the percussion corner.

As a unified orchestra, these choirs now play with a balance and a reciprocation capable of the finest euphonies or the sharpest contrasts.
They range from suggestion to proclamation. Above all, they are supple masters of diverse styles. They excel with Mozart and Haydn. They excel also with Stravinsky and Hindemith. They sound Beethoven and Brahms characterized. They do as much for Debussy and Ravel. Finally such an orchestra and such a conductor have gradually sensitized their accustomed audiences. They are not only suffused with sensuous beauty, thrilled with power, whipped by rhythm, dazzled with color. The quick-eared and quick-minded answer now to subtleties and suggestion, to the finer play of this orchestral art.

From the orchestra of Koussevitzky to his programs. But first, a clearing of the ground. No orchestra can maintain its quality, no audience keep its interest, next to no conductor express himself under the repeated and super-polished performance of a narrow range of music, for the most part classic or museum pieces. The orchestra is staled; the audience sated; the conductor turned finical; the classics themselves routinized and devitalized. Furthermore: in a thousand heads float memories of music once liked, now by time and change stripped, outmoded and deadened.
To resurrect it and to pretend with it would bring only boredom and disillusion.
Yet again: while there are those who are deeply and sincerely stirred by the classics or the surviving romantics, there are also those who are as warmly and honestly impressed by the modernists. It is possible to be thrilled by Stravinsky as well as by Beethoven; to be engrossed by Hindemith as well as by Brahms; to take pleasure in Schumann and also in Honegger.
If age must be served, so also must youth,
if an orchestra is to endure and be a living thing. If the narrow-minded must be warily humored, twice over should the catholic-eared be pleased.

Once more: though august matrons depart in dudgeon and gray heads mutter about "noise," the modernists will continue to write in their own manner because thereby they express themselves and their generation. No more can they be excluded from the concerts of the nineteen-thirties than current inventions can be excluded from our households or current manners and customs eschewed in our living. They are a part of the life and the music of our time. A considerable and indispensable public wishes to hear them, as it reads the lit-

Most of us who listen with any discrimination and background to the Symphony Concerts, who count them as something more than week-end gathering-place for entertainment, have had our differences with Dr. Koussevitzky.
Hearing the outcome, we have wondered why he accepted and played this or that new piece. Exalting our own notions, we have preferred another pace or accents to his. Harking back, as we fondly believed, to the composer, we have doubted his version of the piece in hand.
Once in so often must he try to dramatize a music intrinsically undramatic?
Or the choice or the arrangement of a program has irked us. All these are the minor and momentary concomitants, inevitable but also trivial, of a conductor-ship seven years long. Beside Dr. Koussevitzky's essential and ripened qualities, they recede into the small and personal objection before the large and determining considerations. At the end of seven years, it is again in order to call the roll.
It is essential that the Symphony Concerts should escape routine. Season after season and week after week, Dr. Koussevitzky sets in a focus of interest, a source of surprise, a satisfaction remembered and renewed. It is essential that the conductor himself should not be routined. To hackneyed repertory pieces
Dr. Koussevitzky comes freshly, infuses them with a new vitality, sounds them as they may have plausibly sounded when they also were new. To untried pieces he brings a patience, persistence, faith and zest that are the delight of the composers that half-persuade even unreceptive listeners.

A conductor may not spare himself and bring an orchestra to the standards of performance, gradually gained and now sustained at Symphony Hall. No more may he spare himself when he would have his programs as wide-ranging as those which Dr. Koussevitzky now assembles. There are classics to be assorted, revivals to be considered, new scores to be studied, one adjustment after another to be made—and he does not flag.
After choice, rehearsals and again he is tireless. After performance, betterments under second thought, and his third version of a given piece usually excels the first and the second. The ideal conductor of a permanent orchestra, of an annual series of concerts, is a conductor who places them above all else in his life.
After seven years neither the ambition, the devotion nor the incessant work of Dr. Koussevitzky diminishes. He pursues an ideal, rejoicing in his heart that it will always outstrip him by a little.

In those seven years Dr. Koussevitzky's powers have ripened. Remember his Mozart as it was at the beginning and as it

Recall his first and his present of the tone-poems of Strauss. The of his Beethoven is ever renewed.
hms is measured to a just bal-
the essential qualities. His Debuss-Ravel are more and more sensitive utilized. Not one of his modernists not characterized. Not one of his men that is not set in the best ate light. . . . In the earlier day Dr.
vitzky tended to over-do to lose e and control by excess of pre-occu-with the music before him. Now he master of himself and of it. He plishes remarkable performances;
does not set virtuosity over the dis-of the music in spirit, truth, charand life.

true that whatever Dr. Koussedoes is colored high or deep with a personal quality. But that "per-y" is kindling force upon orches-dience, piece and composer. It is essential nowadays to the American hall. The conductor's variety the American instinct for change; against over-familiarity. His in-tangible vitality keeps every trait ery ability in play and unclouded.
at some distant day, he lays down sent charge at his own request his audience should tire of him—cessor will be difficult to find and regret.

H. T. P.

erature or looks at the painting of its own day. If the modernists were to be removed bodily from the Symphony Concerts, many that now complain of an excess of them would discover and regret the gap. After five years of Monteux and seven years of Koussevitzky, the course of the Symphony Concerts may not easily be turned backward. After fifty years of Symphony Concerts over which the conductor's will has been decisive, no faction in the public, be it conservative or radical, is likely to strip him of his power. Conductors who passion themselves most for performance will prefer classics to moderns. Conductors who passion themselves most for music in itself will give ear to the composers of the immediate day. Conductors who join both passions, like Dr. Koussevitzky, will hold the balance true.

For at bottom the whole controversy resolves itself into a question of proportion. By the evidence of his programs through seven years, Dr. Koussevitzky has not neglected the classics. He has restored the composers of the eighteenth century to just place in the Symphony Concerts. He has not only played Beethoven and Brahms; he has re-vitalized them. No conductor within memory has given Mendelssohn more room; cultivated Schumann more sympathetically. In our ears he has re-created Berlioz. Wagner is intrinsically a composer of the opera house. Dr. Koussevitzky, like Dr. Muck, like most conductors of the present day, prefers to leave him in his own field. There have been condescensions to the popular favor for certain symphonies of Saint-Saëns, Dvorák and Franck.

To pass to established composers of our own day, Debussy and Ravel, Strauss and Sibelius, have ranged as never before through the programs at Symphony Hall. To them Chalkovsky and, in degree, Rimsky-Korsakov have been restored. Mahler and Bruckner have been rediscovered. Hardly an American of conspicuous promise or proved performance has been overlooked. For the most part the discarded romantics are only those whom time—the court without appeal—have banished the world over from the concert hall. These things being as they certainly are, may not the modernists and the young men have the remaining room? To whom but to the living, to write as they chose, could Dr. Koussevitzky have distributed the commissions of this anniversary year? Predilections aside, not few who would deny him are those who cannot bear the thought that conductor and trustees are alike inaccessible to their imperious and accustomed will.

plengency. No modernist painting or coloring has yet over- the percussion corner. a unified orchestra, these choirs play with a balance and a location capable of the finest lies or the sharpest contrasts, range from suggestion to proclamation. Above all, they are supple of diverse styles. They with Mozart and Haydn. They also with Stravinsky and mith. They sound Beethoven and as characterized. They do as much Debussy and Ravel. Finally such orchestra and such a conductor have ally sensitized their accustomed ces. They are not only suff with sensuous beauty, thrilled with, whipped by rhythm, dazzled with The quick-eared and quick-minded r now to subtleties and suggestion, finer play of this orchestral art.

the orchestra of Koussevitzky to But first, a clearing of the ograms. No orchestra can maintain its has, no audience keep its interest, no conductor express himself under eated and super-polished perform- of a narrow range of music, for the part classic or museum pieces. The tra is staled; the audience sated; the given Mendelssohn more room; cultivated ctor turned final; the classics Schumann more sympathetically. In our selves routined and devitalized. Fur- ore: in a thousand heads float mem- of music once liked, now by time and e stripped, outmoded and deadened. surrect it and to pretend with it bring only boredom and disillusion. gain: while there are those who are and sincerely stirred by the classics surviving romantics, there are also who are as warmly and honestly ssed by the modernists. It is possi- be thrilled by Stravinsky as well as eethoven; to be engrossed by Hinde- as well as by Brahms; to take pleas- Schumann and also in Honegger- must be served, so also must youth, orchestra is to endure and be a liv- ing. If the narrow-minded must rily humored, twice over should tholic-eared be pleased. more: though august matrons de- a dudgeon and gray heads mutter "noise," the modernists will con- to write in their own manner be- thereby they express themselves their generation. No more can they eluded from the concerts of the en-thirties than current inven- can be excluded from our house- or current manners and customs ed in our living. They are a part life and the music of our time. A rable and indispensable public to hear them, as it reads the lit-

Most of us who listen with any discrimination and background to the Symphony Concerts, who count them as something more than week-end gathering-place for entertainment, have had our differences with Dr. Koussevitzky. Hearing the outcome, we have wondered why he accepted and played this or that new piece. Exalting our own notions, we have preferred another pace or accents to his. Harking back, as we fondly believed, to the composer, we have doubted his version of the piece in hand. Once in so often must he try to dramatize a music intrinsically undramatic? Or the choice or the arrangement of a program has irked us. All these are the minor and momentary concomitants, inevitable but also trivial, of a conductorship seven years long. Beside Dr. Koussevitzky's essential and ripened qualities, they recede into the small and personal objection before the large and determining considerations. At the end of seven years, it is again in order to call the roll. It is essential that the Symphony Concerts should escape routine. Season after season and week after week, Dr. Koussevitzky sets in a focus of interest, a source of surprise, a satisfaction remembered and renewed. It is essential that the conductor himself should not be routined. To hackneyed repertory pieces Dr. Koussevitzky comes freshly, infuses them with a new vitality, sounds them as they may have plausibly sounded when they also were new. To untried pieces he brings a patience, persistence, faith and zest that are the delight of the composers that half-persuade even unreceptive listeners.

A conductor may not spare himself and bring an orchestra to the standards of performance, gradually gained and now sustained at Symphony Hall. No more may he spare himself when he would have his programs as wide-ranging as those which Dr. Koussevitzky now assembles. There are classics to be assorted, revivals to be considered, new scores to be studied, one adjustment after another to be made—and he does not flag. After choice, rehearsals and again he is tireless. After performance, betterments under second thought, and his third version of a given piece usually excels the first and the second. The ideal conductor of a permanent orchestra, of an annual series of concerts, is a conductor who places them above all else in his life. After seven years neither the ambition, the devotion nor the incessant work of Dr. Koussevitzky diminishes. He pursues an ideal, rejoicing in his heart that it will always outstrip him by a little.

In those seven years Dr. Koussevitzky's powers have ripened. Remember his Mozart as it was at the beginning and as it

Recall his first and his present of the tone-poems of Strauss. The of his Beethoven is ever renewed. ahms is measured to a just balance the essential qualities. His Debussy, Ravel are more and more sensitive utilized. Not one of his modernists not characterized. Not one of his men that is not set in the best at- light. . . . In the earlier day Dr. vitzky tended to over-do to lose e and control by excess of pre-occu- with the music before him. Now he master of himself and of it. He plishes remarkable performances; does not set virtuosity over the dis- of the music in spirit, truth, char- and life.

true that whatever Dr. Kousse- does is colored high or deep with a personal quality. But that "per- sonal" is kindling force upon orches- tral, piece and composer. It is essential nowadays to the American hall. The conductor's variety the American instinct for change; against over-familiarity. His in- tire vitality keeps every trait ery ability in play and unclouded. at some distant day, he lays down sent charge at his own request his audience should tire of him— essor will be difficult to find and regret.

H. T. P.

erature or looks at the painting of its own day. If the modernists were to be removed bodily from the Symphony Concerts, many that now complain of an excess of them would discover and regret the gap. After five years of Monteux and seven years of Koussevitzky, the course of the Symphony Concerts may not easily be turned backward. After fifty years of Symphony Concerts over which the conductor's will has been decisive, no faction in the public, be it conservative or radical, is likely to strip him of his power. Conductors who passion themselves most for performance will prefer classics to moderns. Conductors who passion themselves most for music in itself will give ear to the composers of the immediate day. Conductors who join both passions, like Dr. Koussevitzky, will hold the balance true.

For at bottom the whole controversy resolves itself into a question of proportion. By the evidence of his programs through seven years, Dr. Koussevitzky has not neglected the classics. He has restored the composers of the eighteenth century to just place in the Symphony Concerts. He has not only played Beethoven and Brahms; he has re-vitalized them. No conductor within memory has given Mendelssohn more room; cultivated Schumann more sympathetically. In our ears he has re-created Berlioz. Wagner is intrinsically a composer of the opera house. Dr. Koussevitzky, like Dr. Muck, like most conductors of the present day, prefers to leave him in his own field. There have been condescensions to the popular favor for certain symphonies of Saint-Saëns, Dvorák and Franck.

To pass to established composers of our own day, Debussy and Ravel, Strauss and Sibelius, have ranged as never before through the programs at Symphony Hall. To them Chaikovsky and, in degree, Rimsky-Korsakov have been restored. Mahler and Bruckner have been rediscovered. Hardly an American of conspicuous promise or proved performance has been overlooked. For the most part the discarded romantics are only those whom time—the court without appeal—have banished the world over from the concert hall. These things being as they certainly are, may not the modernists and the young men have the remaining room? To whom but to the living, to write as they chose, could Dr. Koussevitzky have distributed the commissions of this anniversary year? Predilections aside, not few who would deny him are those who cannot bear the thought that conductor and trustees are alike inaccessible to their imperious and accustomed will.

plangency. No modernist painting or coloring has yet over- the percussion corner. a unified orchestra, these choirs play with a balance and a location capable of the finest hues or the sharpest contrasts, range from suggestion to proclamation. Above all, they are supple of diverse styles. They with Mozart and Haydn. They also with Stravinsky and mith. They sound Beethoven and as characterized. They do as much Debussy and Ravel. Finally such orchestra and such a conductor have ally sensitized their accustomed faces. They are not only suff with sensuous beauty, thrilled with, whipped by rhythm, dazzled with. The quick-eared and quick-minded r now to subtleties and suggestion, finer play of this orchestral art.

the orchestra of Koussevitzky to tion. But first, a clearing of the through seven years, Dr. Koussevitzky d. No orchestra can maintain its has, no audience keep its interest, no conductor express himself under peated and super-polished perform- of a narrow range of music, for the part classic or museum pieces. The tra is staled; the audience sated; the conductor turned final; the classics elves routined and devitalized. Fur ore: in a thousand heads float mem- of music once liked, now by time and e stripped, outmoded and deadened. surrect it and to pretend with it bring only boredom and disillusion. gain: while there are those who are and sincerely stirred by the classics surviving romantics, there are also who are as warmly and honestly sed by the modernists. It is possi- be thrilled by Stravinsky as well as eethoven; to be engrossed by Hinde- as well as by Brahms; to take pleas- Schumann and also in Honegger must be served, so also must youth, orchestra is to endure and be a liv- ing. If the narrow-minded must rily humored, twice over should tholic-eared be pleased. more; though august matrons de- a dudgeon and gray heads mutter "noise," the modernists will con- to write in their own manner be- thereby they express themselves their generation. No more can they eluded from the concerts of the en-thirties than current inven- can be excluded from our house- or current manners and customs ed in our living. They are a part life and the music of our time. A erable and indispensable public to hear them, as it reads the lit-

Most of us w crimination and phony Concerts something more ing-place for e our differences Hearing the out why he accepted new piece. Exa we have prefer cents to his. Ha ly believed, to t doubted his vers Once in so often tize a music int
Or the choice o program has irke minor and momen evitable but also ship seven years sevitzy's essentia they recede into objection before t

ing considerations years, it is again

It is essential t certs should escap season and week sevitzy sets in source of surprise bered and renewe
the conductor him tined. To hackn
Dr. Koussevitzky
them with a new they may have p they also were new brings a patience, zest that are the d that half-persua
listeners.

A conductor may bring an orchestra performance, gradu sustained at Symp may he spare him have his program those which Dr. I sembles. There are ed, revivals to be c to be studied, one other to be made After choice, rehear tireless. After perfo under second thoug
sion of a given piec first and the second.
of a permanent orcl
series of concerts, places them above
After seven years n
the devotion nor th
Dr. Koussevitzky d sues an ideal, rejoici
it will always outst
In those seven year powers have ripened.
zart as it was at the

is now. Recall his first and his present delivery of the tone-poems of Strauss. The vitality of his Beethoven is ever renewed. His Brahms is measured to a just balance of the essential qualities. His Debussy and Ravel are more and more sensitive and subtilized. Not one of his modernists that is not characterized. Not one of his young men that is not set in the best attainable light. . . . In the earlier day Dr. Koussevitzky tended to over-do to lose measure and control by excess of pre-occupation with the music before him. Now he is surer master of himself and of it. He accomplishes remarkable performances; but he does not set virtuosity over the disclosure of the music in spirit, truth, character and life.

It is true that whatever Dr. Koussevitzky does is colored high or deep with his own personal quality. But that "personality" is kindling force upon orchestra, audience, piece and composer. It is also essential nowadays to the American concert-hall. The conductor's variety gratifies the American instinct for change; is proof against over-familiarity. His inexhaustible vitality keeps every trait and every ability in play and unclouded. When at some distant day, he lays down his present charge at his own request—lest his audience should tire of him—his successor will be difficult to find and easy to regret.

H. T. P.

288

SYMPHONY HALL, BOSTON

YOUNG PEOPLE'S CONCERTS

THE AFTERNOONS OF

Wednesday, November 12, and Thursday, November 13, 1930 at 4 o'clock

BY THE

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

Dr. SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY, Conductor

W. H. BRENNAN, Manager

G. E. JUDD, Asst. Manager

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky and Richard Burgin will conduct.
There will be brief explanatory remarks with stereopticon slides,
by Alfred H. Meyer.

PROGRAMME FOR BOTH CONCERTS

- Bach . . . Arranged for String orchestra by Pick-Mangiagalli . . . Prelude
- Beethoven Allegretto from the Seventh Symphony in A major
- Mozart . . . Adagio from the Concerto for Clarinet Solo: Victor Polatschek
- Moussorgsky . . . "Pictures at an Exhibition"
Arranged for Orchestra by Maurice Ravel
- Promenade
Gnome
Tuileries
Bydlo
Promenade
Ballet of the Chicks in their shells
Samuel Goldenberg and Schmuyle
- Borodin . . . Polovetzian Dances from the Opera, "Prince Igor"

Three hundred desirable floor seats have been reserved, to be sold directly to individuals for their children. These special reserved tickets are available to Symphony subscribers at the Symphony Hall box office at $1.00 each.
No adult will be admitted unless accompanied by one or more children.
The balance of the seats will, as before, be offered through the schools of Greater Boston, at 35 cents each.

289

YOUNG PEOPLE'S CONCERT

Dr. Koussevitzky and Mr. Richard Burgin divided the honors at the Young People's concert yesterday afternoon. The program was as follows: Bach-Pick-Mangiagalli, prelude for string orchestra; Beethoven, allegretto from the Seventh Symphony; Mozart, adagio from the Concerto for Clarinet with Victor Polatschek, soloist; Moussorgsky-Ravel, "Pictures at an Exhibition"; Bowdin, Polovetzian dances from the opera "Prince Igor." There were explanations with stereopticon slides by Mr. Alfred H. Meyer. Dr. Koussevitzky conducted the first three numbers; Mr. Burgin the other two.

The conductors as well as the orchestra were very fortunate in having an audience sufficiently unsophisticated to react naturally to the music they heard. The silence while the music was played was wonderful to behold in children. Some even dared to assist Dr. Koussevitzky in conducting, but unfortunately were quickly suppressed by their escorts, who really were vandals at this concert and only admitted if a child brought them along.

The program was attentively and respectfully listened to through the Mozart, but enthusiasm did not break loose until the Moussorgsky suite was played. The gnome was received as a kindred spirit; the rumbling and creaking of the Polish cart brought forth a heartfelt burst of applause. Over the Ballet of the Chicks in their shells one felt a slight controversy. To some this ballet seemed quite the proper thing; others were a little skeptical over it, yet not enough so to prevent smiling. Needless to say the instruments of percussion were considered the most fascinating in the orchestra. Though Mr. Polatschek's exquisite phrasing was appreciated, it was the roll of a drum that brought excitement to its zenith.

Mr. Meyer's apt remarks and interesting pictures added much to the enjoyment of the audience, though a more personal and imaginative attitude might have aroused his young listeners to a more attentive response. His mere mention of Dr. Koussevitzky's name was met with a spontaneous outburst.

The program will be repeated this afternoon.

L. B. D.

YOUNG PEOPLE'S CONCERT

The second of the Young People's concerts by the Boston Symphony orchestra took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony hall. Dr. Koussevitzky conducted the first movement of Haydn's Symphony in D major (B. & H. No. 10) and the Scherzo from Mendelssohn's Incidental music for Shakespeare's "A Midsummer Night's Dream"; Mr. Richard Burgin conducted the Handel-Casadesus Andante from concerto (viola solo: Jean Lafranc), Honegger's Pacific 231, and Rimsky-Korsakov's Caprice on Spanish Themes.

The children were well pleased with the choice of music. The pert rhythm of the Allegro from Haydn's Symphony aroused their interest. Their delight increased as the nimble-footed movement advanced. So it was with the Mendelssohn Scherzo; what Mr. Meyer couldn't explain to them in words—such as what the fairies pictured on one of the slides were discussing—the instruments told them quite plainly.

Instead of simply showing the children a picture of the viola Mr. Meyer produced the instrument itself, held it up with the violin that the children might see the differences between the two instruments. That the ear might know to distinguish between them Mr. Theodorowicz and Mr. Lefranc played phrases on their respective instruments—first on the strings the violin and viola possess in common, then on those peculiar to each instrument—thus graphically bringing to the hearers the difference in timbre of each. This was duly appreciated, as was Mr. Lefranc's beautiful playing of the Andante that followed.

The knowledge Mr. Meyer shows of locomotives would almost vie with that of Mr. Honegger himself. However, the young people seemed much more engrossed with the information he gave them than the music which portrays Pacific 231 so vividly. If their attention lapsed a bit during the Honegger, the Caprice on Spanish Themes captivated and intrigued them. The brilliant piece excited curiosity and admiration. Enthusiastic applause followed it.

A fair-sized audience greeted Mr. Koussevitzky and Mr. Burgin. The concert will be repeated this afternoon.

L. B. D.

SYMPHONY HALL, BOSTON

YOUNG PEOPLE'S CONCERTS

THE AFTERNOONS OF

Monday, April 6, and Tuesday, April 7 1931 at 4 o'clock

BY THE

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

Dr. SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY, Conductor

W. H. BRENNAN, Manager

G. E. JUDD, Asst. Manager

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky and Richard Burgin will conduct.
There will be brief explanatory remarks with stereopticon slides,
by Alfred H. Meyer.

PROGRAMME FOR BOTH CONCERTS

- | | |
|---------------------------|------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|
| Haydn | Symphony in D major (B. & H. No. 10), First Movement
Adagio; Allegro spiritoso. |
| Mendelssohn | Incidental Music for Shakespeare's
"A Midsummer Night's Dream" |
| a. Overture. | |
| b. Scherzo. | |
| Jongen | Elegiac Poem, for Viola and Orchestra
Viola Solo: Jean Lefranc. |
| Honegger | "Pacific 2-3-1," Orchestral Movement |
| Rimsky-Korsakov | Caprice on Spanish Themes |

Three hundred desirable floor seats have been reserved, to be sold directly to individuals for their children. These special reserved tickets are available to Symphony Subscribers at the Symphony Hall box office at $1.00 each.

No adult will be admitted unless accompanied by one or more children. The balance of the seats will, as before, be offered the schools of Greater Boston at 35 cents each.

YOUNG PEOPLE'S CONCERT

Dr. Koussevitzky and Mr. Richard Burgin divided the honors at the Young People's concert yesterday afternoon. The program was as follows: Bach-Pick-Mangiagalli, prelude for string orchestra; Beethoven, allegretto from the Seventh Symphony; Mozart, adagio from the Concerto for Clarinet with Victor Polatschek, soloist; Moussorgsky-Ravel, "Pictures at an Exhibition"; Bowdin, Polovetzian dances from the opera "Prince Igor." There were explanations with stereopticon slides by Mr. Alfred H. Meyer. Dr. Koussevitzky conducted the first three numbers; Mr. Burgin the other two.

The conductors as well as the orchestra were very fortunate in having an audience sufficiently unsophisticated to react naturally to the music they heard. The silence while the music was played was wonderful to behold in children. Some even dared to assist Dr. Koussevitzky in conducting, but unfortunately were quickly suppressed by their escorts, who really were vandals at this concert and only admitted if a child brought them along.

The program was attentively and respectfully listened to through the Mozart, but enthusiasm did not break loose until the Moussorgsky suite was played. The gnome was received as a kindred spirit; the rumbling and creaking of the Polish cart brought forth a heartfelt burst of applause. Over the Ballet of the Chicks in their shells one felt a slight controversy. To some this ballet seemed quite the proper thing; others were a little skeptical over it, yet not enough so to prevent smiling. Needless to say the instruments of percussion were considered the most fascinating in the orchestra. Though Mr. Polatschek's exquisite phrasing was appreciated, it was the roll of a drum that brought excitement to its zenith.

Mr. Meyer's apt remarks and interesting pictures added much to the enjoyment of the audience, though a more personal and imaginative attitude might have aroused his young listeners to a more attentive response. His mere mention of Dr. Koussevitzky's name was met with a spontaneous outburst.

The program will be repeated this afternoon. L. B. D.

YOUNG PEOPLE'S CONCERT

The second of the Young People's concerts by the Boston Symphony orchestra took place yesterday afternoon in Symphony hall. Dr. Koussevitzky conducted the first movement of Haydn's Symphony in D major (B. & H. No. 10) and the Scherzo from Mendelssohn's Incidental music for Shakespeare's "A Midsummer Night's Dream"; Mr. Richard Burgin conducted the Handel-Casadesus Andante from concerto (viola solo: Jean Lafranc), Honegger's Pacific 231, and Rimsky-Korsakov's Caprice on Spanish Themes.

The children were well pleased with the choice of music. The pert rhythm of the Allegro from Haydn's Symphony aroused their interest. Their delight increased as the nimble-footed movement advanced. So it was with the Mendelssohn Scherzo; what Mr. Meyer couldn't explain to them in words—such as what the fairies pictured on one of the slides were discussing—the instruments told them quite plainly.

Instead of simply showing the children a picture of the viola Mr. Meyer produced the instrument itself, held it up with the violin that the children might see the differences between the two instruments. That the ear might know to distinguish between them Mr. Theodorowicz and Mr. Lefranc played phrases on their respective instruments—first on the strings the violin and viola possess in common, then on those peculiar to each instrument—thus graphically bringing to the hearers the difference in timbre of each. This was duly appreciated, as was Mr. Lefranc's beautiful playing of the Andante that followed.

The knowledge Mr. Meyer shows of locomotives would almost vie with that of Mr. Honegger himself. However, the young people seemed much more engrossed with the information he gave them than the music which portrays Pacific 231 so vividly. If their attention lapsed a bit during the Honegger, the Caprice on Spanish Themes captivated and intrigued them. The brilliant piece excited curiosity and admiration. Enthusiastic applause followed it.

A fair-sized audience greeted Mr. Koussevitzky and Mr. Burgin.

The concert will be repeated this afternoon. L. B. D.

SYMPHONY HALL, BOSTON

YOUNG PEOPLE'S CONCERTS

THE AFTERNOONS OF

Monday, April 6, and Tuesday, April 7 1931 at 4 o'clock

BY THE

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

Dr. SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY, Conductor

W. H. BRENNAN, Manager

G. E. JUDD, Asst. Manager

Dr. Serge Koussevitzky and Richard Burgin will conduct.
There will be brief explanatory remarks with stereopticon slides,
by Alfred H. Meyer.

PROGRAMME FOR BOTH CONCERTS

- | | |
|-----------------|--------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|
| Haydn | Symphony in D major (B. & H. No. 10), First Movement
Adagio; Allegro spiritoso. |
| Mendelssohn | Incidental Music for Shakespeare's
"A Midsummer Night's Dream"
a. Overture.
b. Scherzo. |
| Jongen | Elegiac Poem, for Viola and Orchestra
Viola Solo: Jean Lefranc. |
| Honegger | "Pacific 2-3-1," Orchestral Movement |
| Rimsky-Korsakov | Caprice on Spanish Themes |

Three hundred desirable floor seats have been reserved, to be sold directly to individuals for their children. These special reserved tickets are available to Symphony Subscribers at the Symphony Hall box office at $1.00 each.

No adult will be admitted unless accompanied by one or more children. The balance of the seats will, as before, be offered the schools of Greater Boston at 35 cents each.

VICTOR RECORDS

BY THE

Boston Symphony Orchestra

Dr. SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY, Conductor

- | | |
|----------------|------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|
| BEETHOVEN: | Symphony No. 6 in F major, "Pastoral". |
| HAYDN: | Symphony No. 6 in G major, "Surprise". |
| PROKOFIEFF: | Classical Symphony.
"The Love for Three Oranges"—March. |
| RAVEL: | Bolero.
"Daphnis et Chloé", Suite No. 2. |
| SATIE-DEBUSSY: | Gymnopédie, No. 1. |
| STRAUSS: | Fruhlingstimmen—Walzer (Voices of Spring).
Wiener Blut—Walzer (Vienna Blood). |
| STRAVINSKY: | Apollon Musagète—Ballet (2 movements).
(Apollo, Leader of the Muses)
"Petrouchka" Suite. |
| TCHAIKOVSKY: | Symphony No. 6 in B minor, "Pathetic". |

Concert-Chronicle

Nov. 7, 1930

For Cambridge Ears

THE program of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Sanders Theater, Cambridge, last evening, anticipated the week's concerts in Boston in the inclusion of Handel's Concerto Grosso No. 12 in B minor, and for the rest followed the program of last week, with Nabokov's Symphony and Chaikovsky's Symphony in F minor, No. 4.

Nabokov's symphony again gave the impression that its composer is a young man of more than ordinary talent. Whether that large talent will ripen into genius, is, as the phrase goes, "up to him." The question has been raised in the foreign press as to how much Nabokov owes to Stravinsky and Prokofiev. To one listener at least, the question seems futile. Probably he would not have written as he did had the two great moderns not lived. But also, probably he would not have written as he did had jazz not been invented. Indeed, if one listens closely, one can hear the echo of the styles of half a dozen or more composers in the work of Nabokov, and probably a majority among them are late Romanticists. It would be said with equal truth that Nabokov's style could not be what it is were it not for these composers.

Nabokov seems to be laying the foundations of a style which will be both intensely personal and broadly eclectic. He is not given to "isms," be they of this or that lion or movement of his day and age, or be they of the past. Such matters, in his style, are apparently put into their place in the style which he is forging for himself. But not all the elements which are going into the making of that style are as yet perfectly fused. It is a natural stage in the work of many a young composer. It argues that a certain state of immaturity has not as yet been passed. The promise for Nabokov lies in the inherent beauty of his ideas and of the uses to which he puts them, and in the sure and certain way in which he is fusing diverse elements into a style of his own. Such a work as this symphony proved highly enjoyable, even though it contains certain evidences of immaturity. Of course, not a little of this enjoyment is due to the splendid performance which Dr. Koussevitzky and his men gave to the work.

Handel's concerto renewed pleasant memories of past experiences with strings silken and sonorous; of a composer in manner now plaintive, now sumptuous, rously energetic; of a conductor's these strings and this music. For Dr. Koussevitzky gives Handel a reading that includes all all vigors, but also all beauty and all beauty of shade; he polal quality until it shines with comparable brightness, kindles it becomes fiery with eloquence, it to soothing gentleness. Such Handel concerto of the Boston ny Orchestra in its year of

or a thrill give us Chaikovsky's

It seems as if with this year's ance of this symphony the conhad set for himself a new and ay high standard with Chaikovsky, om he had already excelled. He it a thing Russian, of the Rusout for all the world. Not possibly his music have been conceived in Europe. Of the quasi-Oriental it breathes in measure after e, period after period. What matit Russian "nationalists" (as they themselves) found in Chaikovsky great kinship with the Germans. he spirit beneath such external ships that counts; and where in rld would one find a work more n in spirit than this symphony of ysky. In its gloomy melodies, in its and bizarre decorative schemes, olorful languors, in its wild, unrenergies, in its unsurpassable pagthis symphony is Russian beyond k of many a "nationalist." And it e blood of the conductor to undervery such quality. If the range ion and effect in the symphony is is feeling for it reaches its utmost Performance which as perfectly s, point for point, the inherent s of the work, one will not soon nce from other sources.

A. H. M.

Stravinsky, Handel And Koussevitzky

Nov. 20, 1931.

audience at Sanders Theater, ambridge, last evening was apause beyond its usual wont. Upconclusion of Handel's Concerto Op. 6, No. 6, in G minor, the fesbegan. Recalled to the stage by clapping, Dr. Koussevitzky inthat Mr. Burgin share individually general favor. Stravinsky's Capr Piano and Orchestra, which has numerous audiences in Boston ewhere, aroused sudden and susnot to say surprising, enthusiasm.

VICTOR RECORDS

BY THE

Boston Symphony Orchestra

Dr. SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY, Conductor

- | | |
|----------------|------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|
| BEETHOVEN: | Symphony No. 6 in F major, "Pastoral". |
| HAYDN: | Symphony No. 6 in G major, "Surprise". |
| PROKOFIEFF: | Classical Symphony.
"The Love for Three Oranges"—March. |
| RAVEL: | Bolero.
"Daphnis et Chloé", Suite No. 2. |
| SATIE-DEBUSSY: | Gymnopédie, No. 1. |
| STRAUSS: | Fruhlingstimmen—Walzer (Voices of Spring).
Wiener Blut—Walzer (Vienna Blood). |
| STRAVINSKY: | Apollon Musagète—Ballet (2 movements).
(Apollo, Leader of the Muses)
"Petrouchka" Suite. |
| TCHAIKOVSKY: | Symphony No. 6 in B minor, "Pathetic". |

Concert-Chronicle

Nov. 7, 1930
For Cambridge Ears

THE program of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Sanders Theater, Cambridge, last evening, anticipated the week's concerts in Boston in the inclusion of Handel's Concerto Grosso No. 12 in B minor, and for the rest followed the program of last week, with Nabokov's Symphony and Chaikovsky's Symphony in F minor, No. 4.

Nabokov's symphony again gave the impression that its composer is a young man of more than ordinary talent. Whether that large talent will ripen into genius, is, as the phrase goes, "up to him." The question has been raised in the foreign press as to how much Nabokov owes to Stravinsky and Prokofiev. To one listener at least, the question seems futile. Probably he would not have written as he did had the two great moderns not lived. But also, probably he would not have written as he did had jazz not been invented. Indeed, if one listens closely, one can hear the echo of the styles of half a dozen or more composers in the work of Nabokov, and probably a majority among them are late Romanticists. It would be said with equal truth that Nabokov's style could not be what it is were it not for these composers.

Nabokov seems to be laying the foundations of a style which will be both intensely personal and broadly eclectic. He is not given to "isms," be they of this or that lion or movement of his day and age, or be they of the past. Such matters, in his style, are apparently put into their place in the style which he is forging for himself. But not all the elements which are going into the making of that style are as yet perfectly fused. It is a natural stage in the work of many a young composer. It argues that a certain state of immaturity has not as yet been passed. The promise for Nabokov lies in the inherent beauty of his ideas and of the uses to which he puts them, and in the sure and certain way in which he is fusing diverse elements into a style of his own. Such a work as this symphony proved highly enjoyable, even through it contains certain evidences of immaturity. Of course, not a little of this enjoyment is due to the splendid performance which Dr. Koussevitzky and his men gave to the work.

Handel's concerto renewed pleasant memories of past experiences with strings silken and sonorous; of a composer in manner now plaintive, now sumptuous,

or a thrill give us Chaikovsky's in these strings and this music. For Dr. Koussevitzky gives Handel a reading that includes all vigor, but also all beauty and all beauty of shade; he polishes quality until it shines with incomparable brightness, kindles it becomes fiery with eloquence, it to soothing gentleness. Such Handel concerto of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in its year of or a thrill give us Chaikovsky's "It seems as if with this year's chance of this symphony the conductor had set for himself a new and high standard with Chaikovsky, from he had already excelled. He it a thing Russian, of the Russian for all the world. Not possibly his music have been conceived in Europe. Of the quasi-Oriental it breathes in measure after measure, period after period. What matter if Russian "nationalists" (as they themselves) found in Chaikovsky great kinship with the Germans, the spirit beneath such external ships that counts; and where in the world would one find a work more in spirit than this symphony of Chaikovsky. In its gloomy melodies, in its and bizarre decorative schemes, colorful languors, in its wild, unrestrained energies, in its unsurpassable pagthis symphony is Russian beyond the work of many a "nationalist." And it is the blood of the conductor to under every such quality. If the range and effect in the symphony is feeling for it reaches its utmost performance which as perfectly as, point for point, the inherent of the work, one will not soon find it from other sources.

A. H. M.

Stravinsky, Handel And Koussevitzky

Nov. 20, 1931.
The audience at Sanders Theater, Cambridge, last evening was ap- plaudive beyond its usual wont. Up- on conclusion of Handel's Concerto Op. 6, No. 6, in G minor, the fes- tivity began. Recalled to the stage by clapping, Dr. Koussevitzky in- vited Mr. Burgin share individually in general favor. Stravinsky's Ca- ncer Piano and Orchestra, which has numerous audiences in Boston elsewhere, aroused sudden and sus- tained not to say surprising, enthusiasm.

VICTOR RECORDS

BY THE

Boston Symphony Orchestra

Dr. SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY, Conductor

- BEETHOVEN: Symphony No. 6 in F major, "Pastoral".
- HAYDN: Symphony No. 6 in G major, "Surprise".
- PROKOFIEFF: Classical Symphony.
- "The Love for Three Oranges"—March.
- RAVEL: Bolero.
- "Daphnis et Chloé", Suite No. 2.
- SATIE-DEBUSSY: Gymnopédie, No. 1.
- STRAUSS: Fruhlingsstimmen—Walzer (Voices of Spring).
- Wiener Blut—Walzer (Vienna Blood).
- STRAVINSKY: Apollon Musagète—Ballet (2 movements). (Apollo, Leader of the Muses)
- "Petrouchka" Suite.
- TCHAIKOVSKY: Symphony No. 6 in B minor, "Pathetic".

Conce

For Cambridge

THE progrphony Or-ater, Cam-ticipated the v in the inclusi Grosso No. 12 rest followed tl-with Nabokov's sky's Symphon-Nabokov's sy-impression that man of more Whether that la-genius, is, as t him." The que-the foreign pres-kov owes to St-
To one listener-seems futile. I have written as lmoderns not livhe would not hav-jazz not been in-listens closely, or the styles of hal-posers in the w-probably a majolate Romanticists, with equal truth-could not be wha-
these composers.
Nabokov seems itons of a style tensely personal
He is not given to or that lion or me-age, or be they oters, in his style, their place in the ing for himself. Ely which are going in-style are as yet a natural stage i a young compose-certain state of in-yet been passed.
kov lies in the in-ideas and of the ly them, and in the s in which he is fuinto a style of his-as this symphony able, even throug evidences of immata little of this en-splendid performansevitzy and his n-Handel's concer-memories of past exsilen and sonoro-manner nov. plain-

U hospital desires posit Boston.

GENERAL waitress city, country cellent cook-SHEA (Agen-
(sf)6t

GENERAL
ble, an references
222 Washing-1906.

GENERAL
uation.
ington 1694-

GENERAL wealth

MAID. would KEN more

HAIRDRIenced a class beaut-Astor st., 2 (sf)6t.

HIGH SC of chd
for board STA dlm

HOUSEK tleman did with or address (sf)2t.

HOUSEK with a ily; modern script. Bos-

LAUNDR
dry la-PAR kwag

NURSE to la-experience erences.

NURSE place most high (sf)2t.

NURSE
sition nurse. C (sf)3t (3

NURSE
as co-references script. Bos-

SECRET
23 ne and Euro-ence in organizat highest re

SECRET
Address
(sf)5t

SECRET trainficient, employed, w
A-1 refer Boston.

SECRET
young
B. U. tra-
G.D.W.

TYPIST know years' ex-TV

now vigorously energetic; of a conductor's way with these strings and this composer's music. For Dr. Koussevitzky gives to his Handel a reading that includes all breadths, all vigors, but also all beauty of line and all beauty of shade; he polishes tonal quality until it shines with an incomparable brightness, kindles it until it becomes fiery with eloquence, caresses it to soothing gentleness. Such is the Handel concerto of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in its year of jubilee.

But for a thrill give us Chaikovsky's "Fourth." It seems as if with this year's performance of this symphony the conductor had set for himself a new and amazingly high standard with Chaikovsky, with whom he had already excelled. He makes it a thing Russian, of the Russians—but for all the world. Not possibly could this music have been conceived in Western Europe. Of the quasi-Oriental Russia it breathes in measure after measure, period after period. What matters it if Russian "nationalists" (as they called themselves) found in Chaikovsky all to great kinship with the Germans. It is the spirit beneath such external relationships that counts; and where in the world would one find a work more Russian in spirit than this symphony of Chaikovsky. In its gloomy melodies, in its brilliant and bizarre decorative schemes, in its colorful languors, in its wild, unrestrained energies, in its unsurpassable pagantry this symphony is Russian beyond the work of many a "nationalist." And it is in the blood of the conductor to underscore every such quality. If the range of emotion and effect in the symphony is wide, his feeling for it reaches its utmost limit. Performance which as perfectly matches, point for point, the inherent qualities of the work, one will not soon experience from other sources.

A. H. M.

Stravinsky, Handel And Koussevitzky

Jan 20, 1931.
THE audience at Sanders Theater, Cambridge, last evening was applausive beyond its usual wont. Upon the conclusion of Handel's Concerto Grosso, Op. 6, No. 6, in G minor, the festivities began. Recalled to the stage by spirited clapping, Dr. Koussevitzky insisted that Mr. Burgin share individually in the general favor. Stravinsky's Caprice for Piano and Orchestra, which has pleased numerous audiences in Boston and elsewhere, aroused sudden and sustained, not to say surprising, enthusiasm.

Mr. Sanromá thrice returned to the stage, the third time bringing Dr. Koussevitzky, who drew the musicians to their feet before redoubled clapping. Few performances and few novel pieces have been received as favorably by a Cambridge audience. Beethoven, however, was not to be outdone. If the applause for Stravinsky's Caprice saluted the cleverness and boldness of the composer and the understanding brilliance of the pianist, that for the "Eroica" Symphony expressed an affection deep-seated and stirring.

As originally announced, the plan of concert followed that of last Monday evening in Symphony Hall. Two numbers were identical while a third held similar weight. By concert-time, however, Dr. Koussevitzky had substituted Handel's Concerto Grosso for Elgar's Introduction and Allegro, both pieces employing an orchestra of strings. The change made a similar balance in the program and gave an equal opportunity to the strings while the music itself made a readier appeal to the audience, though it is a question whether a less sympathetic performance than that of last evening would have prevailed so easily. This Concerto in G Minor has not the contrasts of other Handelian music; it would with difficulty make its point in a workaday or even capable performance. Dr. Koussevitzky, however, went beyond the capable. He drew out the music's essential nobility. He made it expand in broad periods and secure cadences. Working upon lifeless music pages, he emphasized a quality in the music of this composer which distinguished him from other composers of the time—a quality which every listener feels at all times but which is seldom so well defined as last evening. Handel walks aloof and dignified, but not without humanity and conviction. He is an aristocrat who commands attention and respect. However familiar his scheme of harmony, his musical phrase proceeds on its appointed course, not avoiding, but pushing aside the little sticks and stumbles which would block the commoner.

The story of Stravinsky's Caprice is now familiar. Some like it; some don't. The general audience finds it pleasing. Many discover in it Stravinsky's facetious even satirical, slant. The orchestra is thoroughly familiar with the piece and give it a performance of exceptional polish and virtuosity. Mr. Sanromá, in the spirit of Harlequin himself, plays with scarcely a glance at the keyboard, but with knowing lilt and delicacy. It now serves the orchestra as Liszt serves many a pianist.

which to of Handel, Dr. Koussevitzky, the "Eroica" Symphony a select and present to doubtless listener. Possibly he busied himself at a faster pace the next, but if so he gives aid. Doals the full flavor of once in a closes the engrossing and add pagination with which brought his material. e choirs, or at least al significance, while service in the whole erzo, he makes the c, the free play of ye of instrumental N. M. J.

ny Years t Cambridge Conductor Revive Concert-Piece t Sounds

industry Pipe Line er in its business, eld on its ebenture any, Shell s of 1949 than the atial long-k feature, turity be- twenty-five, elders, who never for- on stock were saying, as the or to Oct. d out of Sanders The- on stock that years ago Reisen- re, but it he piece at a pair of past and ts. Reisenauer—they ell in thatnan pianist, in his day nt or nine his conversation and for the We others listened able, theen agreed among our- as of 1930 never heard it before nts of $4, nance, if, indeed, we ured by al. Of course, the emi- he results knew all about it and were un- tion. He always does is in a in hand happens to should be onths' or a few years' n the in- Weber had "thought n the in- Piece in F minor at ther lead- ry, 1821; had written eported to, following June; had a commit- wife with "the sheets uel oil or d it to her while he ces should dmentary." All this rovement when his "Der Frei- d of the h-making" opera, was r the first time any-looking out of the corners of ironic eyes. Weber flourished in a romantic time, when shouting was in order, both in the morning over a finished piano-piece and in the evening over a produced, and triumphant, opera. Print and a diligent "programist" are our mechanistic substitutes. Before Mr. Borovsky sounded a note, all of us knew the vision that had haunted Weber as he wrote and played—the châtelaine sitting solitary and doleful on her tower, while her lord is gone crusading against the infidel; no tidings, only horrific visions of destruction, death, despair; of a sudden the sound and sight of a returning host. 'Tis he—and the knights, the squires and the jubilant folk, all a-glistening in the sunshine. "What a tumult of love! What endless and indescribable happiness!" Weber's very words. For Jules Benedict happened to be sitting by to put them to paper, like a faithful—and timely—scribe. Weber loved these visions of the Age of Chivalry; out of them made three operas that have somehow lasted into this Age of Steel. With much more than a hint of the original inspiration, the three Overtures still sound across our concert-halls.

1939, at d seem to oughly the, did not "shout out" nted this, other "commentary." producers e custom nowadays. entally, is hear music in a ma- producers n—the cynics say- oline, and usly count the house,

A modicum of listening imagination sufficed to mate program and music. Strauss himself could hardly have made closer jointure. But the visioning Weber sounded cramped with no more than a piano and a subordinate orchestra to give release and strike fire. The piano-part had faded less than five score years and ten might have worn it. In fact, Mr. Borovsky was so adroit and sympathetic with both mind and fingers that it never tinkled thin. His tone gave it body; his virtuosity lent it brilliance. Weber loved rhetoric and Mr. Borovsky tempered it with as little modernistic discretion as was possible to an "intellectual" pianist, playing in April 1931. The Concert-Piece probably asks the "grand style" and that sort of eloquence is hard to come by in present concert-halls. Mr. Borovsky, as his Bach was proving last week in Symphony Hall, takes sensitive thought as he plays. Perhaps for that very reason, the Concert-Piece sounded a little dry; whereas it should glow and shout and run its gamut of emotion and expression, even as did Weber himself.

As it was stretched last evening, the canvas seemed too small for the picture. The châtelaine needed a woodwind choir, unharnessed to a piano, to wail her desolation. The returning Crusaders should have come marching and shimmering down the full orchestra. Piano or no piano, it should have proclaimed the "tumult of love" and the "endless and inde-

happiness" as it does from the es of the three overtures. Weber, now him nowadays, was no minia- He worked best with ample in a spacious frame, with a whole ok to transmute first into his then into his tones. So expand- body could call him a "charlatan," was the reproach he feared for the Piece. His alarms were ground- to this day it keeps musical shape, de, movement. It is alive as piano tuoso stuff. If there was no pro- in print, the listener, with the to jog his imagination, would than half suspect the romantic and flourishes. Weber was fore- to Wagner in the theater. In things as the Concert-Piece he be- anticipated Liszt in the concert- And nowadays it is not he, but whom the sincerity-mongers call arlatan."

the rest Dr. Koussevitzky and the tra repeated the Symphony of (in D major) that has lately re- to the active repertory at Sym- Hall. In Sanders Theater, every every shading, sounded bright ear. Haydn was almost as lumi- as Mozart. Gainer also was the e to Musorgsky's opera, "Kho- hina," later in the concert. The a-walled amphitheater concentrat- atmosphere and suggestion that thin through the long tunnel in the orchestra habitually plays. fortunate, however, are the larger les. When it gathered up the orchestra, Mr. Steinert's "Sym- Legend" sounded constricted and urchly pageant of Rimsky-Korsa- "Russian Easter" pushed for room. H. T. P.

brigian Farewell Jan. 1, 1931 Sanders Theater of Harvard University in Cambridge the Bos- on Symphony Orchestra last g gave the concert which e season's last in the second t "series" in metropolitan Boston, ncert which is also prelude to the air of concerts of the current sea- t Symphony Hall. Those last two ts, however, the program of last g did not anticipate. Rather did back—as is the frequent custom of brigian programs—to works on re- programs. In fact, except for one he program was that of last Mon- evening in Boston—Bach, three ents from the suite in D; Brahms, ony in C minor. The third piece, was Lambert's new and ebullient Grande" in Boston on Monday, was vious practical reasons not on this m but was replaced by the Suite

Mr. Sanromá thrice returned to the stage the third time bringing Dr. Koussevitzky who drew the musicians to their fore redoubled clapping. Few petha contemporary listener. Possibly he ances and few novel pieces have beplays the firsts movement at a faster pace ceived as favorably by a Cambridge than most conductors, but if so he gives ence. Beethoven, however, was not it new vitality, reveals the full flavor of outdone. If the applause for Stravits exuberance; discloses the engrossing Caprice saluted the cleverness and inventiveness and imagination with which ness of the composer and the unde the composer has wrought his material. ing brilliance of the pianist, that He individualizes the choirs, or at least "Eroica" Symphony expressed angives them individual significance, while tion deep-seated and stirring. holding them to their service in the whole

As originally announced, the effect. In the Scherzo, he makes the concert followed that of last question and answer, the free play of evening in Symphony Hall. Two fancy. the interchange of instrumental bers were identical while a thir task equally delightful. N. M. J.

After Many Years And at Cambridge

Pianist and Conductor Revive Weber's "Concert-Piece"

And It Sounds

Trans. — Mrs. S. 1931
THOSE obliging elders, who never forget anything, were saying, as the rest of us fled out of Sanders Theater last evening, that years ago Reisenauer had played the piece at a pair of Symphony Concerts. Reisenauer—they added—was a German pianist, in his day noted equally for his conversation and his music-making. We others listened with polite ears; then agreed among ourselves that we had never heard it before in public performance, if, indeed, we had heard it at all. Of course, the eminent "programmist" knew all about it and printed his information. He always does—unless the piece in hand happens to be of only a few months' or a few years' standing. Yes: Weber had "thought out" his Concert-Piece in F minor at Dresden in February, 1821; had written it at Berlin in the following June; had finished it on the morning of June 18, then rushed to his wife with "the sheets hardly dry"; played it to her while he "shouted out a commentary." All this on the very day when his "Der Freischütz," an "epoch-making" opera, was to be performed for the first time anywhere.

Mr. Borovsky, who played the Concert-Piece in Cambridge, did not "shout out" Weber's or any other "commentary." To do so is not the custom nowadays. We live, work and hear music in a materialistic age when—the cynics say—pianists surreptitiously count the house, looking out of the corners of ironic eyes. Weber flourished in a romantic time, when shouting was in order, both in the morning over a finished piano-piece and in the evening over a produced, and triumphant, opera. Print and a diligent "programmist" are our mechanistic substitutes. Before Mr. Borovsky sounded a note, all of us knew the vision that had haunted Weber as he wrote and played—the châtelaine sitting solitary and doleful on her tower, while her lord is gone crusading against the infidel; no tidings, only horrific visions of destruction, death, despair; of a sudden the sound and sight of a returning host. 'Tis he—and the knights, the squires and the jubilant folk, all a-glistening in the sunshine. "What a tumult of love! What endless and indescribable happiness!" Weber's very words. For Jules Benedict happened to be sitting by to put them to paper, like a faithful—and timely—scribe. Weber loved these visions of the Age of Chivalry; out of them made three operas that have somehow lasted into this Age of Steel. With much more than a hint of the original inspiration, the three Overtures still sound across our concert-halls.

A modicum of listening imagination sufficed to mate program and music. Strauss himself could hardly have made closer jointure. But the visioning Weber sounded cramped with no more than a piano and a subordinate orchestra to give release and strike fire. The piano-part had faded less than five score years and ten might have worn it. In fact, Mr. Borovsky was so adroit and sympathetic with both mind and fingers that it never tinkled thin. His tone gave it body; his virtuosity lent it brilliance. Weber loved rhetoric and Mr. Borovsky tempered it with as little modernistic discretion as was possible to an "intellectual" pianist, playing in April 1931. The Concert-Piece probably asks the "grand style" and that sort of eloquence is hard to come by in present concert-halls. Mr. Borovsky, as his Bach was proving last week in Symphony Hall, takes sensitive thought as he plays. Perhaps for that very reason, the Concert-Piece sounded a little dry; whereas it should glow and shout and run its gamut of emotion and expression, even as did Weber himself.

As it was stretched last evening, the canvas seemed too small for the picture. The châtelaine needed a woodwind choir, unharnessed to a piano, to wail her desolation. The returning Crusaders should have come marching and shimmering down the full orchestra. Piano or no piano, it should have proclaimed the "tumult of love!" and the "endless and inde-

le happiness" as it does from the es of the three overtures. Weber, now him nowadays, was no minia. He worked best with ample in a spacious frame, with a whole ok to transmute first into his then into his tones. So expand- body could call him a "charlatan," was the reproach he feared for the Piece. His alarms were ground- o this day it keeps musical shape, ce, movement. It is alive as piano tuoso stuff. If there was no pro- in print, the listener, with the to jog his imagination, would than half suspect the romantic and flourishes. Weber was fore- to Wagner in the theater. In things as the Concert-Piece he be- y anticipated Liszt in the concert- And nowadays it is not he, but whom the sincerity-mongers call arlatan."

the rest Dr. Koussevitzky and the tra repeated the Symphony of (in D major) that has lately re- to the active repertory at Sym- Hall. In Sanders Theater, every every shading, sounded bright ear. Haydn was almost as lumi- as Mozart. Galner also was the e to Musorgsky's opera, "Kho- china," later in the concert. The a-walled amphitheater concentrat- atmosphere and suggestion that thin through the long tunnel in the orchestra habitually plays. fortunate, however, are the larger ties. When it gathered up the orchestra, Mr. Steinert's "Sym- Legend" sounded constricted and urchly pageant of Rimsky-Korsa- "Russian Easter" pushed for room. H. T. P.

brigian Farewell Trans. May 1931

Sanders Theater of Harvard University in Cambridge the Boston Symphony Orchestra last gave the concert which e season's last in the second t "series" in metropolitan Boston, ncert which is also prelude to the air of concerts of the current sea- Symphony Hall. Those last two ts, however, the program of last g did not anticipate. Rather did back—as is the frequent custom of brigian programs—to works on re- programs. In fact, except for one he program was that of last Mon- evening in Boston—Bach, three ents from the suite in D; Brahms, ony in C minor. The third piece, was Lambert's new and ebullient grande" in Boston on Monday, was vious practical reasons not on this m but was replaced by the Suite

Mr. Sanromá thrice returned to the third time bringing Dr. Koussevitzky who drew the musicians to their fore redoubled clapping. Few petha contemporary listener. Possibly he ances and few novel pieces have bplays the firsts movement at a faster pace ceived as favorably by a Cambridg than most conductors, but if so he gives ence. Beethoven, however, was no it new vitality, reveals the full flavor of outdone. If the applause for Stravits exuberance; discloses the engrossing Caprice saluted the cleverness and inventiveness and imagination with which ness of the composer and the unde the composer has wrought his material. ing brilliance of the pianist, that He individualizes the choirs, or at least "Eroica" Symphony expressed an gives them individual significance, while tion deep-seated and stirring. holding them to their service in the whole effect. In the Scherzo, he makes the question and answer, the free play of fancy, the interchange of instrumental task equally delightful. N. M. J.

As originally announced, the concert followed that of last evening in Symphony Hall. Two bers were identical while a third similar weight. By concert-time ever, Dr. Koussevitzky had subs Handel's Concerto Grosso for Introduction and Allegro, both employing an orchestra of string change made a similar balance program and gave an equal oppo to the strings while the music itself a readier appeal to the audience, it is a question whether a less thetic performance than that evening would have prevailed so. This Concerto in G Minor has contrasts of other Handelian m would with difficulty make its p a workaday or even capable perfor Dr. Koussevitzky, however, went the capable. He drew out the essential nobility. He made it in broad periods and secure ca Working upon lifeless music pa emphasized a quality in the music composer which distinguished him other composers of the time—a which every listener feels at all but which is seldom so well def last evening. Handel walks alo dignified, but not without human conviction. He is an aristocrat wh mands attention and respect. H familiar his scheme of harmon musical phrase proceeds on its ap course, not avoiding, but pushin th little sticks and stumbles which block the commoner.

The story of Stravinsky's Cap now familiar. Some like it; some The general audience finds it p Many discover in it Stravinsky's fa even satirical, slant. The orche thoroughly familiar with the pie give it a performance of exce polish and virtuosity. Mr. Sanro the spirit of Harlequin himself, with scarcely a glance at the ke but with knowing lilt and delic now serves the orchestra as Liszt many a pianist.

After Many Years And at Cambridge

Pianist and Conductor Revive Weber's "Concert-Piece"

And It Sounds

THOSE obliging elders, who never forget anything, were saying, as the rest of us filed out of Sanders Theater last evening, that years ago Reisenauer had played the piece at a pair of Symphony Concerts. Reisenauer—they added—was a German pianist, in his day noted equally for his conversation and his music-making. We others listened with polite ears; then agreed among ourselves that we had never heard it before in public performance, if, indeed, we had heard it at all. Of course, the eminent "programmist" knew all about it and printed his information. He always does—unless the piece in hand happens to be of only a few months' or a few years' standing. Yes: Weber had "thought out" his Concert-Piece in F minor at Dresden in February, 1821; had written it at Berlin in the following June; had finished it on the morning of June 18; then rushed to his wife with "the sheets hardly dry"; played it to her while he "shouted out a commentary." All this on the very day when his "Der Freischütz," an "epoch-making" opera, was to be performed for the first time anywhere.

Mr. Borovsky, who played the Concert-Piece in Cambridge, did not "shout out" Weber's or any other "commentary." To do so is not the custom nowadays. We live, work and hear music in a materialistic age when—the cynics say—pianists surreptitiously count the house, looking out of the o Weber flourished when shouting was morning over a fin in the evening ov triumphant, opera. "programmist" are stitutes. Before a note, all of that had haunted and played—the c tary and doleful on lord is gone crusadi no tidings, only struction, death, de sound and sight o 'Tis he—and the ki the jubilant folk, sunshine. "What What endless and ness!" Weber's v Benedict happened them to paper, lik ly—scribe. Weber the Age of Chiva three operas that into this Age of S than a hint of t the three Overtur concert-halls.

A modicum of sufficed to mate Strauss himself (s closer jointure. Ir sounded cramped. piano and a sie give release ande part had faded le and ten might it Mr. Borovsky v pathetic with bo it never tinkledr body; his virth Weber loved rhl tempered it witk cretion as wag lectual" pianistn The Concert-P "grand style" is is hard to conr halls. Mr. Bor proving last t takes sensitiv Perhaps for t cert-Piece sour should glow ar of emotion ar Weber himsel

As it was canvas seemed, The châtelaie unharnessed lation. The r have come g down the fu piano, it shoi mult of love a large in pany did months $2,544,400 and amo 000 below a year as the corp its entire debenture fund req pany ha quirements resenting year, hav of one ye Phillips times.

Railroad

Average United St during th was 5.48 supplied Commissi ment of t Between

February	3,528
January	3,368
1929—
December	3,369
November	3,431
October	5,313
September	7,077
August	6,492
July	6,153
June	5,796
May	5,482
April	5,580
March	5,713
February—	5,618
January	5,663
1928—
December	5,400
November	5,412
October	4,993
September	4,647
August	4,260
July	4,149
June	4,168
May	4,567

scribable happiness" as it does from the final pages of the three overtures. Weber, as we know him nowadays, was no miniaturist. He worked best with ample means, in a spacious frame, with a whole opera-book to transmute first into his visions, then into his tones. So expanding, nobody could call him a "charlatan," which was the reproach he feared for the Concert-Piece. His alarms were groundless. To this day it keeps musical shape, substance, movement. It is alive as piano and virtuoso stuff. If there was no program in print, the listener, with the operas to jog his imagination, would more than half suspect the romantic moods and flourishes. Weber was forerunner to Wagner in the theater. In such things as the Concert-Piece he believably anticipated Liszt in the concert-hall. And nowadays it is not he, but Liszt, whom the sincerity-mongers call the "charlatan."

For the rest Dr. Koussevitzky and the orchestra repeated the Symphony of Haydn (in D major) that has lately returned to the active repertory at Symphony Hall. In Sanders Theater, every detail, every shading, sounded bright and clear. Haydn was almost as luminous as Mozart. Gainer also was the Prelude to Musorgsky's opera, "Khovantchina," later in the concert. The wooden-walled amphitheater concentrated an atmosphere and suggestion that runs thin through the long tunnel in which the orchestra habitually plays. Not so fortunate, however, are the larger sonorities. When it gathered up the whole orchestra, Mr. Steinert's "Symphonic Legend" sounded constricted and the churchly pageant of Rimsky-Korsakov's "Russian Easter" pushed for room. H. T. P.

Cantabrigian Farewell Jan. 1931

AT Sanders Theater of Harvard University in Cambridge the Boston Symphony Orchestra last evening gave the concert which is the season's last in the second largest "series" in metropolitan Boston, the concert which is also prelude to the last pair of concerts of the current season at Symphony Hall. Those last two concerts, however, the program of last evening did not anticipate. Rather did it go back—as is the frequent custom of Cantabrigian programs—to works on recent programs. In fact, except for one item the program was that of last Monday evening in Boston—Bach, three movements from the suite in D; Brahms, Symphony in C minor. The third piece, which was Lambert's new and ebullient "Rio Grande" in Boston on Monday, was for obvious practical reasons not on this program but was replaced by the Suite from Stravinsky's "Firebird" from the programs of last Friday and Saturday.

But performances at Cambridge sound less like "mere" repetitions than any other repetitions which the orchestra undertakes: the entire audience is as near to the orchestra as the first considerable body of seats in Symphony Hall, causing performance to take on in a certain degree the chamber music style, stimulating the conductor to such a style; the huge wooden sounding-board above and to the rear of the orchestra causes the most subtle nuances to take on a definiteness they rarely assume otherwise, causes climaxes to shine forth; Dr. Koussevitzky, by nature not given to stale repetition, takes advantage of acoustical and architectural differences to remold and remake "interpretations" with which rehearsal and performance have made them thoroughly familiar; the men, familiar by seven years' intensive training under one man (the advantages of which unbroken, cumulative training no other orchestra now enjoys) respond in maximum degree to the least suggestion of Dr. Koussevitzky's flexible conducting.

The net result last evening was that not a single number went without applause in such quantities as to demand calling the players to their feet in response. In Bach's suite it was first violins that made such response. For first violins carry (as the phrase goes) that wondrous melody which has become as a household word in the arrangement for solo violin. First violins also bear the burden of the lilting and stamping measures of the final Gigue. And melody and dance, together with the preceding three-fold overture, proved irresistible to this audience of earnest and serious professors, even more earnest and serious students (nobody can be more serious and earnest than a student once he is headed in that direction) and like-minded residents of the other bank of the Charles.

And from the orchestra under this wooden shell came the dances from the "Firebird" with a vividness, with graphic quality, with a rhythmic verve that made one miss the dancers less than one would believe that concert performance could make it possible to miss them. How agile the movements of the princesses in their play with the golden apples! How barbaric, how clothed with splendors, how wild and untamed the final dance of Katschell's cohorts! And by contrast, how subtle and fluid the dance of the princesses! Just possibly all this was even better than had there been dancers to distract the attention.

ms

uillon

naps

e Finge

Corn

st

Anot

Somer-Malden ause of t week, hester George-teachers from should e games ball and r Acadin his heaving day, bet-ark. The -putter, fair to inger of at Cam-essenden erday at opening for base-

R. H. E.
—3 4 0 —2 4 0
rown and

's First. One bet Dr. Koussevitzky ssing performance.
performance one was out the uniqueness
ing. Last evening here seemed more d of the symphony youthfully perhaps?
the breadths were d, and the song of ver rang more true of the Allegretto harm. And never olins, near the mid-nent gathered more st evening. Thus urpassing perform-at of last Monday.
r? Who can say?
Cantabrigians, not lay's performance, pr choice, showered upon conductor and in their enthusiasm sing forces on the or to a beloved con-
a not to be heard
A. H. M.

RT NOTES

of the Boston Sym-
Dr. Koussevitzky, con-Theatre, Cambridge,

night at 8 o'clock.
comprise Bach's suite
3, D major; Stravin-
The Fire-Bird," and y No. 1, C minor.

has arranged the
for the last concerts

Boston Symphony

hony hall tomorrow

rday night: Wagner,

tersingers of Nuremlude to "The After-

Strauss, "Till Eulen-anks"; Beethoven,

3 minor. All these long been accepted

of new works in

It should be re-

n Debussy's Prelude

it was thought by vague ramblings of ic in Boston, hear-

gel" for the first

s in his review of uss must be insane.

to "The Master-

rformed at Leipsic.

ritic in that city

ic, "a tohuwabohu

Wagner, Chaikovsky And New Stravinsky

As a Pension Fund Concert With Sanroma for Soloist Sets Them Forth

—Dec. 29, 1930

JUST as certain artists have their own particular publics, so the Pension Fund concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra have their own programs. On them the works of Wagner and of Chaikovsky have always been prominent. They have, upon occasion, consisted entirely of the works of the one chosen composer. Yesterday both were represented on a single program. One of Wagner's masterpieces, the prelude to "Lohengrin" stood upon the list; another of that master's works, too much slighted probably because it comes from an "early" opera, the overture to "The Flying Dutchman," had preceded it. Chaikovsky brought the fourth symphony, in F minor. And as if for good measure, Igor Stravinsky was there with a work that might well have been designed for popular consumption, the Capriccio for Piano and Orchestra, as yet unheard in the United States outside of Boston. The latter meant that there was a soloist, too, Jesus Maria Sanroma. More widely ranging a program that keeps within the limits of the works desired on a Sunday afternoon, could hardly have been. And an audience, almost but not quite filling Symphony Hall, loosed applause that shook the rafters. If something is needed to hit this audience "squarely between the eyes," the fervors of Chaikovsky, Koussevitzky-heightened, amply provided it.

All of this must by no means be taken to signify that the program, or even Chaikovsky, brought nothing beside fervid eloquence. Subtleties, moments of sheer, unalloyed beauty there were also, passages steeped in delineative suggestion. In the prelude to "Lohengrin" words can scarcely describe the super-earthly ascent, the superb burst of tone when the heights have been reached, the equally wondrous return from the heights. But that, much as it is, is not all. That sonorities, tonal coloring—the shimmer of high strings, the warmth of brass—should match and give reality to the poetic idea, as perfectly as Wagner here provides, is matter for marvel. The poetic idea itself is of no less beauty in its own right—the idea of the mystic Grail approaching the company of spotless knights, being uncovered before

Though such impressions have written a thousand times, they re-pertinent. Yet wait—they came to rough one's ears, not through study printed upon music paper; which is that there must have been an mentality for bringing them to ears, to parallel and make real and Wagner's thought. It is, of course, easy to say that Dr. Koussevitzky his men were the instrumentality. In the glib saying of it, it is all too to forget that to rouse these im- tions it was necessary for them to ate Wagner's music after him. And re-creation, as witnessed again on ay, is not the least of marvels. . . . Various elements of the "Flying man" overture Dr. Koussevitzky rday held securely within their e. Perhaps the dominant impression all was as music of the sea with urning and roaring, with its far-suggestion.

dominant impression of Stravin- "Capriccio" was of a piece designed successfully—solely to give pleas- ure not chiefly to the erudite, nor y to those who follow closely the al stars in their courses, but pleas- ay, to a multitude dropping in at hony Hall on a Sunday afternoon ar beautiful sounds and exciting ms. The scalpel and forceps of the st finds not too much in this score. edly no man has ever created more f less material, unless perchance an be Stravinsky himself; for with nsky material has always been next thing, the totality of his creation thing. Themes, invented or bor- where are they in this Capriccio? es" A few scraps of them perhaps, and there. But the totality? Watch ces, the eyes of man after man, realization comes that with this ical piece of fancy, this play of tive passages and jazzy rhythms, nsky has again performed an act ation the validity of which is hard estion.—And once more, coming to mers, there is Mr. Samromá persua- nd able with the difficulties of the part, Dr. Koussevitzky illuminat- th the orchestral score; both fusing elding their separate parts into a unimpeachable in the singleness of pose.

Chaikovsky's "Fourth." Master- perhaps too much overshadowed by er brothers, the "Fifth" and the "Sixth." With it Dr. Koussevitzky pro- with it he whips up frenzies, with ings gently, with it he makes magic icks of tonal color, sets waltz peri- going, with rarest of delicacies piquant rhythms from strings similar rhythms from brass.

A. H. M.

from Stravinsky's "Firebird" fr And again Brahms's First. One be-programs of last Friday and S lieved on Monday that Dr. Koussevitzky
 But performances at Cambridge had reached a surpassing performance.
 less like "mere" repetitions th After last evening's performance one was other repetitions which the orche not quite so certain about the uniqueness der takes: the entire audience is of that Monday reading. Last evening to the orchestra as the first cons rhythms here and there seemed more body of seats in Symphony Hall, energetic, the life-blood of the symphony performance to take on in a cer pulsed a little more—youthfully perhaps?
 gree the chamber music style, stin But the grandeur and the breadths were the conductor to such a style; tin no wise diminished, and the song of wooden sounding-board above and the slow movement never rang more true rear of the orchestra causes th nor the quiet melody of the Allegretto subtle nuances to take on a defi with more simple charm. And never they rarely assume otherwise, have the high first violins, near the mid-climaxes to shine forth; Dr. Koussle of the slow movement gathered more by nature not given to stale re intense heat than last evening. Thus takes advantage of acoustical an one finds another surpassing perform-tectural differences to remold and ance to lay beside that of last Monday.
 "interpretations" with which r Which was the finer? Who can say?
 and performance have made the But why choose? The Cantabrigians, not
 oughly familiar; the men, fam having heard Monday's performance, seven years' intensive training ur knew no necessity for choice, showered man (the advantages of which ur thunders of approval upon conductor and cumulative training no other o men; at the last rose in their enthusiasm now enjoys) respond in maximum together with the rising forces on the
 to the least suggestion of Dr. stage, to do final honor to a beloved convitzky's flexible conducting. ductor and orchestra not to be heard again for a six-month. A. H. M.

The net result last evening w
 not a single number went without plause in such quantities as to dem calling the players to their feet in sponse. In Bach's suite it was violins that made such response.
 first violins carry (as the phrase
 that wondrous melody which has bec
 as a household word in the arrange for solo violin. First violins also the burden of the lilting and stam measures of the final Gigue. And me
 and dance, together with the prece
 three-fold overture, proved irresistib
 this audience of earnest and serious
 fessors, even more earnest and ser
 students (nobody can be more serious earnest than a student once he is he
 in that direction) and like-minded
 dents of the other bank of the Char

And from the orchestra under wooden shell came the dances from
 "Firebird" with a vividness, with gra quality, with a rhythmic verve that n one miss the dancers less than one w
 believe that concert performance c make it possibl to miss them. How the movements of the princesses in play with the golden apples! How baric, how clothed with splendors,
 wild and untamed the final dance
 Katsche's cohorts! And by conti how subtle and fluid the dance of princesses! Just possibly all this even better than had there been dan
 to distract the attention.

CONCERT NOTES

The last concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra, Dr. Koussevitzky, conductor, at Sanders Theatre, Cambridge,
 will take place tonight at 8 o'clock.
 The program will comprise Bach's suite
 for orchestra, No. 3, D major; Stravinsky's suite from "The Fire-Bird," and Brahms's Symphony No. 1, C minor.

Dr. Koussevitzky has arranged the following program for the last concerts
 this season of the Boston Symphony orchestra in Symphony hall tomorrow
 afternoon and Saturday night: Wagner,
 Prelude to "the Mastersingers of Nuremberg"; Debussy, Prelude to "The Afternoon of a Faun"; Strauss, "Till Eulen-
 spiegel's Merry Pranks"; Beethoven, Symphony No. 5, C minor. All these compositions have long been accepted
 by those suspicious of new works in an unfamiliar idiom. It should be remembered that when Debussy's Prelude was first heard here it was thought by many to be only the vague ramblings of a poseur; that a critic in Boston, hearing "Till Eulenspiegel" for the first time told his readers in his review of the concert that Strauss must be insane.
 When the Prelude to "The Master-
 singers" was first performed at Leipsic,
 the leading music critic in that city
 described it as chaotic, "a tohuwabohu
 and nothing more."

Wagner, Chaikovsky And New Stravinsky

As a Pension Fund Concert With Sanroma for Soloist Sets Them Forth

Dec. 29, 1930
 JUST as certain artists have their own particular publics, so the Pension Fund concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra have their own programs. On them the works of Wagner and of Chaikovsky have always been prominent. They have, upon occasion, consisted entirely of the works of the one chosen composer. Yesterday both were represented on a single program.
 One of Wagner's masterpieces, the prelude to "Lohengrin" stood upon the list; another of that master's works, too much slighted probably because it comes from an "early" opera, the overture to "The Flying Dutchman," had preceded
 it. Chaikovsky brought the fourth symphony, in F minor. And as if for good measure, Igor Stravinsky was there with a work that might well have been designed for popular consumption, the Capriccio for Piano and Orchestra, as yet unheard in the United States outside of Boston. The latter meant that there was a soloist, too. Jesus Maria Sanromá.
 More widely ranging a program that keeps within the limits of the works desired on a Sunday afternoon, could hardly have been. And an audience, almost but not quite filling Symphony Hall, loosed applause that shook the rafters.
 If something is needed to hit this audience "squarely between the eyes," the fervors of Chaikovsky, Koussevitzkyheightened, amply provided it.

All of this must by no means be taken to signify that the program, or even Chaikovsky, brought nothing beside fervid eloquence. Subtleties, moments of sheer, unalloyed beauty there were also, passages steeped in delineative suggestion. In the prelude to "Lohengrin" words can scarcely describe the super-earthly ascent, the superb burst of tone when the heights have been reached, the equally wondrous return from the heights. But that, much as it is, is not all. That sonorities, tonal coloring—the shimmer of high strings, the warmth of brass—should match and give reality to the poetic idea, as perfectly as Wagner here provides, is matter for marvel. The poetic idea itself is of no less beauty in its own right—the idea of the mystic Grail approaching the company of spotless knights, being uncovered before Though such impressions have written a thousand times, they re-pertinent. Yet wait—they came to rough one's ears, not through study printed upon music paper; which that there must have been an mentality for bringing them to ears, to parallel and make real and le. Wagner's thought. It is, of se, easy to say that Dr. Koussevitzky his men were the instrumentality.
 in the glib saying of it, it is all too to forget that to rouse these im-ons it was necessary for them to ate Wagner's music after him. And re-creation, as witnessed again on ay, is not the least of marvels. . . .
 various elements of the "Flying man" overture Dr. Koussevitzky rday held securely within their
 a. Perhaps the dominant impression all was as music of the sea with urning and roaring, with its far-suggestion.
 dominant impr ssion of Stravin-"Capriccio" was of a piece designed successfully—solely to give pleasure not chiefly to the erudite, nor y to those who follow closely the al stars in their courses, but pleas-ay, to a multitude dropping in at hony Hall on a Sunday afternoon ar beautiful sounds and exciting
 ms. The scalpel and forceps of the st finds not too much in this score;
 adly no man has ever created more f less material, unless perchance an be Stravinsky himself; for with nsky material has always been next thing, the totality of his creation thing. Themes, invented or bor-where are they in this Capriccio?
 es" A few scraps of them perhaps,
 and there. But the totality? Watch ces, the eyes of man after man, realization comes that with this ical piece of fancy, this play of tive passages and jazzy rhythms, nzky has again performed an act ation the validity of which is hard stion.—And once more, coming to mers, there is Mr. Samromá persua-nd able with the difficulties of the part, Dr. Koussevitzky illuminatth the orchestral score; both fusing elding their separate parts into a unimpeachable in the singleness of pose.
 Chaikovsky's "Fourth." . . .
 perhaps too much overshadowed by er brothers, the "Fifth" and the
 "With it Dr. Koussevitzky pro-with it he whips up frenzies, with ings gently, with it he makes magic leks of tonal color, sets waltz perigoing, with rarest of delicacies piquant rhythms from strings similar rhythms from brass.
 A. H. M.

from Stravinsky's "Firebird" fr And again Brahms's First. One be-programs of last Friday and Silleved on Monday that Dr. Koussevitzky
 But performances at Cambridge had reached a surpassing performance.
 less like "mere" repetitions the After last evening's performance one was other repetitions which the orchelnot quite so certain about the uniqueness dertakes: the entire audience is of that Monday reading. Last evening to the orchestra as the first consrhythms here and there seemed more
 body of seats in Symphony Hall, energetic, the life-blood of the symphony performance to take on in a cerpulsed a little more—youthfully perhaps?
 gree the chamber music style, stinBut the grandeur and the breadths were
 the conductor to such a style; tin no wise diminished, and the song of wooden sounding-board above anthe slow movement never rang more true
 rear of the orchestra causes thnor the quiet melody of the Allegretto subtle nuances to take on a defiwith more simple charm. And never they rarely assume otherwise, have the high first violins, near the mid-climaxes to shine forth; Dr. Koussdle of the slow movement gathered more by nature not given to stale re intense heat than last evening. Thus takes advantage of acoustical an one finds another surpassing perform-tectural differences to remold and ance to lay beside that of last Monday.
 "interpretations" with which rWhich was the finer? Who can say?
 and performance have made the But why choose? The Cantabrigians, not
 oughly familiar; the men, fam having heard Monday's performance, seven years' intensive training unknew no necessity for choice, showered man (the advantages of which ur thunders of approval upon conductor and cumulative training no other omen; at the last rose in their enthuslasm now enjoys) respond in maximum together with the rising forces on the
 to the least suggestion of Dr. stage, to do final honor to a beloved con-
 vitzky's flexible conducting. ductor and orchestra not to be heard again for a six-month. A. H. M.

The net result last evening w
 not a single number went without
 plause in such quantities as to dem
 calling the players to their feet in sponse. In Bach's suite it was violins that made such response.
 first violins carry (as the phrase
 that wondrous melody which has bec
 as a household word in the arrange for solo violin. First violins also
 the burden of the lilting and stam
 measures of the final Gigue. And me
 and dance, together with the prece
 three-fold overture, proved irresistibl
 this audience of earnest and serious
 fessors, even more earnest and ser
 students (nobody can be more serious
 earnest than a student once he is he
 in that direction) and like-minded
 dents of the other bank of the Char
 And from the orchestra under wooden shell came the dances from
 "Firebird" with a vividness, with gra
 quality, with a rhythmic verve that n
 one miss the dancers less than one w
 believe that concert performance c make it possible to miss them. How the movements of the princesses in play with the golden apples! How
 baric, how clothed with splendors,
 wild and untamed the final dance
 Katschel's cohorts! And by conti
 how subtle and fluid the dance of princesses! Just possibly all this even better than had there been dan
 to distract the attention.

CONCERT NOTES

The last concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra, Dr. Koussevitzky, conductor, at Sanders Theatre, Cambridge,
 will take place tonight at 8 o'clock.
 The program will comprise Bach's suite
 for orchestra, No. 3, D major; Stravin-
 sky's suite from "The Fire-Bird," and Brahms's Symphony No. 1, C minor.
 Dr. Koussevitzky has arranged the following program for the last concerts
 this season of the Boston Symphony
 orchestra in Symphony hall tomorrow
 afternoon and Saturday night: Wagner,
 Prelude to "the Mastersingers of Nurem-
 berg"; Debussy, Prelude to "The Afternoon of a Faun"; Strauss, "Till Eulen-
 spiegels Merry Pranks"; Beethoven, Symphony No. 5, C minor. All these compositions have long been accepted
 by those suspicious of new works in an unfamiliar idiom. It should be remembered that when Debussy's Prelude
 was first heard here it was thought by
 many to be only the vague ramblings of
 a poseur; that a critic in Boston, hearing "Till Eulenspiegel" for the first time told his readers in his review of
 the concert that Strauss must be insane.
 When the Prelude to "The Master-
 singers" was first performed at Leipsic,
 the leading music critic in that city
 described it as chaotic, "a tohuwabohu
 and nothing more."

Wagner, And Ne

As a Pensio
With Sanr
Sets T

JUST as certain particular pi Fund concert phony Orchestra grams. On them and of Chaikovs prominent. They consisted entirely one chosen comp
were represented.
One of Wagner
prelude to "Lohel list; another of th much slighted pro from an "early"

"The Flying Dut
it. Chaikovsky br phony, in F minor measure, Igor Stra
a work that migh signed for popul Capriccio for Pianc unheard in the Ur Boston. The latter a soloist, too, and More widely rang keeps within the li sired on a Sunday
ly have been. An but not quite fill loosed, applause th
If something is ne ence "squarely be fervors of Chaik heightened, amply

All of this must to signify that at Chaikovsky, broug vid eloquence. Su sheer, unalloyed be passages steeped i tion. In the pre words can scarcely earthly ascent, the when the heights h equally wondrous heights. But that,
all. That sonorities shimmer of high st brass—should matc
the poetic idea, as here provides, is ma poetic idea itself i in its own right—th Grail approaching t less knights, bein

Armenian R Estimate Factory: 41

(h)SMtc
RUGS. Rug
all kinds can Oriental for cash. W
GEORGE
Worcester.

WE House
N. M. HA
163 Colum
(h)MWSO

Slip Good refer age approx 0434.

AND Party
monwealth

FOR S MACHINE
Half price
(h)6t:

SI
Also furn
SPOT CAS
Cambridge

WE AL
ANTH RIER & I WEINER'S
Boston. H

SD

F
FOR FOR Brand ards, s very lo
Daily

them. Though such impressions have been written a thousand times; they remain pertinent. Yet wait—they came to one through one's ears, not through study of note printed upon music paper; which means that there must have been an instrumentality for bringing them to one's ears, to parallel and make real and audible Wagner's thought. It is, of course, easy to say that Dr. Koussevitzky and his men were the instrumentality.
 But in the glib saying of it, it is all too easy to forget that to rouse these impressions it was necessary for them to re-create Wagner's music after him. And this re-creation, as witnessed again on Sunday, is not the least of marvels. . . .
 The various elements of the "Flying Dutchman" overture Dr. Koussevitzky yesterday held securely within their frame. Perhaps the dominant impression of it all was as music of the sea with its surging and roaring, with its far-flung suggestion.

The dominant impression of Stravinsky's "Capriccio" was of a piece designed —and successfully—solely to give pleasure; pleasure not chiefly to the erudite, nor merely to those who follow closely the musical stars in their courses, but pleasure, say, to a multitude dropping in at Symphony Hall on a Sunday afternoon to hear beautiful sounds and exciting rhythms. The scalpel and forceps of the analyst finds not too much in this score;
 assuredly no man has ever created more out of less material, unless perchance that man be Stravinsky himself; for with Stravinsky material has always been next to nothing, the totality of his creation everything. Themes, invented or borrowed, where are they in this Capriccio?
 "Motives" A few scraps of them perhaps,
 here and there. But the totality? Watch the faces, the eyes of man after man, and realization comes that with this whimsical piece of fancy, this play of decorative passages and jazzy rhythms, Stravinsky has again performed an act of creation the validity of which is hard to question.—And once more, coming to performers, there is Mr. Samromá persuasive and able with the difficulties of the piano part, Dr. Koussevitzky illuminating with the orchestral score; both fusing and welding their separate parts into a unity unimpeachable in the singleness of its purpose.

Then Chaikovsky's "Fourth." Masterpiece perhaps too much overshadowed by its later brothers, the "Fifth" and the "Sixth." With it Dr. Koussevitzky proclaims, with it he whips up frenzies, with it he sings gently, with it he makes magic with flicks of tonal color, sets waltz periods a-going, with rarest of delicacies throws piquant rhythms from strings against similar rhythms from brass.
 A. H. M.

PENSION FUND CONCERT

The program of the concert given yesterday afternoon by the Boston Symphony orchestra in aid of its pension fund was as follows: Wagner, overture to "The Flying Dutchman," prelude to "Lohengrin"; Stravinsky, Capriccio for piano and orchestra; Tchaikovsky, symphony No. 4, in F minor, op. 36. The solo part of Stravinsky's Capriccio was played by Jesus Maria Sanroma. Dr. Koussevitzky conducted.

An unusual feature of this, the 62d pension fund concert, was the inclusion of a recent "novelty," introduced to regular subscribers no more than eight or nine days earlier. Pension fund concerts have tended to tread the safe ground of all-Wagner, all-Tchaikovsky programs and the like, and while such a program as yesterday's may not fill the hall quite so effectively, yet much good is done by letting a significant new composition be heard outside the closed circle of subscribers to the various series of Boston symphony concerts. It was evident that Stravinsky's new Capriccio, played as it was with consummate skill and admirable spirit by both orchestra and soloist, aroused both interest and enjoyment. It merits its title more than do most similarly-named works; it is capricious in its abrupt and vehement changes of mood, in its prevailing gaiety and the contrasted and unexpected melancholy of its rhapsodic andante, in its excitingly irregular rhythms, its lively and impudent melodies. There is apparent caprice even in the strange contradictions of style that emerge from this music—the characteristic harmonic asperities alternate with euphonious banalities, reminiscences of minor 19th century music, snatches of Viennese elegance, conventional harmonic progressions slightly soured, in which the intention of parody may be guessed. The rhythmic and melodic idioms of jazz—in its lighter, happier mood—are strongly present, but only as one of the many disparate ingredients that go to make up their amusing work. Mr. Sanroma's delightfully neat and alert performance of this difficult music earned him much applause and caused him to be recalled several times to the platform. Dr. Koussevitzky received equal commendation for his and the orchestra's remarkably effective share in the performance.

The concert had opened with a finely dramatic, beautifully suave performance of the "Flying Dutchman" overture, with its foreshadowing of the later Wagner of the "Ring of the Nibelungen" and its reminiscences of the symmetrical cantilena of Weber. The "Lohengrin" prelude, with the unearthly beauty of its high-pitched floating chords, had followed.

public commerce, organization requested workers months describe y, has the exams to a chief committee isity of its playing and ident of mechanical and prolonged ap-conductor and orchestra. S. S.

TUESDAY, 30, 1931. PENSION FUND CONCERT

piece, the B minor on Wednesday last Symphony Orchestra Festival, was repeated close in aid of the fund. The performance divided into two portions length, the Kyrie sung in the afternoon, Credo, Sanctus, and evening. The inter-wo hours and a half; the voices of those e attention of those red a performance of ellence and an aud-joying it.

is, of course, again Harvard Glee Club ffe Choral Society ely by Dr. Davison Woodworth); the so-Evans, soprano, Mar-contralto, Richard Fraser Gange, bass, s incidental to the by Burgin, concert-horn; M. M. Speyer oe d'amore; Albert ssevitzky's vivid and the performance, by ers alike, was one of llance. From the ice of the opening he exhilarating jub-cesurrexit," the soar-the "Sanctus," and ower of the final ona Nobis Pacem." Harvard and Rad-of the most stirring ent, alive, agile and They could achieve ess, too, in the "Qui ncarnatus," in the e adagio section of

The soloists also sang excellently though theirs is a relatively small share in the mass. Mme. Matzenauer's expressive and technically admirable singing of her airs, especially the "Agnus Dei," again commanded admiration. Miss Evans's voice, though used with unequal skill, had at its best a very pleasing brightness. Mr. Crooks again used his fine voice with notable intelligence and beauty of tone, particularly in the "Benedictus," while Mr. Gange once more did excellent work in his two airs.

The sensitive work of those members of the orchestra who played the obbligati for violin, flute, horn and oboe d'amore added notably to the beauty of the airs in which they were employed.

The close of the concert the audience that packed the hall expressed its delight in this great music and in the outstanding brilliance of its performance with an enthusiasm more tempestuous than any other demonstration of the kind within recent memory. Dr. Koussevitzky and the soloists, together with Dr. Davison and Mr. Woodworth, who had so excellently prepared the choruses, were recalled again and again to receive thunderous applause. Dr. Koussevitzky, to whose devotion and enthusiasm the success of the festival just ended was so largely due, was presented with a large wreath by representatives of the Harvard and Radcliffe choruses, amid a storm of congratulatory noises to which the great throng of singers and players upon the platform added their quota. S. S.

Boston to New York

In the first concert, last Thursday evening, of their final visit, for the season to New York, Dr. Koussevitzky and the Boston Orchestra played Bach's second Brandenburg Concerto for violin, flute, oboe, trumpet and strings; his concerto in D minor for piano and orchestra—pianist; Mr. Borovsky; Brahms's symphony in C minor. In the opinion of The Times, such a program "would have been considered formidable a few years ago; but now enthusiasm was rising, reaching climax after the performance of the Symphony. Nearly all the reviewers had a word to say about the recent Festival in Symphony Hall whence two Concertos came. They approved only the performance of both "with virtuosity placed wholly at the service of musical expression." As already noted in these columns, Mr. Mager's high trumpet and trumpeting in the Brandenburg concerto were better liked than in Boston, while there was no lack of good things for Mr. Borovsky as pianist. Acting The Sun, "he thoroughly impressed himself in the spirit and the of the music." In the ears of the Herald Tribune, "he gave a convincing, highly skilful performance, in outline and detail, fluent and proportioned." To The Evening Post he played less as soloist than as member with the orchestra.

In the Symphony of Brahms there were differences of opinion. The Times, for example, was distressed by some of Koussevitzky's tempi and at some length showed him the error (as it believed) of his ways. Other reviewers raised no objection; while The Tribune Herald took a middle course, saying: "Much of Brahms's Symphony was played with memorable eloquence, especially the first two movements, which received an interpretation of praiseworthy breadth and depth and poetic insight. The strings sang with an unusually full, mellow and expressive tone. The first proclamation by the horns of the melody in the introduction to the finale also offered moments of unusual imaginative potency, but in the main part of the movement Dr. Koussevitzky's tempi differed sometimes from Brahms's tempi differed somewhat from those customarily adopted and not always with happy results. The acceleration of the broad main theme diminished, for us, its dignity and impressiveness; but the unusually deliberate tempo for the chorale-like passage at the close proved effective. Then the presto was resumed at a whirlwind pace, and the audience responded with warmly expressed enthusiasm and several recalls for the conductor."

PENSION FUND CONCERT

The program of the concert yesterday afternoon by the Boston Symphony orchestra in aid of its pension fund was as follows: Wagner, overture to "The Flying Dutchman," prelude to "Lohengrin"; Stravinsky, Capriccio piano and orchestra; Tchaikovsky, symphony No. 4, in F minor, op. 36. The solo part of Stravinsky's Capriccio played by Jesus Maria Sanroma. Koussevitzky conducted.

An unusual feature of this, the pension fund concert, was the inclusion of a recent "novelty," introduced by regular subscribers no more than eleven or nine days earlier. Pension fund concerts have tended to tread the safe ground of all-Wagner, all-Tchaikovsky programs and the like, and while such a program as yesterday's may not be the hall quite so effectively, yet much good is done by letting a significant new composition be heard outside the closed circle of subscribers to the various series of Boston symphony concerts. It was evident that Stravinsky's new Capriccio, played as it was with consummate skill and admirable spirit by both orchestra and soloist, aroused both interest and enjoyment. It merited its title more than do most similarly named works; it is capricious in its abrupt and vehement changes of mood, its prevailing gaiety and the contrast and unexpected melancholy of its rhapsodic andante, in its excitingly regular rhythms, its lively and independent melodies. There is apparent capriciousness even in the strange contradictions of style that emerge from this music: the characteristic harmonic asperities alternate with euphonious banalities, reminiscences of minor 19th century music, snatches of Viennese elegant conventional harmonic progression slightly soured, in which the intention of parody may be guessed. The rhythmic and melodic idioms of jazz—in lighter, happier mood—are strong in the present, but only as one of the many disparate ingredients that go to make up their amusing work. Mr. Sanroma's delightfully neat and alert performance of this difficult music earned him much applause and caused him to be recalled several times to the platform. Dr. Koussevitzky received equal commendation for his and the orchestra's remarkably effective share in the performance. The concert had opened with a finely dramatic, beautifully suave performance of the "Flying Dutchman" overture, with its foreshadowing of the late Wagner of the "Ring of the Nibelungen" and its reminiscences of the symmetrical cantilena of Weber. The "Lohengrin" prelude, with the unearthly beauty of its high-pitched floating chords, had followed.

Tchaikovsky's fourth symphony, which concluded the concert, was performed with a dramatic force and conviction, with an expressive beauty, with an unflinching appropriateness of tempo and style, that could hardly be surpassed. It was a performance which minimized the weaknesses of the work and lent dignity and vitality to its inflated tragedy. The melancholy charm of the andante, the delicious lightness and grace of the scherzo were memorable. The orchestra surpassed itself by the beauty and virtuosity of its playing and achieved in the last movement a climax of overwhelming brilliance and power. Vigorous and prolonged applause rewarded conductor and orchestra alike.

PENSION FUND CONCERT

Bach's masterpiece, the B minor Mass, with which on Wednesday last the Boston Symphony Orchestra opened its Bach Festival, was repeated yesterday at its close in aid of the orchestra's pension fund. The performance was again divided into two portions of convenient length, the Kyrie and Gloria being sung in the afternoon, and the Credo, Sanctus, and Agnus Dei in the evening. The intermission of some two hours and a half avoided overtaxing the voices of those who sing and the attention of those who listen; it insured a performance of more sustained excellence and an audience capable of enjoying it.

The chorus was, of course, again composed of the Harvard Glee Club and the Radcliffe Choral Society (trained respectively by Dr. Davison and Mr. Wallace Woodworth); the soloists were Amy Evans, soprano, Margaret Matzenauer, contralto, Richard Crooks, tenor, and Fraser Gange, bass. Instrumental solos incidental to the score were played by Burgin, concertmaster; Boetcher, horn; M. M. Speyer and Devergie, oboe d'amore; Albert Snow was organist.

Under Dr. Koussevitzky's vivid and inspired direction the performance, by orchestra and singers alike, was one of overwhelming brilliance. From the sombre magnificence of the opening Kyrie Eleison to the exhilarating jubilation of the "Et Resurrexit," the soaring exaltation of the "Sanctus," and the impressive power of the final "Osanna" and "Dona Nobis Pacem," the singing of the Harvard and Radcliffe choruses was of the most stirring quality—fresh, ardent, alive, agile and full of movement. They could achieve a deep expressiveness, too, in the "Qui Tollis," in "Et Incarnatus," in the "Crucifixus," in the adagio section of the "Confiteor."

The soloists also sang excellently though theirs is a relatively small share in the mass. Mme. Matzenauer's expressive and technically admirable singing of her airs, especially the "Agnus Dei," again commanded admiration. Miss Evans's voice, though used with unequal skill, had at its best a very pleasing brightness. Mr. Crooks again used his fine voice with notable intelligence and beauty of tone, particularly in the "Benedictus," while Mr. Gange once more did excellent work in his two airs.

The sensitive work of those members of the orchestra who played the obbligati for violin, flute, horn and oboe d'amore added notably to the beauty of the airs in which they were employed.

The close of the concert the audience that packed the hall expressed its delight in this great music and in the outstanding brilliance of its performance with an enthusiasm more tempestuous than any other demonstration of the kind within recent memory. Dr. Koussevitzky and the soloists, together with Dr. Davison and Mr. Woodworth, who had so excellently prepared the choruses, were recalled again and again to receive thunderous applause. Dr. Koussevitzky, to whose devotion and enthusiasm the success of the festival just ended was so largely due, was presented with a large wreath by representatives of the Harvard and Radcliffe choruses, amid a storm of congratulatory noises to which the great throng of singers and players upon the platform added their quota.

From Boston to New York

In the first concert, last Thursday evening, of their final visit, for the season to New York, Dr. Koussevitzky and the Boston Orchestra played Bach's second Brandenburg Concerto for violin, flute, oboe, trumpet and strings; his concerto in D minor for piano and orchestra—piano: Mr. Borovsky; Brahms's symphony in C minor. In the opinion of The Times, such a program "would have been considered formidable a few years ago; but now enthusiasm was rife, and the climax after the performance of the Symphony. Nearly all the reviewers had a word to say about the recent Festival in Symphony Hall whence two Concertos came. They approved the performance of both 'with virtuosity placed wholly at the service of musical expression.' As already noted in these columns, Mr. Mager's high trumpet and trumpeting in the Brandenburg concerto were better liked than in Boston, while there was no lack of good things for Mr. Borovsky as pianist. According to The Sun, 'he thoroughly impressed himself in the spirit and the of the music.' In the ears of the Herald Tribune, 'he gave a convincing, highly skillful performance, in outline and detail, fluent and proportioned.' To The Evening Post, 'he played less as soloist than as member of the orchestra.'

In the Symphony of Brahms there were differences of opinion. The Times, for example, was distressed by some of Koussevitzky's tempi and at some length showed him the error (as it believed) of his ways. Other reviewers raised no objection; while The Tribune Herald took a middle course, saying: 'Much of Brahms's Symphony was played with memorable eloquence, especially the first two movements, which received an interpretation of praiseworthy breadth and depth and poetic insight. The strings sang with an unusually full, mellow and expressive tone. The first proclamation by the horns of the melody in the introduction to the finale also offered moments of unusual imaginative potency, but in the main part of the movement Dr. Koussevitzky's tempi differed sometimes from those customarily adopted and not always with happy results. The acceleration of the broad main theme diminished, for us, its dignity and impressiveness; but the unusually deliberate tempo for the chorale-like passage at the close proved effective. Then the presto was resumed at a whirlwind pace, and the audience responded with warmly expressed enthusiasm and several recalls for the conductor.'

PENSION FUND CONCERT

The program of the concert yesterday afternoon by the Boston Symphony orchestra in aid of its pension fund was as follows: Wagner, overture to "The Flying Dutchman," prelude to "Lohengrin"; Stravinsky, Capriccio piano and orchestra; Tchaikovsky, symphony No. 4, in F minor, op. 36; solo part of Stravinsky's Capriccio played by Jesus Maria Sanroma. Koussevitzky conducted.

An unusual feature of this, the pension fund concert, was the inclusion of a recent "novelty," introduced by regular subscribers no more than eleven or nine days earlier. Pension fund concerts have tended to tread the safe ground of all-Wagner, all-Tchaikovsky programs and the like, and while such a program as yesterday's may not be the hall quite so effectively, yet much good is done by letting a significant new composition be heard outside the closed circle of subscribers to the various series of Boston symphony concerts. It was evident that Stravinsky's new Capriccio, played as it was with consummate skill and admirable spirit by both orchestra and soloist, aroused both interest and enjoyment. It merits its title more than do most similarly named works; it is capricious in its abrupt and vehement changes of mood, its prevailing gaiety and the contrast and unexpected melancholy of its rhapsodic andante, in its excitingly regular rhythms, its lively and independent melodies. There is apparent capriciousness even in the strange contradictions of style that emerge from this music: the characteristic harmonic asperities alternate with euphonious banalities; reminiscences of minor 19th century music, snatches of Viennese elegant conventional harmonic progression slightly soured, in which the intention of parody may be guessed. The rhythmic and melodic idioms of jazz—in lighter, happier mood—are strong in the present, but only as one of the many disparate ingredients that go to make up their amusing work. Mr. Sanroma's delightfully neat and alert performance of this difficult music earned him much applause and caused him to be recalled several times to the platform. Dr. Koussevitzky received equal commendation for his and the orchestra's remarkably effective share in the performance.

The concert had opened with a finely dramatic, beautifully suave performance of the "Flying Dutchman" overture, with its foreshadowing of the late Wagner of the "Ring of the Nibelungen" and its reminiscences of the symmetrical cantilena of Weber. The "Lohengrin" prelude, with the unearthly beauty of its high-pitched floating chords, had followed.

Tchaikovsky's fourth symphony, which concluded the concert, was performed with a dramatic force and conviction, with an expressive beauty, with an un-failing appropriateness of tempo and style, that could hardly be surpassed. It was a performance which minimized the weaknesses of the work and lent dignity and vitality to its inflated tragedy. The melancholy charm of the andantine, the delicious lightness and grace of the scherzo were memorable. The orchestra surpassed itself by the beauty and virtuosity of its playing and achieved in the last movement a climax of overwhelming brilliance and power. Vigorous and prolonged applause rewarded conductor and orchestra alike.

PENSION FUND CONCERT

Bach's masterpiece, the B minor Mass, with which on Wednesday last the Boston Symphony Orchestra opened its Bach Festival, was repeated yesterday at its close in aid of the orchestra's pension fund. The performance was again divided into two portions of convenient length, the Kyrie and Gloria being sung in the afternoon, and the Credo, Sanctus, and Agnus Dei in the evening. The intermission of some two hours and a half avoided overtaxing the voices of those who sing and the attention of those who listen; it insured a performance of more sustained excellence and an audience capable of enjoying it.

The chorus was, of course, again composed of the Harvard Glee Club and the Radcliffe Choral Society (trained respectively by Dr. Davison and Mr. Wallace Woodworth); the soloists were Amy Evans, soprano, Margaret Matzenauer, contralto, Richard Crooks, tenor, and Fraser Gange, bass. Instrumental solos incidental to the score were played by Burgin, concertmaster; Boetcher, horn; M. M. Speyer and Devergie, oboe d'amore; Albert Snow was organist.

Under Dr. Koussevitzky's vivid and inspired direction the performance, by orchestra and singers alike, was one of overwhelming brilliance. From the sombre magnificence of the opening Kyrie Eleison to the exhilarating jubilation of the "Et Resurrexit," the soaring exaltation of the "Sanctus," and the impressive power of the final "Osanna" and "Dona Nobis Pacem," the singing of the Harvard and Radcliffe choruses was of the most stirring quality—fresh, ardent, alive, agile and full of movement. They could achieve a deep expressiveness, too, in the "Qui Tollis," in "Et Incarnatus," in the "Crucifixus," in the adagio section of the "Confiteor."

The soloists also sang though theirs is a relative in the mass. Mme. Mat pressive and technically ad ing of her airs, especially Dei," again commanded Miss Evans's voice, though unequal skill, had at its pleasing brightness. Mr. used his fine voice with n gence and beauty of tone, in the "Benedictus," while once more did excellent wo airs.

The sensitive work of the orchestra who gati for violin, flute, d'amore added notably of the airs in which played.

The the close of audience that packed its delight in this gre the outstanding brilli formance with an tempestuous than ar stration of the kind w ory. Dr. Koussevitzky together with Dr. I Woodworth, who had pared the choruses, w and again to receive plause. Dr. Koussevi volution and enthusias the festival just end due, was presented w by representatives of Radcliffe choruses, congratulatory noises throng of singers and platform added their

to the A. M., heard in the b fire stat Gallagher an alarm On higher or calling

Boston to New York

IN the first concert, last Thursday evening, of their final visit, for the season to New York, Dr. Koussevitzky and the Boston Orchestra played Bach's Second Brandenburg Concerto for violin, flute, aboe, trumpet and strings; his Concerto in D minor for piano and orchestra—pianist; Mr. Borovsky; Brahms's Symphony in C minor. In the opinion of The Times, such a program "would have been considered formidable a few years ago; but now enthusiasm was rife reaching climax after the performance of the Symphony. Nearly all the reviewers had a word to say about the recent Bach Festival in Symphony Hall whence the two Concertos came. They approved warmly the performance of both "with a virtuosity placed wholly at the service of musical expression." As already noted in these columns, Mr. Mager's high trumpet and trumpeting in the Brandenburg Concerto were better liked than in Boston; while there was no lack of good words for Mr. Borovsky as pianist. According The Sun, "he thoroughly immersed himself in the spirit and the style of the music." In the ears of The Herald Tribune, "he gave a conservative, highly skilful performance, clear in outline and detail, fluent and well-proportioned." To The Evening Post, "he played less as soloist than as partner with the orchestra."

Over the Symphony of Brahms there were differences of opinion. The Times, for example, was distressed by some of Dr. Koussevitzky's tempi and at some length showed him the error (as it believed) of his ways. Other reviewers raised no objection; while The Tribune Herald took a middle course, saying: "Much of Brahms's Symphony was played with memorable eloquence, especially the first two movements, which received an interpretation of praiseworthy breadth and depth and poetic insight. The strings sang with an unusually full, mellow and expressive tone. The first proclamation by the horns of the melody in the introduction to the finale also offered moments of unusual imaginative potency, but in the main part of the movement Dr. Koussevitzky's tempi differed sometimes from vitzky's tempi differed somewhat from those customarily adopted and not always with happy results. The acceleration of the broad main theme diminished, for us, its dignity and impressiveness; but the unusually deliberate tempo for the chorale-like passage at the close proved effective. Then the presto was resumed at a whirlwind pace, and the audience responded with warmly expressed enthusiasm and several recalls for the conductor."

SYMPHONY CONCERT FOR PENSION FUND

Dec 29, 1930 964
The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Koussevitzky conducting, gave yesterday afternoon the first of the concerts this year in aid of the pension fund for retired members of the orchestra.

The program, announced originally as being devoted entirely to music by Tchaikovsky, was altered. It included, yesterday, the overture to Wagner's "Flying Dutchman," and the prelude to his "Lohengrin"; Tchaikovsky's fourth, F minor, symphony; and the new "Capriccio for Orchestra With Piano Solo" by Stravinsky. Jesus Maria Sanroma was the soloist in the latter work.

The "Capriccio" was performed for the first time in America at the subscription concerts of the Boston Symphony on Dec 19 and 20 of this year, with Mr. Sanroma playing the solo part. Then, as yesterday, the work was received very cordially.

Generally speaking, the piece is of a light-hearted character. It impressed one listener chiefly with its rather welcome and refreshing spirit of drollery. This drollery, however, is not unrestrained, and there are interludes of serious nature. Because of this, the piece might, by a stretch of imagination, be compared to some present-day popular American music that presents a certain intermittent, deadly determined, seriousness, for no great reason at all.

The "Capriccio" is intricate and pungent instrumental portions, played with the first desk men of the four string sections, and those of the woodwind section (as far as one could observe) grouped closely about the piano, is invigorating and not at all appalling in its dissonances and rhythms. One who is accustomed to extreme vehemence, in the matter of syncopated rhythms, found himself wishing yesterday that such rhythms were being done with more verve and emphasis. But possibly Stravinsky didn't intend that at all.

Mr. Sanroma acquitted himself excellently in the seemingly complicated piano part, and received from both conductor and audience expressions of great admiration.

One doubts whether any conductor could do Tchaikovsky any more brilliantly, forcefully, with greater emotional zeal and fire, than does Dr. Koussevitzky. In this music he is without doubt a master of masters. Under his readings, portions of that composer's works take on new meaning.

One does not hold Tchaikovsky's music to be a well-spring of highest spiritual exaltation, or to be of the utmost profound emotional significance. But one does admit, when Dr. Koussevitzky conducts this music, to a greater respect, and, perhaps, affection for it.

Fiftieth Season

1881 — 1931

The Trustees and the Conductor of the BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

request your presence

at Symphony Hall, Boston

on the Evening of Wednesday, March 25, at 8.30

when the memory of

HENRY L. HIGGINSON

will be honored

on the fiftieth anniversary

of the orchestra which he founded

An answer is requested

300

SYMPHONY CONCERT FOR PENSION FUND

Dec 29, 1930
The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr Koussevitzky conducting, gave yesterday afternoon the first of the concerts this year in aid of the pension fund for retired members of the orchestra.

The program, announced originally as being devoted entirely to music by Tchaikovsky, was altered. It included, yesterday, the overture to Wagner's "Flying Dutchman," and the prelude to his "Lohengrin"; Tchaikovsky's fourth, F minor, symphony; and the new "Capriccio for Orchestra With Piano Solo" by Stravinsky. Jesus Maria Sanroma was the soloist in the latter work.

The "Capriccio" was performed for the first time in America at the subscription concerts of the Boston Symphony on Dec 19 and 20 of this year, with Mr Sanroma playing the solo part. Then, as yesterday, the work was received very cordially.

Generally supeaking, the piece is of a light-hearted character. It impressed one listener chiefly with its rather welcome and refreshing spirit of drollery. This drollery, however, is not unrestrained, and there are interludes of serious nature. Because of this, the piece might, by a stretch of imagination, be compared to some present-day popular American music that presents a certain intermittent, deadly determined, seriousness, for no great reason at all.

The "Capriccio" is intricate and pungent instrumental portions, played with the first desk men of the four string sections, and those of the woodwind section (as far as one could observe) grouped closely about the piano, is invigorating and not at all appalling in its dissonances and rhythms. One who is accustomed to extreme vehemence, in the matter of syncopated rhythms, found himself wishing yesterday that such rhythms were being done with more verve and emphasis. But possibly Stravinsky didn't intend that at all.

Mr Sanroma acquitted himself excellently in the seemingly complicated piano part, and received from both conductor and audience expressions of great admiration.

One doubts whether any conductor could do Tchaikovsky any more brilliantly, forcefully, with greater emotional zeal and fire, than does Dr Koussevitzky. In this music he is without doubt a master of masters. Under his readings, portions of that composer's works take on new meaning.

One does not hold Tchaikovsky's music to be a well-spring of highest spiritual exaltation, or to be of the utmost profound emotional significance. But one does admit, when Dr Koussevitzky conducts this music, to a greater respect, and, perhaps, affection for it.

301

Fiftieth Season

1881 — 1931

The Trustees and the Conductor of the
BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

request your presence

at Symphony Hall, Boston

on the Evening of Wednesday, March 25, at 8.30

when the memory of

HENRY L. HIGGINSON

will be honored

on the fiftieth anniversary

of the orchestra which he founded

An answer is requested

WEDNESDAY EVENING, MARCH 25, 1931

at 8.30

Prelude for Organ - - - - - Bach
(WALLACE GOODRICH)

ADDRESS:

"HENRY L. HIGGINSON"
(BLISS PERRY)

Prelude and Fugue in C minor }
Fantasia No. 3 } - - - Bach
Italian Concerto }
(Harpichord: Mme. PATORNI-CASADESUS)

Toccata for Organ - - - - - Bach
(WALLACE GOODRICH)

(This will be the second evening of a Bach Festival to be given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Dr. Serge Koussevitzky, Conductor, on March 24, 25, 26, 27, 28, 29, 1931).

When Major Henry L. Higginson founded the Boston Symphony Orchestra in 1881, he realized the first dream and aspiration of his life—to give America an orchestra of permanent standing, and of quality comparable to the best in Europe. The eminence which the Orchestra attained was due to his judgment, and his generosity in supporting it alone through thirty-seven years.

In observing the Boston Symphony Orchestra's fiftieth season with a festival of the music of Bach, its present sponsors and patrons turn to the memory of the man who, in his unexampled way, made this orchestra possible.

Henry Lee Higginson, 1881-1931

SYMPHONY HALL, BOSTON

March 24, 25, 26, 27, 28, 29

BACH FESTIVAL

Orchestral, Choral, and Chamber Music of Johann Sebastian Bach

BY THE

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

Dr. SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY, Conductor

To be given in the Orchestra's fiftieth season in honor of its founder, Henry L. Higginson

HARVARD GLEE CLUB

Dr. ARCHIBALD T. DAVISON, Conductor

RADCLIFFE CHORAL SOCIETY

AND

BACH CANTATA CLUB

G. WALLACE WOODWORTH, Conductor

Soloists

AMY EVANS

Soprano

ALEXANDER BOROVSKY

Piano

MARGARET MATZENAUER Mme. PATORNI-CASADESUS

Mezzo-Soprano

Harpsichord

RICHARD CROOKS

Tenor

WALLACE GOODRICH

Organ

FRASER GANGE

Baritone

BLISS PERRY

Speaker

One more week of Season Sale by the Automatic Subscription Board
Huntington Avenue Lobby

Henry Lee Higginson, 1881-1931

SYMPHONY HALL, BOSTON

March 24, 25, 26, 27, 28, 29

BACH FESTIVAL

Orchestral, Choral, and Chamber Music of Johann Sebastian Bach

BY THE

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

Dr. SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY, Conductor

To be given in the Orchestra's fiftieth season in honor of its founder, Henry L. Higginson

HARVARD GLEE CLUB

Dr. ARCHIBALD T. DAVISON, Conductor

RADCLIFFE CHORAL SOCIETY

AND

BACH CANTATA CLUB

G. WALLACE WOODWORTH, Conductor

Soloists

AMY EVANS

Soprano

ALEXANDER BOROVSKY

Piano

MARGARET MATZENAUER Mme. PATORNI-CASADESUS

Mezzo-Soprano

Harpsichord

RICHARD CROOKS

Tenor

WALLACE GOODRICH

Organ

FRASER GANGE

Baritone

BLISS PERRY

Speaker

One more week of Season Sale by the Automatic Subscription Board
Huntington Avenue Lobby

MUSIC

BACH FESTIVAL
Herald By PHILIP HALE 25, 193

The Bach Festival, given by the Boston Symphony orchestra, Dr. Koussevitsky, conductor, in its 50th season and in honor of its founder, Henry L. Higginson, began yesterday afternoon and evening with a performance of the Mass in B minor. The orchestra was assisted by the Harvard Glee Club, the Radcliffe Choral Society; Amy Evans, soprano; Margaret Matzenauer, mezzo-soprano; Richard Crooks, tenor; Fraser Gange, baritone. The violin solos were played by Mr. Burgin; the horn obbligato to "Quoniam tu solus sanctus," by Mr. Boettcher; the two oboe d'amore by Messrs. Speyer and Devergie. There was a very large audience.

The chorus showed the long and careful training under Dr. Davison and Mr. Woodworth. The singing of a great chorus is too often the roaring of multitudinous mediocrity—roaring and nothing more. Dr. Koussevitsky would not have been content with this; the respective conductors knew it, nor would they themselves have sent their singers poorly prepared to him. Under his direction there were the requisite nuances; the poetic and dramatic effects; his artistic sensitiveness and personal magnetism inspired the chorus to sing with enthusiasm and musical understanding. It should be remembered that this chorus is not made of professional singers; that the members have not stood side by side for many years; their achievement last night was the more remarkable. There was not only a magnificent volume of tone in exultant outbursts and imposing climaxes; tonal swelling and diminishing, unfaltering execution of long roulades, sudden contrasts from forte to piano, precision in attack—these made the performance truly memorable.

To the chorus Bach entrusted his greatest musical thoughts, his noblest pages; it was as if the singers recognized it; for they were particularly effective in the opening of the "Kyrie," the ending of the "Gloria in Excelsis"—Cum sancto spiritu" was sung with amazing brio—the section of the "Credo"

beginning "Et incarnatus est" and the "Sanctus." To some in the audience the choruses, "Cum sancto spiritu" and "Crucifixus" were the commanding features of the choral performance.

The solo singers in this mass often have an ungrateful task. It has been said that when Bach wished to be particularly emotional he called on a contralto for full expression. Certainly in this mass Mme. Matzenauer was the one most favored by the composer. Her singing of "Qui Sedes" and the "Agnus Dei" will not soon be forgotten. Mr. Crooks's delivery of the "Benedictus qui venit" was characterized by a skilful use of his fine voice and by a taste that did not allow him to seek favor through a specious but undue display of the sentiment that falls into sentimentalism. Donald Frances Tovey recently made changes in Bach's score for a performance in Edinburgh. His most surprising alteration was the substitution of an oboe solo for the violin in the "Benedictus." He argued that as the autograph score does not name the instrument and the violin is here confined within the compass of the flute, Bach clearly intended the obbligato for a wind instrument. This did not prevent Mr. Burgin from playing in a masterly manner. The same is to be said of Mr. Boettcher's horn obbligato.

Yes, Mr. Crooks sang like a man and a musician, not after the manner of the beeping, bleating tenor who mistakes palsy for emotion in oratorio or other forms of supposedly sacred music. And Mr. Gange, too, sang like a man and made the most of music that in itself is of little interest. Miss Evans was heard to better advantage in the evening than in the afternoon, but one would have preferred a voice with more body and of a more decided character. It is hardly necessary to add that the orchestra responded sympathetically to Dr. Koussevitsky's every wish. The Mass will be heard next Sunday at the concert in aid of the orchestra's pension fund.

The second concert of the Festival will take place tonight at 8:30 o'clock. Mme. Patorni-Casadesus will play these harpsichord pieces: Italian concerto; Fantasia No. 3, C minor; Gigue in D minor. Wallace Goodrich, organist, will play a Fantasia in C minor, Adagio from the Toccata in C major, a Fugue in C major, the chorale prelude "Schmücke dich, O liebe Seele," and the great Fugue in G minor. Bliss Perry will deliver an address: "Henry L. Higginson."

SYMPHONY HALL

Single tickets are now on sale for the following performances of the

BACH FESTIVAL

BY THE

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

Dr. SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY, Conductor

Tuesday, March 24
 at 4.30 and at 8.30

MASS

IN B MINOR

(Performed in two parts)

Thursday, March 26
 at 8.30

BRANDENBURG CONCERTO
 No. 2
 (With Solo Violin, Flute, Oboe and Trumpet)
 PIANO CONCERTO in D minor
 MAGNIFICAT
 (Chorus and Orchestra)

Wednesday, March 25
 at 8.30

ORGAN: Fantasia Adagio
 Fugue

ADDRESS:
 "HENRY L. HIGGINSON"
 HARPSICHORD: Prelude and
 Fugue Fantasia
 Italian Concerto
 ORGAN: Chorale-prelude Fugue

Sunday, March 29
 at 4.30 and at 8.30

MASS

IN B MINOR

(Repeated)

HARVARD AND RADCLIFFE CHORUSES

BACH CANTATA CLUB

Soloists

AMY EVANS
 Soprano

MARGARET MATZENAUER
 Mezzo-Soprano

RICHARD CROOKS
 Tenor

FRASER GANGE
 Baritone

ALEXANDER BOROVSKY
 Piano

Mme. PATORNI-CASADESUS
 Harpsichord

WALLACE GOODRICH
 Organ

BLISS PERRY
 Speaker

MUSIC

Herald BACH FESTIVAL H.H.
By PHILIP HALE 25, 193

The Bach Festival, given by the Boston Symphony orchestra, Dr. Koussevitsky, conductor, in its 50th season and in honor of its founder, Henry L. Higginson, began yesterday afternoon and evening with a performance of the Mass in B minor. The orchestra was assisted by the Harvard Glee Club, the Radcliffe Choral Society; Amy Evans, soprano; Margaret Matzenauer, mezzo-soprano; Richard Crooks, tenor; Fraser Gange, baritone. The violin solos were played by Mr. Burgin; the horn obbligato to "Quoniam tu solus sanctus," by Mr. Boettcher; the two oboe d'amore by Messrs. Speyer and Devergie. There was a very large audience.

The chorus showed the long and careful training under Dr. Davison and Mr. Woodworth. The singing of a great chorus is too often the roaring of multitudinous mediocrity—roaring and nothing more. Dr. Koussevitsky would not have been content with this; the respective conductors knew it, nor would they themselves have sent their singers poorly prepared to him. Under his direction there were the requisite nuances; the poetic and dramatic effects; his artistic sensitiveness and personal magnetism inspired the chorus to sing with enthusiasm and musical understanding. It should be remembered that this chorus is not made of professional singers; that the members have not stood side by side for many years; their achievement last night was the more remarkable. There was not only a magnificent volume of tone in exultant outbursts and imposing climaxes; tonal swelling and diminishing, unflinching execution of long roulades, sudden contrasts from forte to piano, precision in attack—these made the performance truly memorable.

To the chorus Bach entrusted his greatest musical thoughts, his noblest pages; it was as if the singers recognized it; for they were particularly effective in the opening of the "Kyrie," the ending of the "Gloria in Excelsis"—Cum sancto spiritu" was sung with amazing brío—the section of the "Credo"

beginning "Et incarnatus est" and the "Sanctus." To some in the audience the choruses, "Cum sancto spiritu" and "Crucifixus" were the commanding features of the choral performance.

The solo singers in this mass often have an ungrateful task. It has been said that when Bach wished to be particularly emotional he called on a contralto for full expression. Certainly in this mass Mme. Matzenauer was the one most favored by the composer. Her singing of "Qui Sedes" and the "Agnus Dei" will not soon be forgotten. Mr. Crooks's delivery of the "Benedictus qui venit" was characterized by a skilful use of his fine voice and by a taste that did not allow him to seek favor through a specious but undue display of the sentiment that falls into sentimentalism. Donald Frances Tovey recently made changes in Bach's score for a performance in Edinburgh. His most surprising alteration was the substitution of an oboe solo for the violin in the "Benedictus." He argued that as the autograph score does not name the instrument and the violin is here confined within the compass of the flute, Bach clearly intended the obbligato for a wind instrument. This did not prevent Mr. Burgin from playing in a masterly manner. The same is to be said of Mr. Boettcher's horn obbligato.

Yes, Mr. Crooks sang like a man and a musician, not after the manner of the beeping, bleating tenor who mistakes palsy for emotion in oratorio or other forms of supposedly sacred music. And Mr. Gange, too, sang like a man and made the most of music that in itself is of little interest. Miss Evans was heard to better advantage in the evening than in the afternoon, but one would have preferred a voice with more body and of a more decided character. It is hardly necessary to add that the orchestra responded sympathetically to Dr. Koussevitsky's every wish. The Mass will be heard next Sunday at the concert in aid of the orchestra's pension fund.

The second concert of the Festival will take place tonight at 8:30 o'clock. Mme. Patorni-Casadesus will play these harpsichord pieces: Italian concerto; Fantasia No. 3, C minor; Gigue in D minor. Wallace Goodrich, organist, will play a Fantasia in C minor, Adagio from the Toccata in C major, a Fugue in C major, the chorale prelude in C major, the "Schmucke dich, O liebe Seele," and the great Fugue in G minor. Bliss Perry will deliver an address: "Henry L. Higginson."

SYMPHONY HALL

Single tickets are now on sale for the following performances of the

BACH FESTIVAL

BY THE

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

Dr. SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY, Conductor

Tuesday, March 24
at 4.30 and at 8.30

MASS

IN B MINOR

(Performed in two parts)

Thursday, March 26
at 8.30

BRANDENBURG CONCERTO
No. 2

(With Solo Violin, Flute, Oboe
and Trumpet)

PIANO CONCERTO in D minor

MAGNIFICAT

(Chorus and Orchestra)

Wednesday, March 25
at 8.30

ORGAN: Fantasia Adagio
Fugue

ADDRESS:

"HENRY L. HIGGINSON"

HARPSICHORD: Prelude and Fugue Fantasia

Italian Concerto

ORGAN: Chorale-prelude Fugue

Sunday, March 29
at 4.30 and at 8.30

MASS

IN B MINOR

(Repeated)

HARVARD AND RADCLIFFE CHORUSES

BACH CANTATA CLUB

Soloists

AMY EVANS
Soprano

ALEXANDER BOROVSKY
Piano

MARGARET MATZENAUER
Mezzo-Soprano

Mme. PATORNI-CASADESUS
Harpsichord

RICHARD CROOKS
Tenor

WALLACE GOODRICH
Organ

FRASER GANGE
Baritone

BLISS PERRY
Speaker

Bach Provides Interludes in Speech-Making

Organ and Harpsichord Pieces
In a Memorial Evening
For the Founder

Trans. — Mich. 26, 1931

HOWEVER high the festival at Bach's churches in Leipzig, the spoken word of the preacher was joined to the tones of the composer. Before or after song, the sermon. So also with the current Bach Festival at Symphony Hall. On Tuesday, the congregation heard his Mass in B minor. On this Thursday evening, it will hear a Brandenburg Concerto for orchestra; a Concerto for piano; the setting of Mary's hymn, the Magnificat. On the Wednesday between, which was yesterday, it listened to organ and harpsichord pieces; but the essential part of the evening rites were speeches—by Judge Cabot, as President of the Board of Trustees of the Symphony Orchestra; by Bliss Perry, as spokesman of the occasion; by Dr. Koussevitzky responding for the orchestra and himself. Hitherto the festival had celebrated Bach; hereafter it will renew that celebration, marking therewith the fiftieth year of the Symphony Concerts. Now it paused to recall and honor the memory of Henry Lee Higginson, the founder of the concerts in 1881; the continuator until, in 1918, he withdrew from a troubled scene.

The stage was prepared for the occasion. Below the organ and on the side-walls hung a wainscot of neutral tapestries. At the back, centered, stood Bela Pratt's bust of Mr. Higginson—bronze upon a brown pedestal. Above, as for shallow canopy, a bright golden festoon curved to right and to left. For this musical year, 1930-31, is the year of the orchestra's golden jubilee. Flowering shrubs, green and gold, repeated the motif. At the foot of the pedestal lay a wreath tied with gold ribbon—tribute of friendly rivalry from the trustees of the Philadelphia Orchestra. At either side of the stage rows of gilded chairs from The Pops renewed the prevailing color. They faced toward two tables, apart, with a few chairs around middle center. Less decorative console of the organ to the closed harpsichord to the right, the foreground. Beyond tubbed completed the prospect.

At the hour, present and past of the orchestra—of course their instruments—entered sin-pairs and seated themselves in chairs. Then followed what the authorities would call the pro-Judge Cabot, escorting the vendor of the founder, led it. Benjamin came the grandson of the Higginson; trustees and their the speaker of the evening: Madam Koussevitzky; the multi-tudinous of the town, more or related with the Symphony Orchestra Judge Cabot and Mrs. Higginson the table to the left; Dr. Koussevitzky, Mr. Wallace Goodrich, and the table to the right. The tion, which nearly filled the risen in salute; but, since the the procession was slow, many to the confusion for the twenty of these well-meant, but self-nimous, "homages."

ate from the orchestra nervously of spring flowers before Mrs. Judge Cabot rose beside the begin the ceremonies. He read atory telegrams from the boards of the Philadelphia, the and other orchestras. (None, had come from the Philharciety in New York, whereat the smiled discreetly—behind the Laying aside the messages, bot touched briefly on the anniversary of the orchestra, the cur-ival, the merit of each and ad contributed to it. He passed the occasion that had convoked any; recalled the founder and presented Dr. Bliss Perry, the friend, to celebrate both.

ere on this page Dr. Perry's s he prefers to call it) is printed o. Standing in the center of the tall and slender figure—he read manuscript with apt emphasis, d and rounded phrases, with here pauses most would tell, t glints of quiet humor. Such and speaking renewed the patri-mer of an elder day. Not yet, tongues and all ears, had van, intonations of gentle breeding, living, the pursuit of letters, unpractical arts. Dr. Perry the truisms of "tribute"; re-hackneyed facts; kept clear of chronicle. He proffered, instead, the sympathetic and fine-grained analyses of intimacy; remembered anecdotes and letters of friendship; set forth the times as well as the man; penetrated within as well as sketched without; drew and colored the portrait of Henry Higginson. To others he left photograph and record, unless, here and there, he could add a novel footnote. His speech was literary and allusive biography become for the instant spoken words. His hearers heard him intently; applauded him warmly. Tenfold their number will read him gladly.

After intermission and harpsichord pieces, there was more speech-making. Judge Cabot sounded the praises of the chorus of Harvard and Radcliffe youth who had shared in the performance of Bach's Mass. (Dr. Davison and Mr. Woodworth sat by, hearing benignant-ly). Then noted other participants in the present festival; invited Dr. Koussevitzky to speak for them, the orchestra, and himself. The eminent conductor rose in his place; from one pocket drew his pince-nez, from another a sheet of notes; spoke earnestly, if, for the hearer, rather confusedly. There were sentences about the "Bach Renaissance"; about the student-choir; about Mr. Higginson, the orchestra he had called to life, "the miracle" that he had wrought. Sentences also about the beauty, the power, the pleasure of music; about "God's life in men"; praises of the orchestra; phrases of proud humility about himself. Often Dr. Koussevitzky spoke brokenly, as one in stress of emotion, as well as in labor with a foreign tongue. The flood of applause, before and afterward, should have re-assured him.

There was music, besides. To begin and to end the evening, Mr. Wallace Goodrich played organ-pieces of Bach—the Fantasia in C minor; fugues in C major and G minor; the Adagio from the Toccata in C major; the Chorale-Prelude, "Schmücke dich." Direction of the Conservatory and care of Boston's only opera have not lessened Mr. Goodrich as organist. He still plays as ready and masterful technician; with feeling for his manifold instrument as voice to music; with clear, full and enhancing response to the piece in hand. Out of the Chorale-Prelude and the fragment of the Toccata, he summoned Bach, rhapsodist and tone-poet, through the organ speaking intimately, by the organ warmed. From the Fugues rose the Bach who winged forms with motion and clothed them with power; whose hands and spirit played upon the organ in an exhaustless energy of creation.

in Paris had come Mme. Paterni-Cesius, mistress of the harpsichord, forth examples of Bach's minor work—an Italian Concerto in miniature, a little Fantasia; a lively Gigue; an air, a trifle added at Dr. Koussevitzky's ent to please the insistent audience. Her tone was limpid and edgeless. Her billity of ear and finger achieved possible shading. Rarely has the gentle, narrow-ranging harpsichord ded with such resilience, grace, vivy. Writing for it, Bach bade it to ined, lightly decorated patterns, to with rhythmic figures, to light melan- to pretty gayety. What he bade, Casadesus accomplished as though two were touching the keys. A ded festival had included Bach as aturist. H. T. P.

MUSIC

BACH'S GREAT MASS

By PHILIP HALE
The Bach festival, Dr. Koussevitzky conductor, held in commemoration of the Boston Symphony orchestra's 50th year and in memory of Henry L. Higginson, the founder of the orchestra, will begin today with a performance of the Mass in B minor. The chorus is made up of the Harvard Glee Club and the Radcliffe Choral Society. The solo singers will be Amy Evans, Margaret Matzenauer, Richard Crooks, Fraser Gange. The performance will be divided into two parts: One beginning at 4:30 P. M., the other at 8:30 P. M.

In 1733 Bach went to Dresden. He had proposed his son Friedemann for the position of organist at the Sophienkirche, but he had another reason for leaving Leipzig. He took with him the Lyrle and Gloria in Excelsis of his great Mass and conveyed them to the palace of Augustus the Third with a letter couched in the abject terms customary at that time with composers wishing royal patronage: "Profound devotion," "insignificant example of my skill in music," "your majesty's enormous generosity," "my humble rayer," etc., etc. "Insignificant example" reminds one of the courteous hinaman underrating himself and his belongings, debasing himself, as he welcomes a guest. Augustus at that time was interested in a Polish political mess. He paid no attention to Bach's act of homage. Now Bach, unhappy at Leipsic, think-

Bach P Interl Speec

Organ and Har
In a Memor
For the

HOWEVER h Bach's chur spoken word joined to th poser. Before or after So also with the cul at Symphony Hall. C
gregation heard his
On this Thursday eve
Brandenburg Concert Concerto for piano; th hymn, the Magnificat day between, which w tened to organ and but the essential part were speeches—by Jud dent of the Board of T phony Orchestra; by spokesman of the occa
sevitzyky responding fo himself. Hitherto the brated Bach; hereafter celebration, marking eth year of the Symph
it paused to recall and of Henry Lee Higgins
the concerts in 1881.
until, in 1918, he withd scene.

The stage was prep
sion. Below the organ walls hung a wainscot tries. At the back, ce Pratt's bust of Mr.
upon a brown pedest shallow canopy, a brig curved to right and musical year, 1930-31.
orchestra's golden ju shrubs, green and g motiv. At the foot of a wreath tied with go of friendly rivalry fro
the Philadelphia Orch side of the stage row from The Pops renew color. They faced to

Mrs. Z
Adjo
E

Prope street, r sold by to Josep of a fi feet of which $

Title
W. Ben
erty fro Harold structu taxed of on the Thom title of near Dr
It comp
and 10
ment is on $800
A pa and ass ward J located Harlest

Pape of an a road, M cf Broc chaser ecutors bury.
office o Manche

From

set wide apart, with a few chairs around them, at middle center. Less decoratively the console of the organ to the left, the closed harpsichord to the right, shared the foreground. Beyond tubbed trees completed the prospect.

Promptly at the hour, present and past members of the orchestra—of course without their instruments—entered singly or in pairs and seated themselves in the gilt chairs. Then followed what universities authorities would call the procession. Judge Cabot, escorting the venerable widow of the founder, led it. Behind them came the grandson of the house of Higginson; trustees and their consorts; the speaker of the evening; Dr. and Madam Koussevitzky; the musically illustrious of the town, more or less affiliated with the Symphony Orchestra. Judge Cabot and Mrs. Higginson took the table to the left; Dr. Koussevitzky, Mr. Wallace Goodrich, and their wives, the table to the right. The congregation, which nearly filled the hall, had risen in salute; but, since the entry of the procession was slow, many sat again, to the confusion for the twentieth time of these well-meant, but seldom unanimous, "homages."

A delegate from the orchestra nervously laid a bunch of spring flowers before Mrs. Higginson. Judge Cabot rose beside the table to begin the ceremonies. He read congratulatory telegrams from the governing boards of the Philadelphia, the Chicago and other orchestras. (None, seemingly, had come from the Philharmonic Society in New York, whereat the knowing smiled discreetly—behind their programs.) Laying aside the messages, Judge Cabot touched briefly on the anniversary year of the orchestra, the current festival, the merit of each and all who had contributed to it. He passed then to the occasion that had convoked the company; recalled the founder and his works; presented Dr. Bliss Perry, the founder's friend, to celebrate both.

Elsewhere on this page Dr. Perry's speech (as he prefers to call it) is printed in extenso. Standing in the center of the stage—a tall and slender figure—he read it from manuscript with apt emphasis, in spaced and rounded phrases, with pauses where pauses most would tell, with light glints of quiet humor. Such presence and speaking renewed the patrician manner of an elder day. Not yet, from all tongues and all ears, had vanished the intonations of gentle breeding, cultivated living, the pursuit of letters and the unpractical arts. Dr. Perry shunned the truisms of "tribute"; recalled no hackneyed facts; kept clear of routine chronicle. He preferred, instead, the sympathetic and fine-grained analyses of intimacy; remembered anecdotes and letters of friendship; set forth the times as well as the man; penetrated within as well as sketched without; drew and colored the portrait of Henry Higginson. To others he left photograph and record, unless, here and there, he could add a novel footnote. His speech was literary and allusive biography become for the instant spoken words. His hearers heard him intently; applauded him warmly. Tenfold their number will read him gladly.

After intermission and harpsichord pieces, there was more speech-making. Judge Cabot sounded the praises of the chorus of Harvard and Radcliffe youth who had shared in the performance of Bach's Mass. (Dr. Davison and Mr. Woodworth sat by, hearing benignantly.) Then noted other participants in the present festival; invited Dr. Koussevitzky to speak for them, the orchestra, and himself. The eminent conductor rose in his place; from one pocket drew his pince-nez, from another a sheet of notes; spoke earnestly, if, for the hearer, rather confusedly. There were sentences about the "Bach Renaissance"; about the student-choir; about Mr. Higginson, the orchestra he had called to life, "the miracle" that he had wrought. Sentences also about the beauty, the power, the pleasure of music; about "God's life in men"; praises of the orchestra; phrases of proud humility about himself. Often Dr. Koussevitzky spoke brokenly, as one in stress of emotion, as well as in labor with a foreign tongue. The flood of applause, before and afterward, should have re-assured him.

There was music, besides. To begin and to end the evening, Mr. Wallace Goodrich played organ-pieces of Bach—the Fantasia in C minor; fugues in C major and G minor; the Adagio from the Toccata in C major; the Chorale-Prelude, "Schmücke dich." Direction of the Conservatory and care of Boston's only opera have not lessened Mr. Goodrich as organist. He still plays as ready and masterful technician; with feeling for his manifold instrument as voice to music; with clear, full and enhancing response to the piece in its devotion. Out of the Chorale-Prelude and the fragment of the Toccata, he summoned Bach, rhapsodist and tone-poet, rayer, etc., etc. "Insignificant example" reminds one of the courteous hinaman underrating himself and his longings, debasing himself, as he welcomes a guest. Augustus at that time was interested in a Polish political mess. He paid no attention to Bach's act of homage. Now Bach, unhappy at Leipzig, thinkin Paris had come Mme. Paterni, mistress of the harpsichord, forth examples—of Bach's minor work—an Italian Concerto in minia, a little Fantasia; a lively Gigue; an trifile added at Dr. Koussevitzky's ent to please the insistent audience. tone was limpid and edgeless. Her ability of ear and finger achieved possible shading. Rarely has the gentle, narrow-ranging harpsichord ded with such resilience, grace, vivy. Writing for it, Bach bade it to ined, lightly decorated patterns, to with rhythmic figures, to light melan- to pretty gayety. What he bade, Casadesus accomplished as though two were touching the keys. A ded festival had included Bach as aturist. H. T. P.

MUSIC

BACH'S GREAT MASS

By PHILIP HALE
The Bach festival, Dr. Koussevitzky conductor, held in commemoration of the Boston Symphony orchestra's 50th year and in memory of Henry L. Higginson, the founder of the orchestra, will begin today with a performance of the Mass in B minor. The chorus is made up of the Harvard Glee Club and the Radcliffe Choral Society. The solo singers will be Amy Evans, Margaret Matzenauer, Richard Crooks, Fraser Gange. The performance will be divided into two parts: One beginning at 4:30 P. M., the other at 8:30 P. M.

In 1733 Bach went to Dresden. He had proposed his son Friedemann for the position of organist at the Sophienkirche, but he had another reason for leaving Leipzig. He took with him the Credo and Gloria in Excelsis of his great Mass and conveyed them to the palace of Augustus the Third with a letter couched in the abject terms customary at that time with composers seeking royal patronage: "Profound and insignificant example of my skill in music," "your majesty's glorious generosity," "my humble through the organ speaking intimately, by the organ warmed. From the Fugues rose the Bach who winged forms with motion and clothed them with power; whose hands and spirit played upon the organ in an exhaustless energy of creation.

ing himself unappreciated and even slighted there by the authorities—he complained in his letter to Augustus of “undeserved affronts, even the confiscation of emoluments due him”—wished Augustus to appoint him to the office of Court Composer. This was in 1733. It was not until 1736 that he was appointed. The vocal and instrumental parts of the Mass are now in a state library at Dresden and apparently were never used.

Bach, like Handel, did not hesitate to borrow from his own music. Not one of the four movements that follow the Sanctus was written for this Mass. Even in the Gloria and the Credo there are pages borrowed from church cantatas composed earlier than the Kyrie and the Gloria.

The Mass in B minor was not written for the Roman ritual. The text is treated almost clause by clause. Arias and duets alternate with choruses. Twice at least the text differs from the Roman canon. “Bach did not write the Sanctus with his eye upon a Roman Catholic interior, nor has the Mass ever been heard, nor is it likely to be heard, in surroundings which demand attention to ritual observance.” The extreme length of the movements and the difficulties in performance would forbid.

The Lutherans treated the Communion Office as the chief form of public worship. In Bach's time the Kyrie, Gloria in Excelsis, Credo were sung at St. Thomas's, Leipsic, in the Latin of the Roman mass. The prayer-book in use contained prayers in German for those unacquainted with Latin. The B minor Mass may be called a Lutheran Missa with additions that warranted Bach's son Philipp Emanuel in calling it a “Catholic Mass.” The word “Missa” had a restricted meaning in the Lutheran service: “The Missa, or Kyrie Eleison, along with the ancient Church's praise of the Holy Trinity”—i.e., the Gloria in Excelsis. Some have asked why Bach wrote a Mass of these huge proportions, one not suited to the service of either church. Various answers have been given: “The Mass is the expression of Bach's Christian idealism, neither Roman Catholic nor Protestant”; his “genius was Teutonic in its inclination to create a clearly pictured design,” and again, “A desire to express himself in an art form which he had studied in others may also be conjectured.” And he wished the office of Court Composer.

It is thought that the Kyrie may have been heard in Leipsic on Trinity Sundays; that the Credo was heard there at festal occasions; that even the Sanctus and the Benedictus may have been heard at St. Thomas's; but the first performance of the Mass as a whole was in Berlin under Julius Stern's direction in 1861 and by Stern's Gesangverein.

The first performance in the United States was at Bethlehem, Pa., in 1900, by the Bach Choir, J. Fred Wille, conductor.

The first performance in Boston was by the Cecilia Society, B. J. Lang, conductor, on Dec. 3, 1901: “The second complete performance in America.” The announcement also read: “The original instrumentation will be used, including the almost obsolete high trumpets loaned by Mr. J. Montgomery Sears (three), and the two hautbois d'amour, loaned by Mr. Damrosch.” (Probably Frank Damrosch, who as conductor of the Oratorio Society, New York, had given portions of the Mass in April, also in November, 1900.) The singers in the first performance in Boston were Kathrin Hilke, soprano; Adelaide Griggs, contralto; Adah Hussey, contralto; Stephen Townsend, baritone; Clarence E. Hay, bass. B. L. Whelpley was the organist. The orchestra was made up of Boston Symphony players.

1 Trans. Nov. 26, 1931.
Department of the World-
the New York newspaper, nted up Dr. Koussevitzky's s to say the number of his programs at Sym-st season, the Bach Fest-Friday-Saturday concerts figures are: From Bach 7; Brahms 5; Handel 2;
in 3; Schumann 3; Schu-ese figures it adds four gner; four from Strauss;
ovsky, two from Debussy.
es reasonably that, with ttles,” the conductor “is ler at the works their due.”

BACH FESTIVAL

The second concert of the Bach Festival, given last night at Symphony hall, paid special tribute to the memory of the noble founder of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Maj. Henry L. Higginson. Dr. Bliss Perry, who knew Maj. Higginson, gave the great audience a vivid picture of the man, his ideals, and his dreams . . . recalling a fine friend to those who knew him, and acquainting those who did not know him, with the charm and generosity of his character. Dr. Serge Koussevitzky paid eloquent tribute to this great friend of music, and to the music of Johann Sebastian Bach, whose works are being played in this festival to commemorate the fiftieth anniversary of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and the man who founded it, and who through so many years supported it, alone.

The music of Bach that was played last night—organ music, and music for the harpsichord—is some of the loveliest he wrote. The Italian Concerto, the Gigue in D Minor, and the Fantasia in C Minor, that were played by Madame Patroni-Casadesus, embody all the lively humor, the grace, piquancy, and graciousness of Bach's best “entertainment” music. Madame Patroni-Casadesus's playing was all that could be desired. Not unknown to Symphony audiences here, she played even more delightfully than at previous concerts, and she was recalled continuously until Dr. Koussevitzky requested that she repeat the Gigue.

Wallace Goodrich, organist, played the Fantasia in C Minor; Adagio from the Toccata in C Major; Fugue in C Major; Choral-prelude “Schmuckedich, o liebe Seele”; and the great Fugue in G Minor. This admirable selection of organ music was played with taste and brilliance. Perhaps most impressive was the great G Minor Fugue, in which the bold, sonorous structure of the Fugue, rising to a tremendous climax, most appeals to organ-music lovers today.

Dr. Bliss Perry's splendid word-portrait of Henry Higginson was the outstanding feature of the evening. Without making the talk a ceremony, and without investing it with the entirely laudatory character of things forever gone and very unreal, he struck the note of appreciation surely and truly. In his own words, “Beauty and truth do not go out of fashion, any more than Johann Sebastian Bach goes out of fashion. They are forever being recreated; and whatever new and rich pleasures come to the patrons of the orchestra in the next 50 years, they can never quite forget the noble gentleman who first lighted the fire on this hearth.”

E. B.

Concert-Chronicle

Bach's Trumpet

IN New York, last Thursday, Dr. Koussevitzky, the solo-virtuosi and the string choir of the Symphony Orchestra repeated Bach's Second Brandenburg Concerto from the recent festival in Boston. Again Mr. Mager played upon his small, shrill, high-voiced trumpet. Possibly this return to the “clarin” of Bach's time proved more fortunate there than here. At the least, Mr. Henderson in The Sun had good words for it:

“Bach wrote trumpet-parts in such a high register that most orchestral trumpeters of the nineteenth century could not play them. The problem was not solved by application of the knowledge that “clarin” players in Bach's day practiced only the highest notes of the trumpet; while the lower tones were produced by other players. Nor were matters made any better by arrangements substituting other instruments for the trumpet. A German trumpeter invented a high Bach trumpet, which was used at the unveiling of Bach's statue in Eisenach in 1884, when Joachim conducted. But for some reason the old order was not changed and Bach concerti continued to be performed without the shrilling of the original clarion tones.

“The Bach trumpet has recently come into use and there are instrument-makers who specialize in the making of it. The trumpet which Georges Mager used at last evening's performance was a short instrument with a small bore and a very high register. The thin, piercing upper tones were probably close to those which were in Bach's mind when he created this Concerto. The trumpet dominated the concertino (as the group of solo instruments was called by the old masters) and gave the work a complexion somewhat different from that to which we were formerly accustomed. The work was excellently played and the audience signified its approval in unmistakable manner.”

ing himself unappreciated and even slighted there by the authorities—he complained in his letter to Augustus of “undeserved affronts, even the confiscation of emoluments due him”—wished Augustus to appoint him to the office of Court Composer. This was in 1733. It was not until 1736 that he was appointed. The vocal and instrumental parts of the Mass are now in a state library at Dresden and apparently were never used.

Bach, like Handel, did not hesitate to borrow from his own music. Not one of the four movements that follow the Sanctus was written for this Mass. Even in the Gloria and the Credo there are pages borrowed from church cantatas composed earlier than the Kyrie and the Gloria.

The Mass in B minor was not written for the Roman ritual. The text is treated almost clause by clause. Arias and duets alternate with choruses. Twice at least the text differs from the Roman canon. “Bach did not write the Sanctus with his eye upon a Roman Catholic interior, nor has the Mass ever been heard, nor is it likely to be heard, in surroundings which demand attention to ritual observance.” The extreme length of the movements and the difficulties in performance would forbid.

The Lutherans treated the Communion Office as the chief for public worship. In Bach's time Kyrie, Gloria in Excelsis, Credo, sung at St. Thomas's, Leipsic, in Latin of the Roman mass. The prayer-book in use contained prayer German for those unacquainted Latin. The B minor Mass may be a Lutheran Missa with additions warranted Bach's son Philipp Emanuel in calling it a “Catholic Mass.” word “Missa” had a restricted meaning in the Lutheran service: “The Missa Kyrie Eleison, along with the church's praise of the Holy Trinity, i.e., the Gloria in Excelsis. Some asked why Bach wrote a Mass of huge proportions, one not suited the service of either church.”

ous answers have been given: “The Mass is the expression of Bach's Christian idealism, neither Roman Catholic nor Protestant”; his “genius was Teutonic in its inclination to create a clearly pictured design,” and again, “A desire to express himself in an art form which he had studied in others may also be conjectured.” And he wished the office of Court Composer.

It is thought that the Kyrie may have been heard in Leipsic on Trinity Sundays; that the Credo was heard there at festal occasions; that even the Sanctus and the Benedictus may have been heard at St. Thomas's; but the first performance of the Mass as a whole was in Berlin under Julius Stern's direction in 1861 and by Stern's Gesangverein.

The first performance in the United States was at Bethlehem, Pa., in 1900, by the Bach Choir, J. Fred Wolle, conductor.

The first performance in Boston was by the Cecilia Society, B. J. Lang, conductor, on Dec. 3, 1901: “The second complete performance in America.” The announcement also read: “The original instrumentation will be used, including the almost obsolete high trumpets loaned by Mr. J. Montgomery Sears (three), and the two hautbois d'amour, loaned by Mr. Damrosch.” (Probably Frank Damrosch, who as conductor of the Oratorio Society, New York, had given portions of the Mass in April, also in November, 1900.) The singers in the first performance in Boston were Kathrin Hilke, soprano; Adelaide Griggs, contralto; Adah Hussey, contralto; Stephen Townsend, baritone; Clarence E. Hay, bass. B. L. Whelpley was the organist. The orchestra was made up of Boston Symphony players.

Here in Boston Trans. N.Y. 26.1931.

THE Music Department of the World-Telegram, the New York newspaper, lately counted up Dr. Koussevitzky's classics—that is to say the number of such pieces on his programs at Symphony Hall, last season, the Bach Festival and the Friday-Saturday concerts included. Its figures are: From Bach 17; Beethoven 7; Brahms 5; Handel 2; Mozart 4; Haydn 3; Schumann 3; Schubert 2. To these figures it adds four items from Wagner; four from Strauss; two from Chalkovsky, two from Debussy. It then concludes reasonably that, with all his “modernities,” the conductor “is giving standard works their due.”

BACH FESTIVAL

The second concert of the Bach Festival, given last night at Symphony hall, paid special tribute to the memory of the noble founder of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Maj. Henry L. Higginson. Dr. Bliss Perry, who knew Maj. Higginson, gave the great audience a vivid picture of the man, his ideals, and his dreams . . . recalling a fine friend to those who knew him, and acquainting those who did not know him, with the charm and generosity of his character. Dr. Serge Koussevitzky paid eloquent tribute to this great friend of music, and to the music of Johann Sebastian Bach, whose works are being played in this festival to commemorate the fiftieth anniversary of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and the man who founded it, and who through so many years supported it, alone.

The music of Bach that was played last night—organ music, and music for the harpsichord—is some of the loveliest he wrote. The Italian Concerto, the Gigue in D Minor, and the Fantasia in C Minor, that were played by Madame Patorni-Casadesus, embody all the lively humor, the grace, piquancy, and graciousness of Bach's best “entertainment” music. Madame Patorni-Casadesus's playing was all that could be desired. Not unknown to Symphony audiences here, she played even more delightfully than at previous concerts, and she was recalled continuously until Dr. Koussevitzky requested that she repeat the Gigue.

Wallace Goodrich, organist, played the Fantasia in C Minor; Adagio from the Toccata in C Major; Fugue in C Major; Choral-prelude “Schmuedekedich, o liebe Seele”; and the great Fugue in G Minor. This admirable selection of organ music was played with taste and brilliance. Perhaps most impressive was the great G Minor Fugue, in which the bold, sonorous structure of the Fugue, rising to a tremendous climax, most appeals to organ-music lovers today.

Dr. Bliss Perry's splendid word-portrait of Henry Higginson was the outstanding feature of the evening. Without making the talk a ceremony, and without investing it with the entirely laudatory character of things forever gone and very unreal, he struck the note of appreciation surely and truly. In his own words, “Beauty and truth do not go out of fashion, any more than Johann Sebastian Bach goes out of fashion. They are forever being recreated; and whatever new and rich pleasures come to the patrons of the orchestra in the next 50 years, they can never quite forget the noble gentleman who first lighted the fire on this hearth.”

E. B.

Concert-Chronicle

Bach's Trumpet

IN New York, last Thursday, Dr. Koussevitzky, the solo-virtuosi and the string choir of the Symphony Orchestra repeated Bach's Second Brandenburg Concerto from the recent festival in Boston. Again Mr. Mager played upon his small, shrill, high-voiced trumpet. Possibly this return to the “clarin” of Bach's time proved more fortunate there than here. At the least, Mr. Henderson in The Sun had good words for it: “Bach wrote trumpet-parts in such a high register that most orchestral trumpeters of the nineteenth century could not play them. The problem was not solved by application of the knowledge that “clarin” players in Bach's day practiced only the highest notes of the trumpet; while the lower tones were produced by other players. Nor were matters made any better by arrangements substituting other instruments for the trumpet. A German trumpeter invented a high Bach trumpet, which was used at the unveiling of Bach's statue in Eisenach in 1884, when Joachim conducted. But for some reason the old order was not changed and Bach concerti continued to be performed without the shrilling of the original clarion tones.”

“The Bach trumpet has recently come into use and there are instrument-makers who specialize in the making of it. The trumpet which Georges Mager used at last evening's performance was a short instrument with a small bore and a very high register. The thin, piercing upper tones were probably close to those which were in Bach's mind when he created this Concerto. The trumpet dominated the concertino (as the group of solo instruments was called by the old masters) and gave the work a complexion somewhat different from that to which we were formerly accustomed. The work was excellently played and the audience signified its approval in unmistakable manner.”

SYMPHONY HALL, BOSTON

50th SEASON, 1930-1931

Fifth Concert of the
 MONDAY EVENING SERIES
Boston Symphony
 Orchestra

(110 Musicians)

Dr. SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY, Conductor

Monday Evening, March 16, at 8.15 o'clock

PROGRAMME

Beethoven . . . Overture to "Leonore," No. 3, Op. 72

Berezowsky Symphony No. 1, Op. 10
 (In one movement)

(Conducted by the composer)

Mendelssohn . . . Concerto for Violin in E minor, Op. 64

I. Allegro molto appassionato.

II. Andante.

III. Allegretto non troppo; Allegro molto vivace.

Rimsky-Korsakov . . . Caprice on Spanish Themes, Op. 34

I. Alborada.

II. Variations.

III. Alborada.

IV. Scene and Gypsy Song.

V. Fandango of the Asturias.

(Played without pause)

SOLOIST

LÉON ZIGHERA

There will be an intermission of ten minutes before the concerto

An Exuberant Young Russian, And a Matured Parisian Prove Their Mettle

THE audience at "the Mondays" of the Symphony Orchestra is like no other that it assembles. On "the Tuesdays," the company is more youthful and predominantly feminine. On the subscription Fridays, it has "social cachet"—or so the authorities in such matters say; while on the subscription Saturdays, it wears an unmistakable air of quiet distinction. Perhaps it is safest to say that the Monday audience enjoys its six concerts for their own sake; that it attends from no other motive; that it prefers six evenings to twenty-four. Call it also the middle audience of Symphony Concerts, as distinguished from the "social" audience of Friday, the "connoisseur" audience of Saturday, the "youngish" audience of Tuesday. Above any of these three, it upturns faces seemingly of European rather than American or New-England origin; while beyond all the rest, it enjoys itself and makes no secret of its pleasure.

by the formation and move-the parade, the Boston Elevator announced that, as this would with traffic between 1 and 5.3
Columbia road, Boston street
Dorchester avenue, persons go to these streets were a use the Dorchester tunnel, and ston riders the Summer street lines. The religious ce-er big event scheduled for the the laying of the cornerstones, sports a-L-street Baths at City Point expecting to postponed because of the illness. A legislavor. The exercises it was indrowning the sh-morning, will be made a pal whisky," but April 19 program which, as too far away th-tells on Sunday, will be carried into Ulster whay, April 20. public houses this after not hold.

tion to open house this afternoon. This evening in South Boston of the Irish scheduled for this evening included radio broadcast anniversary dinner at the in other national Irish Society, at the Hot noon of an international the annual St. Patrick's Night broadcast a message to the Community Club, at the Municipal America and Dudley street, Roxbury; Iris "All is well" concert at Fields Corner Theatre. We are continuing, of the Catholic Daughters' press to build the and Redberry Council, Knights to preserve the bus; the annual ball of the Celtic nationalities council of Irish County Clubs, in the sons and daughters in Building, Dudley street, Roxbury. own land and a not less than He concluded for Ely pleaded for a renewal in the ideal of St. Patrick at Washington—love of humanity in Ireland, Vans towards the solution of the of Ulster, is the yment crisis, at the annual all over the tion Day banquet of the South Saint Patrick Citizen's Association in the Hot and a message last night.

ing the aggressive spirit theymen scatter his campaign last fall, the go'hey will...re ruck a popular keynote that w...brew' again by Congressman John W...at or ack; Joseph McGrath, presiden...studies Boston City Council, representing...n recit turley, and James H. Brennan...estral own...work
...ean

jection of the current State pro to the program by Governor El the feature of the evening, bu Henry McCann, former corpor nсел of Portland, Me., added
n when he charged that the mea d value of the participation b of Irish birth and extraction hav erlooked and in many notable e deliberately suppressed.
McCann charged that historian
Bancroft, Parkman, Prescott, Pa
isk, Rhodes and Lodge have co
the facts regarding the great pa
by the Irish in the American Rev while other historians have lik reated, with little regard for a and truth. the Irish chanter.

PHILIP HALE Inam

concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's Monday evening concert last night in Symphony Hall, Tchaikovsky conducted. The program was as follows: Beethoven's "Leonore" No. 3. Berezovsky's No. 1, Op. 10 (played for the first performance; composed by the composer). Mendelssohn's No. 10 (Leon Zighera, violin). Korsakov, Caprice.

a time in the history of the opera when any one of Weber's overtures was considered as a safe "filler" in an evening's program. In recent years "Leonore" has found its place. A famous and sure, more dramatic than "Fidelio," but like other Beethoven's it has been performed. There has been undue familiarity with it; so it has come to take its place no matter how brilliant the performance are no longer thrilled by its announcement of the tumultuous rejoicing of the wicked master. If this overture were performed only once in several years it would be more fully appreciated. A performance is so common that of last night, one is almost weary of a repetition at no dis-

sky, born at Lenindied there and in Vito New York in 1922 violinist, the Philchestra of that city. His he was played at a concert stra in 1928. He continued in New York and gave a there. He has composed d chamber music.

chamber music—including that has been performed in— as well as in this country of this year he was conductor of the Cincinnati orchestra.

ny. written, we hear, four full of vitality, at times manner. It shows the ex-youth, which, after all to the scheming callous-re mature composer, and blood his patterns and harmonic scheme, in t is unfamiliar is care-out. Mr. Berezowsky's rial is pleasing; melodi-being lush. The chief ed in an interesting man-ried reappearances. The character; the pliquant; the fi-chief theme with usily exciting. The doubt the prevail-

 of the symphony.
 passages of deli-ere discreet use of ore frequent dyener search after expression. But et too much, even of an indisputable as a flaming tem-own even in his phony means much nes he "over-con-even the score asiasm he knocked tain pages of the sarily flamboyant.

audience felt that something to say e, and often said this and was so try spirit that it times and in no in Boston for the other of the harp- Violoncellist of the on recognition in other European ot large, nor par- should not say priggish Mendels- ndered if any vio- rbed his genteel s the dances of e concerts. Mr. ility and taste, ggestions of blazing movement he was and movement, hints sh; and Mendels- tin-American dance- apidity. Mr. Zig- idiom, the langor- es acid, especially s of the contralto- he audience liked authentically to the warmly, and ap- e music its claim to atzky's accompani- solely a riotous tour- ended brilliantly ae. he sixth and last urmance of Brahms' ril 27th, closed the concert

April 28, 1921.
CONCERT
st concert of the les of the Boston
took place last evitzky had finally wing program, one sed his audience
uite for Orchestra, (in place of the
'Ballett Borodine," rus, by N. Tcherep-Rio Grande," for nd solo pianoforte
(Sitwell); Brahms,
C minor, Op. 68.

New Co New Cor

An Exuberant And a Man Prove

39.411

THE audience of the... like no... On "the... is more youth... it has "social... ties in such... subscription... mistakable air... haps it is safe... audience enjoys... own sake; that... motive; that it... twenty-four... audience of Syn... of Friday, the... Saturday, the... Tuesday. Above... turns faces seem... than American... while beyond all... and makes no... Probably to n... hearers, Mr. L... known quality... at the outset... varied, binds... Mendelssohn's... plauded him to... and conductor... with a new Sy... equally unknow... times he was... hoven's third... whipped this... rounds of clapp... concert, Rims... Caprice" fared... Dr. Koussevitz... him for grante... place. Or the o... his call. The... for cheerful ex... even the Tues... pace. For both... is not an insti...

Mr. Zighera, of that Roumanian family of musicians, is elder brother to the familiar harpist and violoncellist at Symphony Hall. He has made his career in Paris—in orchestras, in recitals and as leader of a string quartet. Now he would try fortune in American concert-halls. His choice of Mendelssohn's Concerto suggests his qualities as virtuoso and musician. He draws a small, sensitive and finely tempered tone, that, over-pressed, tends to run thin and shrill. He directs it with keen ear, flexible hand, clear musical instinct and taste. He is neither effective nor eloquent in the conventional sense of the words, but he can shade his tone expertly; keep a smooth euphony with accompanying instruments; poise and round a phrase; point up a rhythm; control a climax—all discreetly and with clear feeling for the music before him. Measuring all things, Mr. Zighera kept every contour smooth and fine; made tonal lace-work of the figures; took the displayful cadenza lightly; was sympathetic to the composer's sentiment. Not once did he inflate it into emotion; so overstrain both the pattern and the mood. At the end the listener knew him for a violinist with a happy sense of appropriate style. Playing Mendelssohn's Concerto in character, he saved it from the years and from the fashions Dr. Koussevitzky did no less for the orchestra of Syntral part. Taken for what it is, the old piece, now near to its nineties, holds its own. A Viennese like Mr. Kreisler; a Parisian, like Mr. Zighera, plays it instinctively. Decidedly Mr. Berezovsky is of another while beyond all mettle. His Symphony is brief and impetuous, plunging through a single movement, well marked into the usual divisions. A recurring motif, clearly defined at the outset, oftener repeated than varied, binds the whole together. Secondary motifs character each division; one or two suggest Russian folk-tunes. There is little development in the orthodox symphonic sense. Instead, changing rhythm, diversified harmonic and instrumental color, keep the music in motion and significance. True Russian, Mr. Berezovsky is no structural composer; while throughout he prefers free form, free melody, free rhythm. (There is hardly a "modernism" in the whole Symphony.) Above all, he has a passion for sonorities fed, no doubt, by orchestral experience as player and conductor. He chooses the driving pace, the whipping rhythm, the tumultuous progress. He urges his orchestra exuberantly, unremittingly, often to the neglect of contrast. He deploys it in tonal mass, or lean periods.

Services and Sports in the Irish Free State

Irish Free State, March... and celebrated Saint Patrick's... nation-wide religious cer... programs, sports and... dancing, expecting to la... tomorrow morning. A legislati... prevented "drowning the sha... good Irish whisky," but... did not live too far away the... spect of a trip into Ulster whe... closing public houses... day do not hold. Cosgrave of the Irish Tr... his second radio broadcast... to Irishmen in other nation... vantage at noon of an intern... up to broadcast a message... good will to America and oth... He said: "All is well wit... at Eireann. We are continuin... success to build the o... anew, to preserve an... its distinctive nationality, an... for Ireland's sons and daug... ing in their own land and e... of a freedom not less than th... nation." He concluded wi... You all."

... born at Lenin... there and in Vi... to New York in 1922... violinist, the Phil... Orchestra of that city. His "Hebrew" suite was played at a concert of that orchestra in 1928. He continued his studies in New York and gave a violin recital there. He has composed orchestral and chamber music—including a work that has been performed in European cities as well as in this country. In January of this year he was a "guest" conductor of the Cincinnati Symphony Orchestra. The symphony, written, we hear, four years ago, is full of vitality, at times in a yeasty manner. It shows the exuberance of youth, which, after all, is preferable to the scheming callousness of a more mature composer, arranging in cold blood his patterns and an "original" harmonic scheme, in which all that is unfamiliar is carefully sought out. Mr. Berezovsky's thematic material is pleasing; melodious without being lush. The chief theme is created in an interesting manner in its varied reappearances. The concert of the Boston Sym... Monday evening se... last night in Symphony... conducted. The... as follows: Beethoven, "Leonore" No. 3. Berezovsky No. 1, Op. 10 (played first performance; conductor, Mendelssohn, (Leon Zighera, violinist, Korsakov, Caprice on time in the history of... when any one of Weber's... overtures was considered... as a safe "filler" in any... recent years "Leonore" No. 3. A famous... sure, more dramatic... "Fidelio," but like other... it has been per... There has been undue... familiarity with it; so... have come to take it for... no matter how brilliant... are no longer thrilled... announcement off... the tumultuous rejoicing... of the wicked mas... If this overture were... only once in several... their would be more fully... a performance is so... of last night, one is... a repetition at no dis... of Saint Patrick's Da... born at Lenin... there and in Vi... to New York in 1922... violinist, the Phil... Orchestra of that city. His "Hebrew" suite was played at a concert of that orchestra in 1928. He continued his studies in New York and gave a violin recital there. He has composed orchestral and chamber music—including a work that has been performed in European cities as well as in this country. In January of this year he was a "guest" conductor of the Cincinnati Symphony Orchestra. The symphony, written, we hear, four years ago, is full of vitality, at times in a yeasty manner. It shows the exuberance of youth, which, after all, is preferable to the scheming callousness of a more mature composer, arranging in cold blood his patterns and an "original" harmonic scheme, in which all that is unfamiliar is carefully sought out. Mr. Berezovsky's thematic material is pleasing; melodious without being lush. The chief theme is created in an interesting manner in its varied reappearances. The character; the... pliant; the fi... chief theme with... exciting. The... doubt the prevail... of the symphony... passages of deli... discreet use of... frequent dy... eener search after... expression. But... too much, even... of an indisputable... as a flaming tem... own even in his... hony means much... he "over-con... even the score... miasm he knocked... tain pages of the... sarily flamboyant... audience felt that... something to say... e, and often said... this and was so... spirit that it... times and in no... in Boston for the... other of the harp... violoncellist of... on recognition in... other European... ot large, nor par... should not say... priggish Mendels... deder if any vio... rbed his gentle... e concerts. Mr... ility and taste... movement he was... sh; and Mendels... apidity. Mr. Zig... es acid, especially... he audience liked... warmly, and ap... tsky's accompani... ended brilliantly... he sixth and last... ril 27th. April 28, 1921. CONCERT... st concert of the... les of the Boston... took place last... vitzky had finally... wing program, one... used his audience... uite for Orchestra... (in place of the... "Ballett Borodine,"... rus, by N. Tcherep... Rio Grande," for... nd solo pianoforte... Sitwell); Brahms, C minor, Op. 68. he Cecilia Society, Fiedler, assisted in Constant Lambert's... rte part was played... oma. one of those per... nt Bach festival, is... ightful of the com... works. Not only for... ustly familiar air—... nists as a solo tran... string—is the suite... ntaneity, a melodic... st order, a complete... echanical repetition... ulas in which Bach... take refuge when... The prelude with... gigue with which it... living and varied... 's setting for chorus... poem by Sacheverell... a well-known family... st poets—was first... yony audiences dur... end. Last night it... d impression by the... ce of its orchestra... which it illustrated... s of the poem and... there described. The... regularity and vio... s and the percussive... g and difficult inter... solo — superlatively... oma—seemed to owe... s to the dances of... es of the marimba... and movement, hints... tin-American dance... idiom, the langor... s of the contralto—... e music its claim to... solely a riotous tour... ended brilliantly... rmance of Brahms's... closed the concert... Dr. Koussevitzky's... seem constantly to... balance, while they... natic and emotional... w fewer exaggerated... The introduction to... had last night no... neither was the... transformed into a... ere was no lack of... on in the one, nor... loveliness in the... grace of the al... lming jubilation of... the last movement... embered. use was accorded to... ers of the evening, S. S.

PHILIP HALE

New Co New Cor

An Exuberant And a Measure Prove

391-414

THE audience clear feeling for the music of the "Leonora" Overture now sounds in high, heroic voice. The conductor misses no significant detail; deepens or sharpens the momentary significance. Yet the whole expands and mounts; while each phrase, each musical sentence or paragraph falls into instant place. There is transition, suspense, climax. A musical design, puissant in itself, is moulded and dramatized into epic epilogue of the victory of freedom over darkness. The listener doubts only at the moment when the proclaiming trumpets sound too faint and far. . . . Agreed that in these realistic days of Spanish composers, Rimsky-Korsakov's "Caprice" is Spanish only by courtesy title. Agreed also that first last, and nearly all the time, it is orchestral show-piece. Nobody but reviewers of music in New York live perpetually upon a lofty plane of "spiritual elevation." For the rest of us, every one of Rimsky's kickshaws—variations, gypsy song, cadenzas, fandango, what not—so long as there is a virtuoso-orchestra to dispense them and a conductor rejoicing in it to give the word. Euterpe smiles—maybe tucks up her skirt—when she hears such a music.

Decidedly Mr. Berezhovsky is no structural composer; while throughout he prefers free form, free melody, free rhythm. (There is "Caprice" fared hardly a "modernism" in the whole Symphony.) Above all, he has a passion for sonorities fed, no doubt, by orchestral experience as player and conductor. He chooses the driving pace, the whipping rhythm, the tumultuous progress. He urges his orchestra exuberantly, unremittently, often to the neglect of contrast. He deploys it in tonal mass, or

Mr. Zighera, of family of musicians, is familiar harpist and phony Hall. He h Paris—in orchestra leader of a string quartet fortune in America. His choice of Mendelssohn suggests his quality as a musician. He draws finely tempered tones tends to run thin; it with keen ear, musical instinct and effective nor eloquence of the words tone expertly; keeps with accompanying and round a phrase control a climax—clear feeling for the music of the "Leonora" Overture now sounds in high, heroic voice. The conductor misses no significant detail; deepens or sharpens the momentary significance. Yet the whole expands and mounts; while each phrase, each musical sentence or paragraph falls into instant place. There is transition, suspense, climax. A musical design, puissant in itself, is moulded and dramatized into epic epilogue of the victory of freedom over darkness. The listener doubts only at the moment when the proclaiming trumpets sound too faint and far. . . . Agreed that in these realistic days of Spanish composers, Rimsky-Korsakov's "Caprice" is Spanish only by courtesy title. Agreed also that first last, and nearly all the time, it is orchestral show-piece. Nobody but reviewers of music in New York live perpetually upon a lofty plane of "spiritual elevation." For the rest of us, every one of Rimsky's kickshaws—variations, gypsy song, cadenzas, fandango, what not—so long as there is a virtuoso-orchestra to dispense them and a conductor rejoicing in it to give the word. Euterpe smiles—maybe tucks up her skirt—when she hears such a music.

choir by choir, rather than with play of individual instruments. His scherzo leaps; his slow movement sings loud; his finale rises, breaks, rises yet again in floods of sound. Anywhere and everywhere, if there are details, who can spy them out? Hot blood, young vigor and an orchestra at full power carry all before them. Only pedants or "superior persons" will say nay to Mr. Berezhovsky's Symphony of young twenties.

From Dr. Koussevitzky and the orchestra the third "Leonora" Overture now sounds in high, heroic voice. The conductor misses no significant detail; deepens or sharpens the momentary significance. Yet the whole expands and mounts; while each phrase, each musical sentence or paragraph falls into instant place. There is transition, suspense, climax. A musical design, puissant in itself, is moulded and dramatized into epic epilogue of the victory of freedom over darkness. The listener doubts only at the moment when the proclaiming trumpets sound too faint and far. . . . Agreed that in these realistic days of Spanish composers, Rimsky-Korsakov's "Caprice" is Spanish only by courtesy title. Agreed also that first last, and nearly all the time, it is orchestral show-piece. Nobody but reviewers of music in New York live perpetually upon a lofty plane of "spiritual elevation." For the rest of us, every one of Rimsky's kickshaws—variations, gypsy song, cadenzas, fandango, what not—so long as there is a virtuoso-orchestra to dispense them and a conductor rejoicing in it to give the word. Euterpe smiles—maybe tucks up her skirt—when she hears such a music.

H. T. P.

SYMPHONY CONCERT

By PHILIP HALE

The fifth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's Monday evening series took place last night in Symphony hall. Dr. Koussevitzky conducted. The program was as follows: Beethoven, Overture to "Leonore" No. 3. Berezhovsky, Symphony No. 1, Op. 10 (played without pause; first performance; conducted by the composer). Mendelssohn, Violin Concerto (Leon Zighera, violinist). Rimsky-Korsakov, Caprice on Spanish themes.

There was a time in the history of this orchestra when any one of Weber's three greatest overtures was considered by conductors as a safe "filler" in any program. In recent years "Leonore" No. 3 has taken their place. A famous overture, to be sure, more dramatic than the opera "Fidelio," but like other works of Beethoven's it has been performed too often. There has been undue and injurious familiarity with it; so that audiences have come to take it for granted, and, no matter how brilliant the performance, are no longer thrilled by the trumpet's announcement off-stage, nor by the tumultuous rejoicing at the discomfiture of the wicked master of the prison. If this overture were to be performed only once in several years, its grandeur would be more fully realized. Yet when a performance is so eloquent as that of last night, one is tempted to wish a repetition at no distant day.

Nicolai Berezhovsky, born at Leningrad in 1900, studied there and in Vienna. He came to New York in 1922 and joined, as a violinist, the Philharmonic Orchestra of that city. His "Hebrew" suite was played at a concert of that orchestra in 1928. He continued his studies in New York and gave a violin recital there. He has composed orchestral and chamber music—including a work that has been performed in European cities as well as in this country. In January of this year he was a "guest" conductor of the Cincinnati Symphony Orchestra.

The symphony, written, we hear, four years ago, is full of vitality, at times in a yeasty manner. It shows the exuberance of youth, which, after all, is preferable to the scheming callousness of a more mature composer, arranging in cold blood his patterns and an "original" harmonic scheme, in which all that is unfamiliar is carefully sought out. Mr. Berezhovsky's thematic material is pleasing; melodious without being lush. The chief theme is created in an interesting manner in its varied reappearances. The character; the chief theme with its exciting. The doubt the prevalence of the symphony. passages of delicate discreet use of more frequent dyer search after expression. But too much, even of an indisputable as a flaming tem-town even in his phony means much as he "over-con- even the score.iasm he knocked tain pages of the garily flamboyant, audience felt that something to say e, and often said this and was so t spirit that it times and in no-

its setting for chorus poem by Sacheverell e, and often said a well-known family this and was so t spirit that it times and in no- end. Last night it d impression by the ice of its orchestra- which it illustrated s of the poem and there described. The other European regularity and vio- ot large, nor par- s and the percussive should not say g and difficult inter- priggish Mendels- solo — superlatively idered if any vio- oma—seemed to owe rbed his genteels to the dances of e concerts. Mr. es of the marimba, ility and taste, ggestions of blazing movement he was and movement, hints sh; and Mendels- tin-American dance- apidity. Mr. Zig- c idiom, the langor- es acid, especially s of the contralto— he audience liked authentically to the warmly, and ap- e music its claim to tzky's accompani- solely a riotous tour- ended brilliantly e.

he sixth and last rmance of Brahms's closed the concert

Dr. Koussevitzky's seem constantly to balance, while they natic and emotional w fewer exaggerated

The introduction to had last night no

neither was the transformed into a ere was no lack of on in the one, nor loveliness in the grace of the al-liming jubilation of the last movement remembered.

Rio Grande," for use was accorded to nd solo pianoforte ers of the evening,

S. S.

C minor, Op. 68.

April 28, 1921.

CONCERT

st concert of the

les of the Boston

took place last

vitzky had finally wing program, one

used his audience

uite for Orchestra,

(in place of the

"Ballett Borodine,"

rus, by N. Tcherep-

nd solo pianoforte

Sitwell); Brahms,

C minor, Op. 68.

New Co New Cor

An Exuberant And a M Prove

THE audience of the first night like no other has been more youthful and feminine. On the first night it has "social cathartic" ties in such measure as did he inflate subscription Saturday. At the end of the first night, it is safe to say that the audience enjoys private style. On its own sake; that it is the years and from twenty-four. Koussevitzky did not flinch from piece, now near to of Friday, the "own. A Viennese Saturday, the Parisian, like Mr. Tuesday. Above all, turns faces seem than American. Decidedly Mr. Berzovsky, while beyond all mettle. His Symphony makes no secret of its intentions. Probably to the usual divisions. A recurring motif, clearly defined on the program, varied, binds the whole together. Secondary motifs character each division; and conductor. There is little development in the orthodox symphonic sense. Instead, changing rhythm, diversified harmonic and instrumental color, keep the music in motion hoven's third and significance. True Russian, Mr. whipped this free melody, free rhythm. (There is Caprice) fared hardly a "modernism" in the whole Dr. Koussevitzky's Symphony.) Above all, he has a passion him for grants place. Or the of his call. The for cheerful even the Tuesday pace. For both, is not an institution.

Mr. Zighera, of choir by choir, rather individual instrument leaps; his slow movements his finale rises, breaks in floods of sound. Anywhere, if there are details, them out? Hot blood, an orchestra at full power before them. Only pedantic persons" will say nay to sky's Symphony of youth.

From Dr. Koussevitzky's third "Leonora" sounds in high, heroic voice for misses no significant or sharpens the moment. Yet the whole expands and each phrase, each musical paragraph falls into place. There is transition, superb musical design, puissant moulded and dramatized. One of the victory of these rance, love over hate, light. The listener doubts only when the proclaiming too faint and far. . . . these realistic days of Spain Rimsky-Korsakov's "Capriccio" only by courtesy title. Pl. first last, and nearly orchestral show-piece. viewers of music in New petually upon a lofty plane elevation." For the rest of Rimsky's kickshaws—sy song, cadenzas, fandango so long as there is a virtuosos dispense them and a conductor in it to give the word. —maybe tucks up her ears such a music.

petuous, plunging through a single movement, well marked into the usual divisions. A recurring motif, clearly defined at the outset, oftener repeated than varied, binds the whole together. Secondary motifs character each division; and conductor. There is little development in the orthodox symphonic sense. Instead, changing rhythm, diversified harmonic and instrumental color, keep the music in motion hoven's third and significance. True Russian, Mr. whipped this free melody, free rhythm. (There is Caprice) fared hardly a "modernism" in the whole Dr. Koussevitzky's Symphony.) Above all, he has a passion him for grants place. Or the of his call. The for cheerful even the Tuesday pace. For both, is not an institution.

THE

Dan Tardugno of Lawrence, 126-pound semi-finalist by the Turaza of Holyoke in the final. Tardugno lost to Joe Pacini in the final.

Ed Morgan Gives Signs with In

NEW ORLEANS, March 10.—Eddie Morgan, Cleveland, run hitting first sacker, placed his baseball career on his box factory interests and his contract with the Indians. Eddie and his father after conference with Evans, decided business career of the baseball could wait with a bright future the game immediately ahead. Morgan had announced previously that he was through with baseball and would enter the box factory.

move for violas has character; the scherzo is sufficiently piquant; the finale bringing in the chief theme with insistence in tumultuously exciting. The orchestration suits no doubt the prevailing hurrah-boys spirit of the symphony. One would gladly hear passages of delicacy; recognize a more discreet use of the orchestra. A more frequent dynamic contrasts; a keener search after beauty of emotional expression. But one should not expect too much, even from a young man of an indisputable musical nature, who has a flaming temperament as was shown even in his conducting. His symphony means much to him, and if at times he "over-conducted," not sparing even the score which in his enthusiasm he knocked from the desk; if certain pages of the work seemed unnecessarily flamboyant, yet the very large audience felt that Mr. Berzovsky had something to say that was worth while, and often said it effectively; it felt this and was so pleased with his fiery spirit that it recalled him several times and in no perfunctory manner.

Mr. Zighera played in Boston for the first time. He is a brother of the harp-player and a leading violoncellist of the orchestra. He has won recognition in Paris, London and other European cities. His tone is not large, nor particularly rich—one should not say "sensuous" for the priggish Mendelssohn would have shuddered if any violinist had thus disturbed his gentleness and always agreeable concerts. Mr. Zighera showed facility and taste, though in the opening movement he was inclined to be feverish; and Mendelssohn was placid in rapidity. Mr. Zighera's tone was at times acid, especially in forte passages. The audience liked him; applauded him warmly, and appreciated Dr. Koussevitzky's accompaniment. The concert ended brilliantly with the Caprice. The sixth and last concert will be on April 27th.

Herald April 28, 1921. SYMPHONY CONCERT

The sixth and last concert of the Monday concert series of the Boston Symphony orchestra took place last evening. Dr. Koussevitzky had finally settled upon the following program, one which evidently pleased his audience well: J. S. Bach, Suite for Orchestra, No. 3, in D major (in place of the originally promised "Ballett Borodine," for orchestra and chorus, by N. Tcherenichin); Lambert, "The Rio Grande," for chorus, orchestra, and solo pianoforte (poem by Sacheverell Sitwell); Brahms, Symphony No. 1, in C minor, Op. 68.

the Cecilia Society. Fiedler, assisted in Constant Lambert's part was played. One of those per-ent Bach festival, is lightful of the com-works. Not only for-ustly familiar air—nists as a solo trans-string—is the suite-ontaneity, a melodic-rt order, a complete-echanical repetition-ulas in which Bach-take refuge when-The prelude with-gigue with which it-living and varied

's setting for chorus poem by Sacheverell a well-known family-ny poets—was first-nd. Last night it-d impression by the-ice of its orchestra-which it illustrated-s of the poem and-ere described. The-regularity and vio-s and the percussive-s and difficult inter-solo — superlatively-oma—seemed to owe-es of the marimba,--gestions of blazing-nd movement, hints-tin-American dance-c idiom, the languor-s of the contralto—authentically to the-e music its claim to-solely a riotous tour-

formance of Brahms's closed the concert. Dr. Koussevitzky's seem constantly to balance, while they natic and emotional w fewer exaggerated The introduction to had last night no neither was the transformed into a ere was no lack of on in the one, nor loveliness in the grace of the al-—liming jubilation of the last movement-remembered. use was accorded to-ers of the evening, S. S.

New Co New Cor

An Exuberant And a Man Prove

THE audience of the Measuring all like no one ever clouded. On "the kept every contour is more youth tonal lace-work of feminine. On the displayful cadenza it has "social cathartic to the comp ties in such ma once did he infla subscription Sat overstrain both the mistakable air o At the end the list haps it is safest violinist with a h audience enjoys priate style. Pl own sake; that i Concerto in charac motive; that it the years and fro twenty-four. C Koussevitzky did n audience of Syntral part. Taken f tinguished from piece, now near to of Friday, the "own. A Viennese Saturday, the Parisian, like Mr. Tuesday. Above stinctively. turns faces seem than American. Decidedly Mr. Bel while beyond all mettle. His Symp and makes no se petuous, plunging through a single move. Probably to nment, well marked into the usual divi hearers. Mr. Lisions. A recurring motif, clearly defined known quality at the outset, oftener repeated than on the program varied, binds the whole together. Sec- ondary motifs character each division; one or two suggest Russian folk-tunes. and conductor. There is little development in the ortho- dox symphonic sense. Instead, changing rhythm, diversified harmonic and instru- mental color, keep the music in motion and significance. True Russian, Mr. Berezovsky is no structural composer; while throughout he prefers free form, free melody, free rhythm. (There is hardly a "modernism" in the whole Symphony.) Above all, he has a passion for sonorities fed, no doubt, by orches- tral experience as player and conductor. He chooses the driving pace, the whip- ping rhythm, the tumultuous progress. He urges his orchestra exuberantly, un- remittingly, often to the neglect of con- trast. He deploys it in tonal mass, or

Mr. Zighera, of fly of musicians, is familiar harpist an phony Hall. He h Paris—in orchestra leader of a string q try fortune in A His choice of M suggests his quali- sician. He draws finely tempered to tends to run thin it with keen ear, musical instinct an effective nor eloque sense of the words, tone expertly; kee with accompanying and round a phras control a climax—a clear feeling for t

From Dr. Koussevitzky tra the third "Leonora" sounds in high, heroic volc for misses no significant or sharpens the momenta- Yet the whole expands and each phrase, each music paragraph falls into There is transition, suspens, musical design, puissant moulded and dramatized t one of the victory of trais rance, love over hate, light The listener doubts only w when the proclaiming tr too faint and far. these realistic days of Span Rimsky-Korsakov's "Capric only by courtesy title. first last, and nearly all orchestral show-piece. viewers of music in New petually upon a lofty pla elevation." For the rest of Rimsky's kickshaws— sy song, cadenzas, fandango so long as there is a virtuo dispense them and a con in it to give the word. —maybe tucks up her hears such a music.

Dan Tardugno of 126-pound semi-fi Turaza of Holyok Tardugno lost to bury in

Ed Morgan Signs

NEW ORLEA
—Eddie Morgan run hitting fi placed his base his box factory his contract wi Eddie and his ference with business career could wait with the game imme Morgan had a that he was t and would ent

with his father in Kenner

rived at his dressing room. no announcement made by and the fans were mildly see Roberts come in for th Henry Burns of Cambridge Mack dropped Roberts in round, treating him to an plastering. He was clearly the verdict.

Steve Salek scored another when Nat Bor was forced in the second round when shoulder went out of kilter, driving his way to victory accident happened.

GAINOR BEATS CHABOT IN SEMI-FINAL

Billy Chick Gainor of southern New England champion, whose startling Joe Delmont was one of the ing features in the tournament Edward Chabot of Manchester in the opening semi-final pound class.

Chabot drew a bye and fresh made matters quite for the Rhode Island champion scored enough right hand the body to have stopped a boxer, but Chabot kept plow keep Gainor busy trying to with a solid smash to the

All Gainor had to do was the style he did with Del he jabbed and hooked with hand with good result, but the final when he fighting range, he begin to advantage, and then he score heavily and win the

REACH FINALS IN QUICK FASHION

Antique Kessu W
2 Antique Bed Co Long Valance with Temple of He birds, animals ery predomin
Antique Gold Bro
Chinese blue Goddess of Mercy red wall hang 8 Skirts of Bro panels, heavily 12 Assorted Large backgrounds

The chorus of the Cecilia Society, trained by Arthur Fiedler, assisted in the performance of Constant Lambert's work, whose pianoforte part was played by Jesus Maria Sanroma.

The Bach suite, one of those performed at the recent Bach festival, is among the most delightful of the composer's orchestral works. Not only for the beautiful and justly familiar air—often played by violinists as a solo transcribed or the G string—is the suite memorial; it has spontaneity, a melodic charm of the highest order, a complete freedom from the mechanical repetition of conventional formulas in which Bach was accustomed to take refuge when ideas were lacking. The prelude with which it opened, the gigue with which it closed, were full of living and varied beauty.

Constant Lambert's setting for chorus and orchestra of a poem by Sacheverell Sitwell—member of a well-known family of English modernist poets—was first introduced to symphony audiences during the past week-end. Last night it again created a vivid impression by the boldness and brilliance of its orchestration, the skill with which it illustrated the changing moods of the poem and pictured the scenes there described. The almost hysterical irregularity and violence of its rhythms and the percussive brilliance of the long and difficult interludes for piano solo—superlatively played by Mr. Sanroma—seemed to owe as much to jazz as to the dances of Brazil and the tones of the marimba, yet there were suggestions of blazing sunlight and color and movement, hints of more typically Latin-American dance-rhythm and melodic idiom, the languorous closing measures of the contralto—traits that belonged authentically to the setting and gave the music its claim to be regarded as not solely a riotous tour-de-force of technique.

An excellent performance of Brahms's C minor symphony closed the concert (and the series). Dr. Koussevitzky's readings of Brahms seem constantly to gain in measure and balance, while they lose nothing in dramatic and emotional force. There are now fewer exaggerated extremes of tempo. The introduction to the first movement had last night no excessive breadth, neither was the exquisite andante transformed into a slow adagio. Yet there was no lack of majesty and exaltation in the one, nor of repose and calm loveliness in the other. The flowing grace of the allegretto, the overwhelming jubilation of the final pages of the last movement were alike to be remembered.

Enthusiastic applause was accorded to the players and singers of the evening, and to Dr. Koussevitzky.

S. S.

SYMPHONY HALL, BOSTON

50th SEASON, 1930-1931

Sixth Concert of the
MONDAY EVENING SERIES

Boston Symphony
Orchestra

(110 Musicians)

Dr. SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY, Conductor

Monday Evening, April 27, at 8.15 o'clock

PROGRAMME

N. Tcherepnin Ballet Borodine
Suite for Orchestra with Chorus

Lambert . "The Rio Grande," for Chorus, Orchestra and Solo Pianoforte (Poem by Sacheverell Sitwell)
Piano Solo: JESÚS MARÍA SANROMÁ

Brahms Symphony No. 1, in C minor, Op. 68

CHORUS OF THE CECILIA SOCIETY, Arthur Fiedler, Conductor

SYMPHONY HALL

BOSTON

Third Concert of the
TUESDAY AFTERNOON SERIES

Tuesday, February 10, at 3 o'clock

Boston
Symphony Orchestra

Dr. SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY, Conductor

PROGRAMME

Beethoven Symphony No. 3 in E-flat major,
"Eroica," Op. 55

- I. Allegro con brio.
- II. Marcia funebre: Adagio assai.
- III. Scherzo; Allegro vivace; Trio.
- IV. Finale: Allegro molto.

Beethoven Concerto for Pianoforte No. 4, in G major, Op. 58

- I. Allegro moderato.
- II. Andante con moto.
- III. Rondo vivace.

Beethoven Overture to Goethe's "Egmont"

SOLOIST
MYRA HESS

SYMPHONY HALL, BOSTON

50th SEASON, 1930-1931

Sixth Concert of the
TUESDAY AFTERNOON SERIES

Boston Symphony
Orchestra

(110 Musicians)

Dr. SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY, Conductor

Tuesday Afternoon, April 21, at 3.00 o'clock

PROGRAMME

- Chadwick . . . Noël from the Symphonic Sketches
In memory of
George W. Chadwick, November 13, 1854—April 4, 1931
- Schumann . . . Symphony No. 1, in B-flat major, Op. 38
- Stravinsky . . . Capriccio for Piano and Orchestra
Piano Solo: JESÚS MARÍA SANROMÁ
- Strauss . . . "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks", after the
Old-fashioned, Roguish Manner—in Rondo Form, Op. 28

There will be an intermission after the symphony

With a Bit of His Music for Memory

A Bow to George W. Chadwick
As a Symphonic Series
Reaches End

Trans. — Apr. 22, 1931

THE last concert of the Tuesday series of the Boston Symphony Orchestra—held yesterday—was also the occasion of honoring the memory of the late George W. Chadwick. First upon the program stood the "Noël" from his Symphonic Sketches. When Dr. Koussevitzky reached his podium, the men rose to their feet, remained standing a moment in reverent attitude, were seated, after which came "Noël." For the rest the program contained Schumann's Symphony No. 1, in B-flat, known also as the Spring Symphony, and played at the concerts of the last week-end; Stravinsky's Capriccio for piano and orchestra, with Mr. Sanroma as soloist; Strauss's rondo, "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks."

Mr. Chadwick's "Noël"—Andante con tenerezza—deals not with the exuberant joy so often associated with Christmas but has for its motto a poem of the "dreamless slumber" of the Holy Child, "while angel hosts were listening." The program-book described it as a nocturne. It is a simple melody, direct and straightforward, but very expressive, that is developed, rises to an ecstatic climax. Oboe and English horn, occasionally a solo violin, in the climax a trumpet, carry the burden of the melody. Very expressively, "con amore" Dr. Koussevitzky and his men played it yesterday.

The symphony of the Spring is one of the conductor's rarest achievements. It is also Schumann in his most characteristic manner—or perhaps better, his most characteristic manners. Schumann, the naive builder of forms and maker of even more naive introductions and interludes; Schumann, the composer of heart-felt melodies that can only be described by those two untranslatable German words, "schwärmerisch" and "innig"; Schumann, the inventor of rhythms both buoyant and ardent, rhythms light but propulsive, rhythms which in this case are perfect expression for the joy and the thrill and the exuberance of spring.

also told by those who have provided wisdom in such matters, that Schumann's orchestration is faulty. Of such Dr. Koussevitzky's conducting scarcely a trace. One hears no loss of effect, no turgidity of utterance, no hidden or obscured significant Schumann's faults Dr. Koussevitzky puts aside. Schumann's naivetes the conductor's hand become virtues. Schumann's virtues become marks of musical and expressive effect. Dr. Koussevitzky delights in those melodies and how they sing for him. How he works magic with the tones of a scherzo, even more those of a Stravinsky's Capriccio further tends only to further clarify its meaning. One is aware first of all (save perhaps in the rhapsodic Andante) of Stravinsky as flawless formalist. He builds according to tradition, but the sense of proportion and of pleasant balancing several parts is strong upon one who listens to the Capriccio. The frequent objections made to it, that the material is "insignificant," is (terrible!) "frivolous," or (worse still!) that it lacks of music-halls," may very easily be taken by Stravinsky and his men for positive virtues of the work. Why should they not? Since when is it necessary that "frivolity" (let us say) be sically damned? It is not what an expresses, but the way in which he does his job, that counts for or against him. If it were not so, most operas, a part of Shakespeare, would have to be taken off the board. The aesthetic fallacy of hierarchy of ideas, of assorted ideas of values has been exploded too strongly to require renewed rebuttal. Stravinsky who suggests light modern parts at light modern play can be considered the less an artist for pains. Indeed, some of those who in composition would be quick to say that it is more of an achievement than a musical picture of fun—just as hard to evoke soul plumbing tragedy. Some such conclusions yesterday's applause must also have reached. For the applause was tremendous and substantial until conductor and pianist, individually and together, and finally the orchestra had made bowing acknowledgment.

performance of "Till Eulenspiegel" was equally graphic, exceedingly brilliant, fitting close to one of the happiest several series of concerts which the orchestra annually gives. A. H. M.

SYMPHONY HALL, BOSTON

50th SEASON, 1930-1931

Sixth Concert of the
TUESDAY AFTERNOON SERIES

Boston Symphony
Orchestra

(110 Musicians)

Dr. SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY, Conductor

Tuesday Afternoon, April 21, at 3.00 o'clock

PROGRAMME

Chadwick . . . Noël from the Symphonic Sketches

In memory of

George W. Chadwick, November 13, 1854 — April 4, 1931

Schumann . . . Symphony No. 1, in B-flat major, Op. 38

Stravinsky . . . Capriccio for Piano and Orchestra
Piano Solo: JESÚS MARÍA SANROMÁ

Strauss . . . "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks", after the
Old-fashioned, Roguish Manner—in Rondo Form, Op. 28

There will be an intermission after the symphony

With a Bit of His Music for Memory

A Bow to George W. Chadwick
As a Symphonic Series
Reaches End

Trans. — Apr. 22, 1931
THE last concert of the Tuesday series of the Boston Symphony Orchestra—held yesterday—was also the occasion of honoring the memory of the late George W. Chadwick. First upon the program stood the "Noel" from his Symphonic Sketches. When Dr. Koussevitzky reached his podium, the men rose to their feet, remained standing a moment in reverent attitude, were seated, after which came "Noel." For the rest the program contained Schumann's Symphony No. 1, in B-flat, known also as the Spring Symphony, and played at the concerts of the last week-end; Stravinsky's Capriccio for piano and orchestra, with Mr. Sanroma as soloist; Strauss's rondo, "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks."

Mr. Chadwick's "Noel"—Andante con tenerezza—deals not with the exuberant joy so often associated with Christmas but has for its motto a poem of the "dreamless slumber" of the Holy Child, "while angel hosts were listening." The program-book described it as a nocturne. It is a simple melody, direct and straightforward, but very expressive, that is developed, rises to an ecstatic climax. Oboe and English horn, occasionally a solo violin, in the climax a trumpet, carry the burden of the melody. Very expressively, "con amore" Dr. Koussevitzky and his men played it yesterday.

The symphony of the Spring is one of the conductor's rarest achievements. It is also Schumann in his most characteristic manner—or perhaps better, his most characteristic manners. Schumann, the naive builder of forms and maker of even more naive introductions and interludes; Schumann, the composer of heart-felt melodies that can only be described by those two untranslatable German words, "schwärmerisch" and "innig"; Schumann, the inventor of rhythms both buoyant and ardent, rhythms light but propulsive, rhythms which in this case are perfect expression for the joy and the thrill and the exuberance of spring.

also told by those who have provided wisdom in such matters, that Schumann's orchestration is faulty. Of such Dr. Koussevitzky's conducting scarcely a trace. One hears no loss of effect, no turgidity of utterance, no hidden or obscured significant. Schumann's faults Dr. Koussevitzky puts aside. Schumann's naivetes the conductor's hand become virtues. Schumann's virtues become marks of musical and expressive effect. Dr. Koussevitzky delights in those melodies and how they sing for him. How he works magic with the forms of a scherzo, even more those of a Stravinsky's Capriccio further tends only to further clarify its meaning. One is aware first of all (save possibly in the rhapsodic Andante) of Stravinsky as flawless formalist. He builds according to tradition, but the sense of proportion and of pleasant balancing of several parts is strong upon one who listens to the Capriccio. The frequent objections made to it, that the material is "insignificant," is (terrible!) "frivolous," or (worse still!) that it lacks of music-halls," may very easily be taken by Stravinsky and his men for positive virtues of the work.

Why should they not? Since when necessary that "frivolity" (let us say) is actually damned? It is not what an expresses, but the way in which he does his job, that counts for or against him. If it were not so, most operas, a part of Shakspeare, would have to be on the board. The æsthetic fallacy of a hierarchy of ideas, of assorted ideas of values has been exploded too often to require renewed rebuttal. Stravinsky who suggests light modern parts at light modern play can be considered the less an artist for pains. Indeed, some of those who in composition would be quick to say that it is more of an achievement than a musical picture of fun—just as hard to evoke soul plumbing tragedy. Some such conclusions yesterday's performance must also have reached. For applause was tremendous and substantial until conductor and pianist, inally and together, and finally the orchestra had made bowing acknowledgment.

performance of "Till Eulenspiegel" was ingly graphic, exceedingly brilliant, fitting close to one of the happiest several series of concerts which the orchestra annually gives. A. H. M.

34
SYMPHONY HALL, BOSTON

50th SEASON, 1930-1931

Sixth Concert of the
TUESDAY AFTERNOON SERIES

Boston Symphony
Orchestra

(110 Musicians)

Dr. SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY, Conductor

Tuesday Afternoon, April 21, at 3.00 o'clock

PROGRAMME

Chadwick . . . Noël from the Symphonic Sketches

In memory of

George W. Chadwick, November 13, 1854—April 4, 1931

Schumann . . . Symphony No. 1, in B-flat major, Op. 38

Stravinsky . . . Capriccio for Piano and Orchestra
Piano Solo: JESÚS MARÍA SANROMÁ

Strauss . . . "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks", after the
Old-fashioned, Roguish Manner—in Rondo Form, Op. 28

There will be an intermission after the symphony

35
With a Bid
Music

A Bow to Geo

As a Sym

Reac

Trans.

THE last cor American series of the istrars, Dr orchestra—held system was the occasion of hing achiev the late George changes wi upon the program "The me his Symphonic place educa Koussevitzky rea achievem men rose to theing the tak ing a moment in ing him ou seated, after whi of forms u the rest the pro "The tw mann's Symphony theory of also as the Spring facilitation at the concerts latter elim Stravinsky's Cap iversity wor orchestra, with M Strauss's rondo, Merry Pranks."

Mr. Chadwick's tenerezza—deals joy so often ass but has for its "dreamless slumb "while angel host program-book des It is a simple mel forward, but very veloped, rises to Oboe and Englis solo violin, in t carry the burden expressively, "co vitzky and his m

The symphony of the conductor It is also Schuma teristic manner— most characteristi the naïve builder even more naïve i udes; Schumann, felt melodies that by those two words, "schwärm Schumann, the in buoyant and arde propulsive, rhyth are perfect expre the thrill and the nation of t which, he decline.

Speaking nineteenth,

series of the istrars, Dr

chestra—held system was the occasion of hing achiev

the late George changes wi

upon the program "The me

his Symphonic place educa

Koussevitzky rea achievem

men rose to theing the tak ing a moment in ing him ou seated, after whi of forms u

the rest the pro "The tw mann's Symphony theory of also as the Spring facilitation

at the concerts latter elim

Stravinsky's Cap iversity wor

orchestra, with M

Strauss's rondo, Merry Pranks."

On

Best

APRI

"Co

the

The coll

'31

Jobs are po

Best t

Why sho

yet

Before

THE

w

Dartn

Yes o bling

Accord

"Mr

watchd treasury

Accord

One is also told by those who have profound wisdom in such matters, that Schumann's orchestration is faulty. Of such faults Dr. Koussevitzky's conducting leaves scarcely a trace. One hears no muddiness of effect, no turgidity of utterance, no hidden or obscured significant matter. Schumann's faults Dr. Koussevitzky puts aside. Schumann's naïvetes under the conductor's hand become virtues; Schumann's virtues become marvels of musical and expressive effect. How Dr. Koussevitzky delights in those simple melodies and how they sing for him! How he works magic with the rhythms of a scherzo, even more those of a finale!

With Stravinsky's Capriccio further hearing tends only to further clarify its lines. One is aware first of all (save possibly in the rhapsodic Andante) of Stravinsky as flawless formalist. He builds not according to tradition, but the sense of proportion and of pleasant balancing of the several parts is strong upon one as one listens to the Capriccio. The most frequent objections made to it, that its material is "insignificant," is (terrible thought!) "frivolous," or (worse still!) that it "smacks of music-halls," may very possibly be taken by Stravinsky and his admirers for positive virtues of the work. Indeed why should they not? Since when is it necessary that "frivolity" (let us say) be musically damned? It is not what an artist expresses, but the way in which he does his job, that counts for or against him. If it were not so, most operas, a large part of Shakspeare, would have to go by the board. The æsthetic fallacy of a hierarchy of ideas, of assorted ideas of graded values has been exploded too thoroughly to require renewed rebuttal. The Stravinsky who suggests light modern hearts at light modern play can hardly be considered the less an artist for his pains. Indeed, some of those who dabble in composition would be quick to assert that it is more of an achievement to paint a musical picture of fun—just fun—than to evoke soul plumbing tragedies. Some such conclusions yesterday's audience must also have reached. For the applause was tremendous and subsided not until conductor and pianist, individually and together, and finally the whole orchestra had made bowing acknowledgment.

The performance of "Till Eulenspiegel" exceedingly graphic, exceedingly brilliant, was fitting close to one of the happiest of the several series of concerts which the orchestra annually gives. A. H. M.

Jesús María Sanromá

Afternoon of Beethoven and Of Myra Hess

Koussevitzky and the 'Eroica,'
The Pianist Through the G-Major Concerto

Trans. Feb. 11, 1931

NO SINFUL, perturbing modernist intruded. Beethoven filled the whole program—the thrice-familiar Beethoven of the "Eroica" symphony, the "Egmont" overture, the piano-concerto, numbered four and in the key of G major. The orchestra was at the top of its form; the conductor master of himself, his men, the music before him. The pianist for the concerto, Miss Hess, cherished in particular by the Bostonian public, once more raising expectation and fulfilling it; adding her own following to the usual audience at a Tuesday matinee in Symphony Hall. Close attention; no coughing even in these days of February damps; honest, general, hearty applause. Superlative performance of familiar and honored music; decorum and pleasure hand in hand. A perfect concert, departing down the aisles, one to another. Certainly one at high point in the "best Bostonian tradition." Even to reviewers, skirmishing on the outskirts, notable in kind. If tickets were hard to come by—the theme of intermission-gossip—the more fortunate those who had procured them, and forgotten the digging in the pleasure of the reward.

In the morning Dr. Koussevitzky had plied his pains and loosed his enthusiasms upon Monsieur Honegger. For the conductor thinks highly of the Parisian's new Symphony, to be heard on Friday and Saturday. Yet in the afternoon, he came, possibly for the hundredth time, to Beethoven's "Eroica," as though for him and for the while there were no other music in the world. With none of the great Ludwig's greater symphonies does he more excel. Writers about the theater discourse of "the illusion of the mean the ability it plays as it speech that he s these laurels. though but now t be listening to ps; to wing the in this concert-ly accomplishes to discover the ated, with what w sounding it. the instant. on to marvel at Dr. Koussevitzky er of the strings, sion of the first bility, their range and learned, con e lights and all he is hearing it er Beethoven de- he emotion that ounts, with him first audience in loved the upper a quarter ago. above and apart searches the per- r. Laurent's flute one perfunctory Mr. Polatschek's archer for sensa- ties. The horns e vitalized; hears e played at Sym- und him, hitting magic of sound or—should it be- ury of composers ive listener takes our piercing mod- ntasy; decks the e in the incisive the glamour of ca." Upon this thing but that in upon a single in- position—sits by vitzky can inlay aphony, out of it- hoven fashioned. e perennially re- day—the momen- s repertory piece! ing whole. And then Dr. Kousse- of conductor, or- ks to a tempera- a" is true equally is for him a first re to "Egmont." assemblage to be should have risen s play.

ore. The conduc- ent, for many, of ca" a voice that playing of the addition. So gen- th Concerto. The moves in heroic he them and could ing of the darker hat "the G-major piece." Perhaps herzo, the golden- ment. But Miss horns, seem each nate in scintillant other. In thrill- ed and in sharp ale ascends from e orchestra, turn deeper-textured, ot exactly a femi- period; firmer and he was clothed in slow movement— liance, now finely ch the symphonic nt noon. Nor was oralyzing nor sen- the close-woven taltedly of the soul orchestra through ie other souls that oth, the composer lamented has rid- le act of creation. st movement, rid- the sensitive tech- the first audience f euphony, joined was no "Eroica" and players in ad symphony in of the plaint of g van Beethoven." forbidding orches- must have infused the final exulta- ic voice spoken the, deliver the final exulta- conducting, deliver 1? Composer-con- l Beethoven wrote. es was known to did it remain for haps none to ex- for Muck and nd in a hundred canini, to set free far as this our release the heroic aliences have been they did and do; pianist of full-rip- ing, in them, and ng, wide-sweeping, deep. Yesterday at for beauty and naphony, goes jus- hat for beauty and H. T. P.

Jesús María Sanromá

RCHIEFS

y Value But

And Every O
Is Regularly

Moderns who dash of smartness in kerchiefs . . . who intensively seek things that are distinctive . . . will come this sale. Handkerchiefs with clever, unique patterns . . . featuring embroidered signs in gay colors. In fact a wardrobe with less than 150 smart handkerchiefs of a quality which is the accepted standard at the price of 50c. For sale only first time." By it they mean the ability of the actor to make the speech that he nightly repeats sound as though but now it had sprung to his lips; to wing the action that he regularly accomplishes and long since calculated, with what seems the impulse of the instant.

Playing the "Eroica," Dr. Koussevitzky conjures up this "illusion of the first time." The practised, and learned, concert-goer believes that he is hearing it with something like the emotion that may have traversed the first audience in Vienna a century and a quarter ago. The student of details searches the performance and finds not one perfunctory or overlooked. The searcher for sensation feels each measure vitalized; hears the whole swirling around him, hitting him between the eyes, or—should it be—the ears. The imaginative listener takes the pleasure of his fantasy; decks the creative Beethoven in the glamour of romance—he wore anything but that in his struggles with composition—sits by at the miracle of a symphony, out of itself and of performance perennially renewed. The "Eroica" as repertory piece! Out upon the notion when Dr. Koussevitzky sets to it! Thanks to a temperament, every repetition is for him a first time; every audience an assemblage to be impressed.

Not only this but more. The conductor gives to the "Eroica" a voice that bears out a title of tradition. So generated, the symphony moves in heroic atmosphere. The rushing of the darker strings through the Scherzo, the golden-toned, broad-phrasing horns, seem each the complement of the other. In thrilling progress the Finale ascends from suspense to suspense—deeper-textured, ampler of curve and period; firmer and firmer rhythm. The slow movement—one of the few in which the symphonic Beethoven is neither moralizing nor sentimentalizing—speaks exaltedly of the soul of man, poignantly to the other souls that hear. The hero thus lamented has ridden the storm in the first movement, ridden it titanically. To the first audience in Vienna, the "Eroica" was no "Eroica"—only "a new grand symphony in D-sharp by Herr Ludwig van Beethoven." But the heroic spirit must have infused the music, the heroic voice spoken out. Did Beethoven, conducting, deliver the music to the full? Composer-conductors are not always fortunate with their own pieces. Or did it remain for Habeneck and Bülow, for Muck and Koussevitzky and Toscanini, to set free the heroic spirit, to release the heroic tones. Enough that they did and do; while the art of conducting, in them, and for this "Eroica" Symphony, goes justified.

it plays as it is these laurels. He is listening to in this concert to discover the how sounding it. on to marvel at the strings, their range of lights and all Beethoven demands, with him loved the upper above and apart. r. Laurent's flute Mr. Polatschek's ties. The horns played at Syme magic of sound of composers our piercing mode in the incisive ca." Upon this upon a single in- vitzky can inlay hoven fashioned. day—the momen- ing whole. And of conductor, or- a" is true equally re to "Egmont." should have risen s play.

ent, for many, of playing of the th Concerto. The he them and could hat "the G-major piece." Perhaps ment. But Miss nale in scintillant ed and in sharp e orchestra, turn ot exactly a femi- he was clothed in llance, now finely nt noon. Nor was the close-woven orchestra through oth, the composer le act of creation. the sensitive tech- f euphony, joined and players in of the plaint of forbidding orches- the final exulta- submissive silence. ll Beethoven wrote, es was known to rhaps none to ex- nd in a hundred ar as this our diences have been pianist of full-rip- ng, wide-sweeping, deep. Yesterday at for beauty and for poetry, she may still sensitize fineness.

H. T. P.

Jesús María Sanromá

RCH

y Value

ss!

Group—Regularly

hase of Handkerchiefs in this grouping, presenting with hand spun finished Appenzell effects and scalloped and pin do. See this va-

are scores
.....Each

Orders Filled Promptly
Berty 2300

WHITNEY

And PANY
Is R^e and West Street

Modern dash of kerchiefs, distinct, come chiefs que p featur signs. In fact less Han ity v stan price sale only

Army Allots $22
for Bay State

Special to the Transcript:
Washington, Feb. 11.—The Finance Department will expend Massachusetts to relieve unemployment act. Of the sum, $12,000 expended at the Watertown and $9400 at the Springfield Army improvements and repairs to barracks.

Say Oil Men Cut
Prices to Hit

Brockton Feb. 11 (A.P.)

29^c Each

50

The orchestra, when it plays as it played yesterday, shares these laurels. Perhaps the hearer must be listening to a familiar music, played in this concert-hall these twenty years, to discover the full merit of those now sounding it. Once more there is reason to marvel at the splendor and the power of the strings, their unanimity and flexibility, their range in sonorities over all the lights and all the shadows. The deeper Beethoven descends, the higher he mounts, with him they also go. Beethoven loved the upper voices of the woodwinds above and apart from the tonal mass. Mr. Laurent's flute lends him its brightness; Mr. Polatschek's clarinet its clear suavities. The horns of Beethoven, as they are played at Symphony Hall, foretell the magic of sound and illusion that a century of composers has since intensified. Our piercing modern brass has its place in the incisive measures of the "Eroica." Upon this sensitive orchestra, as upon a single instrument, Dr. Koussevitzky can inlay every detail that Beethoven fashioned. They stood clear yesterday—the momentary part of an up-swelling whole. And what is here written of conductor, orchestra and the "Eroica" is true equally with the lesser overture to "Egmont." After it the curtain should have risen white-hot upon Goethe's play.

Not to forget the event, for many, of the day—Miss Hess's playing of the piano-part in the Fourth Concerto. The cynics were as God made them and could not forbear to say that "the G-major was at best a woman's piece." Perhaps it is—in the slow movement. But Miss Hess flinging out the finale in scintillant phrases at high speed and in sharp rhythm, answering the orchestra, turn and turn about, was not exactly a feminine pianist. Rather she was clothed in the new power and brilliance, now finely measured, of her present noon. Nor was she feminine again in the close-woven energies of piano and orchestra through the first movement—both, the composer hidden, in the veritable act of creation.

The imagining poet, the sensitive technician, the mistress of euphony, joined hands with conductor and players in the middle movement of the plaint of the piano against the forbidding orchestra; the long pleading, the final exultation, the whisper into submissive silence. The books say that until Beethoven wrote, no such poetry of tones was known to the concerto-form. Perhaps none to excel it is to be found in a hundred more concertos, as far as this our day. Of late her audiences have been hailing Miss Hess as pianist of full-ripened power, far-ranging, wide-sweeping, penetrating large and deep. Yesterday came the reminder that for beauty and for poetry, she may still sensitize fineness.

H. T. P.

MYRA HESS

CELEBRATED ENGLISH
PIANIST

The Concerts, As They Pass Or Draw Near

The Flute Players' New Series,
Mme. Frijs Variousy,
A Habit Altered

ENGAGEMENTS of artists have delayed the prospectus for the current season of the Boston Flute Players Club. Timely it now comes, assuring to this town, in a barren year,
five concerts of chamber music, chosen widely, to be played by resident musicians. Again Mr. Laurent will be musical director, drawing most of his instrumentalists from the Symphony Orchestra. As heretofore, the gallery of the Art Club will be the concert-room. With one exception the five concerts are announced at monthly intervals—for Sunday afternoons, Dec. 7 and 21, Jan. 18, Feb.
15, March 15, beginning at half-past three o'clock. For the first concert Mr. Laurent proposes these pieces:

Quartets in C major (No. 1); in E-flat major
(No. 3); in G major (No. 5) for Flute, Violin, Viola, Violoncello.....Christian Bach
(First time in Boston)
Trio for Flute, Viola, Violoncello.....Roussel
(First time in Boston)
Suite Divertissement.....Tansman
(First time in Boston)

The players are Messrs. Elcus (violin);
Lefranc (viola); A. Zighera (violoncello); Laurent (flute); Sanromá (piano). It is worth noting, besides, that Roussel's Trio, lately heard in Chicago at Mrs.
Coolidge's Festival of Chamber Music, is a little masterpiece in kind.

course of the concerts, continues ectus cautiously, "these works eard."

et for Harp, Flute, Violin, Viola, ncello.

Quartet in A major for Piano, Violin,
Viola, Violoncello.

onata for Harp, Flute, Viola da amba.

onique, from "Les Bouquets de Chassenay."

te for Flute, Violin, Viola, Violon-
lo.

ata for Flute and Piano.

Trio for Oboe, Clarinet, Bassoon.

intet for Woodwinds.

Chamber Concerto for Flute, Violin,
Piano.

Quintet for Flute and Strings.

ata for Flute and Piano.

et for Piano and Strings.

rio for Flute, Oboe, Clarinet.

onata, No. 2, for Flute and Piano.

season, at the beginning of its ar, the club asks the interest ort of all members, old, new or

ve. With equal reason it re-

m that the club's only income

venue from membership fees year) and guest-tickets at $2

ort. It might have added justi-

at the club is now the only body

ng a series of public chamber-in Boston; that these concerts

er ancient, modern or modern-

; that they do not lack lively or pleasurable quality. Out-nce visitors, they constitute music in Boston concert-rooms;

fore to be encouraged—lest in have none of our own making.

ss Mary Ingraham continues as treasurer, to be addressed at

y Street or called over Kenmore,

e other officers are Messrs Mal-

g, president; Charles Boyden, dent; James C. Howe, Gino L.

Edward M. Pickman, Verne D.

ohn B. Wills, directors.

oping for the largest possible

promptest support. H. T. P.

MYRA HESS

CELEBRATED ENGLISH
PIANIST

The Con As The Or Dr

The Flute Playe
Mme. Frijsht
A Habit

ENGAGEMENT-played the pro-rent season c-Players Club.

assuring to this town,
five concerts of chan-widely, to be played sians. Again Mr. La-cal director, drawing mentalists from the
tra. As heretofore, Art Club will be the cone exception the finounced at monthly in-afternoons, Dec. 7 ar 15, March 15, beginnir o'clock. For the fir-rent proposes these Quartets in C major (No.
(No. 3); in G major (No.
lin, Viola, Violoncello.

(First time
Trio for Flute, Viola, V
(First time
Suite Divertissement...
(First time

The players are Me.
Lefranc (viola); A. L.
Laurent (flute); Sanr worth noting, besid Trio, lately heard i Coolidge's Festival o.
a little masterpiece f-

LEV

B

Testif

stoc

I

Cl

Two-I Co

New Copyright

Vienn

twitchi

Charles

reputed rations for his

German

Vienna

mit to that he

French

cents of

There

er's ide him be police face an for just the Au

not a j

In the course of the concerts, continues the prospectus cautiously, "these works may be heard."

Cras: Quintet for Harp, Flute, Violin, Viola, Violoncello.

Chausson: Quartet in A major for Piano, Violin,
Viola, Violoncello.

Exaudet: Sonata for Harp, Flute, Viola da Gamba.

Prudent: Monique, from "Les Bouquets de Chassenay."

d'Indy: Suite for Flute, Violin, Viola, Violon-cello.

Ballay: Sonata for Flute and Piano.
Villa-Lobos: Trio for Oboe, Clarinet, Bassoon.

Förster: Quintet for Woodwinds.
Cherepnin: Chamber Concerto for Flute, Violin,
Piano.

Slavensky: Quintet for Flute and Strings.
Piston: Sonata for Flute and Piano.

Bloch: Quintet for Piano and Strings.
Bergson: Trio for Flute, Oboe, Clarinet.

Gaubert: Sonata, No. 2, for Flute and Piano.

With reason, at the beginning of its tenth year, the club asks the interest and support of all members, old, new or prospective. With equal reason it reminds them that the club's only income is the revenue from membership fees ($7.50 per year) and guest-tickets at $2 per concert. It might have added justifi-ably that the club is now the only body undertaking a series of public chamber-concerts in Boston; that these concerts range over ancient, modern or modernist music; that they do not lack lively interest or pleasurable quality. Outside chance visitors, they constitute chamber-music in Boston concert-rooms; are therefore to be encouraged—lest in time we have none of our own making.

Miss Mary Ingraham continues as secretary-treasurer, to be addressed at 6 Newbury Street or called over Kenmore, 0491. The other officers are Messrs Malcolm Lang, president; Charles Boyden, vice-president; James C. Howe, Gino L.
Perera, Edward M. Pickman, Verne D.
Powell, John B. Wills, directors. . . .
Here's hoping for the largest possible and the promptest support. H. T. P.

BERNARD ZIGHERA
Harp Soloist
Boston Symphony
Orchestra

SYMPHONY HALL, BOSTON

50th SEASON, 1930-1931

SIX TUESDAY AFTERNOON CONCERTS

November 25 January 6 February 10 February 24 March 10 April 21

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

(110 Musicians)

Dr. SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY, Conductor

OPENING PROGRAMME

BACH . . . Two Preludes (Arranged for String Orchestra
by Pick-Mangiagalli)

BEETHOVEN Symphony No. 7 in A major

BRAHMS Symphony No. 2 in D major

INQUIRY IS INVITED AT THE SUBSCRIPTION OFFICE

W. H. BRENNAN, Manager

G. E. JUDD, Assistant Manager

BERNARD ZIGHERA
Harp Soloist
Boston Symphony
Orchestra

SYMPHONY HALL, BOSTON

50th SEASON, 1930-1931

SIX TUESDAY AFTERNOON CONCERTS

November 25 January 6 February 10 February 24 March 10 April 21

THE BOSTON
SYMPHONY
ORCHESTRA

(110 Musicians)

Dr. SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY, Conductor

OPENING PROGRAMME

BACH . . . Two Preludes (Arranged for String Orchestra
by Pick-Mangiagalli)
BEETHOVEN Symphony No. 7 in A major
BRAHMS Symphony No. 2 in D major

INQUIRY IS INVITED AT THE SUBSCRIPTION OFFICE

W. H. BRENNAN, Manager

G. E. JUDD, Assistant Manager

374

It is an old idea and a good one—this concert of the three great B's. Toscanini used it to usher in his Sunday afternoon concerts in New York. Here Dr. Koussevitzky used it yesterday to inaugurate his Tuesday afternoon series.

From Bach and the tender manipulation of Pick-Mangiagalli, came two Preludes. The first, originally an organ prelude, sustained a mood serene and glowing from within. The second, from the Third Partita, was swift and spirited in rhythm and the orchestra, after its fatiguing travels, seemed to find it exacting. In neither instance did Bach lose anything at his transcriber's hands or at his interpreter's. For many he gained new clarity.

After intermission, the Brahms Second Symphony filled the cup of pleasure to brimming. More complex in development than the work which preceded it, its stabs of emotion were many barbed. It swept on, from the masterful, stirring opening, into the brooding calm of the second movement, from which, with renewed strength, the Scherzo burst forth joyously. The ascendant and transcendent harmonies of the Finale left the audience with flushed cheeks and sparkling eyes. Small wonder they were loathe to leave. For Dr. Koussevitzky and the orchestra, another triumph. Nov. 21/30 F. S. F.

another triumph. Nov. 26/30 F. S. F.

323

ies at the special committee never has been established. House, executive director, failed to bring light on it when he returned to the city yesterday, only remarking that a call for the meeting will be made. It is thought to be too high in scope to permit discussion of any policies. The Democratic party is confident of defeating any attempt to open up the prohibition issue for a vote.

ees for Wet Platform

we have expressed dissatisfaction with the present prohibition law, urged repeal or modification thereof. In the event that the committee adopts such a resolution it will be adopted by the ensuing conference before it is inserted in the par-

Governor Harry Flood Byrd of Virginia has warned his fellow Democrats not to adopt a party policy on the meeting March 5 would divide the party. The Virginian, who is national committeeman for his State, said such action would "violate government principle of representative government parties" and said he would oppose such a proposal. "With

erty-five, who have been the fourth concert of the Tresser series given by the Boston Symphony orchestra, Dr. Koussevitzky arranged the following program: "Finlandia," Symphonic Poem No. 7; Tchaikovsky, Symphony No. 4 in F minor. This was a fine choice of composers—their music proves quite different; further, the contrast between Beethoven's Symphonic Poem and the two compositions by some quarter of a century is interesting to observe the difference in the two works. "Finlandia" impresses with its hardness, sturdy rhythms and full melodies sung so expressively by the orchestra. It is optimistic in the manner of a folk song, but its subtleties cloud its meaning.

Lieberman and Saul their names as fol twenty-six, Bradshaw Dora Delavitch street, and Joseph street, Chelsea. The speaking without aldman, twenty, East South End, was sault and battery
Crowley, and Stan
Shawmut avenue
sault and battery
Gannon. They will

The fifth concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra's Tuesday afternoon series took place yesterday in Symphony hall. Dr. Koussevitsky conducted the following program: Mozart, Symphony in G minor and Berlioz, Symphonie Fantastique—two symphonies rarely heard at the same concert. The Mozart symphony retains a freshness and vigor that make it delightful to hear. Time has not dealt as kindly with the Symphonie Fantastique; though it is interesting, it has not those inherent qualities that tend, at each hearing, to fill it with vitality.

Sincerely and sympathetically was the Symphonie Fantastique treated. Though this symphony is remarkable in many respects — marvellous in sonority; effective in the various moods it establishes—it is often trite, banal, and noisy. It loses in power because the composer feels no curb in his dramatic outpouring. The effusiveness of Berlioz, even Dr. Koussevitsky's careful reading could not obliterate. There were moments when the music was frankly vulgar, despite the infinite pains of the conductor; however lovely melodies flicker through the symphony. The "Scene in the Meadows" was so finely done that its length was forgotten.

The sixth and last concert of this series will take place Tuesday, April 21.
L. B. D.

TUESDAY SY
The Boston

gave its first Tu
gram yesterday a

Koussevitzky con was Bach, Two F
string orchestra
Beethoven, Symp
jor, Opus 92; Br
2 in D major, Op

It is an old id
this concert of the cannini used it to afternoon concert
Dr. Koussevitzky
inaugurate his Tue

In spite of bar
depressions, Symp
ed. A temperate conductor, but th
series of repetitio
the warmth of it
day audience heard it for the first time.
afternoon progres
mission the orche
feet and when the
the Brahms Final
the listeners wer
they had come to away enlightened

From Bach and
tion of Pick-Me Preludes. The fi
gan prelude, sust
and glowing from from the Third E spirited in rhyth
after its fatigui find it exacting. I Bach lose anythir hands or at his in he gained new cla

In the Beethov
formance came clo
counterpoints to which routined hearers completely with could pin any possible objections. Rath living again the st pause which chara
ment, making of templative but no ceding through the third moveme
max of the fourt
tion.

After interm
ond Symphony fill to brimming. N velopment than ceded it, its stabs barbed. It swept ful, stirring open calm of the sea which, with rei Scherzo burst for endant and tri
of the Finale le flushed cheeks
Small wonder the
For Dr. Koussevit
another triumph.

Sibelius Amid the Tuesday Classics

SIBELIUS and Chaikovsky filled the program at Symphony Hall yesterday afternoon; Sibelius with the early and popular symphonic poem, "Finlandia," and the comparatively recent seventh symphony, Chaikovsky with the stirring fourth symphony in F minor.

An observer can occupy himself interestingly by taking note of the growing fortunes of a new symphony. The Seventh of Sibelius is such an one. Five years ago it was first played by Dr. Koussevitzky and the Boston Symphony Orchestra. This year has come the first series of repetitions. Yesterday a Tuesday audience heard it for the first time. Now the Tuesday audience is not one to which one brings works of an experimental nature. The inclusion of the symphony in the program is evidence in itself that the conductor regards it as a masterpiece accomplished rather than as a "noble experiment." How would this most recent of symphonic audiences regard a six-year-old symphony at first hearing? How would that small minority which has heard most of the Bostonian performances react to this latest playing? And lastly (perhaps this should have come first), how would repetition affect performance?

One recalls a sense of feeling baffled from the experienced audience of Friday afternoon when first it heard this symphony. However the symphony contained no harsh combinations of tones, no jarring counterpoints to which routined hearers could pin any possible objections. Rather, these hearers suspected dullness, while at the same time they realized vaguely the presence of forces in the face of which they dared not openly accuse the symphony of being dull. Those blest with deeper insight recognized austerity, unadorned power, the gaunt articulations of a skeletonized form, as positive assets of no mean order. But the majority remained at a willingness "to be shown."

To the audience yesterday the symphony was as new as to that previous audience of a Friday afternoon. Yet, to judge by those visible signs which alone make judgment possible, they accepted the latest Sibelius far more readily, far more eagerly, far more as a "matter of course" than did the others five years ago. One saw no signs of bewilderment, no evidences of being puzzled, no tell-tale reactions of boredom. Those who had heard most of the performances of the symphony before began to talk—for the first time—as if they were finding a covering of about thirty-five, who had ing the leader throughout the parade, suddenly swung his werful uppercut to the man e latter fell on the sidewalk her crowd gathered, and the ped upon the assailant, he and escaped down Stuart

police was sent to Station nge street, and as the crowd
a new crowd of the youth een on the Common as anti spectators appeared.

sweaters, caps and short jack ounced on the man who ha ed down and mauled him vig ll he, too, disappeared on the Fremont and Stuart street s entirely tied up during the police soon had the crowd in arrest was made here.

Verse Crowds

number of police, augmented rol loads of reserves who ar 2.30, handled the situation or on successfully. Mounted offi in dispersing the crowds after stration, but aside from the ests, there was no violence be ce and spectators. Robert A former clergyman and for fou
or of Peabody, who was arrest disturbance on Feb. 10, viewe
today from a bench near the

Cantor, Lieberman and Saul
sted gav their names as fol
a Block, twenty-six, Bradsha Dorchester; Dora Delavitch
Waban street, and Joseph

Williams street, Chelsea. They ged with speaking without Goldie Waldman, twenty, East
d street, South End, was
with assault and battery
fficer Paul Crowley, and Stan
ston of Shawmut avenue wa
with assault and battery
Francis Gannon. They wil

SYMPHONY CONCERT

fourth concert of the Tues noon series given by the Bos phony orchestra, Dr. Kousse ranged the following program:
Finlandia," Symphonic Poem
No. 7; Tchaikovsky,
No. 4 in F minor. This was choice of composers—their ancestors may have been their music proves quite dif
character; further, the con Sibelius's Symphonic Poem and Symphony, the two composi rated by some quarter of a show a wonderful develop is interesting to observe the the two works.

impresses with its wardness, sturdy rhythms ful melodies sung so expres the orchestra. It is optimis in the manner of a folk subtleties cloud its meaning, often would infringe on the e it not that the conductor's e fitness of things saved it in this category. In the symphony it would seem one with a different man. The on successfully. Mounted offi
in dispersing the crowds after stration, but aside from the ests, there was no violence be ce and spectators. Robert A former clergyman and for fou
or of Peabody, who was arrest
disturbance on Feb. 10, viewe
today from a bench near the

despite the wonderful co
the orchestra, its depths ded by the audience. It Waban street, and Joseph Williams street, Chelsea. They
ged with speaking without Goldie Waldman, twenty, East
d street, South End, was
with assault and battery
fficer Paul Crowley, and Stan
ston of Shawmut avenue wa
with assault and battery
Francis Gannon. They wil

performance of Tchaikovsky's sintillating; excellent in usly perfect as a whole.
was delicately tinged with he scherzo, of a faerie redolent of the whirling birds' wings.
ence welcomed Dr. Kous ained to applaud him.
25. '33 L. B. D.

SYMPHONY CONCERT

The fifth concert of the Boston Sym phony orchestra's Tuesday afternoon
series took place yesterday in Symphony hall. Dr. Koussevitzky conducted the following gprogram: Mozart, Symphony in G minor and Berlioz, Symphonie Fan
tastique—two symphonies rarely heard
at the same concert. The Mozart sym phony retains a freshness and vigor
that make it delightful to hear. Time has not dealt as kindly with the Sym phonie Fantastique; though it is in teresting, it has not those inherent qual ities that tend, at each hearing, to fill it with vitality.

Mozart's symphony was beautifully played—the finale, brilliant and exhil arating; the andante, quietly poignant.
There was a perfect fusion of the con
ductor's individuality with the compos er's art. Nor was there any cut and dried playing on the part of an orches tra presumably weary from recent trav
els. Phrases were exquisitely chiseled.
Each movement was a model in finesse.

Sincerely and sympathetically was the Symphonie Fantastique treated. Though
this symphony is remarkable in many respects — marvellous in sonority; ef fective in the various moods it estab lishes—it is often trite, banal, and noisy.
It looses in power because the composer
feels no curb in his dramatic outpour
ing. The effusiveness of Berlioz, even
Dr. Koussevitzky's careful reading could not obliterate. There were moments
when the music was frankly vulgar, de spite the infinite pains of the conduc tor; however lovely melodies flicker through the symphony. The "Scene in the Meadows" was so finely done that its length was forgotten.

A large audience was appreciative of the afternoon's music.

The sixth and last concert of this series will take place Tuesday, April 21.
L. B. D.

TUESDAY SY
The Boston

gave its first Tu
gram yesterday a

Koussevitzky com
was Bach, Two F
string orchestra
Beeethoven, Sympl
jor, Opus 92; Br
2 in D major, Op

It is an old id
this concert of the cannini used it to afternoon concert
Dr. Koussevitzky
inaugurate his Tue

In spite of bar
depressions, Symp
ed. A temperate conductor, but th
series of repetitions
the warmth of id
day audience heard it
afternoon progres
mission the orche
which one brings w
feet and when the
the Brahms Final
the listeners wer
they had come to away enlightened

From Bach and
tion of Pick-Ma Preludes. The fi
gan prelude, sust
and glowing from from the Third I spirited in rhyth
after its fatigues find it exacting. I Bach lose anythi hands or at his in
he gained new cla

In the Beethov
formance came clo players seemed to counterpoints to whic completely with living again the s pause which chara
ment, making of templative but no cending through the third moveme
max of the fourt
tion.

After intermiss
ond Symphony fill to brimming. A velopment than ceded it, its stabs
barbed. It swept ful, stirring open calm of the sec which, with re Scherzo burst for endant and tri
of the Finale le flushed cheeks
Small wonder the
For Dr. Koussevit
another triumph.

Sibelius Am

Tuesda

SIBELIUS and Ch program at Sym day afternoon; S ly and popular sym landia," and the co seventh symphony, Cl stirring fourth symph

An observer can estingly by taking fortunes of a new sy enth of Sibelius is s years ago it was first

In spite of bar
depressions, Symp
ed. A temperate conductor, but th
series of repetitions
the warmth of id
day audience heard it
afternoon progres
mission the orche
which one brings w
feet and when the
the Brahms Final
the listeners wer
they had come to away enlightened

One recalls a sense from the experienced afternoon when first phony. However the s no harsh combinations could pin any possible er, these hearers s while at the same t vaguely the presence o of which they dared the symphony of being with deeper insight re unadorned power, th
tions of a skeletonized assets of no mean orde ity remained at a w shown."

To the audience ye

phony was as new as to that previous audience of a Friday afternoon. Yet, to judge by those visible signs which alone make judgment possible, they accepted the latest Sibelius far more readily, far more eagerly, far more as a "matter of course" than did the others five years ago.
One saw no signs of bewilderment, no evidences of being puzzled, no tell-tale re actions of boredom. Those who had heard most of the performances of the sym phony before began to talk—for the first time—as if they were finding a covering of flesh and blood over these hard bones, steeled sinews. One heard in the intermis sion such expressions as "what emotional depth," or "what intensity of feeling," or "what dark, moving power."

Now it is not within belief that the Tuesday audience, eager as it is, far as it finds itself from a blasé point of view, should of itself be capable of as much censorer an appreciation of this symphony

Nor is the reaction of the "repeaters" without significance. Both together point to performance as perhaps a determining factor in this increased acceptance, in this new reaction toward the symphony.

It is matter of common knowledge that Dr. Koussevitzky's repetitions of a given work proceed in a straight line of gradual but sure ascent of increasing revelation of the work in hand. Of no work has this been more true than of Sibelius's seventh symphony. One begins now to hear strings sing in a rare but melan choly song. One hears trombones and brass, thrice-repeated, in a nobility and an elevation for which they seem as if made, but in which composers have none too often given them voice. One begins to hear wood-winds, in playful measures, taking on a new charm. By all the signs, thus, with yesterday's performance a new "Sibelius's Seventh" is beginning to emerge. One can find its early course thus far similar to that of symphonies of Brahms. Here, too, one found first austerity, erudition, scholarship; found these gradually giving way to glowing romance. Already one can add to the first impressions of this latest Sibelius.
It is not beyond belief that he also will in time achieve the glow which one now accords to the bearded Johannes.

Concerning "Finlandia" or Chaikov sky's "Fourth," what is there new to write? From the folk manner to the excitements of brass and percussion,
"Finlandia" came and went vividly. With the older symphony Dr. Koussevitzky again soothed, charmed, electrified. No less than cataclysmic are some of his climaxes.—Speaking of masterpieces, here is a masterpiece of interpretation.

A. H. M.

SYMPHONY CONCERT

For the fourth concert of the Tues day afternoon series given by the Bos ton Symphony orchestra, Dr. Kousse vitzky arranged the following program:
Sibelius, "Finlandia," Symphonic Poem
and Symphony No. 7; Tchaikovsky, Symphony No. 4 in F minor. This was an arresting choice of composers—though their ancestors may have been the same, their music proves quite dif ferent in character; further, the con tours of Sibelius's Symphonic Poem and Seventh Symphony, the two composi tions separated by some quarter of a century, show a wonderful develop ment. It is interesting to observe the contrast in the two works.

"Finlandia" impresses with its straightforwardness, sturdy rhythms and beautiful melodies sung so expres sively by the orchestra. It is optimis tic simple, in the manner of a folk tune. No subtleties cloud its meaning.
In fact, it often would infringe on the obvious were it not that the conductor's sense of the fitness of things saved it from falling in this category. In the Seventh Symphony it would seem one is dealing with a different man. The beautiful melodies he still retains, but they are more episodic in character.
Nothing is obvious; subtlety reigns su preme. The oneness of mood—for the contracts are not marked enough to break the general impression of som berness—does not relieve and refresh the listener by changes in intensity and feeling. The symphony is rich, power ful and profound. Despite Dr. Kousse vitzky's intelligent and thoughtful in terpretation, despite the wonderful co operation of the orchestra, its depths were not sounded by the audience. It left them baffled.

The performance of Tchaikovsky's symphony was scintillating; excellent in detail, wondrously perfect as a whole.
The andante was delicately tinged with melancholy; the scherzo, of a faerie quality, was redolent of the whirring of humming birds' wings.

A large audience welcomed Dr. Kousse vitzky and remained to applaud him.
Herald, Apr. 25, '33 L. B. D.

SYMPHONY CONCERT

The fifth concert of the Boston Sym
phony orchestra's Tuesday afternoon
series took place yesterday in Symphony
hall. Dr. Koussevitzky conducted the following program: Mozart, Symphony
in G minor and Berlioz, Symphonie Fan
tastique—two symphonies rarely heard
at the same concert. The Mozart sym
phony retains a freshness and vigor
that make it delightful to hear. Time
has not dealt as kindly with the Sym
phonie Fantastique; though it is in teresting, it has not those inherent qual
ities that tend, at each hearing, to fill it
with vitality.

Mozart's symphony was beautifully played—the finale, brilliant and exhil
arating; the andante, quietly poignant.
There was a perfect fusion of the con
ductor's individuality with the compos
er's art. Nor was there any cut and dried playing on the part of an orches tra presumably weary from recent trav
els. Phrases were exquisitely chiseled.
Each movement was a model in finesse.

Sincerely and sympathetically was the Symphonie Fantastique treated. Though
this symphony is remarkable in many respects — marvellous in sonority; ef fective in the various moods it estab
lishes—it is often trite, banal, and noisy.
It looses in power because the composer
feels no curb in his dramatic outpour
ing. The effusiveness of Berlioz, even
Dr. Koussevitzky's careful reading could not obliterate. There were moments
when the music was frankly vulgar, de spite the infinite pains of the conduc tor; however lovely melodies flicker
through the symphony. The "Scene in the Meadows" was so finely done that
its length was forgotten.

A large audience was appreciative of
the afternoon's music.
The sixth and last concert of this series will take place Tuesday, April 21.
L. B. D.

SYMPHONY HALL, BOSTON

50th SEASON, 1930-1931

Second Concert of the
TUESDAY AFTERNOON SERIES

The Boston
Symphony Orchestra
(110 Musicians)

Dr. SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY, Conductor

Tuesday Afternoon, January 6, at 3 o'clock

Wagner Programme

Overture to "RIENZI"

Bacchanale, "Der Venusberg" from "TANNHÄUSER"

Introduction to Act III, "LOHENGRIN"

Ride of the Valkyries from "DIE WALKÜRE"

Prelude and Love-Death

from "TRISTAN UND ISOLDE"

Prelude to

"DIE MEISTERSINGER VON NÜRNBERG"

This seems an appropriate time for us all to join in an expression of appreciation and gratitude to Dr. Koussevitzky for all that he has accomplished by his untiring devotion to the work of bringing our orchestra to its present perfection.

It is proposed to present at the end of this season to Dr. Koussevitzky a wreath of gold or other emblem marking his part in the Celebration of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's Fiftieth Anniversary which his splendid efforts have made so memorable.

If you care to participate in the gift kindly send your subscription (not exceeding one dollar) to Francis C. Gray, Lee, Higginson Trust Co., 50 Federal Street, Boston, not later than April 15th.

Mr. Frederick P. Cabot

Mrs. M. G. Haughton

Mr. Russell S. Codman, Jr.

Mr. and Mrs. E. B. Hill

Mr. and Mrs. N. Penrose Hallowell

Mrs. Edward Thaw

Mr. and Mrs. Alexander Steinert

No receipt will be sent unless requested.

TRANSCRIPT, MOND

serves It Bears

ath for Dr. Koussevitz

Final Concert in the Fiftieth Y ries Proposed It and Collected by Tiffany & Co. It Bears this and Affectionate Appreciation o
Boston Symphony Orchestra

This seems an appropriate time for us all to join in expression of appreciation and gratitude to Dr. Koussevitzky for all that he has accomplished by his untiring devotion to the work of bringing our orchestra to its present perfect

It is proposed to present at the end of this season Dr. Koussevitzky a wreath of gold or other emblem marking his part in the Celebration of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's Fiftieth Anniversary which splendid efforts have made so memorable.

If you care to participate in the gift kindly send your subscription (not exceeding one dollar) to Francis C. G. Lee, Higginson Trust Co., 50 Federal Street, Boston, later than April 15th.

Mr. Frederick P. Cabot	Mrs. M. G. Hall
Mr. Russell S. Codman, Jr.	Mr. and Mrs. E. T. Lee
Mr. and Mrs. N. Penrose Hallowell	Mrs. Edward T. Lee
Mr. and Mrs. Alexander Steinert

No receipt will be sent unless requested.

"He Who Deserves It Bears the Palm"

Wreath for Dr. Koussevitzky

Given to Him, on Saturday Last, at the Final Concert in the Fiftieth Year of the Boston Orchestra. A Committee of Subscribers to the Various Series Proposed It and Collected Subscriptions at One Dollar Apiece. It is a Design of Olive Leaves Cut in Gold by Tiffany & Co. It Bears this Inscription: "Serge Koussevitzky Inspired Leader with the Ever Grateful and Affectionate Appreciation of His Audiences. . . . Fiftieth Anniversary Boston Symphony Orchestra 1931."

SYMPHONY HALL

Wednesday, May 6

OPENING NIGHT

46th Season

POPS

Orchestra of 80 Symphony Players

ARTHUR FIEDLER, Conductor

POPULAR PROGRAMMES

REFRESHMENTS

Bound Volumes
OF THE
Boston Symphony Orchestra
Programme

Containing
Mr. Philip Hale's analytical and descriptive notes
on all works performed during the season:

The Friday and Saturday Symphony Programmes
The Monday and Tuesday Programmes
The Young People's Concerts Programmes

"A Musical Education in One Volume"
"Boston's Remarkable Book of Knowledge"

LAWRENCE GILMAN in the
N. Y. Herald and Tribune

Price $6.00 per volume

Address
SYMPHONY HALL
BOSTON, MASS.

NOTICE TO SUBSCRIBERS

FIFTY-FIRST SEASON, 1931-1932

OPENING CONCERTS, OCTOBER 9-10

BOSTON SYMPHONY
ORCHESTRA

Dr. SERGE KOUSSEVITZKY, Conductor

24 Friday Afternoon Concerts

24 Saturday Evening Concerts

RENEWAL CARDS HAVE BEEN MAILED TO
ALL FRIDAY AND SATURDAY SUBSCRIBERS.
IF ANY SUBSCRIBER HAS NOT RECEIVED HIS NOTICE, HE IS REQUESTED TO ADVISE THE
SUBSCRIPTION OFFICE TODAY.

W. H. BRENNAN, Manager,
Symphony Hall, Boston.

AS THE POPS GOT UNDER WAY

AS THE POPS GOT UNDER WAY

Spring Is Here, Pops Are Proof

Opening Night of May, 1931,
With All the Pleasures
Of the Season

Transcript—77 March 1931
THE more it changes, the more it is the same thing, writes the reviewer returned from the forty-fifth renewal of the Pop Concerts and beginning, say, his twentieth article about that annual occasion. Forthwith meditation and recollection correct him. The Pops remain a unique Bostonian institution. Elsewhere in these United States no series of similar concerts flourishes, or ever has flourished, in spite of many attempts to imitate or transplant. Nor in these days, unless memory slips in its haste, is there any comparable series in Europe. Such as they were, the war and the aftermath sank them almost "without trace." Here in Boston, The Pops have survived a changed city, a changed public, changed minds, manners, habits and living—all that differentiates the nineteenth-twenties and thirties from the eighteenth and nineties.

A small and centered community has become a metropolitan district. A compact audience in its likings has expanded into variegated divisions and subdivisions. On this night and that, the earlier and the middle Pops had social cachet. The later Pops are informal and democratic. Horse-cars set us down at the old Music Hall. Trolley-cars conveyed us to Symphony Hall. Now, on an "opening night," tardy comers hunt for parking place. Through many years ales of Britain and wines of France and Germany were the emollients. Now we make shift with malted mixtures and pseudo-punches; while an unblushing menu proffers Pineapple Sundaes and Nut Taffy. (Good Lord, deliver us!) For better or for worse, to softer drinks have succeeded sedate manners. It is a long, long time since any gentleman-roisterer has hung a pair of trousers over the waiting arm of Apollo Belvedere.

As to "good light music" current tastes and current notions have also changed. The proof is written large in the volumes of early and middle programs scattered through the cases in the exhibition room at Symphony Hall. By tens, twenties and hundreds, items have come into favor and fashion; gone into neglect and oblivion. There was Mr. Gershwin to hear, last evening, out of the musical play, "Girl Crazy"; while twice over the audience insisted upon the waltz from "Two Hearts in Three-Four Time." Tonight in walk Messieurs de Falla and Ravel; while no farther away than Sunday come old Boyce out of the eighteenth century and young Mr. Lambert very much of this twentieth. Modern music and music in present vogue; but "good light music" withal, barring only that paltry and pestiferous film-waltz.

Eighty men from the Symphony Orchestra play it and decline seldom into the lassitude of summer and a hundred Symphony Concerts well behind. If they do—the weaknesses of the flesh and the spirit being what they are—the conductor brings them quickly back to the mark. Tireless himself, minded to give each piece its true and particular voice, Arthur Fiedler would have the orchestra as energetic and elastic. In him is the spark that keeps an audience in lively glow; but first it sets the players alight. Fortunately for Boston, Henry Higginson grew up musically in Vienna where they then cultivated, and still cultivate, the lighter pleasures of the arts. Otherwise, there might have been only Symphony Concerts and no Pops. And they must be cheap as well as good, said this New England Mæcenas, remembering a frugal folk. The prices have changed with the times; but who has ever begrudged them?

The rest is detail of an evening's pleasure. To please the eye the lush green, the tempered gold, the cooler grey of the seasonal decorations—brightness without heat as becomes an ideal summer; the frocks and frills, light, colorful and cut to the newest mode, upon one's neighbor's wife, one's neighbor's daughter and the next friend of the young man at the next table. To please the ear, the sound of music from composer and orchestra; the polite but never arbitrary silence that gave it room; between whiles the tinkle of gossip across the blue and gold tables for which, among frequenters, The Pops are a famous place. To please both eye and ear, the quick interest in music and performance; the pretty stir over a favorite and remembered "extra"; the good will toward conductor and orchestra; the gay mood, not easy for Bostonians to catch in a public place, but more in evidence at The Pops than at most other entertainments. The quick-witted and sympathetic Fiedler often chooses music to prompt it. Perhaps my lady's cigarette also helps—though not her Pineapple Sundae.

The program was summary of a proper Pops repertory: the march for rhythm and sonority—this time the "Rákóczy" sound and fury; the favorite overture—to "Oberon"; the operatic fantasia—from "Carmen"; the "popular classic"—Liszt's "Preludes"; the pretty trifle—Bolzoni's "Minuet"; the sentimental trifle—"The Londonderry Air"; waltzes, polkas and a czardas from Vienna or thereabouts; the potpourri from a recent American musical play—Mr. Gershwin's "Girl Crazy"; Wagner's Valkyrs hurtling the air and the brass; as many "extras" as Mr. Fiedler might give, which were five, some for the rhythm, some for the tune and all for the tickling of the ear and, maybe, the fancy. A nod to radio with Percy Grainger's "Country Gardens"; a bow to the films with that "Zwei Herzen" waltz. For The Pops must keep touch with the times and the public.

Not much that was new hereabouts, except certain "Tales from Johann Strauss" and the "selection" from "Girl Crazy." Erich Korngold, who in his young days was a prodigy composer, strung together operetta-tunes, which few remembered; polkas and such like; the inevitable "Blue Danube," which everyone recognized, to make the "tales." Mr. Gershwin tossed in "Embraceable You," "I Got Rhythm" and other public necessities from "Girl Crazy"; also exhibited himself in his newest guise—less melody, more rhythm, a hard-driven orchestra, the modernist rather than the jazzy touch. Before long the last doubter will be calling him a "serious musician"—New York style. But the audience's ears and Mr. Fiedler's hand seemed warmer, last evening, for Vienna. H. T. P.

As pendant to the 50th season of Symphony Concerts there began at Symphony Hall last evening the 46th season of Pops and the second of Arthur Fiedler's conductorship.

As was the case a year ago, the hall itself had shed its winter raiment of red for a spring dress of green and gold.

HALL IS FILLED

If the size of the audience at this first concert is any criterion the Pops will be as well attended this year as they were last, "hard times" notwithstanding. There was almost literally not an inch of space on the floor untenanted and every seat in the two balconies appeared to be filled.

Mr. Fiedler made his opening programme out of pieces old and new, pieces frankly light and pieces at least semi-serious. The actual novelties were a medley of Strauss waltzes and polkas from the pen of Erich Korngold; a pleasing arrangement of the familiar Londonderry Air for solo violin, harp and strings by Sir Hamilton Harty; a selection from George Gershwin's latest musical comedy, "Girl Crazy"; and a conventionally effective Czardas from an opera, "Ghost of the Warrior," by one Grossman, otherwise unknown to these parts. Included among the extra numbers, plentiful throughout the evening, was one not unnaturally new to the Pops this year, the pretty waltz from the talkie-operetta, "Zwei Herzen in Drei Viertel Takt."

Familiar Pieces Heard

The familiar pieces were the Rakoczy March of Berlioz, Weber's "Oberon" Overture, Bolzoni's Minuet for strings, a Fantasia on "Carmen," Liszt's "Les Preludes" and Wagner's riding Valkyries.

In fact as well as in name the orchestra was the Boston Symphony, reduced to 80 men and minus certain illustrious "first desks," but tonally and otherwise its virtuoso self.

As conductor Mr. Fiedler is hardly an individualist, but in these days of highly personal and occasionally eccentric readings his straightforward presentation of the music in hand is not unwelcome. At least Mr. Fiedler is never listless, his conducting has plenty of "pep" and in the mechanics of that art he grows steadily.

A second season of Pop concerts finds him ripened, more the master of himself, his music and his men. And his popularity is incontestable. He was greeted with enthusiasm when first he appeared last evening and hardly a piece on the programme failed to bring forth enough applause to warrant an extra number.

1931 The Pops

To the not altogether incongruous harmony of the tinkling of glasses, bottles and cracked ice the Pops began its 46th season last evening. There was the usual and pleasantly remembered hum of subdued yet happily frivolous conversation, the ease-inducing aura of tobacco smoke rising to fill the nostrils of the classic and stonily tolerant statues that fill the niches in the upper regions of Symphony Hall. As in years past, the bright, festal colors of evening gowns mingled with the sombreness of dinner coats and street dress and gave the gathering a certain cosmopolitan appearance. The hall was filled.

While Robert Edmond Jones' decorative scheme used in Symphony Hall this season was instituted last year, commendation of its effectiveness and consistent good taste is by no means stale or superfluous. The green walls and tables lend a restful coolness to the scene; the gilded chairs and latticework of the stage walls and door borders provides just the proper amount of contrast to make the interior of Symphony Hall resplendent and attractive.

The highlights of Mr. Fiedler's program were Berlioz' "Rakoczy" march, the overture to Weber's "Oberon," a fantasia on excerpts from Bizet's "Carmen," Liszt's symphonic poem, "Les Preludes"; Sir Hamilton Harty's arrangement of the so-called "Londonderry Air," selections from George Gershwin's score for "Girl Crazy" and the "Ride of the Valkyries" from Wagner's "Die Walkure."

There is no point in applying severe critical judgment either to the performance or the programs of such concerts as these. There is no pretense of maintaining high and rigid artistic standards. All highbrow esthetic considerations are subordinated to the effort to give the greatest pleasure to the greatest number.

Pops Season Opens Auspiciously, With Quartet at Every Floor Table

Arthur Fiedler's second term as conductor of the Pops and the 46th season of that Bostonian institution opened joyously last evening in Symphony hall. As evidence that Mr. Fiedler's fame is not ephemeral, every floor table had its quartet of eager listeners and smokers; the balconies showed no empty spots. There were no polite ceremonials. The concert began promptly on time, and Mr. Fiedler, after an incisive acknowledgement of noisy greetings plunged into his first number, the "Rakoczy" march by Berlioz. The new season was on.

For a majority of those present the summer decorations of stage and walls and tables, first revealed a year ago, were now familiar: the latticed framework in gray and gold, which served as setting for the musicians; the grass-green tints along the lower side walls of the hall; the gay green tables and the gilded chairs about them. For those viewing these seasonal changes as innovations they were agreeable and refreshing. It will be recalled that the color scheme was that of Robert Edmond Jones, an artist of more than passing renown.

Back to the music. Mr. Fiedler has gained in confidence within the year. Never afflicted with mannerisms, never guilty of spurious gesticulations, he reads calmly, even cautiously. He is not disdainful of honest applause, would share it with his band invariably. Last evening he added five encores to his program and thereby bound his audience closer to him; for Pops audiences dearly love their encores. He ranged from Weber's "Oberon" overture on to Bolzoni's minuet for string orchestra, a fantasia on Bizet's "Carmen," Korngold's "Tales from Johann Strauss" (last year it was Richard Strauss who was honored), Kreisler's "Londonderry Air," arranged by St. Hamilton Harty, for violin solo by the concert master, Julius Theodorowicz, Liszt's "Les Preludes," selections from George Gershwin's "Girl Crazy," the czardas from Grossman's opera, "Ghost of the Warrior," to Wagner's "Ride of the Valkyries."

Again it was noticeable that Mr. Fiedler has a fine talent for program making. A standard march and overture, a waltz, an operatic pot-pourri, at least one meaty classic like "Les Preludes," played last evening with full symphonic resonance, a selection from some current musical comedy, and for balance and complement lighter pieces, particularly in the matter of extra numbers. We cherish a modest hope that Mr. Fiedler was impressed by one

POP CONCERTS

The Pop concerts, which opened last night in Symphony hall will give their 8:30. Arthur Fiedler announces the following program.

Marche Militaire.....	Schubert
Overture, "A Midsummer Night's Dream".....	Mendelssohn
Two Pieces in Canon Form.....	Schumann
Invitation to the Dance.....	Weber-Berlioz
"El Amor Brujo," Ballet Suite.....	De Falla
Cherzo from the Fourth Symphony.....	Tchaikovsky
Bolero.....	Ravel
Waltz from "The Bat".....	Strauss
To a Water Lily.....	MacDowell
Lohengrin, Introduction to Act III.....	Wagner

incident of this enjoyable evening. In response to a conscientious interpretation of excerpts from the Gershwin opus, "Girl Crazy," with its slightly labored melodies, he struck into that glorious waltz movement from "Zwei Herzen in Three-quarter Takt," by Robert Stoltz, from the motion picture of that name. It was over too soon, as the clamor for more indicated. So, after taking his seat, Mr. Fiedler played it again. Gustav Struber, in his day, would have needed no urging. Now, as then, German operetta, if given a chance, might outweigh in popular esteem the jazzed dissonances of contemporary scribblers. W. E. G.

Pops Season Opened With Fine Programme

338

Music

May 2, 1931 Minut
The Restored Pops

The forty-sixth season of the Symphony Hall Pop concerts was inaugurated last night with gladsome sights and sounds. The audience filled the hall. The gray and gold decorative scheme installed last year under the direction of Robert Edmond Jones again formed the cheerful setting. Arthur Fiedler, beginning his second term as master of musical ceremonies, received an ovation on his entrance. Enthusiasm grew as the program advanced. There was the usual number of encores, one of which—a selection from "Zwei Herzen im 3/4 Takt"—had to be played twice. Most of the auditors lingered for a late leave-taking.

All of which is testimony to the renewal and freshening of the Pops, now evidently once more firmly established in popular favor. The management, sensitive to the public pulse, recognized last year the necessity for a modification of the rather austere atmosphere maintained by Mr. Casella. Seeking the ameliorator, it fixed upon Mr. Fiedler, who indeed would have been hard to overlook after his success with the Esplanade concerts the previous summer. The choice has been justified.

The program of the opening night gives a clue to Mr. Fiedler's success. Three of the items are, or have been in the not remote past, a part of the repertory of symphony orchestras in subscription seasons. These are Weber's Overture to "Oberon," Liszt's "Les Préludes" and Wagner's "Ride of the Valkyries." Even Berlioz's "Rakóczy" March has been heard in the course of such solemn rites. For the rest, more popular numbers—a Bolzoni Minuet, a fantasia of tunes from "Carmen," a Korngold potpourri of Straussian waltzes, the Harty arrangement of the Londonderry Air, selections from Gershwin's "Girl Crazy" and the Czardas from Grossman's opera, "Ghost of the Warrior."

For First of the

"Classical" Pops

May 11, 1931 Minut

WHETHER it has happened before, and when, only an older resident of this Greater Boston, or a more inveterate attendant at the Pops is in position to say. But last evening, the roving eye, seeking the dim corners of floor and galleries, found no unoccupied places, indeed, witnessed ushers placing rows of chairs against the side walls, in order that all who came might sit. "Classical" Sunday Pops being a creature of the last five years, even the reviewer whose chronicling memory does not go far back of the present regime at Symphony Hall, may well conclude that last evening's crowd was unprecedented for a comparable concert.

The weather could hardly have been the reason. For the weather was forbidding. Possibly, in looking at the program, one could find a better reason; and of course, should one be lacking all other reasons, there is always the sleek and well-groomed figure of Arthur Fiedler at the conductor's stand to fall back upon. This program was termed a "British-Chaikovsky" program. The British part was almost entirely novel. Elgar's fifth march of the "Pomp and Circumstance" series had not been heard before in Boston; Boyce's pleasant little Fifth Symphony had been heard only a few weeks ago at a concert of the MacDowell Club, but never in Symphony Hall; the Londonderry air was heard in a version of Sir Hamilton Harty rather than in the more popular, romantically over-ripe version which memory assigns to Mr. Percy Grainger; the last of the British group, also the piece de resistance of the evening, was Constant Lambert's "The Rio Grande" with assisting choral forces from the "Cecilia," and Mr. Sanroma and Miss Murray as piano and contralto soloists. Chaikovsky's part of this program was necessarily somewhat less novel—the overture-fantasia, "Romeo and Juliet"; the ballet suite named "Nutcracker"; the overture, "1812."

The task of the composer who would write a round half-dozen pieces to a given title (as is Elgar's purported intention with his "Pomp and Circumstance" marches, is a difficult one when an early one of the series has come to be a "hit" or a "best seller." The particular "Pomp and Circumstance" march which is honored (or dishonored) by performance upon any and all occasions and in many and varied guises, indeed the only march that most people know under this name, is Number Two of the series. The one which was introduced to Boston last evening in Number Five. Presumably at some time a Number Six—last of the projected and now all but complete series—is at some not distant time to be forthcoming. The natural question anyone will certainly ask, "Is it as good as the one we know?" a reviewer would be rash to answer with an unhesitating affirmative. It is an excellent march, proceeding from a theme of aggressively descending intervals. There is a portion which at least begins a broad melody of the type of that middle division of Number Two which has suffered transcription beyond other parts. There are a few syncopations similar to those which are so effective in Number Two. The whole moves along in a superb rhythm. Mr. Fiedler for the most part held this rhythm strict and tight. A march was to be a march and not an orchestral tone poem. With which sensible premise one could not possibly take issue. Yet if a march is a march, Elgar is also Elgar, and Number Two taken as a tone poem with the martial idea in the background has sometimes seemed to be better exposition of Elgar than of a march. At any rate, through this marchy march of last evening one could easily imagine—for better or worse—many points at which a treatment more "espressivo" would reveal more Elgar if less march.

As at the concert of the MacDowell Club Orchestra, the little symphony of Boyce out of the middle eighteenth century was piece of pure delight. Not alone the Bachs and the Handels had the ability to project this pleasant idiom. Not alone to minor Germans need we turn for felicitous results. A grubbing choirmaster in London church or cathedral also showed ability to turn the trick. The rolling periods unfold, the rhythms trip their light, shining way. And when all is done, neighbor nods to neighbor, with an agreeable, "That was a good one."

Sir Hamilton Harty, in his version of the so-called "Londonderry air," gives his tune first to a violin solo on a G-string, later sings it in high register for massed first violins. The first reaction is one of disappointment at the lack of those lush contrapuntal harmonies which are associated in most men's minds (oh, what an error! one would have written "in most young ladies' minds") with this expressive tune. But second thought is the better. This setting of Harty's is far more chaste, moves with more restraint and more delicacy, and best of all, gives the melody itself more of a chance. It deserves all the hearings it will receive.

Then "The Rio Grande." An additional hearing did not dim the pleasure which one took in it. And the greatest pleasure which one hearer has taken in it at every performance, is at that point where after a huge climax the solo piano enters with the cheapest of jazz chiches. Banal? Yes, of course—a dozen times over again; so banal that it could not possibly have been accident or lapse on the part of a skillful young composer. From the audience this piece of rhythms and of languors, of wild choruses and tumultuous piano solos, of bold percussions and screaming brass and propulsive strings, again drew thunders of applause. Not all "hits" continue to please after repetition. Mr. Lambert has succeeded beyond surface success.

Not a word yet about Chaikovsky. But can fresh comment possibly come out of "Romeo and Juliet" and "Nutcracker" and "1812"? One records excellences of days of the machine age? A. H. M.

339

The Law, the 'Siegfried Idyl,' Jazz, Chasins, Sanroma, All at a Sunday Pop

REASONABLY, Symphony Hall intends that the public of the Sunday Pops, which now fills every seat and overflows into the standing-room, shall know where the blame falls. Conspicuously on the program last evening stood this admonition:

Refreshments of any kind shall not be offered for sale and no smoking shall be permitted in a theater or a public hall during an entertainment. [From the Sunday Regulations of the Department of Public Safety of Massachusetts]

It is in order to submit once more that such interference with innocent habit and pleasure encourages irritated spirits to break every trivial law and petty regulation coming their way; makes the Commonwealth of Massachusetts a laughing-stock to its own citizens and to strangers within its gates; added to similar restrictions, dissuades visitors, accustomed to the usual freedoms of twentieth-century civilization, from this port and this good city of Boston. There in Symphony Hall last evening were 2600 listeners, well-mannered, well-intentioned, altogether decent and orderly. They might not smoke at the tables, but they had only to take ten steps into the corridors to smoke their fill. They might not buy so much as a box of chocolates; but if they had them in pocket, they were free to eat them. The distinction between what is permissible at the Pops on Sunday evening and on the other six days of the week, is altogether legal, artificial, intolerant and absurd. It is ridiculous in the third decade of the twentieth century to deny to adults, on Sunday or any other day, liberty in refreshment and entertainment. Sooner or later, even the State House will discover that grown-up people are in fact grown-up and like to be treated as free agents—the Lord's Day included.

The first half of the program fell to Wagner, and among the four pieces one that Boston has seldom heard of late—the "Siegfried Idyl." Through twelve seasons it has been overlooked at the Symphony Concerts—and with such strings, woodwinds and horns as Dr. Koussevitzky has at command! If within that time it has been played at The Pops, the occasion has been rare. Yet the "Siegfried Idyl" is a Wagnerian masterpiece, like no other in the whole range of his work. He is writing a purely symphonic music, though the motifs, for the most part, come from the Third Act of his opera, "Siegfried." He is writing for intimate usage with little or no thought of public performance—to mark Cosima's birthday at Christmas, to release her

Music

May 2, 1931 Minuta
The Restored Pops

The forty-sixth season of the Symphony Hall Pop concerts was inaugurated last night with gladsome sights and sounds. The audience filled the hall. The gray and gold decorative scheme installed last year under the direction of Robert Edmond Jones again formed the cheerful setting. Arthur Fiedler, beginning his second term as master of musical ceremonies, received an ovation on his entrance. Enthusiasm grew as the program advanced. There was the usual number of encores, one of which—a selection from "Zwei Herzen im 3/4 Takt"—had to be played twice. Most of the auditors lingered for a late leave-taking.

All of which is testimony to the renewal and freshening of the Pops, now evidently once more firmly established in popular favor. The management, sensitive to the public pulse, recognized last year the necessity for a modification of the rather austere atmosphere maintained by Mr. Casella. Seeking the ameliorator, it fixed upon Mr. Fiedler, who indeed would have been hard to overlook after his success with the Esplanade concerts the previous summer. The choice has been justified.

The program of the opening night gives a clue to Mr. Fiedler's success. Three of the items are, or have been in the not remote past, a part of the repertory of symphony orchestras in subscription seasons. These are Weber's Overture to "Oberon," Liszt's "Les Préludes" and Wagner's "Ride of the Valkyries." Even Berlioz's "Rakóczy" March has been heard in the course of such solemn rites. For the rest, more popular numbers—a Bolzoni Minuet, a fantasia of tunes from "Carmen," a Korngold potpourri of Straussian waltzes, the Harty arrangement of the Londonderry Air, selections from Gershwin's "Girl Crazy" and the Czardas from Grossman's opera, "Ghost of the Warrior."

For First of the

May 14, 1931 Minuta
"Classical" Pops

WHETHER it has happened before, and when, only an older resident of this Greater Boston, or a more inveterate attendant at the Pops is in position to say. But last evening, the roving eye, seeking the dim corners of floor and galleries, found no unoccupied places, indeed witnessed ushers placing rows of chairs against the side walls, in order that all who came might sit. "Classical" Sunday Pops being a creature of the last five years, even the reviewer whose chronicling memory does not go far back of the present regime at Symphony Hall, may well conclude that last evening's crowd was unprecedented for a comparable concert.

The weather could hardly have been the reason. For the weather was forbidding. Possibly, in looking at the program, one could find a better reason; and of course, should one be lacking all other reasons, there is always the sleek and well-groomed figure of Arthur Fiedler at the conductor's stand to fall back upon. This program was termed a "British-Chaikovsky" program. The British part was almost entirely novel. Elgar's fifth march of the "Pomp and Circumstance" series had not been heard before in Boston; Boyce's pleasant little Fifth Symphony had been heard only a few weeks ago at a concert of the MacDowell Club, but never in Symphony Hall; the Londonderry air was heard in a version of Sir Hamilton Harty rather than in the more popular, romantically over-ripe version which memory assigns to Mr. Percy Grainger; the last of the British group, also the piece de resistance of the evening, was Constant Lambert's "The Rio Grande" with assisting choral forces from the "Cecilia," and Mr. Sanroma and Miss Murray as piano and contralto soloists. Chaikovsky's part of this program was necessarily somewhat less novel—the overture-fantasia, "Romeo and Juliet"; the ballet suite named "Nutcracker"; the overture, "1812."

The task of the composer who would write a round half-dozen pieces to given title (as is Elgar's purported intention with him "Pomp and Circumstance" marches, is a difficult one which an early one of the series has come to be a "hit" or a "best seller." The particular "Pomp and Circumstance" march which is honored (or dishonored) by performance upon any and all occasions and in many and varied guises, indeed the only march that most people know under this name, is Number Two of the series. The one which was introduced to Boston last evening in Number Five. Presumably at some time a Number Six—last of the projected and now all but complete series—is at some not distant time to be forthcoming. The natural question anyone will certainly ask, "Is it as good as the one we know?" a reviewer would be rash to answer with an unhesitating affirmative. It is an excellent march, proceeding from a theme of aggressively descending intervals. There is a portion which at least begins a broad melody of the type of that middle division of Number Two which has suffered transcription beyond other parts. There are a few syncopations similar to those which are so effective in Number Two. The whole moves along in a superb rhythm. Mr. Fiedler for the most part held this rhythm strict and tight. A march was to be a march and not an orchestral tone poem. With which sensible premise one could not possibly take issue. Yet if a march is a march, Elgar is also Elgar, and Number Two taken as a tone poem with the martial idea in the background has sometimes seemed to be better exposition of Elgar than of a march. At any rate, through this marchy march of last evening one could easily imagine—for better or worse—many points at which a treatment more "espressivo" would reveal more Elgar if less march.

As at the concert of the MacDowell Club Orchestra, the little symphony of Boyce out of the middle eighteenth century was piece of pure delight. Not alone the Bachs and the Handels had the ability to project this pleasant idiom. Not alone to minor Germans need we turn for felicitous results. A grubbing choirmaster in London church or cathedral also showed ability to turn the trick. The rolling periods unfold, the rhythms trip their light, shining way. And when all is done, neighbor nods to neighbor, with an agreeable, "That was a good one."

Sir Hamilton Harty, in his version of the so-called "Londonderry air," gives his tune first to a violin solo on a G-string, later sings it in high register for massed first violins. The first reaction is one of disappointment at the lack of those lush contrapuntal harmonies which are associated in most men's minds (oh, what an error! one would have written "In most young ladies' minds") with this expressive tune. But second thought is the better. This setting of Harty's is far more chaste, moves with more restraint and more delicacy, than the more strident and more unbridled version of the same tune which we have heard in the hands of other New England singers and Crowley is working with it. Boat flying is novel to most aerial passengers and we step out.

Boat flying is novel to most aerial passengers and we step out. Boat flying is novel to most aerial passengers and we step out. Boat flying is novel to most aerial passengers and we step out.

performance, the sympathetic pointing of well-known effects, now charming, now delicious, now strong and propulsive. Mr. Fiedler and his men created the desired illusion. His audience rose to it. Seldom does "1812" fail to make its effect. Last evening was no exception. There was clapping of hands and stamping of feet, yes, and there was shouting. Is not this exactly what Chaikovsky is for in these days of the machine age? A. H. M.

May 25, 1931 Minuta The Law, the "Siegfried Idyl," Jazz, Chasins, Sanroma, All at a Sunday Pop

REASONABLY, Symphony Hall intends that the public of the Sunday Pops, which now fills every seat and overflows into the standing-room, shall know where the blame falls. Conspicuously on the program last evening stood this admonition:

Refreshments of any kind shall not be offered for sale and no smoking shall be permitted in a theater or a public hall during an entertainment. [From the Sunday Regulations of the Department of Public Safety of Massachusetts]

It is in order to submit once more that such interference with innocent habit and pleasure encourages irritated spirits to break every trivial law and petty regulation coming their way; makes the Commonwealth of Massachusetts a laughing-stock to its own citizens and to strangers within its gates; added to similar restrictions, dissuades visitors, accustomed to the usual freedoms of twentieth-century civilization, from this port and this good city of Boston. There in Symphony Hall last evening were 2600 listeners, well-mannered, well-intentioned, altogether decent and orderly. They might not smoke at the tables, but they had only to take ten steps into the corridors to smoke their fill. They might not buy so much as a box of chocolates; but if they had them in pocket, they were free to eat them. The distinction between what is permissible at the Pops on Sunday evening and on the other six days of the week, is altogether legal, artificial, intolerant and absurd. It is ridiculous in the third decade of the twentieth century to deny to adults, on Sunday or any other day, liberty in refreshment and entertainment. Sooner or later, even the State House will discover that grown-up people are in fact grown-up and like to be treated as free agents—"the Lord's Day" included.

The first half of the program fell to Wagner, and among the four pieces one that Boston has seldom heard of late—the "Siegfried Idyl." Through twelve seasons it has been overlooked at the Symphony Concerts—and with such strings, woodwinds and horns as Dr. Koussevitzky has at command! If within that time it has been played at The Pops, the occasion has been rare. Yet the "Siegfried Idyl" is a Wagnerian masterpiece, like no other in the whole range of his work. He is writing a purely symphonic music, though the motifs, for the most part, come from the Third Act of his opera, "Siegfried." He is writing for intimate usage with little or no thought of public performance—to mark Cosima's birthday at Christmastide, to release her joy and his in Siegfried, their new-born son. They stand above the cradle and he speaks. The little orchestra plays upon the staircase of their house, and she listens. Finally it is music wrought in delicate texture and subdued coloring, infused with the poetry of tender affection, loving longing and quiet beatitude. Its only fellow is the introduction to the Third Act of "Die Meistersinger," and that is written on a larger scale, to have place in a romantic comedy, more outspoken and diverse in emotional flow.

340

In the daily procession of The Pops Mr. Fiedler had little time to rehearse what for most of the players may have been an unfamiliar piece. Nor in this stage of his progress as conductor is he to be reproached with a performance that at moments might have been more sensitive, plastic and euphonious. Enough that the hungry ear heard anew the "Siegfried Idyl"; while answering imagination sufficed for outer gloss and inner implication. Before the listener passed a music in which Wagner shuts himself within narrow confines because, so doing, he may more felicitously express himself and gain his end. Within them, a super-sensitive variety of texture is woven into a persistent loveliness; an adroitly changeable flow sustains a pervasive mood; a few colors are brightened or darkened, blended or contrasted, refinement upon refinement, until the whole becomes a sublimated magic upon the enfolded senses. The "Siegfried Idyl" upsprings from the motifs of the hero whose name the new-born son and this, his music, shall bear. Yet Wagner so mutes and transmutes them, so stays his instinctive richness and flood, that it sounds with quiet gladness, still affection, tender longing and visioning, a blest happiness and peace.

A single note, a passing phrase, the lightest modulation, inflection, shading, and we listeners are stirred. As there is no more sensitive, so there is no finer-fingered Wagner. He is writing most intimately, yet the benediction of the "Siegfried Idyl" falls upon all the fathers and all the mothers who may stand dreaming in happy content beside the cradles of their sons. It is his moment of surcease from the theater, from his epics and tragedies in words and tones. Tone-poet he cannot help but be; yet this time "from the heart to the heart" as Beethoven had it on a very different occasion. Some of us take leave to think the lyric pages of "Die Meistersinger" the rarest music in beauty that man has yet written. In that very house Wagner had finished them. Now into the "Siegfried Idyl" he distilled their quintessence. . . . Mr. Fiedler went on to the heroic sweep and sound of the other Siegfried's "Rhine Journey"; then to the Overture to "Tannhäuser," the only proclamation of triumphant virtue of which mind and spirit seldom weary. Yet above these sonorities lingered the "Siegfried Idyl," soft and bright and vaporous.

Next Mr. Abram Chasins and "Parade"—the piece in which Mr. Toscanini, as the saying went in New York, "discovered America." There have been more exciting discoveries; while the composer's anxious friends might have hung less literary baggage about his neck. Mr. Chasins hears a passing procession; hears it advancing and receding; hears it also in sustained and broken rhythms. The sound stirs in him anxieties, resentments, alarms, inasmuch as parades depress him and rouse his dread of mob-spirit. Now in the under-ody, now on the surface, he would impart this mood. In degree, with reciprocal labor on the part of the listening imagination, he succeeds. Parade and sensations dwindle away and a compact, neatly made, workaday tone-poem, mostly of the common stock, is at end. Well enough on a Pop Sunday; but the "maestro illustrissimo" might advisedly broaden his explorations of the music of this land.

Last, Mr. Gershwin's "Rhapsody in Blue" as fresh, though by no means so surprising, as when it emerged seven years ago. There are good tunes in it as the slow section, with Russian flavors, still witnesses. There are pianistic and orchestral acrobatics, intrinsically jazz-like, as the finale over-abundantly testifies. There is, above all, a first section that sounds to this day like no music the listener has heard before or since—Mr. Gershwin releasing the jazz that long had been second nature to him, then discovering, con amore and confuoco, that he could give it musical form, substance, seemliness and effect.

There were also for this particular occasion, as for Mr. Tansman's Sonatina, Mr. Tapley who is expert saxophonist, and Mr. Sanromá who played the piano-part with a Gershwinian boldness and fervor, sonority and rhythmical energy, with a more than Gershwinian mastery of means to ends. From his hands the sheer beat and plangency carried all before them. Mr. Fiedler can spur any jazzy piece; while as everyone knows—for blame or for praise—the Bostonians can be the jazziest of symphony orchestras. To Mr. Gruenberg and to Mr. Carpenter, as now to Mr. Gershwin, they have given proof. At the end, clapping, shouting and through the happy tumult Mr. Sanromá in and out. What say, Mr. Chasins or even Mr. Tansman? H. T. P.

of your needs food elementary

by Committee the Female Party for ment of Candidates for State-Wide Offices

Forty-Sixth Opening, Last Evening at Symphony Hall, of the Pop Concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra

surcease from the theater, from his epics and tragedies in words and tones. Tone-poet he cannot help but be; yet this time "from the heart to the heart" as Beethoven had it on a very different occasion. Some of us take leave to think the lyric pages of "Die Meistersinger" the rarest music in beauty that man has yet written. In that very house Wagner had finished them. Now into the "Sieg-

fried Idyl" he distilled their quintessence. . . . Mr. Fiedler went on to the heroic sweep and sound of the other Siegfried's "Rhine Journey"; then to the Overture to "Tannhäuser," the only proclamation of triumphant virtue of which mind and spirit seldom weary. Yet above these sonorities lingered the "Siegfried Idyl," soft and bright and vaporous.

as now to Mr. Gerswin, they are a proof. At the end, clapping, shouting and through the happy tumult Mr. Sanromá in and out. What say, Mr. Chasins or even Mr. Tansman? H. T. P.

Wins Poster Prize

RICHARD E. PRIEST
March 27, 1931
LEOMINSTER BOY WINS
POPS POSTER CONTEST Prize-Winning Design Work by Richard E. Priest

First prize in the Pops concerts poster contest was won by Richard E. Priest, 20, of Leominster, a student at the Massachusetts school of art, it is announced by officials of Symphony hall, where the concerts will start May 6. The poster consists of a line design, in color, of musical instruments on a black background with white lettering.

Second prize was awarded to Mark Hayes of the Designers Art School, and third to Cordella Loring Brooks of the Museum School of Fine Arts. Honorable mention was given designs of Helen M. Gregor of the Wagner School of Sign Arts, John C. Bergen of the Scott Carbee School of Art and Henry D. Hart of the Wagner school. The posters will be on view in Symphony hall at the opening of the concerts.

The first Pops Sunday evening Symphony concert was attended by an audience that packed Symphony hall, and that showed its pleasure not only by much applause but by many shouts of "Bravo!" during the evening.

The program was as follows:

Elgar March "Pomp and Circumstance" No. 5
 (First time in Boston)
 Boyce Fifth Symphony
 Londonderry Air
 Arranged for String Orchestra by Sir Hamilton Harty
 Lambert "The Rio Grande"
 for chorus, orchestra and solo pianoforte (Piano solo, Jesus Maria Sanroma)
 (Contralto solo, Marie Murray)
 (Chorus of the Cecilia Society)
 Tchaikovsky "Romeo and Juliet" Overture—Fantasia
 Ballet Suite, "Nutsacker"
 Overture Solennelle, "1812"

The occasional small errors, lack of surface polish, and other evidences of weariness from the strain of a long, hard season and the haste with which Pops concerts must be prepared and given, which showed in the orchestra's playing last night, were more than made up for by its spirit and verve. Mr. Fiedler sets sharp, invigorating rhythms, has a clear, incisive beat, and, while he sometimes lacks graciousness in phrasing, he never errs in the direction of sentimentality—a fault which is insupportable in popular programs.

As to the program, it combined pieces by British composers (from the almost forgotten Boyce to Lambert, whose "Rio Grande" was one of the best liked of the new compositions brought out by the Boston Symphony this winter), with three selections from Tchaikovsky's best-liked works. The Elgar march, re-echoing an earlier "Pomp and Circumstance," is less straightforward, more fussy, than the first, while built around the same over-romanticized themes. Boyce's clean, fresh Symphony, with its neat fugue, was refreshing after the preceding piece's ponderous strivings. Sir Hamilton Harty's arrangement of the well-known "Londonderry Air," a charmingly appropriate arrangement, at last, of this much mauled and overplayed, but still lovely air, was played very suavely by the strings, the air being sung by solo violin.

Lambert's "Rio Grande" which was played with all the deft rhythm, sparkle and changing mood that it demands, again made a favorable impression. When music like this, so obviously pictorial, episodic and unashamedly entertaining, still delights at third hearing it is rare indeed. Even Ravel's exciting "Bolero" did not meet the third-hearing test for many a concertgoer.

Concluding with music of Tchaikovsky, the orchestra outdid itself. Unrestrained shouting followed the playing of the "Nutsacker" suite. It seemed the very soul of wit after the long-winded "Romeo and Juliet" overture-fantasia, though there are beauties and to spare in the latter. Naturally "1812," which was consummately well played, brought a storm of applause. E. B.

May 11, 1931 SYMPHONY HALL First Sunday Pop Concert

The items of chief interest at the season's first Sunday Pop Concert last evening were the revival by Mr. Fiedler of the Fifth Symphony by William Boyce, the 18th century English composer, and Constant Lambert's "The Rio Grande," introduced here at the Symphony concerts two weeks ago. As before, Jesus Maria Sanroma, pianist; Marie Murray, contralto, and a chorus from the Cecilia Society assisted in the latter piece. The remainder of the program was devoted to Sir Edward Elgar's recently written "Pomp and Circumstance," march No. 5, which was played in Boston for the first time, and to Tchaikovsky's "Nutsacker" suite, "1812" overture, and a fantasia on his "Romeo and Juliet" music.

The symphony proved to be engaging music, characteristic of the musical period and style, nimble and graceful if not airy. Boyce's melodic invention, while quite without subtlety—as was also his manipulation, apparently—has a solidity and variety that are pleasing. There were some interesting high passages for the trumpets.

This "symphony"—such it is in name, though it is not a symphony in the modern sense of the word—ought to be a welcome addition to the Pops' repertory. Perhaps Mr. Fiedler may favor his audiences with some or all of the other seven.

By no stretch of imagination can Lambert's music be called great. In fact, one has a sneaking suspicion that he had no such thought when he composed it. Melodically and harmonically it becomes banal in a few places. One or two of his uses of percussion are inept.

On the other hand, "Rio Grande" is genial, warm-blooded music that is virtually never dull; it has variety of instrumentation and melody. It is stimulating, and for that reason ought to be heard more than rarely.

Mr. Fiedler's performance of the "Rio Grande" may have been less replete with subtle details than the previous performances of the work here, but he alone, apparently, has been able to secure the proper rhythm. For that reason "Rio Grande" sounded better than ever last evening. There was much applause for conductor, soloists and orchestra.

Last night in Symphony Hall, the Pops orchestra, Arthur Fiedler, conductor, gave its first Sunday evening concert of the season. The program comprised "Pomp and Circumstance" No. 5 by Elgar; Fifth Symphony by Boyce (1710-1779); Londonderry Air, arranged for string orchestra by Sir Hamilton Harty; Lambert, "The Rio Grande"; three numbers by Tchaikovsky, the "Romeo and Juliet" Overture-Fantasia, the "Nutsacker" Suite and the "1812" Overture. The orchestra had the able assistance of the Cecilia Society in the number by Lambert.

Standing room was at a premium in Symphony Hall last night and, as usual, Mr. Fiedler had prepared a program worthy the efforts of the band which he conducts and satisfying to those who listen. "Pomp and Circumstance" No. 5 is built upon a pattern similar to the overture by that name with which everyone is familiar, and, although the thematic material is interesting, the piece is hardly of stuff likely to bring it into immediate competition with its predecessor.

The Boyce miniature symphony proved a charming bit of eighteenth century writing in three movements, with a delightfully exuberant fugal ending to the third movement which emphasized the style as typical of this period.

The pièce de résistance of the evening was of course, Lambert's "Rio Grande" with Miss Marie Murray and J. M. Sanroma again in their accustomed rôles, with the Cecilia Society to lend the choral atmosphere. Since this composition has twice been reviewed in these columns within a few weeks, it seems unnecessary to comment upon the performance last night other than to say it maintained the high standard noted in previous performances.

Upon the Tchaikovsky group Mr. Fiedler bestowed as much care and attention to detail as though his audience were composed of subscribers to the "regular" symphony series, instead of the more informal and less-inclined-to-be-critical music lovers who comprise these Pop audiences. In all, a program which measures up in every way to those of the Sunday evenings of former seasons.

May 11, 1931 G. M. S.

June 8, 1931
 Mr. Sanromá played the many-sided and witty part for the first piano among the animals; then was pianist in Mr. Fiedler's needlessly abbreviated version of Gershwin's "Rhapsody in Blue." There is scarcely a piece that the conductor does better, which fact makes his cuts the less understandable. Is he not, as with some of his suites, over-afraid that he will exhaust the attention of a usually eager audience? As it was, the long and loud applause for Mr. Sanromá was pleasure to hear and record. He excels in such music of keen rhythms, plangent tone, hard edge and flamboyant bravura. He has excelled, indeed, in all that he has undertaken the season through, both at the Symphony Concerts and at The Pops. No task was too small for his pains; none, however exacting, exceeded his ripening powers. He made believable the extraordinary piano-part that Lourie wrote into "Liturgical Sonata." His light, fine hand with figures and arabesques added graces to Pilati's little Suite for Piano and Strings. He was the modernist pianist, par excellence, by the verve of his rhythm and the brilliance of his tone in Stravinsky's "Caprice." He outdid himself in both the ornate and the songful measures of Lambert's "Rio Grande," his ripest performance of the year. Now at The Pops he does no less well with the piano-parts in Tansman's Sonatina and Gershwin's Rhapsody. It is high time Mr. Sanromá's name were added to the list of virtuosi in the orchestra. He keeps pace with them. Tran H. T. P.

Koussevitzky and Dr. Davison Make Ready a Score

314

June 8, 1931

Mr. Sanromá played the many-sided and witty part for the first piano among the animals; then was pianist in Mr. Fiedler's needlessly abbreviated version of Gershwin's "Rhapsody in Blue." There is scarcely a piece that the conductor does better, which fact makes his cuts the less understandable. Is he not, as with some of his suites, over-afraid that he will exhaust the attention of a usually eager audience? As it was, the long and loud applause for Mr. Sanromá was pleasure to hear and record. He excels in such music of keen rhythms, plangent tone, hard edge and flamboyant bravura. He has excelled, indeed, in all that he has undertaken the season through, both at the Symphony Concerts and at The Pops. No task was too small for his pains; none, however exacting, exceeded his ripening powers. He made believable the extraordinary piano-part that Lourie wrote into "Liturgical Sonata." His light, fine hand with figures and arabesques added graces to Pilati's little Suite for Piano and Strings. He was the modernist pianist, par excellence, by the verve of his rhythm and the brilliance of his tone in Stravinsky's "Caprice." He outdid himself in both the ornate and the songful measures of Lambert's "Rio Grande," his ripest performance of the year. Now at The Pops he does no less well with the piano-parts in Tansman's Sonatina and Gershwin's Rhapsody. It is high time Mr. Sanromá's name were added to the list of virtuosi in the orchestra. He keeps pace with them.

Tran H. T. P.

Koussevitzky and Dr. Davison Make Ready a Score

Lifelong Silhouette

The Younger Koussevitzky

(Colby)

From the Book Describing his Concert-Giving Voyage down the Volga, Included in the Current Exhibition at Symphony Hall

16. 1930.

Lifelong Sill

From the Book De

Obbligato of the Stars

Transcript

On the Esplanade

Aug. 16. 1930.

Sketch from the Summer Series of Concerts Now Drawing to a Close

GOOD MUSIC FOR THE PEOPLE

To the Editor of the Transcript:

The impressive success of the concerts on the Esplanade, following good example of New York, St. and San Francisco, has been remarkable for the high character of programs and performance than size, quality and delight of the audiences. This deep and continuous light is a vindication of the people cheering refutation of the vulgar notion that the people are given so cheap meretricious music in concert over the radio because that is the thing that is fit for them and they like. Mr. Damrosch and his conductors who come into real contact with the people assure us that the music is never too good for them and never fails in response, that the conveyors of the poor stuff constantly them, giving them music that does go over their heads half so often as their feet; that our people are essentially music-loving people, and that there is over-ripe for a national crusade half of better music for the people.

England is demonstrating the thing. In June there was given north of England a season of Pro-Concerts of the highest character. Chester had a fortnight of the Liverpool and Leeds a week each the concerts given by the Halle Orchestra under the direction of Sir Hamilton Harty. The response, under so propitious conditions, was astonishing. There was a total attendance of 40,000, fully justifying a renewal experiment next year, which it believed would result in packed audiences. "I have been greatly impressed," Sir Hamilton Harty, "by the young the audiences. The great majority of the auditors were apparently young and girls. That is a most gratifying feature."

"No concession" says the concert "has been made to what is called taste in music; and the result of the concerts has proved the great interest in the love of the best music which comes to the less wealthy classes of in recent years. "Commenting on hundreds of letters that came from final "request program," he said, "a few people seemed to want a no high type of music, the great majority 80 per cent, desired orchestral work of the very highest class. It is perhaps surprising that the big Schubert symphony in C major won the greatest support. In looking for a reason I should say that a great number of people have heard this work on the gramophone, but have not had the opportunity of hearing it as often as other symphonies on account of its length and its difficulty."

The Cambridge University Musical Society recently gave a festival of British music. It began with a concert of madrigals and folk-songs, followed by a lecture by Professor Edward J. Dent on the "Church Music of the Restoration Period," given on Sunday evening in King's College Chapel. Of the music given on Sunday evening, the local report says, "the most impressive thing was Purcell's great Latin anthem, 'Jehova quam multi sunt hostes mei.'" The effect of some of Purcell's funeral music played in a side chapel at the end was "magical."

Why is it that so little of the music of Purcell, greatest of English composers, is heard in Boston? Much of it is not difficult, and much is most melodious. At the annual recital by Mrs. Morgan's pupils in Brookline, this spring, all of them young, there were several Purcell pieces, all well and easily played, and all beautiful. But what we need is a whole Purcell symphony program. The notes by Philip Hale would be a liberal education, and a much needed education for thousands.

The Cambridge University Society program of British music covered a period of seven hundred years and a multitude of composers. One night the madrigals were sung on the river beside King's College Bridge, the singers grouped in four boats near a drooping willow tree. "It was an ideal summer evening, fresh and green, the river bending round." It "made one realize under what makeshift conditions we habitually listen to music in concert rooms and elsewhere. Here the madrigals were simply part of the scene. Music became a thing to live with."

The whole picture and the whole story set the Bostonian to thinking of the impressive musical effects possible on our own Charles River Basin; and the popular response to such efforts would be even greater than the notable response at the English Cambridge.

EDWIN D. MEAD
Boston, Aug. 21.

MARY A. BROWN
25 CORTES STREET
BOSTON, MASS.

In Memoriam.

Allen Augustus Brown.

Since the death of my cousin, "1916,"
I have continued his work, with which,
I was familiar, as assistant, relating to
"The Boston Symphony Orchestra."
So in this, "The Semi-Centennial Year",
Of the Orchestra

1881-1931

It will be found complete, in the Music Room.

The Boston Public Library.

It has been a labor of love, and the kindly appreciation of my efforts by

Mr. Richard B. Spier

"Music Librarian"

has greatly inspired and encouraged me.
I hope it will meet the approval
of his Friends & The Public.

June, 1931.

GOOD MUSIC FOR THE PEOPLE

To the Editor of the Transcript:

The impressive success of the Fiedler concerts on the Esplanade, following the good example of New York, St. Louis and San Francisco, has been no more remarkable for the high character of the programs and performance than for the size, quality and delight of the great audiences. This deep and continuous delight is a vindication of the people and a cheering refutation of the vulgar allegation that the people are given so much cheap meretricious music in concerts and over the radio because that is the sort of thing that is fit for them and what they like. Mr. Damrosch and all the conductors who come into real touch with the people assure us that the best music is never too good for the people and never fails in response, that the purveyors of the poor stuff constantly wrong them, giving them music that does not go over their heads half so often as under their feet; that our people are essentially a music-loving people, and that the time is over-ripe for a national crusade in behalf of better music for the people.

England is demonstrating the same thing. In June there was given in the north of England a season of Promenade Concerts of the highest character. Manchester had a fortnight of the season, Liverpool and Leeds a week each, all of the concerts given by the Halle Orchestra under the direction of Sir Hamilton Harty. The response, under some unpropitious conditions, was astonishingly good. There was a total attendance of 40,000, fully justifying a renewal of the experiment next year, which it is believed would result in packed houses. "I have been greatly impressed," said Sir Hamilton Harty, "by the youth of the audiences. The great majority of the auditors were apparently young men and girls. That is a most gratifying feature."

"No concession" says the conductor, "has been made to what is called 'cheap' taste in music; and the result of the concerts has proved the great increase in the love of the best music which has come to the less wealthy classes of people in recent years. "Commenting on the hundreds of letters that came for the final "request program," he said, "while a few people seemed to want a not very high type of music, the great majority, 80 per cent, desired orchestral works of the very highest class. It is perhaps sur-

nal book big Schubert symphony nting ex he greatest support. In ars, and son I should say that a at War people have heard this character mophone, but have not es should ity of hearing it as of-n we atiphonies on account of al in the difficulty."

here 5000 University Musical So-ble music ve a festival of British snipion ian with a concert of ags, followed by a rse Betw Edward J. Dent on ndship— of the Restoration to Make l. Of the music

The Know ing, the local re-impressive thing atin anthem, 'Jehostes mel.' The ell's funeral music el at the end was ministers n all the ongregate sembly of with one work predly com-the good tendly co-sonal con-atedly at uaintance ween the had been war, the nd would rld which ratic and more and ential not vernments

e friends, hing pro-travel for and culersity Society pro-e covered a period

rs and a multitude ght the madiragls beside King's Col-rs grouped in four willow tree. "It evening, fresh and nding round." It er what makeshift lly listen to music elsewhere. Here mply part of the a a thing to live

is a very uously a is a con-everything peace and home in neva; and there that judgment nal obliga-
ed prizes

nd the whole story hinking of the im-ts possible on our sin; and the popuefforts would be notable response ldge.

EDWIN D. MEAD

MANUSCRIPT

MARY A. BROWN
25 CORTES STREET
BOSTON, MASS.

In Memoriam

Mr. Augustus Brown.

Since the death of my cousin "1916,"
I have continued his work, with which,
I was familiar, as assistant, relating to

"The Boston Symphony Orchestra,"
in this "The Semi-Centennial Year,"
Of the Orchestra

1881-1931

It will be found 'complete' in the Music Room

The Boston Public Library

It has been a labor of love, and the result is a most interesting and useful work.

Mr. Richard Brown

Music Librarian

It is greatly appreciated and encouraged me.
I hope it will meet the approval
of his friends & the Public.

June 1931.

GOOD MUSIC FOR THE PEOPLE

To the Editor of the Transcript:

The impressive success of the concerts on the Esplanade, following good example of New York, St. Louis and San Francisco, has been remarkable for the high character of programs and performance than size, quality and delight of the audiences. This deep and continuous light is a vindication of the people cheering refutation of the vulgar notion that the people are given so cheap meretricious music in concert over the radio because that is the only thing that is fit for them and they like. Mr. Damrosch and his conductors who come into real contact with the people assure us that music is never too good for the people and never fails in response, that the conveyors of the poor stuff constantly them, giving them music that does go over their heads half so often as their feet; that our people are essentially a music-loving people, and that there is over-ripe for a national crusade half of better music for the people. England is demonstrating the thing. In June there was given north of England a season of Promenade Concerts of the highest character. Chester had a fortnight of the best, Liverpool and Leeds a week each of the concerts given by the Halle Orchestra under the direction of Sir Hamilton Harty. The response, under so propitious conditions, was astonishing. There was a total attendance of 40,000, fully justifying a renewal of the experiment next year, which it is believed would result in packed audiences. "I have been greatly impressed," Sir Hamilton Harty, "by the youth of the audiences. The great majority of the auditors were apparently young men and girls. That is a most gratifying feature."

"No concession" says the concert "has been made to what is called taste in music; and the result of the concerts has proved the great interest in the love of the best music which has come to the less wealthy classes of the people in recent years. "Commenting on the hundreds of letters that came from the final "request program," he said, "a few people seemed to want a no higher type of music, the great majority 80 per cent, desired orchestral works of the very highest class. It is perhaps surprising that the big Schubert symphony in C major won the greatest support. In looking for a reason I should say that a great number of people have heard this work on the gramophone, but have not had the opportunity of hearing it as often as other symphonies on account of its length and its difficulty."

The Cambridge University Musical Society recently gave a festival of British music. It began with a concert of madrigals and folk-songs, followed by a lecture by Professor Edward J. Dent on the "Church Music of the Restoration Period," given on Sunday evening in King's College Chapel. Of the music given on Sunday evening, the local report says, "the most impressive thing was Purcell's great Latin anthem, 'Jehova quam multi sunt hostes mei.' The effect of some of Purcell's funeral music played in a side chapel at the end was magical."

Why is it that so little of the music of Purcell, greatest of English composers, is heard in Boston? Much of it is not difficult, and much is most melodious. At the annual recital by Mrs. Morgan's pupils in Brookline, this spring, all of them young, there were several Purcell pieces, all well and easily played, and all beautiful. But what we need is a whole Purcell symphony program. The notes by Philip Hale would be a liberal education, and a much needed education for thousands.

The Cambridge University Society program of British music covered a period of seven hundred years and a multitude of composers. One night the madrigals were sung on the river beside King's College Bridge, the singers grouped in four boats near a drooping willow tree. "It was an ideal summer evening, fresh and green, the river bending round." It "made one realize under what makeshift conditions we habitually listen to music in concert rooms and elsewhere. Here the madrigals were simply part of the scene. Music became a thing to live with."

The whole picture and the whole story set the Bostonian to thinking of the impressive musical effects possible on our own Charles River Basin; and the popular response to such efforts would be even greater than the notable response at the English Cambridge.

EDWIN D. MEAD

Boston, Aug. 21.

MANUSCRIPT

MARY A. BROWN

25 CORTES STREET

BOSTON, MASS.

In Memoriam
Mr. Augustus Brown.

Since the death of my cousin "1916,"
I have continued his work, with which
I was familiar, as assistant, relating to
"The Boston Symphony Orchestra."
So in this "The Semi-Centennial Year"
of the Orchestra
1881-1931

It will be found 'complete' in the Music Room

The Boston Public Library

It has been a labor of love, and I have tried by all means to make it as complete as possible.

Mr. Richard Stone

Music Librarian

A - greatly interested and encouraged me.
I hope it will meet the approval
of his friends & the Public.

Jan. 1931.

The Massachusetts Division of University Extension
The Public Library of the City of Boston 1931-32

A Series of Lectures, with Music
ON THE Boston Symphony Concerts on the Thursdays preceding the Concerts at 5.15 p.m. in the

Lecture Hall, Boston Public Library
(Boylston Street Entrance)

These lectures are intended for all who wish to gain a keener enjoyment and appreciation of symphonic music whether attending concerts, "listening in," or following phonograph recordings. Based on the programmes of the regular subscription series of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, the course assures an invaluable introduction to all symphonic repertory, contributing to the understanding of the Monday and Tuesday and Pension Fund series and to other occasional concerts.

A unique feature of the course has been the coöperation of the composers in explaining their own works. In addition to the assistance of local authorities coöperating with Richard G. Appel of the Music Division of the Boston Public Library, Mr. Alfred H. Meyer has been secured to present important novelties, in the absence of the composer.

Composers assisting during 1930-31.

ARTHUR FOOTE
HOWARD HANSON

CARL MCKINLEY
ALEXANDER LANG STEINER

Composers who assisted previously.

SIR THOMAS BEECHAM
ALFREDO CASELLA
FREDERICK S. CONVERSE
AARON COPELAND
VLADIMIR DUKELSKY
HENRY EICHHEIM
HENRY F. GILBERT
EUGENE GOOSSENS

EDWARD BURLINGAME HILL
FREDERICK JACOBI
WERNER JOSTEN
DANIEL GREGORY MASON
DARIUS MILHAUD
OTTORINO RESPIGHI
ROGER HUNTINGTON SESSIONS
TIMOTHY MATHER SPELMAN
ALEXANDER TANSMAN

First lecture, Thursday, October 8 at 5.15, open to the public.
The Course will be given in three parts of 8 lectures each. $1 per Course, or $2 for the entire 24 lectures.

JAMES A. MOYER, Director, Division of University Extension

CHARLES F. D. BELDEN, Director,
Boston Public Library

ANNOUNCEMENT

A NEW BOOK—

"The BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA: 1881-1931"

By M. A. De WOLFE HOWE

Semi-Centennial Edition

It is seventeen years since M. A. De Wolfe Howe's history of the Boston Symphony Orchestra was published. The Fiftieth season of the Orchestra has seemed a fitting time to re-publish this prized narrative of its earlier days, and likewise to record, in additional chapters, the last years of Dr. Muck's conductorship, and those of Henri Rabaud, Pierre Monteux, and Dr. Serge Koussevitzky.

New appendices will include a complete list of the music played at the regular concerts, giving the dates of performances. The soloists and the personnel through fifty years are also recorded, and address on Henry Lee Higginson made by Bliss Perry at the Bach Festival, March 25, 1931.

The Semi-Centennial Edition of "The Boston Symphony Orchestra" will be issued at a retail price of $2.50. A reduction will be made, however, to patrons of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Upon receipt of a mail order for $1.50, the book will be sent to you, postpaid, immediately on its publication, the latter part of this month.

Address—W. H. BRENNAN, Symphony Hall, Boston

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA, Inc.

Operating Deficit estimated for year 1930-31	$100,000.00
Subscriptions to date	77,604.33
Balance unsubscribed	$22,395.67

It is quite evident that the deficit which was estimated at $100,000 at the beginning of the season will be fully that amount when the books are closed. It is therefore important that the balance of $22,395.67 unsubscribed should be provided, and the trustees hope very much that this may be forthcoming before the close of the season.

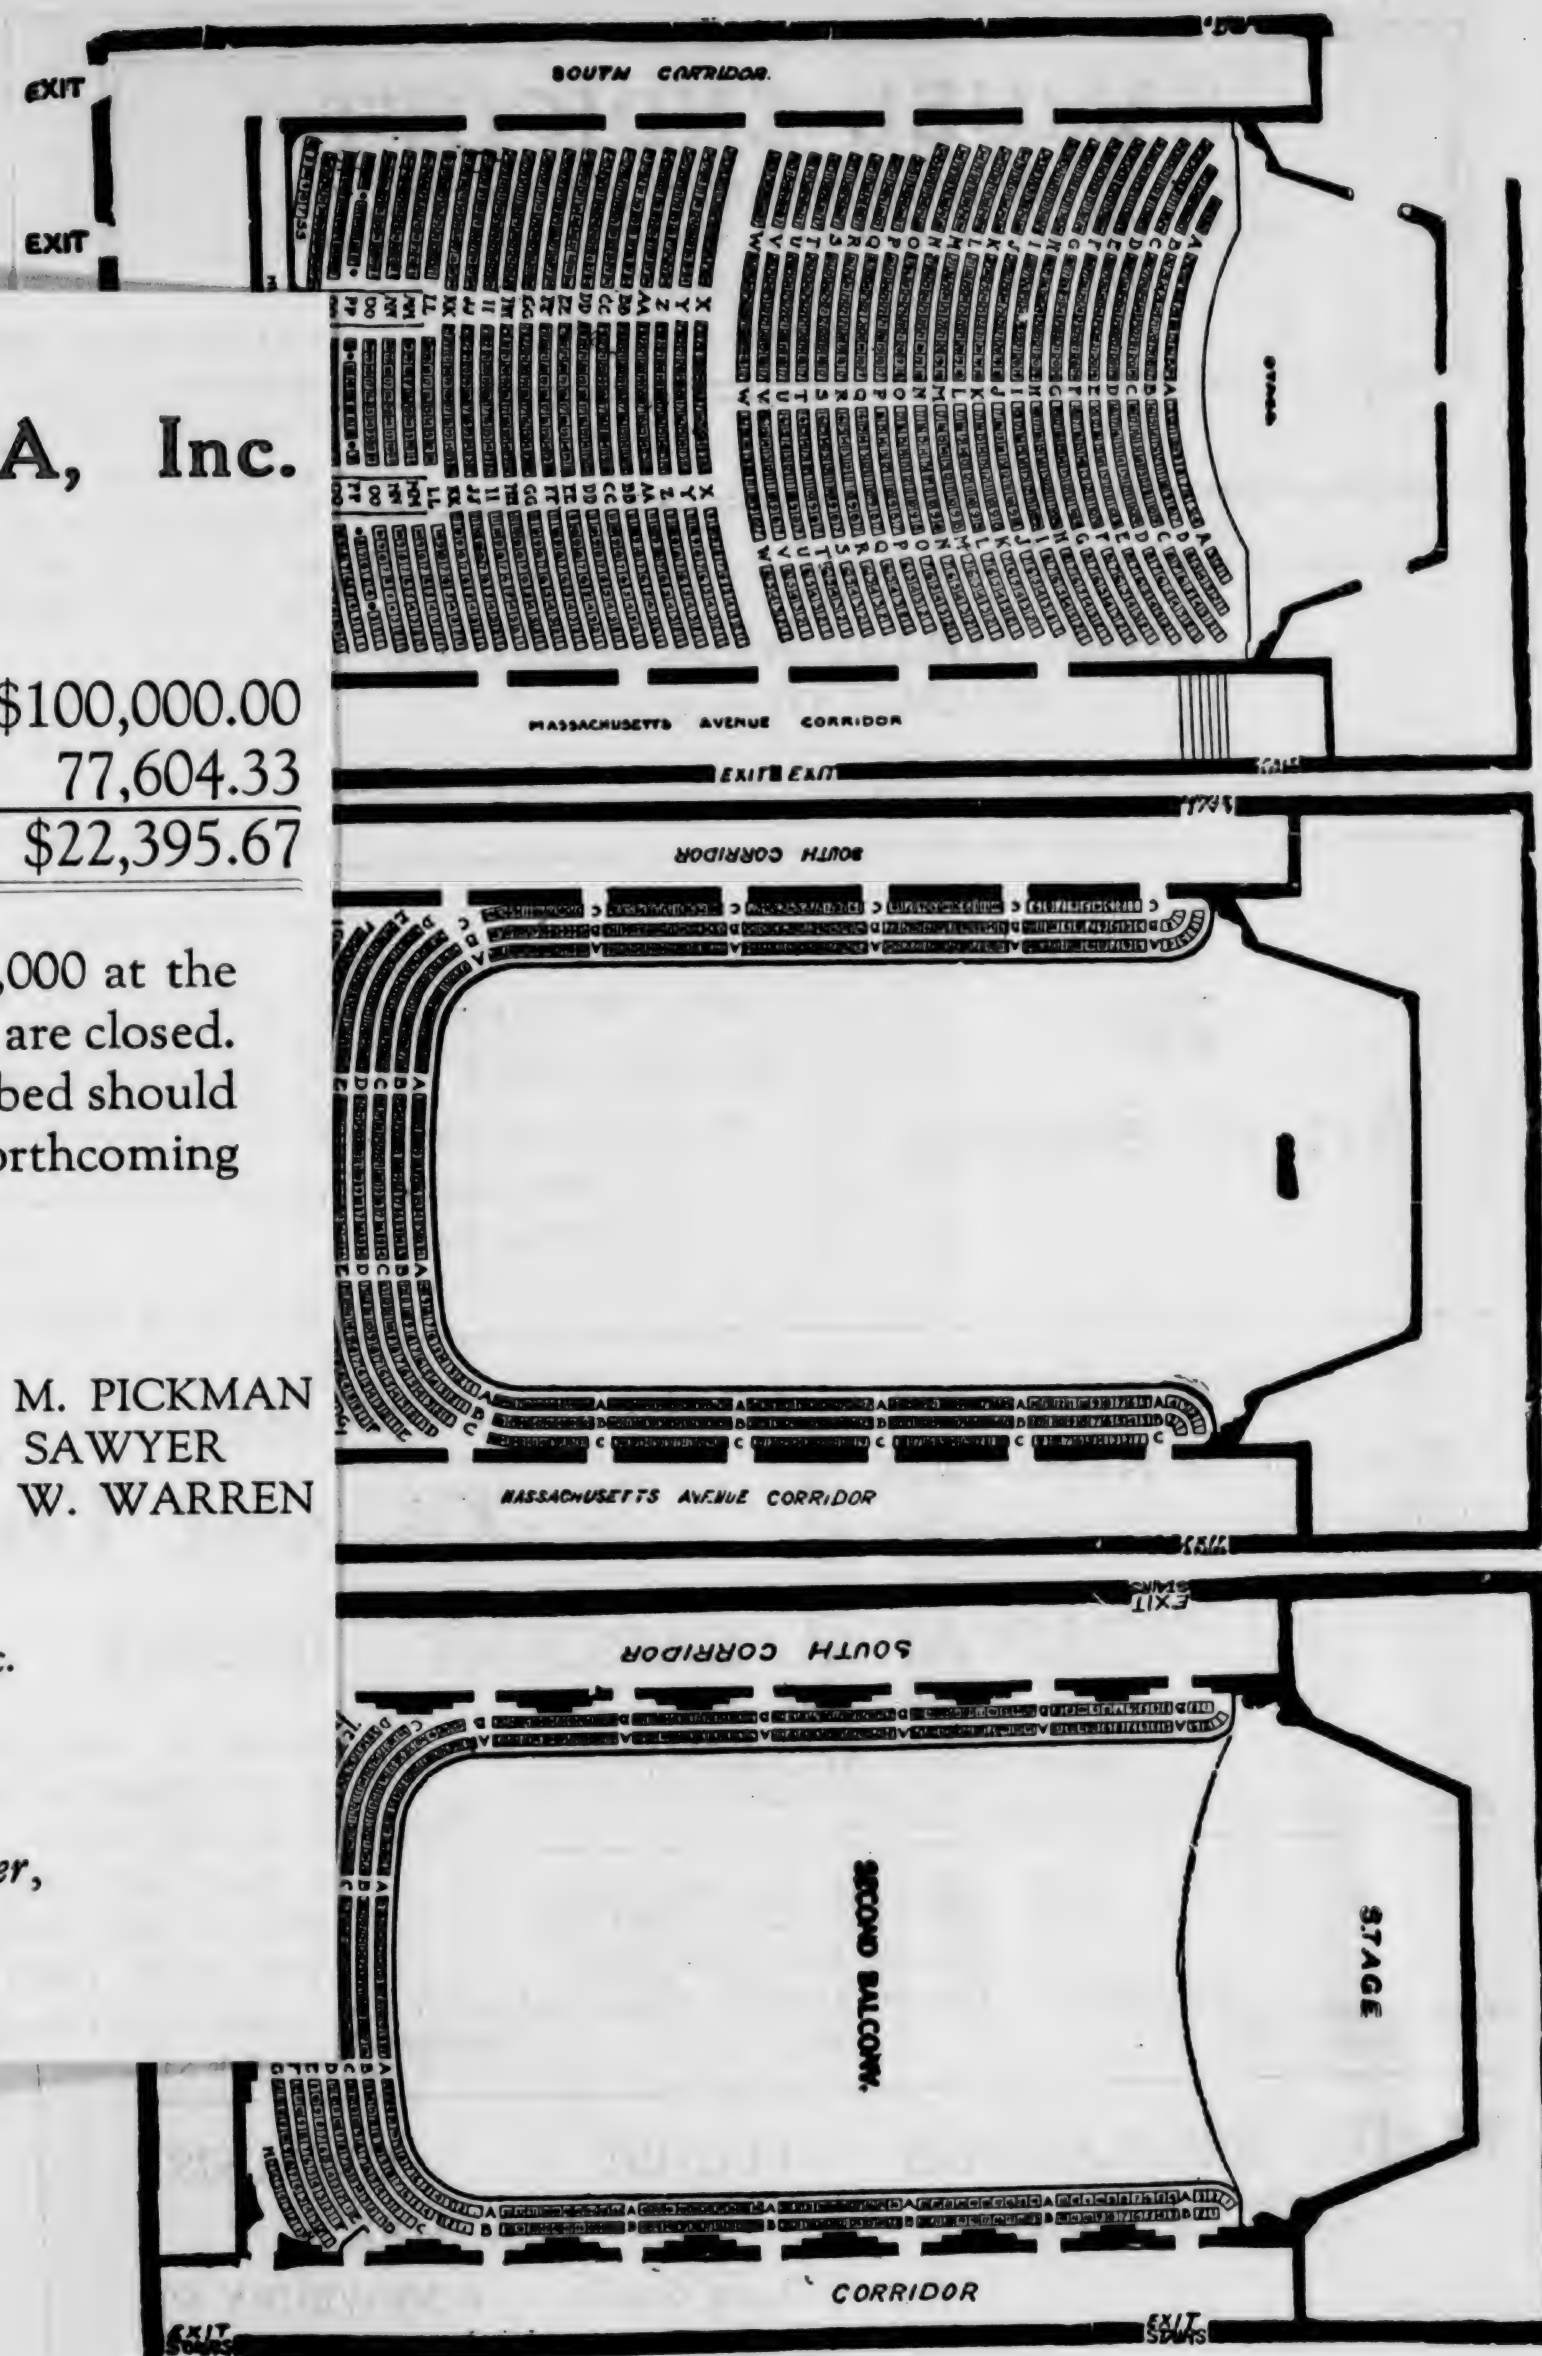

FREDERICK P. CABOT
ERNEST B. DANE
N. PENROSE HALLOWELL
M. A. DE WOLFE HOWE

JOHN ELLERTON LODGE
FREDERICK E. LOWELL
ARTHUR LYMAN
WILLIAM PHILLIPS

EDWARD M. PICKMAN
HENRY B. SAWYER
BENTLEY W. WARREN

The Officers and Trustees of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Inc.

Subscriptions should be sent to E. B. DANE, Treasurer, 6 Beacon Street, Boston, Mass.

BOSTON SY

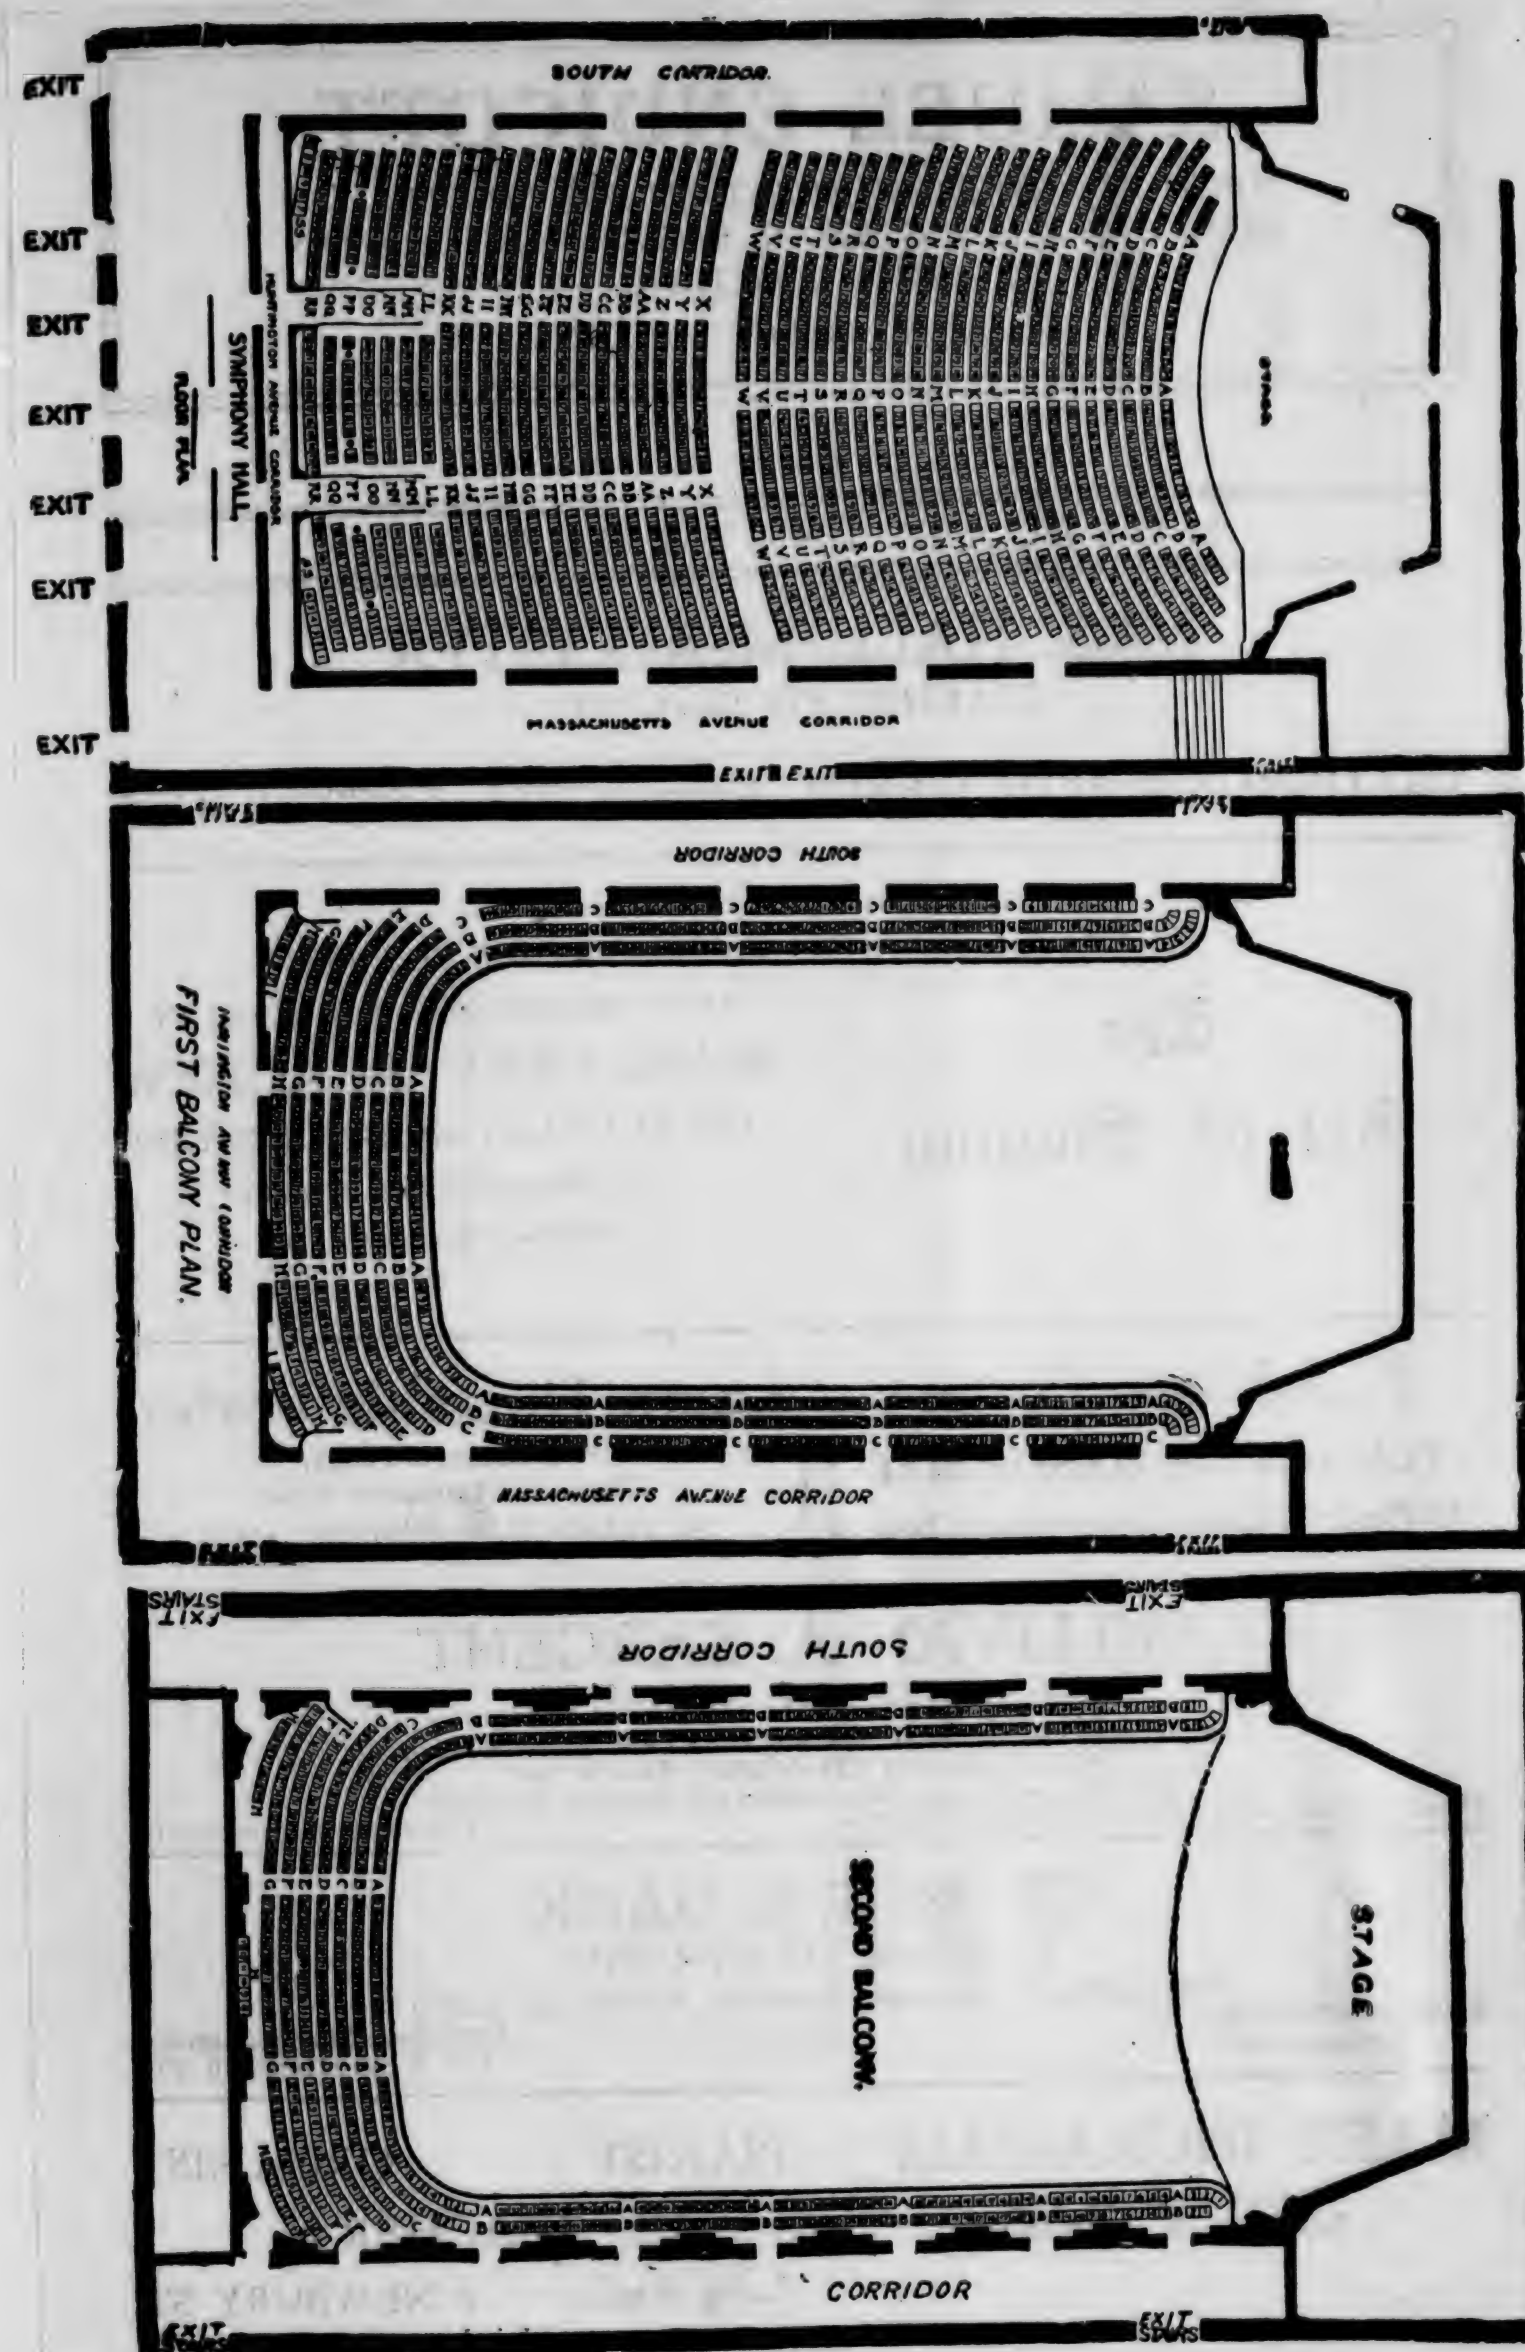

Operating Deficit e
Subscriptions to da Balance unsubscrib

It is quite evident th beginning of the seas
It is therefore import be provided, and the before the close of t

FREDERICK P. CABOT
ERNEST B. DANE
N. PENROSE HALLOWE
M. A. DE WOLFE HOWE

The Officers

Subscription

LIST of CASTS in SYMPHONY HALL

As you face the stage, the casts on the right, beginning with the one nearest the stage, are as follows: Faun with Infant Bacchus (Naples); Apollo Citharoedus (Rome); Girl of Herculaneum (Dresden); Dancing Faun (Rome); Demosthenes (Rome); Sitting Anacreon (Copenhagen); Euripides (Rome); Diana of Versailles (Paris).

The casts on the left are the Faun of Praxiteles (Rome); Amazon (Berlin); Hermes Logios (Paris); Lemnian Athena (Dresden, head in Bologna); Sophocles (Rome); Standing Anacreon (Copenhagen); Aeschines (Naples); Apollo Belvedere (Rome).

The reliefs in the passage are: Bacchic Procession (Naples); Orpheus, Eurydice, and Hermes (Naples).

LIST of CASTS in SYMPHONY HALL

As you face the stage, the casts on the right, beginning with the one nearest the stage, are as follows: Faun with Infant Bacchus (Naples); Apollo Citharoedus (Rome); Girl of Herculaneum (Dresden); Dancing Faun (Rome); Demosthenes (Rome); Sitting Anacreon (Copenhagen); Euripides (Rome); Diana of Versailles (Paris).

The casts on the left are the Faun of Praxiteles (Rome); Amazon (Berlin); Hermes Logios (Paris); Lemnian Athena (Dresden, head in Bologna); Sophocles (Rome); Standing Anacreon (Copenhagen); Aeschines (Naples); Apollo Belvedere (Rome).

The reliefs in the passage are: Bacchic Procession (Naples); Orpheus, Eurydice, and Hermes (Naples).

SEP 30 1932

CONTINUED ON NEXT REEL